There is the same opposition to-day to any attempt to renew Maclean's influence and give the workers access to the full facts of his career and—more important still—to his writings. (In that Autobiography Gallacher pays full tribute to Maclean's tireless energy and his magnificent Anti-war work, but coupled with this lip-service there is not only a significant failure to treat Maclean's ideas seriously or tell the truth of the disgraceful way in which his work to secure a Scottish Socialist Party was undermined when he was in jail, and the Communist Party of Great Britain formed instead. Above all, Gallacher makes out that Maclean was finally so broken up by his prison experiences as to be mentally irresponsible. Maclean's disgust with his betrayers is misrepresented as a growing jealousy and inability to work with others. Maclean's apprehensions with regard to prison treatment are scoffed at as the delusions of a man unbalanced by a persecution-complex (Gallacher forgetting that his personal experiences as a short-term prisoner have no relevance with regard to the treatment accorded to a long-term prisoner). MacShane follows Gallacher in all these damnable insinuations as one sheep follows another through a gap in a dyke. Having the whole of the biographical material in my hands, and having regard to the first-hand testimony of intimate friends of Maclean, and to the unimpaired acuity of understanding and coherence of expression revealed in Maclean's writings at this very time when Gallacher and MacShane would fain persuade us he was mentally diseased, I have no hesitation whatever in dismissing this atrocious story. It has obviously been manufactured to discredit his advocacy at this time of Scottish Workers' Republicanism, which is represented as a typical distortion of an aberrant mind.

This is no new expedient in politics, nor is it new in regard to Scottish Republicanism. Thomas Muir and Fletcher of Saltoun have similarly had doubts cast on their mental soundness, and one of the intentions in resorting to this infamous expedient in respect of Maclean is, undoubtedly, an anxiety to represent his advocacy of Scottish Workers' Republicanism as a new and unheralded departure and hide the fact that on the contrary Maclean came at the end of a long sequence of Scottish Radical and Republican thinkers, that this doctrine is as Rudolf Bringhamm, William Ferris and other writers on the Gaelic Commonwealth show a doctrine profoundly related to our hidden Gaelic traditions, and that in coming to it Maclean was not the victim of a mental disequilibrium, nor (as MacShane basely suggests) merely imitative of the Irish movement, but realising the deepest impulses of his whole nature in their final and highest form, and that so far from indicating any mental breakdown this development is in logical accord with the entire evolution of his political thought, and did not betray, but crowned his career, its relationship to all that had gone before, its consistency with his profound grasp of the whole situation in which Scotland was involved, and the forthrightness, courage, and power with which he avowed his stand for Scotland being in themselves enough to dispose at once of the suggestion that Maclean's brain was in any way impaired. I say no more at the moment of these vicious and unscrupulous suggestions since I deal with the whole matter more fuly in my second article. Suffice it for the time being to quote and reaffirm what I said on this score a year or two ago in my pamphlet, "Scotland; and the Question of a Popular Front against Fascism and War."

The depth of his Marxian analysis forced John Maclean to stand for Scottish Autonomy, and a Scottish Workers' Republic. The betrayal of Maclean's line by the Communist Party of Great Britain has resulted in a loss to Scottish Socialism beyond all reckoning. Even William Gallacher, M.P., who was primarily responsible for it, admits this, by implication, in his Autobiography. It is obvious that until the Communist Party abandons its present line and reverts to the lead given by John Maclean, it can never carry the masses of the Scottish people. A similar position was to be found in Catalonia—but there the Communist Party altered its line, and, as a direct result, its membership went up by leaps and bounds." Communism in Scotland was poisoned at its very well-spring by this betrayal of John Maclean, and can never do any good till it gets rid of of the damnable distortion so introduced and, along with the distortion, the false comrades, still active in the councils of the C.P. who were responsible for the betrayal Maclean never forgave or forgot.

What I have said in the foregoing paragraphs gives one of the reasons for the unconscionable delay in producing a biography of Maclean—to do so is to handle lightning. To have Maclean depicted to the life in an adequate biography might be to revive his unique and unprecedented influence with the Scottish workers. The working class movement in Scotland to-day is full of people like Iglesias's Spanish followers—"Opium Poppies" (adomideras) as they were called—a lot of honest folk, somewhat small-minded and devoted to the cult of the pretty virtues, if possible non-smokers and good workers, good fathers of their families, afraid above all to go too far." Humbly and modestly hoping that the rich may take a greater interest in the workers. Striving not for social equality but for the betterment of the workers. Their "leaders" (saving the mark) love the retail, the precedent, and the routine. Punctilious administration is their main strength. Almost all of them have been workers. They have, as Andrade puts it, been educated "not in the class struggle but in administrative patience." They were, and remain, afraid of John Maclean. So his career has been subjected to a general conspiracy of silence, while fame, as great Scotsmen, has been attributed to titled nonentities, party hacks, and all manner of sycophants and swindlers "whom the King has delighted to honour," in the country at large and in the working-class movement. There has been a failure in all too many quarters to profit by the lessons of the tragic fate of the great German and Austrian Social Democratic Organisations, an absence of concrete plans and a clear theory, and a general prevalence of the weakness best summed up on the Spanish word "Confusionismo." Maclean has not been forgotten, of course, by the class whose cause he so splendidly championed, though a great deal has happened since, a mass of bewildering developments and new alignments, and it is not easy at this distance to describe all the outs-and-ins and manifold bearings of the positions he adopted, and show that not a single one can be denounced as erroneous or misconceived from the standpoint of a thorough grasp of dialectical materialism no matter what changed positions in this respect or that the Communist Party in Russia or elsewhere may have adopted since. To show that would call for such a mastery of Marxism as Maclean himself possessed—and apparently no other Scot has yet attained. But the stumbling-block is perhaps less the difficulty than the danger. Maclean's was a great outgoing spirit with a fearless assurance of his Socialist integrity informing everything that he said and did, and this is in itself unpopular to-day in a country where even the majority of Communists are legalistic line-toers, who seem to regard Communism as a "guarded flame" that must be sedulously shielded from the rude blasts that encompass it, and move as if walking on eggs for fear any inadvertent step or the next word they utter may land them in heresy and result in their expulsion from the Party. A state of alarm which, of course, is general to-day and by no means restricted to members of the C.P. The general feeling is that there are few quarters now in which it is not definitely far too dangerous to say boo to a goose. For, as a friend of mine wrote me, after a recent visit to Scotland, "There is not the slightest doubt that at the moment fear is reigning supreme, and the dialectical process just now seems to be to huddle together. Anyway, there is a complete lack of individual assertion, and the man who does assert ever so slightly is to be crushed."

Apart from this general condition of affairs, it is especially crude to be obviously Scottish; much better get any rude provincial difference of that sort polished away, and share the blessings of English civilisation, compared to which the Scottish tradition is mere barbarism (as a Fife litterateur, a typical "superior person," has put it, unaware that during his last great trial Maclean, with his wonderful proleptic faculty, said—"I should say the last place in which a revolution would take place would be Fife." Assimilation to English standard, this literary gentleman tells us, is the criterion of good breeding. It is "dreadfully immature to be irreconciliably opposed to English Imperialism." English culture is taken as synonymous with civilisation, nor does its present condition suggest that there should be inverted commas round the word, and any clinging to the broken tradition of Scots language and literature (let alone any "damned Celtic romanticism") is dismissed as "mere childishness" and the "most nonsensical trash." It behoves reasonable Scots to-day to recognise that the issue has already been finally decided against them, and to adjust themselves to English culture, with all the grace and even gratitude they can muster. Yet this writer calls himself a Socialist! It is, of course, only the cultural snobism of a renegade Scot and lick-spittle of English Imperialism. For Fife, at the time he wrote, had become the centre of the Scottish Literary Movement, subverted from the revolutionary programme of its imitators by fascisising tendencies, and already hand in hand with the dangerous policy which had begun to fill Scotland with a proliferation of Fascistic Boards and Development Councils and offer a pseudo-satisfaction to Scottish Nationalism by transferring the Scottish Office to impressive new buildings in Edinburgh.

No wonder a blind eye is turned to John Maclean's place in Scottish history while all this is going on, for the essence of Maclean's whole position when he declared that he stood for a Scottish Workers' Autonymous Republic, lay in a recognition of the fact that Capitalist Development is at a more advanced stage in Scotland than in England (therefore, too, Fascism is further developed) and that in addition to the Capitalist exploitation which the workers in Scotland suffer in common with the workers in England, Scotland is subject also to Imperialist oppression from which England is free. It was Maclean's recognition of the fact that just as Connolly said of Ireland that the social revolution would be incomplete without a national revolution, so in Scotland here it is obvious that the objectives of the social revolution can only be realised if it eventuates in autonomy on a Communist basis, which gave him his unique power as the greatest revolutionary leader of the Scottish Workers, and it is unthinkable that the Scottish workers will ever respond in like fashion to anyone who lacks a similar perception of the specifically Scottish question.

In saying this, I am adverting to Keir Hardie's admonition that Socialism would have been given a much greater impetus if Scottish Socialists had given pre-eminence to Scottish Independence alongside the Irish Independence issue, and to the splendid lead given by John Maclean, which circumstances since have so amply vindicated, viz. (from his Gorbals Election Address, 1923), "Scotland's wisest policy is to declare for a Republic in Scotland, so that the youths of Scotland will not be forced out to die for England's markets. I accordingly stand out as a Scottish Republican candidate, feeling sure that if Scotland had to elect a Parliament to sit in Scotland it would vote for a Working-Class Parliament. Such a Parliament would have to use the might of the workers to force Scotland, and the means of production in Scotland, out of the grasp of the brutal few who control them, and place them at the full disposal of the community. The Social Revolution is possible sooner in Scotland than in England. The working class policy ought to be to break up the Empire to avert war and enable the workers to triumph in every country and colony. Scottish separation is part of the process of England's Imperial disintegration and is a help towards the ultimate triumph of the workers of the world. . . . Had the Labour men stayed in Glasgow and started a Scottish Parliament, as did the genuine Irish in Dublin in 1918, England would have sat up and made concessions to Scotland just to keep her ramshackle Empire intact to bluff other countries. . . . Ireland will only get her Republic when Scotland gets hers."

It is so eminently reasonable a line as to brook no gainsaying—the opposite of all the "I do believe in Freedom's cause, as far away as Poland is" business. In Russia, the rebellion of the suppressed Nationalists considerably aided the workers' revolution. In Spain it performed a similar function.. It turns a great many of middle-class people against the Central Government, the separatist fights for decentralisation, threatens the State with pulverisation, and, when successful, weakens the resistance the Central Government can put up against the revolutionary movement,.' and despite Edwin Muir's supercilious contentions in his "Scott and Scotland," the Scots language is no less susceptible of educated classes in the 16th century; but continued to be spoken by the lower classes, by "illiterate peasants,'" and by "the rabble of the town." "Nationalist movements are sound, justified, and usually irresistible." The Scottish movement will be no exception. The real trouble is that in Germany a combination of clever propaganda and of fierce and inhuman terror have managed to obsess the public mind with problems of foreign policy. In England, the astuteness of the ruling class, and the suicidal tendencies of the Parliamentary Opposition, have obtained a similar result and concentrated public attention, even within the Labour Movement, upon the question of Imperial policy to the exclusion of everything else." It is high time Scotland was completely taken up with the problems of internal policy instead. Every means will be taken to prevent anything of the sort happening. The Irish "troubles" will be child's play in comparison to the bloody repression visited upon Scotland by the English Government should any such tendency develop. Yet we would win, as the Irish did, and with far less loss to the Scottish Nation than for no good end, we sustained in the First Imperialist War, and are to-day again sustaining in the Second one.

SIR PATRICK DOLLAN.

Parliamentarism has arrived and P. J. Dollan received his Knighthood on January 1st, 1941. This is the climax of many years alleged Socialist Parliamentarism and strenuous denial of Anti-Parliamentarian "slanders." Press comments on Sir Patrick Dollan's title—and significant press omissions as to his 1916-1918 Conchie-days' activities—will appear next month. As a Socialist, we have never believed in honours or honours' list. If we did, even under capitalism, we know of men belonging to the City of Glasgow, who are not Socialists and seek no careers, whose names should figure in such lists. Those responsible for drawing up the list would honour themselves by including such names. But that would be departure from routine and would be unforgivable. Dollan receives the conventional title for conventional services. The award becomes the man. It proclaims to the world his utter and complete mediocrity. In a city of misery, representing one of the most miserable divisions of the city, he has arrived. He receives a Knighthood—like the Lord Provost before him for having failed to do battle with the dragon of poverty and war—the monster of capitalist exploitation.

KING'S SPEECH DEBATE.

The debate on John McGovern's amendment will be discussed fully in the February Word. The voting list will be analysed. Also, the debate on 18B. We are publishing full parliamentary reports of these vital discussions, as they affect human progress towards a world of peace and commonweal, and our traditional and historic rights of liberty of thought and association.

OLIVER BROWN'S PAMPHLETS.

Two excellent fact pamphlets from the pen of Oliver Brown, M.A., are being circulated and may be obtained from our office. They are: Scotland and Westminster, published at 2d., in which the author adduces facts to make a plea for a Scottish Socialist Government; and The Hypocrisy and Folly of This War, including Will Dyson's prophetic 1919 cartoon, reprinted from the Daily Herald. This is published at 1d. Both pamphlets will be sent post-free for 4½d. They are on sale at most Labour and Socialist bookshops.

We believe that the author has another pamphlet in hand. This will be published by the I.L.P. in due course.

LAWYERS & CONSCIENCE

Lawyers are not suspected of scruples. Sometimes they are supposed to be brilliant. During 1940, a number of lawyers appeared before Conscientious Objectors' Tribunals in England and Wales, to express and define their scruples. None of them appeared very brilliant. Only two were treated with consideration, and only one secured absolute exemption.

John Harvey Robson, of The Mount, Causey Hill, Hexham, the well-known barrister of the North-Eastern Circuit, was unconditionally registered as a conscientious objector at Newcastle Tribunal on Tuesday, August 20.

Robson, a member of the Church of England, said that at the beginning of the war he expressed a desire to do any work for the nation which was not directly or indirectly associated with belligerent activities.

Sir Luke Thompson: What do you mean by directly or indirectly associated with any belligerent activities?—I mean activity connected with the prosecution of the war.

J. S. Aston, a solicitor, of Stanhope Avenue, Church End, appeared before the Law Courts Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal on Friday, August 23. Asked if he would fight a war to end war, Aston replied "No." The Tribunal allowed Aston's name to remain on the register of conscientious objectors subject to his doing work on the land or A.R.P. work.

Sir Stafford Cripps is one of the most distinguished lawyers of our time and highly successful as an income earner. His son, John Stafford Cripps, is not a lawyer, but he has been reared in the legal atmosphere. So his appeal before the Oxford Tribunal, on Wednesday, September 3, has a place here. He was registered to do work of national importance.

Cripps submitted that war was irreconcilable with the Christian belief in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man . He left Oxford University in 1934, had worked at the Oxford Institute of Agricultural Economics, and for nearly two years was on the staff of The Countryman. At one time he was prospective Parliamentary Labour candidate for Exeter.

The chairman (Judge Drucquer) said the Tribunal was of opinion that Cripp's work on The Countryman was of national importance, but, in addition, he would be required to do agricultural or horticultural work or market gardening for two days a week.

The Liverpool Tribunal registered for non-combatant duties a solicitor, well known in the city, Stanley Williams, aged 29, of Glenwyllin Road, Crosby, who appeared on religious grounds as a member of the Calvinistic Methodist Church of Wales.

Williams told the Tribunal that, in spite of the merits of the cause, he could not conscientiously inflict suffering upon others.

"I rather feel I must work for the alleviation of the suffering of humanity, whatever may be the cause of such suffering. As I cannot conscientiously draw any distinction between suffering soldiers and other human beings I am ready to succour soldiers on the battlefield or elsewhere."

Professor W. Lyon Blease, Professor of Law in the University of Liverpool, spoke to the sincerity and ability of Williams.

The next day the Leeds Tribunal granted conditional exemption to a Leeds solicitor, Joseph Rowntree Naish, aged 32, of 27 Cumberland Avenue, Headingly, Leeds. The condition was that Naish continued work as an inspector for the N.S.P. C. C., which work he had undertaken on account of the shortage of inspectors.

Naish impressed this awkward Tribunal with his sincerity, and even Judge Stewart said:—

"This man is sincere. This is one of the cases which justifies this Act being on the Statute Book. I only wish I could say that of some of the others."

Evidence showed that Naish had been a member of the Society of Friends since birth. He had always held strong views against war and militarism. He served as "poor man's lawyer" in the East Street district of Leeds. His work for the N.S.P.C.C. was unpaid.

On Wednesday, October 2, the London Tribunal, sitting at the Law Courts, registered for non-combatant duties Robert Norman Law, a solicitor, of 44 Queen's Road, Reading. Law was very conciliatory. He told the Tribunal that as a follower of Christ he was convinced he was prohibited from taking human life. An elder of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, he had held pacifist views for a number of years.

Announcing the decision of the Tribunal Judge Hancock said:

"I would have thought that as a lawyer applicant would have seen there is a possibility he is wrong. He thinks he is infallible, but he quite honestly and sincerely holds these views."

Among the applicants for exemption from military service appearing before the North Wales Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal at Caernarvon on Wednesday, October 9, was Daniel Gwyndalf Williams, solicitor, Portmadoc.

In his statement he said:

"I am fully conscious that a victory for Hitler and the forces behind him would destroy our democratic system of government, deprive us of our traditional liberties, and overthrow those standards of human conduct to which, after a struggle of many centuries, we have achieved."

Williams added that he did not think that Hitlerism could be destroyed by the resistance of military force. Such a method was also evil because it involved the very wrongs which we sought to eradicate.

The chairman (Judge Sir Thomas Artemus Jones)—Supposing a number of Germans were to land at Portmadoc and martial law was declared, you would then be subject to military control?

The Applicant—I would refuse to comply if they asked me to do things which were in conflict with my conscinece. He added that he had no objection to doing humanitarian work not under military control, nor to work on the land to help his fellow-men.

Williams was registered to do full-time hospital work.

The following day a barrister-at-law, and member of the Welsh Nationalist Party, named Drfydd Arwyn Jenkins, was ordered to do non-combatant work by the same Tribunal sitting at Aberystwyth.

Jenkins had appeared on behalf of Welsh Nationalists at previous tribunals, and was the organising secretary of the Welsh language in the Law Courts Petition Committee.

Applicant was called to the Bar six years ago, He objected to military duties of all kinds. He recognised that some forms of non-combatant service in the Army were in themselves beneficial, but they would not exist apart from war, and their first purpose was to help the war.

At the end of his examination the chairman (Sir T. Artemus Jones) remarked: "I hope many barristers do not hold your views."

B.B.C. AND OBJECTORS

The Daily Herald, on December 10, last, announced that the B.B.C. chiefs had informed one of their officials that he would be dismissed as soon as they were notified by the Ministry of Labour that he had registered as a conscientious objector.

They also told him that the B.B.C. would refuse to recognise the decision of a tribunal that he should continue in his employment.

A memorandum circulated among B.B.C. employees states:

"It has recently been decided by the Board of Governors that conscientious objectors who have registered under the National Service Act shall have their engagement terminated forthwith.

"If and when they obtain non-combatant service with the Forces the Corporation will be prepared to consider applications by them for reinstatement."

MAN IS IMMORTAL

By THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

[The following notes of criticism on Why Jesus Wept were addressed to the author by the Duke of Bedford. The notes are interesting and will inspire discussion. The author maintains his position and will defend it in due course. He does not believe in the existence of a god. He believes in the mortal soul of man. He inclines to believe in the fact of the existence of Jesus, the man, and regards Jesus as a prophet of human emancipation. But he also believes that those who hold contrary views ought to be heard.—Ed.]

*p.*5—The chief objections to the rejection of the idea of immortality seems to me to be.

1. That it rules out the possibility of the existence of a good and loving god and it seems to me that there is a great deal of sound reason for believing in the existence of such a god.
2. That it invokes us in the necessity of regarding as mistaken on this point many of the best and wisest men who have ever lived—first and foremost Christ himself.
3. Belief in a future life has been a source of comfort and inspiration to countless very fine people. It is a very rare thing for error to be a deep source of comfort and inspiration to many such people. Indeed I can think of no parallel case.
4. It is difficult to see by what process the immortal personality can come to an end or why separation from its "house," the body, should cause it to do so.

*p.*8—It is not very easy to see why Jesus wept on the twenty fourth occassion on which He is recorded as having done so. There is no reason to suppose that the things mentioned here were in his mind when he saw the distress of Lazarus' relatives.

Objection to the Virgin Birth always goes hand in hand with rejection of Christ's divinity. If He were what He claimed to be, Virgin Birth was the most mortal method for Him to enter the world.

"Reality" contains some very thought provoking arguments for the existence of a Christlike god. There is certainly no evidence of the existence of any other.

*p.*9—Polygamy may have physical advantages, anyhow for women in a society where women predominate in numbers but the mental and spiritual drawbacks to polygamous unions, involving the children, also, of such unions are very grave if you are aiming at anything approaching ideal relations between men and women and ideal conditions for the upbringing of children.

*p.*10—It would be more true to say that Jesus stood for a way of life independent of class. It is true He began as a working man but when He started his mission He annoyed His fellow-workers by His possession of a degree of education and spiritual knowledge which was not normal to carpenters.

*p.*12—The Labour M.P. twisted Christ's words rather oddly to suit his purpose. The context shows quite plainly that Jesus was merely warning His followers against excessive preoccupation with material things to the neglect of spiritual.

*p.*13—Revolutionary "force," perhaps, but not revolutionary violence.

*p.*15—It is untrue that Christianity did not teach the immortality of the soul. It was not the only religion to teach it.

*p.*24—"Consolation to a malefactor"—by, according to your view, telling him a lie! You say there can be no paradise.

*p.*27—If there was no resurrection how do the unorthodox account for the sudden and amazing change in the disciples' character and outlook, and their willingness to face death for proclaiming what they knew to be a lie?

*p.*27—What if the Divine possesses such powers of self-limitation on the one hand and aid to men on the other if the right conditions are fulfilled that Jesus as God's explanation of Himself to man is not outside the realm of human evolution?

A Theist must reject the divinity of Jesus only if he disbelieves in the nature of god being love. Love solitary is unthinkable. A Deity which is Love by its own nature cannot have been solitary before the creation of the world.

*p.*30—No conception of man's can, in ultimate analysis, be other than anthropomorphic.

My definition of a Christian (as distinct from Christlike man) is one who believes Christ to be the Divine Son of God and bears a reasonable degree of resemblance to him in character and outlook.

*p.*34—Had it not been for fundamentalism and the unmoral doctrine of the atonement held by the idolaters of the Bible there would have been no Unitarian Church and no protest against the very reasonable conception of a Deity whose nature is Love existing in a triune form and not in a solitary one.

*p.*64—I do not think the real Christian ever suggests that there is virtue in the mere fact of being, far from it. It is the quality of life that matters. Few enlightened Christians to-day deny the probability of future existence for animals. A good soul would not be unduly grieved by the thought that another soul had gone the other way if it knew that it had gone the other way only after deliberately refusing all the appeals of Perfect Love to do otherwise—the appeals and the efforts to help. To the good there can be nothing pitiable, attractive or lovable about the wholly evil and its annihilation. The contrary feeling is based on two false old-fashioned religious ideas.

1. The doctrine of eternal torment—a ghostly theory.

2. The suggestion that people may be exter nally lost who may not be wholly evil and may not have refused every possible chance. This too is a horrible and unchristian idea and no good soul, certainly, could contemplate it with, peace of mind.

"If we act uprightly to-day we are pleased to-day." There is a measure of truth here but there is a suggestion of somewhat selfish or at anyrate self-regardant morality! Moreover there are occasions when doing right can mean gethsemane and not a nice warm glow of self-righteousness! Many people can act meanly and enjoy themselves nearly or quite all their lives, especially if their lives are ended suddenly in their early prime. I knew an extremely selfish though able and courageous young man who was killed in the last war. He enjoyed himself hugely—often at other people's expense—and also enjoyed the war—until it killed him!

Why could not a man be punished in the hereafter if his conscience did not trouble him much in this life. Could a man who enjoyed himself through physical pleasures and by exploiting the defenceless and good-natured be punished by having to live with the selfish in a state which did not admit of physical pleasures?

Immortal existence in the company of good and happy people could be a tremendous joy and recompense to anyone whose good life on earth had involved much suffering and separation from loved ones. The theory of rewards and punishments is fundamental truth—you yourself admit its operation in this life. A man's character is to a great extent reward or punishment here—but not always or perfectly. In the hereafter the process is perfected and carried to its logical conclusion.

Why does the doctrine make God an upholder of a world of fundamental discord? Annihilation is the final end of the wholly evil. Hell comes before annihilation which is the only act of final kindness which Love can bestow on the wholly evil. Many thousands believe in immortality.

*p.*66—It has been my experience that the more man understands himself the more he is aware of the need and value of God. What if God be the biggest part of truth? Christ said He was the Truth and also that He was one with God. I have never yet met a man who denied the existence of God and his own need for God who was any good at helping, redeeming and making the best of really awkward and unpleasant people. Many such men are very nice with nice people but the other sort soon brings them to the end of their patience and their resources. (They often bring me to the end of mine, but there are, thank God, many truer Christians than I, some of whom I have been privileged to know!).

There are many interesting, true and helpful things in Why Jesus Wept, even though you have rather made Jesus in the image of your own social doctrine!

Those who deny the Divinity of Jesus while praising the man always involve themselves in the dilemma of taking as their hero someone who was terribly mistaken in a great deal that He said and thought; or, alternatively, if they ascribe all Jesus' supposed references to God as human inventions, they leave the gospels so fearfully mutilated and the work of such romancers the that one wonders how much of what is left of the record of Jesus' life and teaching may not also be untrue.

CAN ANYTHING BE WORSE THAN WAR

Dr Earnest A. Hooton, of Harvard, world-famous anthropologist, said some things at the recent session of the Harvard Summer School which are worth pondering.

Referring to the present plight of Europe, he declared that it was traceable to the World War of 1914-18, since that war was "largely responsible for the decline in human physique, intelligence and morality which has led in Europe to the abandonment of individual liberty and free institutions."

Continuing, he said:—

"War kills and cripples the best and most vigorous of the breeding stock and wreaks havoc upon the nervous and endocrine organization of potential mothers, thereby lowering the quality of the offspring which they produce. It depresses nutritional and general environmental conditions, so that a post-war generation is conceived in pathology and born in despair."

This, of course, is nothing new. It was the preachment for years of Dr. David Starr Jordan, who argued as an eminent biologist that war sapped the race of those very qualities of blood and breed, of body, mind and spirit, which could alone maintain the civilization for which war was being fought. War, in other words, strikes at the very roots of those very things which are presented by non-pacifists as the justification of war. Which immediately raises the question—Can anything be worse than war? Yes, we are told—the loss of liberty is worse than war.

But war itself loses this very liberty for which you choose to fight, as witness Professor Hooton's statement that the last war led straight to that "abandonment of individual liberty and free institutions" which has annihilated European civilization. Yes—the loss of national entity, we are told, is worse than war. But how many European nations have now lost their national existence just because of that "decline in human physique, intelligence, and morality" which was the result of the last war?

"It is better to die fighting on our feet," we are told flamboyantly these days, "than to live bowing on our knees." But what if the fighting on our feet forces us feebly to our knees, where we perish of weakness and despair? War is itself the complete destroyer. Only by abandoning war can we hope to save anything. The last war brought us starvation, misery, chaos, Naziism, Hitler, the present horror. Yet there are those who would go to war again—to save mankind!

Unity, Chicago, August 19, 1940.

In the United States, many religious leaders have urged respect for conscientious objectors and their scruples. Among those who have testified before House and Senate committee hearings on the conscript bill were Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, of the Riverside Presbyterian Church in New York City; the Right Reverend W. Appleton Lawrence, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Western Massachusetts; James A. Crain, Executive Secreaary, Department of Social Education and Social Action, Disciples of Christ; C. F. Boss, Jr., Executive Secretary of the General CConference Comm. on World Peace, Methodist Episcopal Church; and Paul C. French, representing the Friends General Conference.

ORPHEUS CHOIR BAN

It was announced in the press on Monday, December 2, that Sir Hugh Roberton, founder and conductor of the famous Glasgow Orpheus Choir, has been refused further broadcasts by the B.B.C. because he is a pacifist. The report added:—

"The choir, which was to have broadcast on Wednesday next, has refused to go on without him, and the transmission has been cancelled."

The following statement was issued from Broadcasting House, London:—

"The B.B.C. does not, in time of war, invite to the microphone anyone publicly known to be opposed to the national effort.

"As Sir Hugh Roberton has reaffirmed the views he has publicly expressed on this subject, the B.B.C. could not, as it would otherwise have done, invite him to appear at the microphone with the Orpheus Choir."

The dispute was carried a step further on December 4 by a public statement by Mr F. H. Bisset, president of the choir. Mr Bisset pointed out that he does not share Sir Hugh's views on the war, neither do the other officers of the choir. The choir is a purely musical organisation.

Commenting on the B.B.C.'s action, he said:—

"Joan of Arc has been a long time dead, but it appears that the English heresy-hunter still runs to type.

"The choir, it appears, is no longer to broadcast," he went on. "Sir Hugh Roberton—regarded by those who know as the most distinguished living conductor of 'a capella' choral music—has, it seems, quite another side to his character. The B.B.C. has made the shocking discovery that he is a pacifist, and apparently, in some queer way, this connects up with his work as a musician.

"But because Sir Hugh is a professed and unrepentant pacifist the ever-patriotic B.B.C. has cancelled the choir's broadcast engagements. Well, not quite. If Sir Hugh is prepared to recant or if the choir is prepared to find some other conductor whose personal views find favour in the eyes of the B.B.C. everything in the garden will again be lovely. Honour will be satisfied. Thus do we guard and cherish that liberty of conscience, that freedom in citizenship, for which we are understood to be fighting."

On December 7, Sir Hugh Roberton made a statement to the Scottish Daily Express reporter, which was published in that journal the following day. Sir Hugh said:—

"For the past 20 years super-patriots have been criticising us for not singing the National Anthem at concerts. Most of these people, I have found out, have never attended an Orpheus Choir concert, and probably never will.

"They do not know what they are talking about. The National Anthem is never sung at choral concerts.

"The Orpheus Choir opens with a beautiful hymn to the King of Kings. Could a better opening be given?

"The Orpheus Choir has sung twice before the King and Queen, and once before King George V. They wanted to hear choral music, and did not worry about the National Anthem. It is only would-be patriots who know nothing about music who bring up this red herring.

"I am surely entitled to devise the programme of music for the Orpheus Choir concerts, and I do not see how the National Anthem, which has never been sung at concerts, should be introduced.

"There is nothing personal about the omission of the Anthem from our programmes."

The Glasgow Herald has published considerable correspondence on this B.B.C. ban. We reproduce three opinions:—

"Of what worth is a democracy which penalises a man whose enthusiastic activities have been devoted to the cultivating of artistic expression and granting to his audiences exhilaration of spirit? One does not like to think that in Britain Christians are being persecuted for their profession of Christian principles.

"If the B.B.C. objected to Sir Hugh Roberton broadcasting 'pacifism' one would understand, but to refuse to broadcast his choir betrays a spirit of bigotry which to most Britons is repugnant. To be consistent the B.B.C. should refuse to use German pianos and delete from their programmes all the music that is not hallmarked by Britain or her Allies.

"Sir Hugh and his choir shall no doubt render The Beatitudes with even greater fervour than hitherto (and that is saying much). 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you. . . . Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward.' How refreshing it is to hear some one expressing his convictions in these days.

"The B.B.C. should choose choirs for their musicianship and that should be the only criterion.

"We are supposed to be fighting for freedom of conscience rather than for self-preservation, yet because of his love of peace and harmony rather than of war and discord one of our foremost musical conductors is not allowed to broadcast.

"Many who are by no means disloyal to their King and country nevertheless see no reason for constantly singing "God Save the King" before or after everything they do. There are a whole lot of things they pray in private that God may save—truth, freedom, liberty, love, purity, meekness, and the virtues of all good men, the King's included. We owe a higher loyalty even than to our earthly King, yet we do not sing about it before or after every musical performance.

"It is these fanatical, super-patriots of all nationalities who think it a virtue to put their own nation before everything else that are the cause of all wars."

On Thursday, December 12, Mr William C Park, an I.L.P. member of Glasgow Corporation, was suspended after he had refused to accept the Lord Provost's ruling that the motion he had submitted, expressing disapproval of the B.B.C. in cancelling the engagement of Sir Hugh Roberton and the Orpheus Choir was not urgent.

When the motion was read by the Town Clerk the Lord Provost immediately said he did not consider it to be urgent. Park maintained that it was a matter of public interest, and Dollan pointed out that if he wished to raise the matter he would have to give notice of motion in the ordinary way. Park replied that it was urgent and the Lord Provost again held that it was not urgent and asked Mr Park to resume his seat. The I.L.P. member continued to stand, saying, "Actions such as this by the B.B.C. is inculcating into this country Nazism in its worst form."

The Lord Provost—"Sorry, you are faded out."

Park continued speaking, and the Lord Provost said that he was going to ask the Senior Magistrate to move his suspension. After a pause Dollan added: "If this is not done, I am going to move the adjournment of the house."

This brought from Bailie M'Kinlay the protest that he was merely waiting to see if Mr Park would not take his seat.

Eventually Mr Park's suspension was moved and carried by a large majority. He continued to address the Corporation until he was warned by the Lord Provost that he was not in order in doing so.

As Mr Park walked out escorted by the Council Officer he shouted to the Lord Provost, "You are associating yourself with the same Nazi tactics as the B.B.C."

PENALISING C.O.s

The following interesting letter appeared in the Manchester Guardian, for November 19 last:

"Sir,—You print to-day a dignified protest, made yesterday by Judge Sir T. Artemus-Jones, against the penalisation of conscientious objectors. On another page the chairman of another tribunal is reported as having said, on the same day, to a teacher conscientious objector: 'I am not at all sure that it is good for a conscientious objector to teach children.' Does not this amount to flat opposition to the wishes of the Government, which were forcibly expressed in Parliament not long ago by Mr. Ernest Bevin? It is comical to be told that the teacher was afterwards registered as a conscientious objector 'on condition that he remains in his present occupation.'

"May I end by quoting a paragraph which appeared in the Manchester Guardian a little over eight years ago (July 28, 1932)?

TEACHERS WHO OBJECTED TO WAR

—The Glamorgan County Education Committee at Cardiff on Tuesday decided to restore to those teachers who were conscientious objectors during the war the increments deducted from their salaries on account of their war attitude. Only the chairman (Sir William Jenkins, M.P.) and two other members voted against the proposal.

"I suppose we may expect to see another similar paragraph appear in your paper somewhere about 1950.—Yours, &c.,

"R. W. KING.

HENRY J. ADLARD

On the Sunday that Mr Adlard delivered his address on Universal Religion at Sioux City, he pronounced the following benediction at the conclusion of the service.

"Benediction

"May we leave this place filled with a greater sense of modesty, and with minds duly chastened by a proper humility. May we endeavour to practise a wider toleration of the other men's faiths, they also being seekers after the truth and the light. May we scatter, day by day, a spirit of kindliness, brotherhood and justice among all men everywhere, seeking thereby to establish holy bonds of human comradeship and an abiding peace, so that, unitedly, we may build on earth the commonwealth of man, the fellowship of the free."

Notes from Sermon on John Morley

Only a few of Mr. Adlard's addresses have been reported, since his pastorate at the Trim Street Unitarian Chapel, Bath. The local paper reported the address he delivered there on the Centenary of Viscount Morley, whom he described as "a great Englishman." We embody this report.

Mr. Adlard quoted the excerpt from Bishop Whately, that Morley placed on the fly-page of his work On Compromise:

"It makes all the difference whether we put truth in the first place or in the second place."

Declaring that this principle was Morley's guiding star, Adlard stated that Morley lost his seat in Newcastle, in 1895, on a matter of principle; and on the same ground opposed the Boer War in 1899 and left the Ministry, in 1914. It might be said of Morley as it was said of John Stuart Mill: "He raised the tone of Parliament."

Adlard quoted Morley's utterance during the Boer War:

"You can carry fire and sword into the midst of peace and industry; it will be wrong. A war of the strongest government in the world, with untold wealth and inexhaustible resources against this little republic will bring you no glory; it will be wrong. You may make thousands of women widows and thousands of children fatherless; it will be wrong. It may add a new province to your Empire, it will still be wrong. You may give buoyance to the African stock and share market; it will still be wrong."

Finally, the speaker described Morley as he regarded him:

"John Morley was not only a great Englishman in the best sense of the word; he was a great 'liberal,' with a little 'l.' He was the finished embodiment of such, a Victorian with a conscience. He stood for those things which, with all our easy-goingness and compromise, have made England great and admired. It is fitting in these days, with things as they are, when international morality is at a low ebb, that we should commemorate the first centenary of his birth.

"John Morley was not a pioneer, a radical, a man of swift action. Rather he was a moral touchstone, a jealous guardian and conserver of great altars of the past—altars profanely desecrated in these times—of intellectual integrity, freedom of thought and speech. He was a great humanist. With him it was not expediency. It was ever the sheer moral issue; what is right,not popular. For him the issues were ever serious, far-reaching. They must be carefully weighed. He never trifled with the truth; and, looking back, one has to admit that he was so often right—and in a minority. . . .

"Much might be said about Morley's religion or lack of it. I am persuaded that, like his comperes, Mill and Huxley, he had much more religion than some of his critics. He became notorious in his earlier days for spelling the Name God with a small g. The important thing is not how to spell God in books, but how He is spelled in our lives. I would call Morley a reverent,, Puritan-Agnostic humanist. To claim him, as some do, as an 'unavowed Christian,' seems to me not only beside the mark, but adds nothing to his stature.

"The name, Christian, has become a sort of omnibus in these days, where almost anyone can get on board for next to nothing. If by Christian they mean one who 'went about doing good,' then, if Morley was not a religious man, it is rather a bad job for religion."

HAVELOCK ELLIS ADDRESS

When Havelock Ellis died in 1939 at the age of 80, Mr. Adlard delivered an address on his worth at the Trim Street Chapel. Adlard said that the important fact about Ellis was that he had lived in such a fashion that he would not die for a long time, if ever. One could not say of his fourscore years that they were "labour and sorrow"; rather they were serenity, fulness, happiness. Yet one wonders how much he meant to the average man; even a prominent London newspaper gave him no more space than a champion prize fight.

Not only was Havelock Ellis a great, wise, catholic-minded man, but he was, as a distinguished American said, "Undoubtedly the most civilised Englishman living to-day."

Adlard accepts Clive Bell's definition of a civilized man: "One who has a sense of values and reason enthroned."

Mrs. Ellis styled her husband: "A hermit and yet an iconoclast"; "A lover of mankind, yet withdrawn from its haunts." Never, Adlard continued, was there a more gentle, persuasive, yet at the same time a more ruthless, outspoken "iconoclast."

Like many other great men he was shy, retiring, no self-advertiser, rarely appearing in public, having but a tiny voice for so rugged a face. Yet no man knew his world better. He entered many fields, passed his judgment upon them, and while it must not be expected that he was equally competent in all, he was ever illuminating, always adorning that which he touched.

Ellis was an adventist in the true sense of the word, an announcer, a man who opened up new vistas of values and living. He looked what he really was—a philosopher, combining depth with breadth. His intellect was acutely analytical, but his emotions responded to more than the intellect can define.

A man of letters, yet his most abiding contribution to mankind was in the realm of sex. A forerunner of Freud, it is here that he will be longest honoured and remembered. There has been such a tremendous swing from sex repressions in recent years that it is difficult for us to realise the hubbub caused by the publication of six volumes on the Psychology of Sex. The second volume, which actually appeared first, Sexual Inversion, was published in England in 1897. A short time after its publication a bookseller, George Bedborough, was prosecuted for selling it, on the grounds of "obscenity." The prosecution caused a stir in the literary and scientific world. A defence committee was formed, but when the trial began (Oct., 1898) the defendant lost courage, and pleaded guilty. Ellis, not being prosecuted, had no standing in court, and was obliged to listen to the Recorder's grossly offensive comments on his character without any means of replying, but his sensitive nature was deeply wounded. Eventually, the volumes were published in Philadelphia.

Ellis had a sympathetic, critical attitude toward Freud rather than that of a partisan. Freud dealt with abnormal sex behaviour, Ellis with normal sex behaviour as it functions in society, and held that a proper knowledge of it was concerned with the very foundations of society. He pleaded for sexual education and hygiene, that it must not be left to a few scientific amateurs, but that it must begin at the top with the teachers themselves, and emanate from the centres of learning. This "Magnus Opus" of Ellis made him notorious rather than famous—and as is ever the case—the main criticism of his Psychology of Sex came from those who had not read the book.

Ellis was also a literary critic and creator of considerable importance with a tremendous total output to his name. He was most attracted to those writers who had what could be interpreted as a message, those men who endeavour to make their fellow men see life in a new light. Hence some of his great spiritual comrades were Edward Carpenter. Olive Schreiner, Tolstoy, Zola, Ibsen. He had a great faith in the underlying unity of thought and art. This is specially developed in that original and popular book, The Dance of Life, in which he demonstrates, in several fields, his rhythmic response to the universe, and held that there is no impassable gulf between the poet and the mathematician, the musician and the scientist. One of his last compilations of earlier volumes, The Fountain of Life might be used as a bedside book of devotion for a Humanist. Much more might be said; it is all summed up in that, "He was a great civilised man"—the world's greatest need.

This summary of Henry Adlard's address on Ellis gives some index to the work he has been attempting at Bath.

We conclude by reproducing the announcements of some of his other addresses for the years 1938, 1939, and 1940:

GLASGOW N.C.L.

Dear Sir,—We would be pleased to have you publish, at least, some of the following:—

Appreciation.—More than thanks in the award due to Gordon Stott, Advocate, Edinburgh, for the handling of the case of Philip Boyle and the work he has put in for the No-Conscription League. We received a pleasant surprise when Mr. Stott himself paid the expenditure. Thanks is also due D. N. M'Kay, solicitor for services rendered and to Comrade Guy Aldred for his keen invaluable work, his articles appearing in The Word, and his advice to all classes of C.O.'s.

Com. Fullerton of Glasgow, serving sentence of 93 days imposed on him at Liverpool, is now in Walton Gaol. Much expense has been incurred in the case of Fullarton, Tomlinson, and others who were sentenced at the same time. The advisory Bureau of the N.C.L. have agreed that we should be partly responsible for this expenditure and have sanctioned a contribution of £5. The Liverpool C.O.'s have, as already reported elsewhere, been subjected to ill-treatment. James Curran, a Glasgow C.O., suffering from St. Vitus Dance was graded A.1, and after being man-handled at Pollokshaws Detention Camp by deserters, was sent to Liverpool. He is now serving a sentence of 28 days at Chorley. Curran has been under doctor's care since 1931—proving the efficiency of the M.O.'s is in a par with that of some Generals. The N.C.L. is pursuing this matter further.

Com. M'Manus, Gorbals, is now in Barlinnie Prison, his case being unique. C.O.'s usually serve their sentence first and are then detained for medical examination. In the case of M'Manus the process has been reversed—detained first and sentence of 30 days to follow. M'Manus is being supplied with a hot meal daily by us.

Durris Camp Victimisation:—Eight C.O.'s, who were employed by the Forestry Commission, have been involved in a dispute regarding general conditions. As a result of approaches made to us by Com. J. M'Nair, General Secretary, I.L.P., we rendered immediate financial assistance.

The C.O.'s concerned are determined to abolish the hardships imposed.

STRICKLAND REPUDIATIONS

We quarrelled with the late Sir Walter Strickland on two issues:—

(1) The Great War, 1914-1913. Strickland supported this war until 1916 and then returned to his old anti-militarist position, as soon as conscription was introduced. Our arrest for resisting military service was a signal for Strickland to renew his friendship and association, and to apologise for being, even temporarily, pro-war.

(2) The Soviet Union and the Stalin regime. In 1927 he strongly supported the "restraint" of Anarchists and extreme Socialists in the Soviet Union, on the ground that they were counter-revolutionary. He repudiated us for maintaining a consistent opposition to Stalinism, and even to the errors of Leninism and Trotskyism, on this point. Seven years later he withdrew his repudiation of our policy and renewed his friendship.

The details of our quarrel with Strickland on the second point were published in The Commune, Second Series, Vol. II., No. 6, for September-October, 1927, pages 154-155, beneath the heading "A Repudiation." We republish that account exactly as published in The Commune then.

A REPUDIATION

We have received a communication from Sir Walter Strickland, who became friendly with us during our first imprisonment for sedition, 1909-1910, and for whom we have acted as publisher and secretary since, dated from Prague, July 26, in which he says:—

"Even if I was willing to continue to publish my writings and translations in Britain, after the destruction of 10,000 of my works by the Glasgow Customs, and even if I was willing to let you continue to act for me as my agent whilst insisting on living among these people, instead of accepting my offer to travel the Continent, your violent diatribes against the Russian Government, which, with all its faults, I believe in, and your oracular denunciations of Leninism, render it not only difficult but impossible for me to subsidise, by continued employment of any kind, its so bitter enemy.

Also, under date July 28, Strickland forwards us this statement for publication:—

"In the last number of Mr. Guy Aldred's paper, the Commune, an article, extracted from one of my essays, was printed without my permission. I wish to say I am not responsible for this and that, so long as the Commune maintains its present attitude towards the Soviet Republics, I must absolutely prohibit any writings of mine being published n ts columns.

"Yours truly,
"W. W. STRICKLAND,
"Citizen of Prague and Czecho-Slovakia."

Which settles many slanders about our work being subsidised. Socialists are imprisoned in Soviet Russia as in other capitalist nations. The political dictatorship of Moscow is not Communism. Leninism, in other countries, stands not for Communism or Socialism but careerism. The agents of Moscow are hirelings as much as the orators of the Anti-Socialist societies. We are not a hireling, and we have no intention of altering our attitude. We expect our working-class readers to respect our integrity and rally to the support of our work. The Commune is the only journal in Britain fighting for Socialism and pioneering the workers' industrial republic. Every comrade must rally to its support.

We have received the following further letter from Strickland in this connection:—

PRAGUE, August 23.

"To the Editor of the Commune.

"Dear Sir,

"In one of the numbers of the Commune, an article of mine was published by the Editor. This was done in a perfectly friendly spirit, but if I had known that he felt it his duty to denounce the present Russian Government in the most unbridled terms, I should most emphatically have forbidden the appearance of anything of mine in his paper. Having traversed the whole of Siberia the year before last, and reading a large number of Slav and other foreign newspapers, I may be somewhat less liable than the Editor to have my judgment perverted by the atmosphere of his forgeries and worst created by the English reactionaries and their bourgeois Press, in which the Editor of the Commune lives, moves, and has his being.

"It appears to me that the editor has chosen an extremely unfortunate moment to join the hue and cry of his bourgeois friends against the Soviet Republic.

"In any case, I must refuse to contribute either by pen or purse to his paper, so long as he considers it his duty to do so, or to support in any way whatsoever. I must request him kindly to publish this letter in his paper, and to give the fullest publicity to my decision in this matter.

"Yours truly,
"W. W. STRICKLAND."

It will be remembered that Strickland supported the war in August, 1914, when we opposed it. Shortly afterwards he regretted his decision and opposed the war. He may change his mind again.

Our opposition to the Stalin Government is not dictated by forgeries or bourgeois friendships. It is dictated by integrity and understanding. We take our stand definitely by our imprisoned Socialist comrades in Russia, by the Mjasnikow and Sapronow Opposition, by the Socialist thought and struggle suppressed as much in the Soviet Union as in the United States of America. Time will vindicate our stand.

Time has vindicated our stand.

Seven years after writing the letter published in The Commune, Strickland placed in our hands an essay he had written, analysing the Soviet persecutions, and denouncing the growing reactionary role, internal and external, of the Soviet regime.

Strickland's attitude towards the war was influenced, at first, by his deep respect for Kropotkin, who turned violently pro-war. In The Spur, Vol. I., No. 6, for November, 1914, page 46, we wrote:—

"Sir Walter Strickland has written dissociating himself from the policy of this journal. We shall publish his letter next month. All who preach war are wrong—except it be the class war."

The policy of The Spur was anti-militarist, and it maintained that policy throughout the war, and down to 1921, when it was closed down owing to our Glasgow imprisonment for alleged sedition.

When we faced our first court-martial, Strickland wrote a vigorous letter to the court, heartily approving our stand for conscience and anti-militarism. His letters followed us from guardroom to prison and back again.

OUR APPEAL

Saving The Word—Give Now!

The response to our appeal has been disappointing. In two issues we have defined our appeal. We must cover our losses on printing at once and we must make up the expenses of our Hyde Park Free Speech Struggle. The sum needed is £1,971 11s. 3d.

We are publishing no names this month. We want to publish one list and then leave the matter. We delay detailed acknowledgements another month in the hope that the full sum will be subscribed by then.

We have received £16 19s. 9d. This leaves a total of £1,954 11s. 6d. to come. We ask each reader to make a special effort.

Unless this help is forthcoming within the next month, we cannot continue to issue "The Word" in its present form.

LEMONS FROM ITALY!

John Bull, in its issue for December 21 last, exposed the Italian lemon scandal. Here is our contemporary's challenge to Whitehall:

"Britain is trading with Italy.

"No, she is not buying from us. She is not that sort of fool.

"We are buying from her.

"Large quantities of lemons are reaching us from Spain.

"John Bull challenges Whitehall to deny that they are Italian lemons sent to us through Spain.

"We challenge Ministers to deny that we are buying other Italian foodstuffs in the same roundabout way.

"We challenge them to deny that this country is thus providing Italy with the sinews of war.

"While trying to knock her out by our blows in Egypt and Albania, we are helping to keep her in by supporting her tottering resources.

"We have let her outbid us for the Spanish onion crop. Bankrupt Mussolini pays for them in the goods which we buy.

We are opposed to war because of its sacrifice of human life. But war is impossible without finance and trading. Surely the situation exposed in John Bull is a criminal farce. The people who defend it call for every sacrifice from the common poople and are horrified when some conscientious objector, who has an Italian father or mother, objects to killing his possible relatives, or persons who are much his kin as British friends and relatives. These same folk trade with the enemy and so arm them for continued war.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Guy Aldred,—Recently, when I was at Stormont Murray's, I glanced through a copy of The Word and was interested. I am a member of P.A.X. and a C.O., but am putting forward a Socialist case and not religious. I was bombed out of London and am now working in Reading.

Your name is not new to me as I remember my Father talking about you when I was a youngster in 1920.

With every good wish.

Yours sincerely,
EDWARD GOUGH YATES.

Mortimer, October 30.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I wish to express my indebtedness to you for the help and counsel you have given me. The Appellate Tribunal have dismissed my Appeal. I take courage from the example of the C.O.'s of the last war and the present one. In conclusion may I say how much I enjoy reading the articles in The Word. Every success to it.

Sincerely yours,
PATRICK SCANLAN.

Oxford, November 26.

Dear Guy Aldred,—This being the first time, and I hope not the last, to pick up a pen to write to you, I must first thank you for your untiring effort in the cause of freedom of Man. I hope that the power of your pen will not diminish for many years to come. The main purpose of this letter is in answer to your appeal for help in extending the sales of The Word.

At present I am secretary of the Hammersmith Youth Parliament. I also have joined the I.L.P. in Hammersmith. I would also be glad to know what groups are in existence in London which support The Word, and its policy, and what pamphlets there are to distribute.

Undoubtedly Annesley has told you that my brother and myself have registered as C.O.'s

Yours fraternally,
VICTOR G. ROSE.

London, W.12, November 30.

Dear Comrade,—Many thanks for copies of The Word and pamphlets received. These were distributed among our group members and were greatly appreciated.

You have a name and above address on your list, Robert Morley, but mine is John Morley. Robert is my son. He and another son, Alan, are keenly interested in the Anti-War cause.

I served my time to the business during the last war, and used to enjoy reading your outspoken articles at that time. I am delighted to see that you are no less vigorous in your denounciation of war and injustices than you were then. So more power to your elbow.

Yours fraternally,
JOHN MORLEY.

This pamphlet is addressed to Socialists for consideration and criticism. It is not intended to be an attack on Socialism, or a criticism of Socialist thought. The Author has no desire to cover with criticism the whole field of Socialist thought. He merely wishes to submit to Socialists, for their observation, another approach to the attempted solution of the problem of poverty and exploitation, the problem of social wrong. The Author desires to receive Socialist criticism: and to be corrected if the reader feels that he has fallen into error. Your consideration and criticism is invited.

PARLIAMENT AND PEACE:

JOHN McGOVERN'S APPEAL

An Analysis of the Debate on the I.L.P. Peace Amendment.

By The DUKE OF BEDFORD.

On December 5th, 1940, an amendment was moved in the House of Commons by Mr. John McGovern regretting that the Government had failed to set forth a plain statement of its peace aims and proposing that a conference should be called to bring the war, if possible, to an early conclusion.

Although Mr. McGovern never suggested that we should surrender to Hitler or invite him to let us hear his own terms as though we were nearing defeat, and were prepared to give way to anything he might demand from us, the amendment was rejected by 341 votes to 4.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of this debate seeing that the vote rejecting the suggestion of the only measures that might shorten the duration of the war was equivalent to a vote for the slaughter of many hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of our fellow-countrymen, including, it may be, many of those who are dear to us. Furthermore, of course, it amounted to a vote for the destruction of an unknown number of homes by air-raids; for untold mental injury to children and nervous people from terror and anxiety; and for further financial ruin to those whose businesses the war has threatened with disaster. Even though a constructive statement of peace aims should unexpectedly be made at an earlier date than the voting on the amendment appeared to indicate; while we may be extremely glad of this evidence of an increase of wisdom in our legislators, the change itself will only serve to emphasise the extreme instability of their outlook and policy.

It is indeed essential that we should consider most carefully the speeches made on both sides, and especially that we should make a minute examination of the strength, or otherwise, of the arguments by which those whom we have elected to carry out our wishes and protect our interests have justified so grave a decision as that which the rejection of the amendment involves. As has already been suggested, it may literally prove to have been an issue of life and death for some of us.

Mr. McGovern's statesmanlike appeal to humanity and reason and his much-needed warnings speak for themselves and need few comments. His quotations from the Prime Minister's book and from Mr. Bevin's speech remind us of the manner in which politicians who now occupy important posts keep changing their views for no good or obvious reason, and even abandoning sensible opinions they have once held for others which are very much the reverse. While we can all respect men who have the honesty to admit they have made mistakes and are open-minded enough to learn and unlearn, it is profoundly disturbing, at a time of acute national crisis, to find at the head of affairs leaders who are so destitute of any steady and consistent purpose.

Nor are Mr. Churchill and Mr. Bevin the only examples. Mr. Morrison, who, in 1917, declared before a Tribunal that he had a conscientious objection to taking life is also a supporter of the present war, and expressed the opinion in a recent debate that a man who is an enemy of the State ought to be shot (even though he be an unarmed prisoner and the country be not at war at the time).

Mr. Attlee has changed his mind no less than three times on issues connected with the war. He was a serving soldier in the Great War, but at a public meeting in the Kingsway Hall held not long after the conclusion of hostilities he is said to have declared to the celebrated pacifist, Mr E. D. Morel, "You were right and we were wrong."

In spite of this, however, he is a supporter of the present war. Before he became a member of the Government he openly advocated a plain statement of our peace aims. Since joining the Government, however, he has opposed the policy regarding peace aims which he formerly advocated!

Mr. McGovern's suggestion that the Prime Minister should always make a reasoned reply to Hitler's speeches, asking him searching questions, is particularly important, for the Government's failure to do this has shown a gross lack of imagination and sacrificed many opportunities, either of bringing the war to an early conclusion, or of placing Hitler in an increasingly awkward position.

Mr. Campbell Stephen's remarks are also able and to the point. He makes it quite plain that the last thing that the supporters of the amendment either intend or propose is unconditional surrender to Hitler, and he shows that in the (very unlikely) event of a plain statement of peace aims making no impression on the German people the result on the opinions of the peoples of other countries would be most helpful to our cause.

Mr. James Griffith, the first speaker hostile to the amendment, would either appear to have been asleep during the speeches of Mr. McGovern and Mr. Campbell Stephen, or to have lacked the intelligence to understand their very plain explanation of their proposals. It may be, however, that his mind was so filled with the foolish notion that the amendment was put down for no more important purpose than to enable the I.L.P. to make war upon the Labour Party that he was incapable of grasping any of the vital issues that had been raised.

Mr. Maxton's speech is another thoughtful contribution which needs no comment.

Mr. Thurtle's objections and criticisms are on the same level as Mr. Griffiths'. He shows absolutely no capacity to grasp the diplomatic possibilities of the situation, and of the chance that exists of forcing Hitler to behave reasonably whether he, personally, desires to do so or not; or, should he refuse to be reasonable, to lose the goodwill of large numbers of Germans whose sympathy is essential to his success. Mr. Thurtle's comparison of the supporters of the amendment to blacklegs who were prepared to take advantage of the sacrifices of others was as stupid as it was ill-natured. The supporters of the amendment were putting forward a policy designed to terminate the sacrifices of others; Mr. Thurtle's policy involved their continuance. It is even more important to end the sacrifices of other people than to share them.

Mr. Woodburn seems to have lost sight of the fact that there may be another side to the story about Hitler "deliberately plunging Europe into war." Captain Liddell Hart has described the policy of the British Government on the Polish issue as a "mixture of temptation and provocation." The Cabinet's strenuous efforts to secure the support of Russia and its guarantee of help to the Poles without making the Polish Government's acceptance of the extremely reasonable proposals put forward by Hitler in the previous March for the settlement of serious and long-standing grievances a condition of their promise of assistance, amply justifies Captain Liddell Hart's adverse judgment, an adverse judgment shared by no less a statesman than Mr. Lloyd George. Even, however, if we set all this on one side, it should have been obvious to Mr. Woodburn that the supporters of the I.L.P. amendment were proposing to stop Hitler by offering to his war-weary people the extremely attractive bait of a peace fair to their own country, as well as to other countries. If Hitler were to refuse reasonable peace terms, we should have involved him in a mistake which, if the terms were left on permanent offer, would be likely to provoke revolution in Germany and Italy at an early date and the break-up of the Axis Alliance.

If Hitler accepted reasonable terms and later tried to start a new war on an unjust issue he would certainly be overthrown by revolution, for the German people, after their recent severe lesson, would naturally fear the sufferings of another war far more than any punishment he could try and inflict on them for disobedience. Thus if Hitler did not play the game, whichever way he turned he would be trapped. Placing him in such a position would be the essence of real diplomacy, and real diplomacy has been utterly and completely absent from the policy of the British Government and of Parliament who, throughout the war, have behaved in the short-sighted manner of foolish schoolboys who have lost their tempers.

Sir Patrick Hannon, who suggested that the point at which to make a statement of peace terms would be when Hitler had been defeated, apparently lacked the wisdom to see that the defeat of an enemy who is in possession of a fully-trained Army four or five times as large as our own, and who, for geographical and other reasons, has a decided advantage in air warfare, is, to put it mildly, such a stupendous task that we can ill afford to neglect any weapon which would give us valuable aid. Psychological weapons are as important as military weapons, and sometimes even more so, and the strongest of all the psychological weapons which we could use would be an attractive and reasonable statement of peace terms left on permanent offer, and calculated to remove as far as possible from German minds the idea that the dismemberment of their country is our ultimate objective.

The member who interrupted Mr. Maxton's speech with the remark, "Chamberlain did try, but what was the result?" overlooked the fact that Mr. Chamberlain's venture was highly successful until he ruined everything soon after his return by a complete reversal of policy. He had given Hitler to understand that he would settle all future problems by the friendly method of negotiation, yet, without suggesting another conference or waiting to receive further provocation from Hitler, a week after he got home he announced a programme of re-armament, obviously against Germany. Hitler not unnaturally felt he had been deceived, and was thereby absolved from keeping his own promises if he considered that his country's interests involved their violation. Even if it be the case that Hitler was not sincere and had no intention of observing his pledges in any case, Mr. Chamberlain's failure to suggest another conference and to defer the continuation of the re-armament programme until Hitler gave some further provocation, was a diplomatic blunder of the first magnitude, as a magnificent opportunity was thereby lost of putting the Führer in the wrong and depriving him of the sympathy and support of a large number of his own people.

Mr. Brooke failed to realise that the best way of "sickening the German people of National Socialist deceit" would be to offer them terms fair to their own country as well as to others, and the chance of co-operating in the building of a better world on sane political and economic foundations. A continuation of bombing raids, on the contrary, is more likely to sicken them of the British Government than of their own!

One would have thought that our chances of "convincing the world that ours was the most truly popular and beneficient form of government" would be considerably greater in peace than during the continuation of the present war! Even in India fear of trouble during the war period seems to be encouraging oppressive methods rather than liberal ones.

Mr. Walker's contribution to the debate amounted to a reminder that other bodies as well as the House of Commons could show a majority of persons whose judgment left much to be desired, which, though doubtless true, had no very constructive bearing on the soundness, or otherwise, of the I.L.P. proposals!

Sir Percy Harris's remarks were the least weak of those made by the opponents of the amendment, and did at any rate provide one constructive suggestion. His expression of fear that the amendment would encourage enemies and discourage friends was not, however, supported by any arguments, and did not show a balanced grasp of the possibilities of the situation.

Sir Malcolm Robertson's contribution consisted of praise of the Prime Minister and the British cause, combined with the apparent advocacy of the very unmoral plan of letting our peace conditions and demands depend, not on any principles or arrangements of unchanging justice, but on the degree of military success we might be able to achieve in the future. "We might be embarrassed later," it seems, if, by being too definite or too generous now, we found that at some future date we felt strong enough to withhold some of the things we had earlier felt that it was right to promise! How the "wisdom, courage and determination of the world" could "finally" deal with the question of peace terms, it is rather difficult to see, for "the world," even apart from Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy as at present constituted, would be likely to bring to the conference table discordant elements, which Mr. Attlee in a later speech regarded as fatal to success. We should certainly have quite as good a chance of devising, now, proposals likely to form a basis for a satisfactory final settlement, as some future world conference — including, we may assume, Turkey, Russia, Japan and the United States—which met with no outline or "agenda" to work on.

Mr. Attlee began his reply on the behalf of the Government by inviting his audience to agree with him in the fallacious assumption that conditions in Czecho-Slovakia under German rule in peace were worse than conditions in this country in war, and worse than they could be in Europe when a peace of exhaustion followed a long continuation of the war. He brought forward no evidence in support of this contention, and it is highly probably that his information about Czech-Slovakia comes mainly from Czech political refugees who, for obvious reasons, are the persons most likely to draw the darkest possible picture of German rule, and also, in fairness one ought to add, the persons who, together with their friends still living in Czecho-Slovakia, are the ones most likely to have suffered severely. A very important point is here raised which merits most careful examination. The fact is continually overlooked that a tyranny is only really a tyranny for those who differ from the Government in power for reasons political, religious, economic, or racial, the racial source of trouble applying mainly to Jews and to non-Germans living in what was formerly German territory. Persons who support a Government are not conscious of living under a tyranny, no matter how autocratic the Government may be. They regard their leaders with affection and admiration; any sacrifices that are asked of them are made cheerfully in what is believed to be a noble and worth-while cause; and no sympathy is felt for the victims of the Government's oppression, who are regarded as unpatriotic or anti-social persons who deserve all that they get.

Even the large number of people who, while they may not actually admire a Government, take no interest in politics or in any form of religion of which the Government disapproves, are not conscious of any serious degree of oppression, and there is good reason to suppose that a high percentage of the inhabitants of Czecho-Slovakia would fall into this category. As long as such people are not too heavily taxed they continue to enjoy the pleasures of their home life, the interests of their trade or profession, and all those many and varied cultural amenities which even the most tyrannical Governments do not discourage. However much we may deplore their lack of intelligent political interest, and however indignant we may be at the fate of those who really are political rebels, it is sheer nonsense to think of every person under German or Italian rule as living in complete bondage, deprived of every joy and privilege of civilised life. There cannot be the slightest doubt that those who are not actively against the Government are, on balance, far better off than the inhabitants of a country at war, who are continually subject to the terrible devastation of air-raids. Moreover, if their economic position be good (there is evidence that the material prosperity of Czecho-Slovakia increased when Germany assumed the Protectorate, at anyrate until the outbreak of war), they are also likely to be much better off than the people who will be living in Europe should the economic life of the Continent be crippled by the prolongation of the present war.

Mr. Attlee went on to ask Mr. Maxton whether he held that peace was right at any price, and also if he was prepared to "give his life for liberty." One would have thought it was sufficiently obvious from the speeches of Mr. Maxton and his friends that what they had proposed was the exploration of the possibilities of a just peace, and not conclusion of peace on any terms that Hitler might demand. Mr. Attlee's enquiry as to whether Mr. Maxton was willing to "give his life for liberty" (a question which, it will be noted, evoked cheers from members stronger in the heart than in the head), really constituted the introduction of a red herring. Whether Mr. Maxton was, or was not, "prepared to give his life for liberty," whatever that phrase might imply, had nothing to do with the desirability of the present Government making a plain statement of reasonable peace aims either as a means of bringing the war to an early conclusion, or as a means of dealing a fatal blow to Hitler's prestige if he should prove unreasonable.

Mr. Maxton's answer amounted to an assertion of the important and obvious truth that liberty is not promoted by the methods of war. Mr. Attlee, however, does not seem to have been satisfied with the reply. He was apparently trying to make capital out of the sentimental popular idea of the soldier "laying down his life for his country." He might have been reminded that a truer conception of a soldier's duty is embodied in the question, "Do you believe in taking someone else's life for the sake of your country?" for it is the normal duty of a soldier, in war, to attempt to kill his enemy, while using all reasonable precautions to protect his own life for further service, i.e., for further killing.

Mr. Attlee's next question, which a number of his supporters seem to have thought remarkably clever, was, on the other hand, indicative of a complete lack of imagination and of any capacity to handle a diplomatic situation to the advantage of his country. He asked Mr. Maxton to postulate Hitler's rejection of reasonable peace terms, and enquired what he would then do. Mr. Maxton's reply was a sensible one, though it may not have been quite the best for the emotional, prejudiced and unintelligent audience with which he had to deal. He said that Mr. Attlee's question was a hypothetical one, meaning that he had been asked to state what he would do in an imaginary situation with the exact details of which his questioner had not supplied him. Obviously if Hitler did refuse reasonable terms the measures which a true statesman would then adopt would depend on the manner of Hitler's rejection and on the phrases which he employed. A true statesman would study Hitler's conduct and words with the most minute care to see what capital could be made out of them for creating prejudice against him in his own and neutral countries and also in Italy.

Mr. Maxton would, perhaps, have done better to reply—"What I personally would do in the event of Hitler rejecting a reasonable peace offer does not matter, seeing that I am not the British Government; but what the British Government could do would be to continue the war, with the satisfaction of having dealt Hitler the heaviest blow in the field of morale that has been inflicted on him since the commencement of hostilities."

Mr. Attlee went on to suggest, most unfairly, that it was Mr. Maxton's custom to speak eloquently about suffering, but to take no action to end it, leaving such action always to other people. On this occasion Mr. Maxton was taking the most constructive action possible to end suffering by suggesting a policy that would either terminate the war at once, or inflict immense damage on the popularity of the enemy leaders with their own people. Naturally, not being himself in office, he had to leave it to the Government to carry out his suggestions if they chose to do so, the Government alone having the power to take the necessary action.

Mr. Attlee went on to ask Mr. Maxton why he did not go to Hitler and ask him to come to a conference. A more senseless rhetorical question it would be difficult to imagine. Would Mr. Maxton be permitted by the British Government to confer, during war, with the leader of an enemy State, and with what authority would they invest him—a member of a small opposition Party—to negotiate on their behalf?

Mr. Attlee then made the astonishing assertion that when Mr. Lansbury went to plead with Hitler and Mussolini he got nothing from them. He appears to have forgotten that when Mr. Lansbury returned from his interview with Hitler in April, 1937, he said, "I got what I wanted." He had secured from Hitler a statement of the latter's willingness to attend a conference to thrash out economic problems, if President Roosevelt or the head of any other great country would take a lead in calling it. That conference was never summoned, so what more could Mr. Lansbury do?

Mr Attlee then repeated the cliché that there is something worse than killing the body, and that is killing the soul, meaning that peace under an oppressive Government is more damaging to human character than war. It has already been pointed out that, even when a Government is tyrannical in character, only those who are in opposition to it endure an appreciable amount of suffering, or are deprived of those non-political amenities of civilised existence of which they, as distinct from the political rebels, are normally accustomed to avail themselves. Mr. Attlee is blind to the fact that the terror, anxiety and strain which war, or the economic collapse following an unduly protracted war, inflict upon the minds, especially of children or highly strung people, is far greater than that inflicted by a dictatorship in time of peace. Mr. Attlee doubtless believes that a tyranny in peace time injures souls—kills is too strong a word—by putting into people's heads wrong ideas about the supremacy of the State; disregard of the individual's right of freedom; contempt for other nations; belief in force; false ideas about religion; and callousness towards the sufferings of those whom the State regards as its enemies.

But does not war do all these things to an even greater degree? Are not the Governments of democratic States compelled, in war, to claim all the powers of the dictatorships, and is it likely under the conditions of economic collapse which must follow a protracted war that they will feel it either right or possible to surrender these powers? Is not the liberty of the individual completely disregarded in war in democratic as well as in dictator States? Does not force become the supreme arbiter? Is not hatred of, and contempt for, the people of enemy nations freely taught, if not at the beginning, anyhow as war proceeds? Does not war make people callous towards those whom the State regards as its enemies? Is there not an exact resemblance between the attitude now adopted in this country by many "patriotic" people towards conscientious objectors and 18B prisoners, and the attitude adopted by many Germans towards Pastor Niemoller and the Jews? Does not war cause the churches to panic into accepting the world's outlook, and encourage them to crucify Christ afresh by supporting "mass murder and organised sin?" Is not the spectacle of a disloyal Church far more injurious to the spiritual welfare of the people than the spectacle of a faithful Church persecuted for its belief by a pagan ruler?

Mr. Attlee also appears to overlook the fact that, while the souls of the many good and useful people who perish in war may not, indeed, be injured, their removal to another sphere leaves this world spiritually impoverished and deprived of the services of those who, by the leavening influence of their ideas, ultimately overthrow tyranny.

Lastly, war prevents those international contacts which are of immense value in promoting friendship between the peoples of different countries, and which make possible a helpful exchange of ideas and a better understanding of each other's problems.

Mr. Attlee's picture of "a great race whose young men had been trained to go back to barbarism" is an example, not so much of the tragedy of the youth of a foreign nation mentally perverted, as of an English politician forming hasty and emotional judgments on very imperfect acquaintance with the facts. In so far as Mr. Attlee's aspersions on the character of German youth have any substantial measure of justification, he is about 20 years behind the times. There was a period, not many years after the last war, when the moral tone of German youth, especially in the great cities, sank to a low ebb. Later, however, there was a great change for the better, the results of which had been observed and recorded by as observant and experienced a traveller as Sir Phillip Gibbs and by many British visitors to Germany who have established personal contacts with the young people in a friendly and not too critical spirit, prepared to see good, if it were present, as well as evil. Even if we grant, as we certainly may, that some of the German State propaganda for the young is open to criticism, is all the present propaganda put over by our Ministry of Information calculated to inspire our youth with the highest Christian ideals? Is it not the case that, even in Germany, young people do not always swallow all that the Government tells them, as gospel truth? Many persons, including, it would appear, Mr. Attlee, are absolutely horrified at the idea of the Germans thinking themselves the finest nation on earth, with, for that reason, a right to dominate others. But do not an enormous number of British people think the same about their nation, and consider that the latter has a right to dominate the world through the Empire—which, incidentally, we built up in the past by methods often indistinguishable from what is now termed "aggression?" Some of us may share this view of the superiority of the British race; others may feel that it is rather conceited and silly; but whether we share it or not do we regard those who hold it as barbarians upon whom it is necessary to make war? Why is a spirit of national egoism, which is pardonable in British youth and British political leaders, absolutely unpardonable when it is found in German youth and German political leaders?

Mr. Attlee suggested that Hitler's grip on the German people would not be loosened by a few nice phrases from Mr. Maxton. No one, and certainly not Mr. Maxton himself, suggested that it would, but one cannot help wondering whether Sir Robert Vansittart's recent broadcast to America made, no doubt, with Mr. Attlee's knowledge and approval, in which the former declared that Germany should be broken up into small States after the war, is calculated to loosen it either!

Mr. Attlee pointed out the difficulty of reaching an agreement with the German and Italian statesmen by reason of the difference in their outlook and ideals. He drew a picture, plausible enough to evoke cheers and laughter, but none the less misleading, of Mr. Maxton and the Dictators, acting as perfectly free agents uninfluenced and uncontrolled by outside forces, meeting round a conference table and trying to reach an agreement. He overlooked the fact that after months of devastating war, whatever the outward appearances might be, Hitler and Mussolini would come to the conference table anything but free to give full expression to all their personal feelings and desires. On the contrary, they would come as men only too well aware that the eyes of millions of their fellow-countrymen were fixed upon them, fellow-countrymen who, in the last resort, held their political futures and perhaps their lives in their hands. These fellow-countrymen, sick and weary of the conflict, and only prepared to go on if peace meant for them injustice and humiliation, would be watching them closely and also hopefully, but with a hopefulness that would readily turn to fury if their hopes, without good and sufficient cause, were dashed to the ground by the unreason or ambitious obstinacy of their leaders. Those who attend a conference with such a human "background" have, indeed, a powerful incentive to come to terms with an adversary who is prepared to grant any measure of true justice.

Mr. Attlee raised the difficulty of securing proper representation for the countries at present under German control. Surely, however, there need be no serious obstacle here? A stipulation could easily be made, if it were thought desirabl to do so, that the conference should be attended by members of the "refugee" Governments, and it should not be impossible for the British Government itself to discover and put forward the views of those who are truly representative of their countries.

Mr. Attlee's statement that our prime difficulty is that we are up against people who do not begin to accept the beginnings of the decencies of our modern civilisation, besides being an exaggeration, entirely overlooks the fact that even if this were true at the beginning, the grim lesson of the war will by now have taught the citizens of enemy nations that, if the observance of the decencies of modern civilisation be the price of peace, it is a price that is well worth paying.

Mr. Attlee's reference to the freedom allowed in this country will not impress those who are aware of the gross injustice with which patriotic men and women have been imprisoned, ostensibly for being in league with the enemy, but in reality for criticism of the Government or its war policy. Freedom would, indeed, be as dead in Britain as in any dictator country if even members of the Legislature were denied the right of suggesting a plan whereby an early and an honourable peace might be secured or the popularity of the leaders of enemy States undermined!

Mr. Attlee said we could not get peace by washing our hands and letting others go to the devil, but as the supporters of the amendment had never suggested anything of the kind, this remark was wholly irrelevant.

Mr. Attlee said that, in the making of an ordered peace, we could not lay down the law for the rest of the world, and did not want to. That, however, is no reason why a conference should not be summoned, at which "the rest of the world" (a somewhat vague phrase!) should be invited to state their views, and this, again, was what the supporters of the amendment had suggested.

Mr. Attlee reserved his greatest pearl of eloquence for the end of his speech. He said we could only say: "Here is our way of life," and advocate our principles by striving more and more to extend our ideas of social justice. Exactly how we are to do this, in war, and display before the world an alluring picture of freedom and prosperity it is somewhat difficult to see! Partly from necessity and partly from a propensity for maladministration the Government is becoming more and more totalitarian, and more and more indifferent to the rights of individuals the longer the war continues; while the growing burden of war taxation; the destruction of our towns and industrial plant by air-raids; and the loss of our shipping by enemy action on the sea; cause the economic fabric of our country to become disorganised to an increasing extent.

Upon such feeble arguments as those which we have had under consideration rests the rejection of an intelligent and constructive proposal which might have saved our country, ourselves and the people of other countries, also, from untold misery and loss. As has already been indicated, hundreds of British citizens of very varied schools of political thought, and possessing in some cases distinguished records of service in the late war, have been labled "Fifth Columnists," and imprisoned on the libellous and unjust charge of desiring to assist the enemy, their only real offence being that, with a patriotism which future generations will appreciate at its true value, they sought to arrest the carnage of this war by a just and honourable peace.

Who is it, however, who up to the end of December, 1940, have refused absolutely to take any steps to explore the possibilities of staying the destruction and slaughter?

Who is it who, while professing to desire revolution in enemy countries, reject the one plan which, in the event of the war being continued, is likely to secure that end?

While obviously the result is precisely similar whether British morale be undermined or German morale strengthened, who is it who, by uttering, or permitting their spokesmen to utter, foolish threats of the dismemberment of Germany in the event of a British victory, rally the German people firmly behind Hitler and assist the propaganda of Goebbels?

Who is it who can find endless supplies of money for war, but can find so little for the relief of the poor and of the over-burdened taxpayer in time of peace? These are questions which the British people would do well to ask themselves—and also answer.

SOCIALISM, WAR, AND PEACE

JOHN McGOVERN'S SHETTLESTON ADDRESS

On Sunday, December 8, 1940, John McGovern, M.P., addressed the most important political meeting held in his constituency since the declaration of war. He received a warm welcome from the audience. The chairman was Councillor David Gibson, Shettleston. Bailie Joe Taylor and Councillor Myer Galpern supported the speaker.

John McGovern said:—

"I come before the Shettleston people not in any spirit of humility or on the defensive in any way, as is suggested by my political opponents who have joined the Tory Diehards at the moment.

"I came into the working-class movement in my early years. I have worked for their rights all my life. My position has never altered during my lifetime. I have never swam with the tide. I have always swam against the tide because I believe in my conviction, deeply, and was always prepared to make sacrifices for the working class.

"MY POINT OF VIEW."

..."What is my point of view in relation to the war struggle? There are those who are 100 per cent. pacifist in their outlook towards the war, believe that complete pacifism is the proper attitude when war comes, that nothing can be gained by force.

"I have never been 100 per cent. pacifist in the struggle. I believe that ultimate pacifism is an ideal towards which we should struggle. If the working class at the polls got an electoral mandate for social reform, and having the people in the country in the majority behind them, were determined to take over the industries and transport of the country, and were opposed by a minority of the ruling class, I would ruthlessly use every power in the State to crush that minority.

"That is the extent to which I am prepared to support the use of force—to be used by the majority to protect its rights and bring social reform. I believe that this war is a struggle between privileged classes struggling to protect their interests at the expense of the mass of the people. I am therefore opposed to this capitalistic struggle. Because, let there be no doubt about it, the present war is no different from the last one.

JUST WARS.

"In defending my son before the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal I was asked by Lord Elphinstone, 'Mr McGovern, do you not agree that this is a just war?'

"I replied, 'Surely, Your Lordship, you do not suggest that Britain has been engaged in anything but just wars. If you were to tell the people that they would never fight.'

"During the reign of Queen Victoria Britain was engaged in thirty-two wars. And they were all just! Germany to-day, from Hitler to Haw Haw, is saying that Germany is engaged in a just war. The working class in Germany to a large extent believes that. The fact is that the war is the same as every other war—the lust for colonial power—yellow and black slave labour.."

Referring to the Spanish civil war, and the British Government's policy of non-intervention, John McGovern said that this policy was supported by Mr Churchill. He commented:—

"Mr Churchill would not fight for socialism. Why should I fight for capitalism? Churchill is becoming the darling of the Labour Movement. He is Pat Dollan's leader. Britain has got Churchill, Scotland has got Dollan. I wish the positions were reversed. I have no time for a man who puts on the Hallowe'en false face of Socialism and fights for capitalism.

"The Allies' capitalist oppression of Germany after the last war produced Hitler. They are now talking in the House of Commons that the Nazis are imprisoning the working class in Germany. There was no antagonism when the German and Italian planes were bombing the Spanish working people at Guernica, in their try-out for the World War.

"No, they want us to defend democracy, democracy which refuses to allow Sir Hugh Roberton to broadcast with the B.B.C., which beats conscientious objectors in Liverpool into submission, and which imprisons Indian leaders who demand that for which we are fighting!"

John McGovern proceeded to deal with the bombing of Coventry, and then answered the critics of his plea for a negotiated peace. He explained his House of Commons speech:—

"In my speech in the House of Commons I did not suggest that we should throw down our arms and sue for peace. I said Mr Churchill should come to the House of Commons, with a prepared speech, and answer each Hitler speech, no matter how stupid or arrogant it might be. ... ...

"We should ply Hitler with questions as to what he means by peace, what guarantees he would give to restore freedom to the countries under his subjection, what kind of world he envisages for the future, and see if it is not possible to get the diplomatic arm instead of the military one to prevail."

Dealing with the heavy Labour Party vote against the I.L.P. amendment to the King's Speech, John McGovern said:—

"The Labour members were threatened with the most extreme expulsion if they voted with the I.L.P. Nevertheless I do not think that there was a single Labour member in Glasgow who voted in the Government Lobby. In fact, only three Scottish Labour M.P.'s voted against us."

McGovern said that he had been asked to resign and to fight a by-election. He was prepared to accept the verdict of the electors, but why should he fight a by-election? Let the Government declare a General Election.

Turning next to the position of his son, John McGovern explained:—

"A number of you may have noticed that my son appeared as a conscientious objector. I was glad. I asked him before the war what he would do. I used no force. I used only Socialist and fatherly advice. He told me that no matter what happened he would not go. He would not fight for a cause he did not believe in. I accepted that. I was proud of him. I defended him. It was my own point of view in the last war."

This brought the speaker to the case of the Lord Provost. On this subject, McGovern said:—

"We do not take instructions, and we do not grovel in the mire in order to get titles from the ruling class. Dollan would be more of a gentleman if he joined the Conservative party.

"But there is not a party in the country which has any faith in him."

Later in his speech McGovern said:—

"Dollan supported the last war until 1916—then he was called up, and became a conscientious objector."

Referring to his proposed American trip, McGovern said that it had been postponed, perhaps indefinitely.

Bailie Joe Taylor also attacked the Lord Provost.

This meeting was reported fully in the Glasgow Eastern Standard for December 14. Our contemporary also published several local opinions of the I.L.P. amendment. The question asked in each interview was:—

"What is your opinion of the amendment moved in the House of Commons by Messrs. McGovern, Maxton and Stephen—namely that a Peace Conference should be called and the Government's peace terms put forward?"

The people questioned were small grocers, tram-cleaners, air-raid wardens, housewives, railwaymen, coalmen, paper-makers, typists. All the replies except one were unfavourable. The most favourable reply was to the effect that the time was not ripe for a peace conference.

Mr William M. Stairs, president of the Haghill Tenants' Association, thought that there was an urgent demand for a solution to the trouble. He added:—

"If Maxton, Campbell Stephen, and M'Govern contested a by-election at the present they would be returned with a sweeping majority. It is ridiculous to say they do not represent the working-classes in their constituencies."

A.F.S. OBJECTERS BARRED

The Barnet Urban District Council, at their monthly meeting on Saturday afternoon, January 11 last, discussed the question of the employment of conscientious objectors in Council services.

Those present at the meeting were Councillors R. H. Broadbridge, J.P. (chairman), Mrs M. Strugnell (vice-chairman), County Ald. H. E. Fern, and Councillors C. T. Beard, A. Cheason, F. E. Claydon, C. E. Green, F. Jacques, P. C. Marris, F. M. Martin-Smith, E. P. Offord, W. H. Rean, W. P. Render, W. Ryley Pratt, and J. L. Scutt, with the Clerk and A.R.P. controller (Mr. A. S. Mays) and other officers.

The discussion on the policy of dismissing conscientious objectors from the service of the Council followed a report by the emergency committee regarding part-time Auxiliary Fireman Petchley. This stated that he had appeared before a tribunal for conscientious objectors. The committee did not consider that his services were any longer required in the Council's Auxiliary Fire Service, and had dismissed him on January 7. Petchley wrote asking for reconsideration of the committee's decision as to the cessation of his services. The report added:

"The committee was of opinion that his principles, conflicting as they did with those of this authority, might, if adhered to, prove mutually embarrassing, and accordingly their decision could not be varied, but that he should be thanked for the regularity of his previous services with the A.F.S."

In reply to Councillor Claydon, the Chairman said that Mr Petchley's services whilst with the A.F.S. were satisfactory, and a letter to that effect was sent.

Urging that the committee's decision should be reconsidered, Councillor Claydon said he thought the committee had "acted in a very ungracious manner" in their conduct of the matter, in view of the fact that the man's services had been perfectly satisfactory.

Councillor Claydon added:—

"We are fighting this war for the preservation of the right of the individual to hold opinions. This man is a conscientious objector, distinct, I presume, from the Communist element, with which I have no sympathy. The emergency committee is trying to sit in judgment on the Government, which has set up machinery to test the validity of the opinions claimed by conscientious objectors."

Councillor Claydon pointed out that the war emergency committee was appealing for an increase in the number of part-time firemen, yet they were not prepared to use a man who was willing to continue his satisfactory services.

At this stage the clerk to the council, Mr A. S. Mayes, who had no right to participate in the discussion, said that it was understood that the Council, as a whole, was against the employment of those who termed themselves conscientious objectors.

Councillor Ryley Pratt (chairman of the war emergency committee) said:—

"I think if this country is not worth fighting for it is not worth receiving wages from. A man who is not prepared to fight for his home and country should not be a member of a service for which we are paying. I cannot understand principles which say that a man shall not defend his own kith and kin from a marauding robber. If such a man can find work elsewhere, well and good, but I would not be prepared to work with him, and if I have the power I shall see that no one holding such principles shall work in any service with which I am connected."

There was no resolution, and the Council passed to other business. The dismissal of Petchley was accepted as a fact unworthy of discussion.

A similar discussion occurred at the meeting of the Saffron Walden Borough Council the previous afternoon. The Council considered the refusal by the Saffron Walden Fire Brigade Committee of the application by a conscientious objector for enrolment as an auxiliary fireman.

Councillor S. S. Wilson fought as an infantryman in the Great War of 1914-1918. He was a Y.M.C.A. volunteer with the B.E.F. in France in 1939. At this meeting he supported vigorously the right of the conscientious objector to join the A.F.S. He criticised severely the A.F.S. men who threatened to strike if an objector were allowed to join their ranks. The objector told the Fire Brigade Committee when he volunteered: "I am not willing to take lives, but I want to do my bit in saving them."

When the Town Council approved the committee's decision, Councillor Wilson said that he was surprised at such action. It had been said that all the help that could be obtained was needed for fire-fighting. The Minister of Labour, on behalf of the War Cabinet, had recently urged that conscientious objectors should be used in work of national importance—such as the A.F.S. or A.R.P.—yet this man had been refused for both. The Tribunal and the Ministry of Labour had been completely defied.

Between the present time and the Spring small country fire brigades would be called upon again and again to go to big towns. Many men in small fire brigades had already given their lives in saving people, and nobody had asked whether they were V.C.s or C.O.s.

Councillor Wilson explained that the Government's attitude towards C.O.s was:

"If you refuse to take life, surely you will help to save it. We expect you to do that. We expect you to take up fire fighting or go into some branch of National Service."

He commented:—

"We have to mobilise the whole of our man power. There are rumours already that all sorts of people are going to be called up. Surely a fireman's job is as dangerous as a soldier's.

"If I was in a burning building I should not ask a man whether he was a Conservative. (Laughter.) If he was willing and able to get me out of the building I should be very thankful. We have got to get away from sentiment, and think of the nation as a whole. It was necessary for every one to be doing useful work.'

It was said of this man that the firemen would not work with him. He did not believe it. If there were a few they would get over it. One did not ask a soldier whether he would work with certain other soldiers. He was just where he was wanted, and had to get on with the job. It might be that a conscientious objector would be the means of releasing a man from other important work.

Councillor Wilson appealed to the people of Saffron Walden to remember the traditions of the borough.

"Many a former Mayor would have been a conscientious objector if he were alive today. I do not agree with the Society of Friends, but I respect their opinions. I am not a C.O. I would like to bump off lots of people, and they are not all in Germany. (Laughter.) I ask you to accept this man, who is willing to risk his life."

The Deputy Mayor (Alderman Custerson) supported Councillor Wilson. He stressed the need for toleration.

Councillor Hyde asked what was the use of employing this man if it meant losing other firemen who had been trained.

Councillor Wilson: They could be conscripted.

Councillor Bradley said that he was not a C.O., but surely we were fighting this war for freedom. If a man was willing to risk his life in saving life and property he should be allowed to do so.

The matter was then allowed to drop, Councillor Wilson remarking:

"I am against the minute, and so are many others if they only had the pluck to say so."

The following day Councillor Wilson told the reporters:

"I don't support the Pacifist's views, but I believe him to be sincere and anxious to do his bit in his own way. In any case, a fireman's job today is as hazardous as a soldier's."

A fireman stated the A.F.S. viewpoint. To our mind this betrays not only muddled thinking but want of moral courage. The explanation is mean and unworthy of consideration. He said:

"We are proud of our A.F.S. uniform, and we want to preserve the good name of the service. Once fire-fighting became known as an objectors' job we should be afraid to walk about in uniform in case people mistook us for objectors too."

The Evening Standard, London, for January 9, under the heading, "Boanerges of Barnet," published a very interesting editorial on the subject. It was commenting on the committee's dismissal in the first instance. Our contemporary commented:

"A small matter in the midst of a great war, you may say. We think it not so small.

"Certainly the arguments of conscientious objectors make no appeal to us. We think their case is practically and morally unsound. Only a small minority in this land believes that Naziism can be withstood by any other means but force. . . .

"However, despite all the evidence, it is still possible for a man, on religious or other grounds, to believe that he can never be justified, whatever the consequences, in killing his fellow men. Our Parliament and our laws recognised this fact. They have made provision for conscientious objectors to perform non-combatant duties. If such a man actually chooses a service like that of a fireman, which will enable him to save life at the risk of his own, all honour to him. Here is proof of the sincerity of his convictions. . . .

"Has Parliament made a law that conscientious objectors should not be allowed to serve their country by helping to save their countrymen? No, this amazing doctrine is issued in the form of a private Bill drawn up by a few self-appointed Popes in a single parish. If they have any regard for our laws and free institutions they had better think again. If they would like the law changed, our institutions offer them means by which they may attempt to change it. And until the law of England decrees that conscientious objectors should be refused all chance of honourable service to the State, these worthy councillors had better stop behaving like miniature Nazis. . . .

"It is not such a small thing after all. . . .

"The habit of freedom is our armour against defeatism. Therefore we are resolved that the voice of reason, spoken in our Parliament, shall not be bawled down by some Boanerges in Barnet."

C.O.'s and AGRICULTURAL WORK

Worcestershire County Scheme.

Mr George E. Gregg, of Avoncroft, Stoke Prior, Bromsgrove, Worcs., has asked us to publish this announcement:—

"I have been asked by the War Agricultural Committee of Worcestershire to organise the group labour of C.O.'s to work under the authority of the Committee and not under individual farmers, to do such jobs as hedging and ditching and later as the good weather comes to perform all these jobs which farmers require, but to do it on a contract basis.

"So far as I can gather, individual farmers, with exceptions, are unable to overcome their prejudices as regards C.O.'s but quite often exploit men when they do.

"My scheme would overcome that as the men would be under the control of the Committee, and would work in groups. Wages would be prescribed by the Ministry of Agriculture, namely—38/- per week for the first two months and 48/- per week thereafter. Only men who could do a reasonable amount of work and were fairly adaptable would be accepted and to test this could only be done by trial. At the same time it is my intention to see that no exaggerated demands would be made on men as I realise that sedentary workers are not easily changed into manual workers. The employment of refugees has taught that. Nevertheless there must be many C.O.'s capable of doing a reasonable amount of work and given the will under a properly organised scheme would find not only the satisfaction of work but able to share in the Community life of the Hostels which I propose to set up.

"All further details may be had on application to me."

CONDITIONAL EXEMPTION.

The Nottingham Journal, in its issue for December 13 last, published the following interesting editorial:—

STUPID REGULATION

A defect in the working of the Conscientious Objectors Tribunals that could easily be remedied in the light of experience, although it would require an alteration in the present regulations governing the powers of such bodies, revealed itself at this week's sitting of the North Midland Tribunal at the Shire Hall, Nottingham.

This was in respect of genuine conscientious objectors who have been placed on the register on condition that they follow some course of conduct laid down by the Tribuntal, and then, through no fault of their own, are unable to do so.

For example, a man is told to carry on with his present job, which is of national importance. He loses this job on account, say, of shortage of material causing a number of men to be dismissed, and obtains a job in agriculture. When he appears before the Tribunal all that they can do now is to report him to the Ministry for not fulfilling the conditions they have laid down, and order him to appear before them, de novo, in a month's time, when, as a matter of fact, all the members of the Tribunal are satisfied that he is usefully employed in his new job, and would like to tell him to "carry on."

As the law now stands, however, they cannot do this. Time and again this anomalous position developed at this week's sitting of the Tribunal in Nottingham.

WANDSWORTH IN REVOLT

By R. M. FOX.

[In the April, 1940, Word we told, from press cuttings and the Government White Paper Report, the story of the 1918-1919 Wandsworth Prison revolt. The present article, selected from Smoky Crusade, by R. M. Fox, is another account of these events by a prisoner who did not participate in them at first. Fox's description is an independent record of what happened as seen by an active and interested observer. Subsequent to our release, Fox became a hunger-striker also. On another page we make other extracts from Fox's book—Ed.]

We set out from the guard-room, a band of about six prisoners with eight or ten guards. We had to cross London, and the sergeant agreed to let us have tea with our friends at a West End restaurant while he and the soldiers went off to refresh themselves. In an hour or two he returned very worried and told us that he could not find the escort anywhere. We volunteered to help, and scoured the surrounding public-houses. At last we rounded up all of them and proceeded on our journey. Our escort was merry and staggering, but we got them safely to the prison gates.

My heart sank when I saw the grim entrance of Wandsworth Prison again and heard the key grate once more in the lock. A little band of pacifist women, led by Clara Cole, greeted us at the prison gate, where they were tireless in their demonstrations.

I must confess that when the prison door clanged behind me for the third time I had a feeling of dismay. But I determined to fight all the way. Next day the task-master came into my cell.

"You will be pleased to hear," he said brightly, "that the task has been reduced since you were here last!"

"I am neither pleased nor sorry," I answered. "I am not interested. The word 'task' is expunged from my dictionary. I do not intend to do it."

He looked at me to see whether I meant it.

All right," he said, after a pause. "You needn't do anything if you don't like, but don't tell the others."

I soon found that the prison was completely out of hand. Now that the Armistice had come the long pent-up repression of the prisoners demanded an outlet.

Before I had arrived one body of prisoners—who had become known as the "All-Out Strikers"—had declared that they intended to disregard all prison rules. When they were let out on exercise they refused to come in, and warders had to chase them all over the prison buildings and carry them back to their cells. These men were now locked up permanently but, by means of talking out of the windows or through their spy-holes, they managed to add to the prison turmoil. Guy Aldred, who had been with me in Brixton, was, I learned, one of these locked-in-men.

Finding out which cell he was in, I went to the door as we returned from exercise and talked to him. He was on the second landing while my cell was on the fourth. A warder on the ground floor bawled angrily, "Hi, Number ——, what are you doing at that cell door?"

"I am talking to the man inside," I replied.

After exchanging further greetings I went upstsairs, and entered my own cell, shutting the door. In a minute or two I heard the lock grate and a red-faced, angry, puffing warder, who had climbed the stairs, entered and demanded to know what I meant by my reply.

"It was the literal truth," I answered. "Now go away and report me. I don't want you in my cell any longer."

He went. But I was not reported. Everyone in the prison was defying the rules, and the warders did not know what to do.

An order was given that the "All-Out Strikers" were to be removed to the basement cells, where they would cause less disturbance to the prison. Instead of this, when they got together, they held meetings and sang continuously, their voices rising up from the depths.

One big man, an objector named Brooks—who had also spent some time at Brixton—decided to smash up his cell in the basement as a protest. When I went out to exercise I saw him sitting in the midst of a heap of debris, having broken his windows, gas box and everything his cell contained. He was sitting chipping away at the tiled floor of his cell. I asked him how he was getting on. "Fine!" he replied.

Someone slipped him in an iron bar through the window, and he spent the day pounding at the iron-clad door. He had knocked a jagged hole through the panel, with its metal sheeting on both sides, before the warders rushed in and hustled him away in a strait jacket to a silent cell. He was a powerfully built man, with great muscular arms, easily, I think, the strongest man in the prison. A few days later the doctor ordered his release on health grounds. He literally broke his way out of prison.

As a protest against the treatment of the basement men, we decided to take the unprecedented action of holding a meeting in the exercise yard. We were entitled to association at exercise now—which meant that we could walk round in twos and threes. We talked and sang in the prison corridors. But so far no meetings had been held. We decided to hold one on Sunday to discuss action on behalf of the basement men—who had been shut up for weeks without exercise, and were, we were told, to be given bread and water diet.

It was arranged that four men, Beacham, Knight, Spiller and myself, would speak in turn from a stone parapet overlooking the exercise ground. We were sure that each man who attempted to speak would be dragged away, so it was necessary to have several speakers ready. But Sunday was a day when the prison was short-handed. Many of the warders had week-end leave and so we were not interfered with. The meeting was held and a mass deputation chosen to see the Governor next day.

Out of this grew a regular organisation—a Prisoners' Committee of five—which reported to the prisoners on the exercise yard. Beacham and myself represented the party of action on this committee and we received general support, especially as our tactics of mass deputations proved successful. Our plan was for the prisoners to form up and march to the centre of the prison and refuse to disperse until a particular grievance had been dealt with. The Chief Warder realized that our direct-action tactics gathered ever more support. One morning he climbed to the top landing of the prison and entered my cell, panting. He came to announce that some minor grievance of which we had complained was being remedied.

"I have put that through for you," he said. "But mind, I don't want 'Another Victory,' talk all over the prison."

We held meetings in the evenings, too. A weekly meeting was held at each end of the prison on two nights of the week. Sometimes a man spoke out of the window from his stool, sometimes he talked through the spy-hole in the door. All the spy-hole glasses had been smashed.

It was an eerie sensation, I found, to address an unseen audience, to ask for questions and discussion, and to have comments fired from the various cells, some below, some above. The warders tried to interrupt these meetings by rattling trays and creating a din but, when this happened, the whole of the prison adjourned for a "serenade." A serenade meant a concerted banging of wooden stools against iron doors. The prison rocked under the blows, and lights appeared in all the surrounding buildings.

One night at the end of a meeting the speaker humorously announced a collection, and dozens of tin dinner-cans went flying through the windows on to the asphalt yard. Concerts and mass singing added to the din. A few prisoners objected to the continuous noise, one, Leonard J. Simons, even writing and circulating an attack on the "Basement Oligarchy" who talked far into the night. This document—on brown toilet paper—was the subject of wide comment. A little journal with a special canvas cover and an embroidered flag—a product of the work-room—called The Red Flag—was also produced. Many who liked quiet bore with the racket solely because of the need to attack the silence rule. . . .

This was the post-Armistice atmosphere of Wandsworth Gaol. The Chief Warder—a stiff little man of about sixty with close-cropped white hair which earned him the nickname of Snowball—came out one morning and appealed to the objectors to keep order so as to enable him to run the prison.

I can understand the 'All-Out Strikers,'" he said. "They tell me they won't obey the rules. That is a John Blunt honest attitude, but you men who walk about singing—I don't think that's playing the game!"

It did not occur to Snowball that it was no game for us.

Some wanted to hunger-strike at once in answer to what they called the Chief Warder's challenge. One or two smashed up their cells. We could hear a crash as the gas-box and anything else breakable went. One man yelled, "This is my answer to the Chief Warder!" and a series of crashes followed. The warders rushed to his cell and dragged him away. He was put in a strong cell with a strait-waistcoat, like a suit of armour, fixed so that he could not move his hands. This smashing up of cells was called "going over the top." It had an element of hysteria in it. It represented that point when nerves were too wrought up to stand any more. About this time, when men had been shut up for several sentences totalling from two to three years, it became a familiar incident of the prison. When the Chief Warder made his foolish speech contrasting the attitude of the "All-Out Strikers" with that of the others, he called up this kind of response.

Seven men went on hunger-strike immediately and, after a week, the rest of us became anxious about their condition. We had caught glimpses of them staggering weakly as they came out of their cells in the morning. And it was reported, too, that the doctor had made jeering remarks to them on his morning round, inquiring—with fine satire—whether their insurance premiums were fully paid up. We decided to march to the centre of the prison and demand to see the Chief Warder about the release of these men. The men came in after exercise and took up their position.

Three of us were selected as a deputation, and I acted as spokesman. At first the Chief Warder was adamant.

"You must apply to the doctor in the morning," he told us.

If this failed, he said, we could petition the Home Office, which would mean, we knew, getting a reply in not less than a month's time.

"Are we to go out and tell these men you refuse to do anything?" I asked.

"What can I do?" he countered. "It is a matter for the doctor, and the doctor alone."

I decided to play my trump card—the card of individual responsibility.

"Very well, then," I replied. "I will tell the men that. But I want you to understand that these men are hunger-striking as the direct result of a speech you made in the exercise yard—a speech which they took as a challenge. If anything happens to them you will bear a special responsibility, for no doubt all this will be raised in Parliament and elsewhere."

"I am sure," Snowball blustered, "I never meant to incite any prisoner to break prison rules!"

"Unfortunately it has had that effect," I remarked, "whatever your motive."

"Wait a minute," said Snowball. "Perhaps I can find out something about the case. I will telephone to the doctor."

His voice was shaky as he carried on a long telephone conversation. When he turned to us he was still under the stress of emotion.

"I think it will be all right," he said. "I have talked it over with the doctor and you can tell the men that the hunger-strikers will probably be released in a day or two."

The men were released and I was confirmed in my belief that there is nothing that a prison official is so much afraid of as being held personally responsible for any happening. Only so long as they can slip behind their official status do they feel safe.

NEWCASTLE ATHEIST WAR RESISTER

Letters in which he expressed anti-war feeling were read at the Moot Hall Police Court, Newcastle, on December 20, 1940, when our comrade, Robert Morley (23), of "Rosslyn," Highfield Road, Westerhope, was summoned for failing to register under the National Service Armed Forces Act (1939) and for failing to attend a medical examination.

Morley, who refused to plead, was ordered to be detained in custody until such time as he is required to go for his medical examination. He was fined £2 on each charge, and ordered to pay £12 4s 9d costs.

Prosecuting on behalf of the Ministry of Labour and National Service, Mr P. L. Frankham said that Morley had written letters stating that he did not intend to register or go through a medical examination as he was opposed to war.

Among the reasons for his refusal was that the war was being fought, not to beat Hitler, but to further the interests of the British Empire.

FATHER WAS C.O.

His reason for not registering as a conscientious objector was because "it was designed to break any opposition to the Armed Forces Act."

The letters stated that Morley's father was a conscientious objector in the last war, and that Morley had been brought up to disbelieve in war. Morley said he preferred to be called a "War Resister."

In the witness-box, Morley refused to swear on the Bible. He explained that he was an atheist, giving as his reason his belief that "The Bible is merely a collection of historical incidents and has no spiritual significance.

"I do not believe in the existence of a Deity."

WAR FUTILE.

He affirmed, and then read a letter, written by himself on receipt of the summons, in which he stated that he did not intend to come to the court.

Describing war as "futile," Morley said he intended to make the Armed Forces Act as unworkable as possible.

Mr Frankham asked for an order for Morley to be detained in custody. There was a cry of "And that's illegal" from the public gallery.

After the Bench's decision a voice called "Good luck," and Morley left the court with a wave of his hand to his sympathisers.

SHETTLESTON COUNCILLOR C.O.

Glasgow Town Councillor, Robert McAllister, I.L.P. representative for Shettleston and Tollcross, was refused registration as a conscientious objector at the Glasgow Tribunal on December 10, 1940.

Councillor McAllister, who gave his age as 34, stated that he had been a member of the I.L.P. for the past 18 years, and had joined that party because of the position it had taken up in the last war.

"Have you," said the chairman, Sir A. Campbell Black, K.C., "considered the result of German domination on yourself and your fellows in this country?"

In reply, McAllister said he considered that if the war were to end tomorrow, either by the invasion of Germany or of this country, Hitler would be at his wits' end to solve the economic and social problems which would confront him in Germany. He would have 10,000,000 unemployed to feed. He could not cope with that, and if the people of Germany could not be fed Hitler would not be in power.

GORDON STOTT

The name of Gordon Stott, the Edinburgh advocate, will be familiar to all conscientious objectors in the West of Scotland. He has assisted freely and wisely all objectors to war if they sought his aid. He will be remembered for his defence of our comrade, Philip Boyle, at his second court martial at Maryhill Barracks. Subsequently he conducted Boyle's case before the Appellate Tribunal at Edinburgh.

The son of the parish minister at Cramond, Midlothian, Gordon Stott began his political career while a student at Edinburgh University. He was closely associated with the University Labour Party and was later appointed secretary of Edinburgh Trades Council. He still represents the Trades Council and Labour Party at the meetings of the managers of Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

For a time Gordon Stott was prospective Parliamentary Labour candidate for the Aberdeen constituency. In 1925, however, he was adopted as prospective candidate for West Edinburgh, the Lord Advocate's constituency.

Mr. Scott is 31 years of age. He was called to the Bar in 1936. His chambers are at 32 Dundas Street, Edinburgh. He is a member of the Church of Scotland, and objects to military service and to killing, but not to work under civil control.

Gordon Stott appeared before the Edinburgh Local Tribunal on January 22. He appealed for exemption on moral and conscientious grounds. He was refused exemption.

Mr. Stott said that he was a member of his fathsr's church but he did not take any active part in church affairs.

Answering the questions of the Tribunal, Gordon Stott said that he had no objections to the use of force in civil affairs. He did not object to the work of the police in this country. The police were dealing with criminals, and in the prosecution of their duties they did not involve fairly innocent people. War, on the other hand, meant that almost everyone was involved.

In 1935, as secretary of the Edinburgh Labour Party, he had submitted a resolution that all possible assistance—short of war—be rendered to the Abyssinians, who were at that time at war with Italy.

He suggested that the supply of oil and petrol to the Italians should be cut off.

The Labour Party had been pushed into support of the war by its Left-Wing.

He thought that if we were invaded we should just have to accept an army of occupation, but he did not think that, should the invaders force their views on the children of this country, everyone would comply. He had more faith in the British people, and although several people would undoubtedly suffer for this resistance there would be a great many more who would refuse to comply.

A fortnight before appearing before the Tribuntl, Mr. Stott volunteered as a fire watcher at Edinburgh courts. He was under the impression at that time that it was a purely voluntary and private scheme. Since then, however, it had been compulsory, and he felt that this would give a great deal of thought to pacifists who had volunteered.

He did not object to compulsion, but thought that once a scheme was put on compulsory lines it became an organised part of the Government who were prosecuting this war.

ANNESLEY ALDRED

Annesley Aldred was granted total exemption by the Glasgow Conscientious Objectors' Local Tribunal on Tuesday, January 28. The appellant submitted written evidence as to the views held by his father and mother. He explained that he had been reared in a Socialist and Anarchist household.

Replying to the Chairman of the Tribunal, Sir Archibald Campbell Black, Annesley Aldred stated that he included German National Socialism under the term Fascism. He was strongly opposed to this expression of militarism and oppression. His method of opposing its growth was not counter-militarism but non-co-operation and civil disobedience.

The Chairman questioned him on this point and stated that he did not see how it would be sufficient to destroy invasion, or a successful blockade without invasion, that could result if the British Navy were not active protecting the import of food from the Colonies, the United States, and neutral overseas countries. The appellant replied that he did not mean non-co-operation to be isolated to Britain but to extend, and to involve civil disobedience widespread in all countries affected by Nazi domination. The Chairman stated that he appreciated the point of view but added that he could not share it. He made it clear that he felt that non-co-operation would prove non-effective in practice, unfortunately.

The Tribunal showed great courtesy, and a desire to understand the influences that explained the appellant's attitude.

DOLLAN'S KNIGHTHOOD

Congratulations from the leaders of the "Socialist" and Progressive (sic) Parties in the Corporation of Glasgow were extended to the Lord Provost on his elevation to knighthood at the January 9th meeting of the Glasgow Corporation.

Councillor Hector McNeill and Councillor John McSkimming, in acting as spokesmen for their respective groups, paid tribute to the zeal and devotion to duty shown by Mr Dollan in his discharge of the office of civic chief, and made special mention of his self-sacrificing activities in the war effort.

Councillor William Park, chairman of the I.L.P section, dissociated his party from this praise, criticising the acceptance of the honour as a betrayal of Socialist proprieties. Many thousands of Socialists, declared Councillor Park, held the opinion that the acceptance of honours at the hands of the King was merely supporting capitalism.

Replying to the congratulations, Dollan said that the responsibility for accepting the honour was his alone, not that of the Socialist Party. He added :—

"What I have done is in accordance with the best civic traditions, and I hope that occupants of this chair will continue to consider the welfare of Glasgow more important than any notoriety they might gain from refusing to do the conventional thing."

He retorted to the I.L.P. criticism with the remark that there was very little difference in principle between a Socialist Lord Provost accepting a knighthood and an I.L.P. councillor seeking to be a magistrate or a J.P. This may be correct reasoning, but the trouble is that Dollan did not adopt this view always. There was a time when he defended Labour Bailies, but would not have applauded Labour knighthoods. He used to reply to our Anti-Parliamentarian criticism by denying indignantly that Parliamentarism led to capitalist honours, and so involved careerism. Of course, Dollan's position answers his own previous arguments.

UNITED STATES CONCHIES

At Omaha, Neb., U.S.A., on October 14, 1940, a declaration that Christian citizens are duty bound to bears arms in defence of their country received the approval of the United Lutheran Church of America. The church, however, recognised the individual's right to conscientious objection to military service. The convention added a provision that communicant members who are conscientious objectors may file with the executive board a written statement of their position.

The Central Pennsylvania synod asked the church to take a stand along the lines followed by the Society of Friends.

The board's report approved by the convention declares—

"It is right for Christians to bear civil office, to sit as judges, to engage in just wars, to serve as soldiers, to make legal contracts, to hold property, to make oath . . . save only when commanded to sin, for then they ought to obey God rather than man."

A Temple University (Philadelphia) theological student served notice on October 16 that he would under no circustances register for the draft.

The remaining 166 students of the theological school indicated that they would register as conscientious objectors.

Dr. John W. Mason, newly appointed president of Swarthmore College, announced that neither the facilities nor the campus of the college would be turned over to the Government for military training.

The student who refused to register was Ernest Kurkjian, 24, 316 S. 62nd Street, a third-year student.

Kurkjian refused in any way to alter his stand, despite his mother's pleas and those of his local draft board member, Dr. William J. Miller, pastor of the Tabernacle Lutheran Church, 59th and Spruce Sts. The youth's brother, Haig, 22, a tool designer at an aircraft factory, left home promptly at 7 a.m. to register.

Kurkjian explained his position :—

"I would call conscription involuntary servitude. I believe in non-violence.

"This conscription is a conscription of the national conscience. The United States apparently wants to overshadow Germany. Politically, the same thing will happen. It is coming to that. Right now I am not even being allowed to follow the voice of my conscience."

Dr. Miller pointed out to him—

"Registration insures your safety as a citizen. By registration you don't give up your conscientious objection. You still can appeal as a conscientious objector."

Kurkjian's answer was that by registering he would be

"Evading the draft. I'm not trying to evade anything. And I know what I will have to suffer."

Kurkjian added that he had joined the American Friends Service Committee, and hoped to work in aiding migratory workers or, if he is "capable enough," go abroad to Europe and aid refugees.

Kurkjian announced his intention several weeks prior to his action, in a letter addressed to the editor of the Philadelphia Evening Ledger. In this letter he said :—

"For the cord and to make public my views, I write this letter, to state in brief my conscientious objections to war and conscription for war.

"War and war preparations are wasteful and uneconomical. War is socially destructive to all and brings more ailments. War is un-Christian and Anti-Christ, and war is against the brotherhood of man. Because of this I am a conscientious objector of the absolute type. I take this means of making public my view and my objection to the conscription of men for war.

"My action will be that I shall not register because I cannot conscientiously register for military service. I shall be ready to take the consequences, whatever they may be."

According to the American Friend of December 5 last, a Pacific Coast Friend, Edwin A. Sanders, was brought before the Federal Court at Portland, Oregon, on November 23 for refusing to register under the American Conscription Act. He, with a Methodist minister who had made the same refusal, were both released on bail.

Edwin Sanders graduated from Earlham College in 1938, and is also an M.A. of Haverford. He and his wife were directors of the Quaker Hill Hostel at Richmond, and he is now a member of the faculty of Pacific College.

Sanders adopts the "absolutist" position. "All my training," he told a reporter, "has been to abhor the taking of life, and, to me, even an ounce of surrender means to violate that training."

There is no "unconditional exemption" in the Conscription Act in U.S.A. This explains why many C.O.s, whom we should in Britain call "absolutists," refuse to register. They feel this is the only way to express their absolutism.

A good deal of publicity has been given in the American Press to the group of theological students at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, who refused to register for "the draft" on October 16, on the grounds that they were thereby co-operating with the war system. To the contention that the Act made provision for religious pacifists, these men replied in a manifesto :

"It is not alone for our own exemption from fighting that we work—it is for freedom of the American people from Fascism and militarism."

In the January Word we reproduced the comment made on their refusal by the New Republic, New York.

Eight of these students were indicted in Federal Court, New York, on October 21, 1940, for refusing to register in compliance with the United States Selective Training and Service Act—a felony under federal law. They pleaded guilty, and the case was adjourned for sentence.

On November 14 they reiterated their refusal to register for selective service, and were sentenced to serve a year and a day in federal prison.

Federal Judge Samuel Mandelbaum, just before passing sentence, gave the men an opportunity to register "at this last minute." The roll was called. Each refused, and Judge Mandelbaum passed sentence.

The court noted that the maximum term possible was five years' imprisonment and a 10,000 dollars fine, and added that if at any time within the sentence imposed any of the defendants decided to comply with the Act, the court would be "only too happy" to moderate the sentences.

Kenneth Walzer, counsel for the students, told the court that "their consciences hold them to the teachings of the great master."

"They believe those teachings to mean what they say," he added, "and they find in them instructions to have nothing to do with the mass killing which is called war."

The eight and the colleges from which they were graduated are: William N. Lovell, 26 Ploughkeepsie, N.Y., president of the Union Theological Student body and a Yale graduate; Richard J. Wichlei, 23, Binghamton, N.Y., Syracuse; Donald Benedict, 23, Newark, N.Y., Albion; David Dellinger, 25, Wakefield, Mass., Yale; Meredith Dallas, 23, Grosse Point, Mich., Albion; George M. Houser, 24, Denver, University of Denver; Joseph G. Bevilacqua, 24, Buffalo, N.Y., Tufts, and Howard E. Spragg, 23, Malden, Mass., Tufts.

Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin president of the Union Theological Seminary, issued a statement later in which he said in part :

"On behalf of the seminary let me say that we are sad at heart that these young men, whose Christian characters and devotion we admire, have persisted in their defiance of the law."

Dr. Coffin added that, in his judgment,

"Their course in this matter is prejudicial to democracy, that form of government under which the Christian Church enjoys the utmost liberty. And I am sure the last thing these young men wish is to injure democracy."

"Consequently one hopes that, having made their position clear, they will see that no further purpose can be served by persisting in this course."

CANADIAN CONCHIES

Several University of Alberta students refused on October 22, 1940, to take compulsory military training with the University Auxiliary Battalion on the ground that they were "conscientious objectors." Dr. W. A. R. Kerr, president, referred their cases to the Alberta War Services Board.

One of the students was reported to be in the senior medical class, and some others in the theology class of St. Stephen's College.

The Senate of McGill University, Montreal, at a special session on November 9, suspended Gordon K. Stewart, 47 Prospect Avenue, from the university until he is ready to abide by the rules of the college.

McGill's sole "conscientious objector" to the compulsory military training programme for male students, Stewart, 19 years of age, refused to comply with the university regulations, which he said were against his religious principles. He is a student in second year Arts.

The case was considered by the special military committee of the university, and referred to the University Senate for action. It was decided by the Senate members that Stewart would remain under suspension from the university and all its activities until such time as he was willing to participate in the military training programme.

As Stewart was only 19, his case was handled entirely by the university authorities. Had he been of military age he would have come under the scope of the Government, and the matter would have been beyond the jurisdiction of the university itself.

Ten students at the University of Toronto also listed "religious principles" as their reason for refusing to participate in the military training programme there.

TEACHER CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Education, London, for January 10, under the above heading, publishes an interesting letter on the attitude of Local Education Authorities from Mr. G. E. Laywood, The Gardens, Rislingbury, Northants. Mr. Laywood writes :—

"That efficiency of the educational system provided in their area should be the primary concern of L.E.A.'s who dismiss conscientious objectors, is apparently not a fact. Men who by reason of their appearance before a tribunal are recognised as C.O.'s are dismissed, but men over the reservation age are likely to retain their posts. Women whose suggestive influence may well be more insidious than men also retain their positions.

"As the war progresses, the gradual depletion of the male teaching staff may result. Fully trained and experienced men will be difficult to obtain: women will replace them. That trained skill, and the much more valuable teaching experience of dismissed C.O.'s will have been lost.

"This skill was in the vast majority of cases obtained at the Government's expense. At a time of financial stringency, can anything be more wasteful than dismissal? Replacement, if possible, will cost a deal more money than the original training. . . .

"The L.E.A. makes decisions by a vote: this is taken after discussion in an atmosphere charged with prejudice, tainted with malice, and containing an element of remorse that such irregularities had not been previously discovered. Self-righteousness among those who have aided and abetted the previous retention of their posts by C.O.'s is obvious. At the bottom is the knowledge that neglect to participate in such dismissal will result in the loss of the seat at the next local government election of councillors.

"If the L.E.A.'s were really desirous of equalising pay of C.O.'s and conscripted colleagues, then they might well invite the Government to make use of Regulation 58a, made under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1940. Under this regulation the Minister of Labour and National Service may direct any person in the United Kingdom to perform such services in the United Kingdom as may be specified . . . upon such terms as to remuneration and conditions of service as the Minister may, in accordance with this Regulation, direct."

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS:
AMERICAN ACT EXPLAINED

BY ROGER N. BALDWIN.

The following article from the pen of the well-known American lawyer and Liberal thinker is reprinted from The Nation, New York, U.S.A., for October 12, 1940.—Ed.

Provision for conscientious objectors under the recently enacted Military Service Bill falls short of the liberal measure advocated by the Quakers and other agencies. It does not include non-religious objectors and does not permit total exemption for any man. But what failed to be written into the law may yet be achieved by regulation. Even the War Department officials responsible for the draft regulations have stated privately that they favour an interpretation of the provisions generous enough to exempt, as in the World War, all genuine objectors, whether religious, humanitarian, or political. Though the World War provision for objectors was narrowly written to include only members of "well-recognised religious sects historically opposed to war," it was in practice extended by regulation to include even members of the I.W.W., Socialists, anarchists, and, indeed, Irishmen who objected to fighting in a war on England's side.

Congress, however, fearful that Communists and German-American Nazis might take advantage of too liberal a provision for objectors, refused to extend a definition which recognises only those who "by reason of religious training and belief are conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." Even in peace time Congress could not be induced to be as generous as Britain is in war time, although in the hearings before the Military Affairs Committees of both houses not a single voice was raised against the proposed provisions and an impressive array of witnesses supported them.

Congressional fears of leaving a loophole for Communists and German-American Nazis are, I believe, unfounded. The Communists, despite their opposition to conscription, have already advised their members to obey the law and enter the army here as they have in other countries. German-American sympathisers with Hitler and Irish-Catholic followers of Father Coughlin, though opposed to the draft, will raise no issue of conscience. The conflict between conscience and conscription will revolve around the religious objector who refuses all service and the comparatively few Socialist, Anarchist, and "ethical" objectors.

The present Military Service Act is an improvement upon the World War Draft Act in that conscientious objectors are to be dealt with outside the army. They first declare themselves in a questionnaire to be filled out after registration and then get a hearing by the local draft board. Those found to be genuine objectors may be assigned either to non-combatant service in the army, or, if they refuse any military service, to "work of national importance under civilian direction." In the World War under a similar provision, objectors were furloughed from the army to farm work under civilian diection or to work with the Quakers abroad. Similar assignments are doubtless now contemplated.

Men who refuse even civilian service will inevitably be prosecuted and will face penalties potentially more severe than in the World War. The maximum prison term for a man tried in the civil courts for refusing to obey the Draft Act in the World War was one year; under the Military Service Act it is five years, with a fine up to $10,000. It is possible that some at least of those who refuse all service may be assigned to the work they are doing if such work is regarded as of "national importance." That has been done in England, and it offers a means of breaking the impasse between some of the "absolutists" and the government. High officials in the War Department are quoted as saying that they wish the act to be so administered that no genuine objector will be sent to prison.

All objectors dissatisfied with a local board's ruling and those who refuse all service will have the right of appeal to the regional appeals boards. These boards will refer all appeals to the Department of Justice, which will investigate and give a hearing to each objector. Just how the machinery of the department will operate is not yet known, but efforts are being made to prevent the FBI from handling such a delicate task as searching a man's conscience. The department's recommendations to an appeals board are only advisory. In each case the decision of the appeals board is final, unless the President can be induced to intervene. Efforts are being made to secure the appointment by the President of a special national board on conscientious objectors, limiting the discretion of the appeal boards, since only some central authority thoroughly familiar with the varieties of conscience can insure uniform and just treatment. It would be an injustice, for example, to have members of Jehovah's Witness considered insincere in one area and exempted as genuine religious objectors in another.

If the decision of the appeals board is against an objector, he will be notified by his local draft board to report for physical examination preparatory to induction into the army. If he then refuses he will be subject to trial in the civil courts. If he should take the physical examination and pass it he would be eligible for military service, and as soon as he took the oath required on induction into the army, would come under the jurisdiction of a military court martial. Refusal to comply at that point or with any subsequent order would subject him to the almost limitless penalties of a military court.

Most objectors, obviously, will be tried in civil courts; among these will be those who refuse to obey any order of a local draft board, whether they are adjudged sincere objectors or not, and those who refuse to comply with the requirements for registration. It is known that a considerable number of men, including some of the most obviously sincere religious objectors, will refuse to register on the prescribed forms and merely notify the local draft boards of their names and addresses so as not to be confused with draft-dodgers. Since refusal to fill out the forms is a violation of law, these men will almost certainly be prosecuted. Thus at the very beginning of the draft there will be held those trials for conscience which the administration seems anxious to avaid, and the civil courts will be confronted with the unwelcome duty of creating martyrs for principle. Washington officials have stated that men who refuse to register will be leniently treated and have even suggested that registration by others in their behalf might be accepted, but refusal to give any information except name, age, and address will make prosecution almost inevitable. While objectors will have no formal opportunity to state their position until they are reached by questionnaires in the process of calling men up, many intend to indicate it by writing "conscientious objector" on the margin of their registration cards. Such a notation, even though outside the information specified, is not a violation of law.

The prospective number of objectors, by any estimate, will be small. Most of them, as in the World War, will be members of pacifist religious sects. And most of them will accept non-combatant service in the army or work of national importance under civilian direction. In the World War 65,000 out of more than 3,000,000 drafted men registered as conscientious objectors with the draft boards, but only 4,000 so declared themselves after arriving at a military camp, and less than 500 were court-martialled for refusing all service or as insincere. . . .

The task of distinguishing the genuine conscientious objectors from the draft-evaders will be a difficult one. In the World War this delicate probe into sincerity was conducted by a special board appointed by the Secretary of War, composed of Harlan F. Stone, now Justice of the Supreme Court, Judge Julian W. Mack, and an army officer. This board went about the country interviewing men segregated at military camps. Their decisions as to whether a man should be treated as a genuine objector or as a "slacker" were final. The records show that a few men will pretend to conscientious scruples to secure their personal safety or convenience, but that their resistance is easily worn down and their pretence exposed. In England 20 per cent of the objectors up to June 1 were classed as not bona fide and were ordered into the army.

When men of unfamiliar and apparently inconsistent views come before the boards that will judge the validity of their scruples, some injustice may be done. Consistency will be demanded by agents of the government; complete consistency can rarely be furnished by objectors. The Christian pacifists will be perhaps most easily understood, though Jehovah's Witnesses will be a problem, as they were in the World War. Men whose conscientious objections rest upon loyalty to humanity, to the international working class, and- to political philosophies that seem "un American" are the most likely to be unfairly treated.

Legal aid to conscientious objectors will be rendered by the American Civil Liberties Union in all cases in which injustice appears and in appeals to the regional boards. The Union will not aid men prosecuted for refusing to identify themselves on registration day, though it may aid those prosecuted for refusing to fill out the prescribed forms. It advises all objectors who desired to be treated as such to comply fully with registration requirements and to state plainly their views. Conscientious objectors will also be aided by the leading Protestant agencies, not only the denominations historically opposed to war but others as well. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has established a National Committee on Conscientious Objectors; the Quakers, Mennonites, and other pacifist sects have their committees; and the Fellowship of Reconciliation in New York City has established a National Board of Conscientious Objectors to furnish information and advice.

Not until the Department of Justice announces the personnel of its investigating agency, and until we know whether a central reviewing body is to be created, shall we be able to tell just how liberal the administration of the law will be, what burden the private agencies will carry, or how well the government will be able to resolve the historic conflict between conscience and military conscription.

Anglican Pacifist Fellowship

This is an association of communicant members of the Church of England, clerical and lay, who have pledged themselves "to take no part in war, but to work positively for the construction of Christian peace in the world."

Members of the Fellowship hold that "wherever the principles of their religion come into conflict with the standards of the secular world, at that precise point the witness to full Christianity must be plainly borne. They are, therefore in conflict with much of the existing social, economic, political and industrial order, and are con vinced that modern war has its roots in failure to apply the principles, teaching and example of the living Christ to the problems of everyday life.

Those who are in agreement with these principles should write for an explanatory leaflet to the Rev. C. Paul Gliddon, 17 *Red Lion Square, London, W.C.*1.

THE DUKE AND 18b.

Peter Howard, in the Sunday Express, for December 8 last, publishes a series of notes headed: "What is The Duke of Bedford Up To?" Under this heading he wrote:—

"Some say that the worst mistake a man can make is to be born of poor parents. By their exertions—or their good fortunes—his ancestors spared the Duke of Bedford this folly.

"Dukes are not famous for their poverty, and of all dukes in this kingdom the Duke of Bedford is probably the richest.

"He owns land and castles and houses. Much of his property is in London, now the target of Hitler's bombers.

"What is his grace the duke up to? Here is an odd angle on his present activities. A friend of mine wrote a letter to the Press. In this letter my friend drew attention to what he regarded as a weakness in the Purchase Tax.

"My friend was surprised to receive a few days later a note from the Duke of Bedford (living in Newton Stewart, Wigtownshire), signed by the ducal hand, congratulating him on his letter to the Press, and enclosing for his attention a bundle of printed literature."

This attack on the Duke of Bedford for possessing property is directed against him merely because he is opposed to war. Are there no people on the side of war who own land and castles and houses? Are these people ever attacked in the capitalist war press? Would the Duke of Bedford be reminded of his possessions if he identified himself with the cause of war? Are there not people hungry for wealth on the side of war? Are these people not supporting the clamour of war because they hope to grow rich thereby? We do not believe in the existence of rich and poor. We do not believe in titles or in any of the paraphernalia or class distinctions of contemporary society. But we do object to the irrelevancy, which amounts to abuse, of indicting the Duke of Bedford's stand for pacifism by attacking his property interests. The Duke's anti-militarism is not to his class interest and does involve boycott and antagonism in the very circles to which he might be expected to address himself for respect and friendship.

Peter Howard reproduces "a few extracts from a document the Duke of Bedford sent my friend." These extracts urged "a negotiated peace in which neither side gives in." The Duke of Bedford's views on this matter are known to our readers and need not be requoted. Peter Howard continues:—

"One of the documents (priced 6d. on the cover but sent free and post-free by the Duke to my friend) is composed by the Duke himself. It is published by Mr. R. J. Scrutton. . . .

"Mr. Scrutton believes that 'there must be a written common law to make illegal the exploitation of human life.' . . .

"Now what on earth is the game? What is the Duke of Bedford doing in association with Mr. Scrutton?

"I must make my position plain about this matter. I stand against repression and for freedom of expression. I believe, as a general principle, that men should be allowed to state their views on events without hindrance even in wartime.

"But I also believe in equality. I know perfectly well that if I, Peter Howard, expressed views like those set out by the Duke of Bedford in the document he sent to my friend I should be locked up by the Home Office under Section 18B of the Defence Regulations.

"You may agree with the proposition that I should deserve to get locked up. Or you may hate it. That at any rate is the position.

"For my part, I think it would be farcical to lock up the Duke or myself for expressing this opinion. It only represents the viewpoint of a dwindling minority. Just the same many of the women and men already detained under Section 18B have advocated peace with Hitler less directly and less skillfully than his Grace the Duke of Bedford.

"Now, either all those who advocate peace with our enemies should be locked up, or none of those who advocate peace with our enemies should be punished on that account. Judge or journalist, butcher or barrister, duke or demolition worker—all should go the same way home.

"Nothing I have here set down on paper should be taken as indicating that I believe in allowing such freedom of expression in wartime as will damage our cause. My opinion about the duke is that he does us no harm with his doctrines

"But men who preach sedition and dissention in our docks and factories, that is another matter—in their case I advocate jail. For them I am a locker-upper. That is my position."

The last paragraph is alarming. It might mean the imprisonment, without trial, of any man who ventilated a factory grievance or opposed some most reprehensible expression of industrial conscription. We are not saying that in war time actual agents of the enemy nation must not be arrested or detained. We are not pleading the cause of spies. Thy must face the penalty of their trade. We are protesting against the loose employment of the terms "dissension" and "sedition." These are dangerous terms of clamour and have no place in the vocabulary of democracy.

But why should there be any "game" in a duke associating with a man who wants "to make illegal the exploitation of human life"? Might not even a duke become a Socialist? We know that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. But a rich man might have ambitions and impulses in that direction. He might yearn for sincerity and simplicity. .

In the Sunday Express for December 22, Peter Howard returns to the Duke of Bedford but softens his comments:—

"A week or so ago I wrote about that well-known Christian Pacifist, the Duke of Bedford.

"Since then I have received a letter from the duke. May I add that the letter received from his grace the duke was far and away the most friendly document I have ever received from a duke in my life? In fact, it is the only document I ever received from dukedom."

Peter Howard concludes his article by making the following extract from the letter the Duke of Bedford sent to the editor of the Sunday Express:

"I agree with Mr. Howard about the treatment of 18b prisoners. The Government had the choice of two honest and consistent policies, and it has rejected both in favour of one which is neither honest nor consistent.

"If it had imprisoned only traitors engaged in sabotage or in plotting to assist a German invasion and had left at liberty those who, though loyal to their country, considered the war a mistake, they would have shown the maximum degree of regard possible in war-time for the principles of democratic liberty for which we are supposed to be fighting.

"If, on the other hand, they had imprisoned all of us who favour a negotiated peace, they would have been quite consistent—as well, of course, as completely Nazi."

Which seems to be an excellent criticism of 18B, and one shared by several of the speakers from the Labour benches in the House of Commons on the 18B debate.

Minister—Rev. RICHARD LEE, M.A.

A Centre of Culture and of Anti-Militarist and Anti-War Christianity.

This church has been re-opened after temporary repairs. Owing to the damage, it is impossible to obtain warmth. Repairs will cost over £500. Whilst playing his part in alleviating the distress caused by the heavy bombings, Richard Lee continues his work for peace. He has reprinted his recent leaflet against war and Councillor Tom Kerr, of Glasgow, has sent a donation towards the cost of reprinting and distribution. Richard Lee feels that his pulpit has a part to play in ending war and suffering and promoting the cause of world peace. He believes that the Unitarian Pulpit should be the fearless centre of radical thought and protest against the horrors of war.

"Man Is Immortal."—Some errors crept into this essay, published in our last issue.

"Gethsemane" was spelt with a small "g" instead of a capital "G."

Kensington War Refugees

We make no apologies for reproducing the interesting letter we have received from the Rev. John C. Ballantyne, M.A., minister of Essex Unitarian Church, Palace Gardens Terrace, London, W.8., on the subject of war refugees. Mr Ballantyne is the Hon. Secretary of the Kensington War Refugees Committee. The Chairman of the Committee is Councillor R. C. D. Jenkins, J.P., L.C.C., Mayor of Kensington, and the Hon. Treasurer is the Borough Treasurer, Mr W. J. S. Moore.

Mr Ballantyne writes:

"Dear Mr. Aldred,

"Many thanks for sending me your publications.

"I need hardly say that I admire your courage. I hope many of your readers will be stirred to sincere thought by your writings.

"I am not pretending to contribute to your columns. I am a pacifist who calls himself an activist. The notion grows on me with the years that our best reply to war consists of a way of live. I am quite aware that to say this seems to some people (a) bumptious and (b) soft. I don't think I am (a); am not pretending that my life is any better than the other man's; but my firm conviction is that only propaganda which would have any permanent value would be a propaganda of action; hence the rame activist. My hope is less and less that people will subscribe to this or that belief about war, but that they will be active—passionately active—and constructive, letting every action of their lives be activated by a certain quality or spirit. And I know I am not (b)! I have found it far softer to talk than to live. I might sound, or appear, far more courageous if I were to hit out with the rod of my mouth at the 'opposition,' denounce their errors, etc. I find it much more difficult, in the midst of war, but much more invigorating to me, and more helpful to my little world, to do actively, each day, something towards building a better world-order.

"As a matter of fact there are a hundred and one things that can be done, even in these mad days, and the way I find most suitable is this Refuge work. Here are these foreign folks in our midst. Through welfare effort, education of the adults and children clothing and feeding, Club-centre, etc., we try at this Church to prepare our Refugees (many hundreds of them!) so that by and by they may go back to their own lands as ambassadors of a Way of Brotherhood and of internationalmindedness (that's a fine word!)

"I am not against efforts for freedom of speech and conscience,—far from it. I am only trying to say that my reason for not sending a long 'provocative' letter for publication is that I feel the urgent necessity, the terrible urgent necessity, of another way by which to achieve the liberation of the spirit of mankind—the spread of living fellowship, here, there, and everywhere,—a spirit that prompts to act, to build, to construct, to produce.

"I am not a looker-on pacifist. I'm not a dictator or a captain on the bridge, not even a man at the wheel, but a stoker, trying to get up steam which will propel (the only steam which will ever propel) this dear old, sinful, glamorous world into the ways of new art and mightier music and all the things that are more excellent.

"If you can, by your able pen, deepen the spirit of mutual trust and sacrificial service, then more power to your elbow!

"Yours faithfully,

"formerly a Glaswegian,

(Signed) JOHN C. BALLANTYNE.

Mr Ballantyne has written an interesting book, published by THE LINDSEY PRESS, entitled: Liberty, Diversity, Fraternity. He has published a pamphlet on peace and conscientious objectors, under the title: Liberal Christians and the Problem of Peace. In this he shows how he was converted to pacifism from militarism during the Great War by appearing on behalf of conscientious objectors before Tribunals. This penny pamphlet deserves a wide circulation.

This pamphlet is published by the

UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN PEACE FELLOWSHIP.

BASIS:

"A fellowship within our churches of those who bear witness to the belief that war is a sin against God and a crime against humanity, and that only under the sanctions of the law of love is it possible to establish right relations between citizens and nations, and who therefore pledge themselves to the promotion of international goodwill and peace."

Hon. Sec.: Rev. WALTER M. LONG, 35 Oakington Manor Drive, Wembley, Middlesex.

Dear Mr Aldred,—Would you please send me 6 copies of THE WORD. I always remember "The Spur," which was one of the things that inspired me when very, very young.

All best wishes

Yours for the Cause of Peace,

A WAR RESISTER'S STORY

R. M. Fox, in Smoky Crusade, published in 1937, by the Hogarth Press, London, tells the story of his down to the time that he left London to settle in Dublin. He described the orators of the Socialist Party of Great Britain who lectured in Tottenham, London, in days prior to the Great War of 1914-1918, and explains how he jonied the party. He became a speaker himself, whilst working in the factory, and serving his time to engineering. On Labour Day—the first of May—he joined regularly the demonstration from the Embankment to Hyde Park. He describes the 1912 Labour Day demonstration in Hyde Park, and pictures the Anarchist platform.

"At one platform the chairman announced Guy Aldred, Anarchist editor of The Herald of Revolt. A full-faced young man with a broad forehead and dark eyes of a dreamer mounted the platform. The meeting was edged in shadow now. There was a holiday spirit in the crowd, some were inclined to be rowdy.

"'Anarchist!' jeered one man. "I'm a bigger man than you are!'"

"Unfortunately," said Aldred smoothly, "we do not, nowadays, measure a man's intelligence by the length of his body."

"I looked at him curiously. A well-turned phrase never failed to hold my interest. He was wearing a dark jersey with a gleaming red tie under the soft collar. He had a Norfolk jacket unbuttoned, the belt hanging loose. He emphasised his remarks by clenching his fist and bringing it down on the palm of his other hand. But he was a philosophic rather than a boisterous speaker. He went on to attack what he called the Institution of the King. As he elbowed his way through the crowd at the conclusion of his speech I saw he was joined by a tall young girl with a dark oval face, masses of silky black hair and expressive eyes, the eyes of an idealist and a revolutionary. This was Rose Witcop, a Polish Jewess, who shared his life, and only refrained from marrying him because neither of them believed in the Institution of Marriage any more than they believed in the Institution of the King. Rose did not marry him until years later—when they had parted at her wish. They were married then to save her from being deported as an alien. The Institution of Marriage was found to have certain conveniences after all."

Fox proceeds to describe Charles Lalor and his famous bookshop. He relates the story of the I.W.W. propaganda in London at that time, and recalls Freitag, the little German printer who worked in a cellar off Tottenham Court Road, and produced anti-militarist sheets and pamphlets. He tells how the war came and how he refused to attest. Fox's brother was arrested as a conscientious objector. When Fox's young brother had been sentenced to Wandsworth Detention Barracks for a second time by Court Martial, his mother and father went to see him and were refused admittance, as the prisoner was refusing all military orders. Owing to the threats that were issued, the mother addressed a letter of protest to Mr Philip Snowden, M.P., and received the following, to our mind, disgraceful reply:—

"Dear Madam,—I really cannot help your son. He has made his choice between civil freedom and remaining under military control, and has accepted the latter. He knew when he did so that it meant returning to the Army and going through all the ordeal again to find himself back again in prison once more.

"By infinite labour and effort we have provided a way of escape for them from military control, and if they will not accept it we cannot help them. However, I have got the permission of the War Minister to say that the offer of accepting the Home Office scheme remains open, and if your son should at any time feel that he can conscientiously accept it, as the vast majority of the C.O.'s have done, he has only to notify that and he will be released.

"I have much sympathy with you, and I think your son might take into consideration that ti would be a relief to you to know that he was away from further suffering in the hands of the military.

"Yours sincerely,

"PHILIP SNOWDEN."

In November, 1916, R. M. Fox was arrested for refusing to render military service, and was taken to Mill Hill Barracks. He describes life in the guardroom, his sentence of 112 days, and his removal to Wormwood Scrubs prison. This description of prison should be read by present-day C.O.'s.

Fox served his sentence, and was taken back to Mill Hill Barracks, and Court-martialled a second time. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour in Wandsworth Prison. He describes Wandsworth. Readers will recall that the story of Wandsworth Prison, with pictures of C Hall and a prison cell, was published in The Word for April, 1940. Fox writes:—

"When I set out for Wandsworth Gaol, to do my two years, I was very glad of that.

"Each prisoner—there was about eight of us—who went to Wandsworth were served out with a generous ration of tea and sugar, wrapped in paper, for the army was responsible for our maintenance for the day. In prison, however, tea drinking was not allowed, so each man had to empty his packet solemnly in the firegrate of the pirson reception-room.

"Wandsworth was an old stone prison with an out-of-date and inadequate heating system. The stone cell floors gave one teh impression of living always in the scullery. I had to start again and work up to the privilege of letters, visits, library books and work in association. But when I had completed my novitiate for the second time I sewed mail-bags in a workshed on a treadle sewing machine. A similar machine occupied a good part of the space in my narrow cell. We sat in rows and a warder stood on a raised platform, watching us intently to see that we did not talk.

"Each Sunday after the sermon the Chaplain gave us a résumé of the week's news in a ten minutes' talk. The news was carefully selected. He told us, with indignation, that the Germans had started a 'corpse factory.'

"At the end of the sermon the organist played God Save the King. The khaki-clad soldiers in the gallery always stood to attention. The "drab" men—ordinary convicts—stood also, but very few of the grey, broad-arrowed mass of objectors rose to their feet. At first, the Chaplain was inclined to insist on men rising, but thinking better of it, he left this to individual choice.

"One Sunday, when news time came, the Chaplain spoke in an unaccustomed lyrical fashion.

"'And now,' he said, 'I want to tell you something for which all the bells in Christendom should ring with joy. A nation of 160 millions have at last asserted their right to liberty. The Russians have revolted and dethroned the Czar. Autocracy in Russia is no more!'

"That was the first news we had of the Russian Revolution, the shock of which was reverberating through the world. Men clapped and stamped their feet for several minutes, their pallid prison features lighting with joy. The Chaplain was disconcerted by the enthusiasm with which his news was received. He went on hurriedly to tell us that Russia would prosecute the War with far more vigour along with its democratic allies.

"Nothing else was whispered about in the prison for days. By this time men had become adepts at talking without moving their lips. Even the rumours of our impending release—a perennial topic—were swept out of the way by this great event.

"The Chaplain continued to give us tiny scraps of information about Russia. The Russians, he said, were like schoolboys who had been penned up in school for a long time. Suddenly they had been released and wanted to stay in the playground. But when they settled down, they would begin to fight again in earnest. So he tried to comfort himself but, as week succeeded week, the Chaplain grew less indulgent to the Russians.

"One Sunday his tone changed. The Russian sailors of the Baltic Fleet, he announced, had disarmed their officers. The admiral, rather than give up his sword, had flung it into the sea!

"His announcement was the signal for the most wonderful and spontaneous demonstration I have ever seen. Men who had served all these weary months in jail leapt to their feet and roared with delight, they stamped, clapped and yelled till the prison chapel shook.

"The Chaplain was pale with anger. When the tumult ceased he cried, 'I denounce that as an act of blasphemy in the House of God!'

"One or two of the prisoners were actually charged by the warders with creating disorder in the chapel, but the Prison Governor said that he couldn't punish them for doing just as all the rest did.

"The Chaplain, like other supporters of Imperialism, found it hard to believe that the Russians hadn't planned and carried out their revolution just in order to help in the war. And he would never understand why men in prison longing for the end of the war—which incidentally meant the end of their own sufferings—should hail the Russian refusal to fight with such enthusiastic delight. The objectors, too, had to meet black looks and muttered threats from the ordinary convicts as they filed through to the work-sheds.

"Wandsworth Gaol overlooked the military detention barraks' exercise ground, which lay beneath our windows. All day raucous shouts and curses of the drill sergeants rang in our ears. We saw the bullying that went on in the square. One man—by no means the worst, for he had a sense of humour—used to throw stones at his men. I heard an instructor teach bayonet drill out in the square."

He described how he and eight other men were removed to Brixton Prison. We were one of the others mentioned.

We pass over Fox's story of "Battles in Brixton" to come to Wandsworth Prison again. Fox finished his two years' imprisonment on the eve of the armistice, and was returned to Mill Hill Barracks for his third Court-martial. He was sentenced again to two years' hard labour and removed to Wandsworth Prison. He describes the trek to Wandsworth and his experiences there.

This story is far too long to tell in small type, so it is printed separately as a special article.

GLASGOW CORPORATION C.O. EMPLOYEES

The Glasgow Corporation, on January 9, discussed the question of C.O. employees.

Councillor John McSkimming objected to the procedure adopted by the Conditions of Service Committee for dealing with the application for an allowance by a conscientious objector employee who has undertaken forestry work.

In committee it was decided that, as in the case of employees on military service, applications from conscientious objectors should be remitted to a sub-committee with powers to grant allowances on approved scales. A minority of the committee, led by two Socialist members, wished to have the remit limited to one "to consider and report" on claims received from conscientious objectors. The committee's decision was taken on a 7 to 6 vote.

Councillor McSkimming, in moving the amendment defeated in committee, held that the power to make grants to conscientious objectors without reporting the matter meant depriving the Corporation of a control and a means of obtaining information that they ought to have in such a situation.

Councillor W. G. Bennett, in seconding, said these conscientious objectors were getting all the advantages that were intended for the men going on service while evading, of course, what many held to be a duty of citizenship. The provision made in the Military Service Act for their exemption did not contemplate that they were to be specially favoured in this way.

Bailie James Carmichael defended the decision of the committee as one that was in line with accepted practice. The real objection by Mr McSkimming, he said, was that it did not discriminate against the conscientious objector.

The committee's position was approved by 46 votes to 26.

HENRY J. ADLARD

At Trim Street (Unitarian) Chapel, Bath, the Rev. Henry J. Adlard is delivering a series of Sunday afternoon addresses, beginning at 3.0, entitled: "Since Calvary." This series began on January 19. It repeats the series delivered January to April, 1934, by Mr. Adlard, at the First Unitarian Church, Duluth, Minn., U.S.A. The titles were reproduced in our December issue, and need not be repeated. Mr Adlard adds a concluding address which rounds off the series. This will be delivered on March 16, and is entitled: "Which raises the Question—was Jesus a Christian?"

Mr. Adlard rightly claims for this series: "They will be a tremendous revelation." To most orthodox and complacent folk they will be a revelation. For this reason, they should be attended.

Mr. Adlard delivers two lectures every Sunday: 11 a.m. and 3.0 p.m.

On December 29, he preached a vigorous sermon on the theme, "The Church and Its Doubtful Allies." A summary of this address will appear in our next issue.

REPRISALS:

What Does Christianity Say?

By the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., Minister, Hope Street Unitarian Church, Liverpool.

[Reprinted from The Unitarian and Free Christian Monthly, January, 1941.—Ed.]

MORALITY AND EXPEDIENCY.

Some writers are aware that the question of morality, and the question of expediency, as they understand it, are not the same. They believe that war, with all its evils, is necessary at the present time, and they do not believe that there is any point in trying to apply a moral standard to the methods we adopt. Others assume that what is necessary for the purpose of victory is by that very fact morally justified. Reprisals, one writer argues, are unquestionably right, if they will shorten the war, with which suggestion it is interesting to compare a statement made by a German airman:

> "I can speak for my comrades," he said, "when I assert that every one of them drops his bombs, not because he wants to kill Englishmen, but because he feels somehow that the best way to end the war quickly is to cause just as much destruction as possible."

In all the correspondence I have read, not one of the writers, so far as I am aware, made the slightest reference to the fact that the method of retaliation, hitting back again, reprisals, was a thing explicitly considered, and explicitly rejected, in the teaching of Christ. What I find it difficult to understand is how these writers can adopt an ethical outlook diametrically opposed to that of Jesus without even referring to the difference.!

What matters, people tell us, is the purpose we have in view: the question of method is relatively unimportant. That was the point of view of the Inquisitors in the Middle Ages. To-day what is substantially the same position is held by Fascists and Communists. The interests of the national State in the one case, of the working class in the other, are held to justify whatever men believe to be necessary to secure them.

CHRISTIANITY AS A WAY OF ACTING.

Is that Christian teaching? In the Acts of the Apostles Christianity itself is described as "the Way," and Jesus declared, according to John, "I am the Way." Christianity does not come before us simply as a vision of the goal we have to seek: it comes before us as a vision of the way in which the goal is to be attained. It comes before us not simply as a demand that we shall serve God faithfully, and seek to do his Will; it comes before us as a claim that we can see in Jesus the Word made flesh—that we can see in his spirit and his way of life the revelation of the divine Purpose for mankind.

Mr Marchbank, a Trade Union leader, secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, urges that we should pursue the policy of bomb for bomb and blow for blow. A writer in The New Statesman for November 30th, says:—

> "It is not at all a question of mere revenge. It is rather a question of an offence against society being followed by inevitable retribution on the heads of the offenders."

Incidentally, that seems a curious way of describing the method of wholesale slaughter. The "offenders" in his eyes are evidently the whole German population, including the children—unless he forgets that children are involved. The writer in The New Statesman contends that what is needed to cure the Germans of their love of militarism is the method of retribution. Mr Marchbank describes any shrinking from the "maximum destruction of German cities" as sheer weakness and imbecility." Now turn to the pages of the Bible. In Exodus xxi. it is laid down that where a man does injury to another there shall be an exact and literal retribution:

> "Thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe."

JUSTICE OR VINDICTIVENESS.

The motive for this was in the first instance to establish justice against sheer vindictiveness. When the Hebrew legislator said, "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand," he was trying to restrict the fury of what was originally an unregulated revengefulness. When Jesus quoted the traditional law, he did so in order to express the more clearly by contrast his own distinctive method. "Ye have heard that it was said, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you 'Resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also.'"

It was one of the marks of the early Christians that they did, to a great extent, live in harmony with this principle. Christianity was, to begin with, a new way of living—a way of living based on the way of Jesus.

THE ART OF LOVING OTHERS.

Can you reconcile that with the principle of reprisals? The Manchester Guardian said, not long ago, "The art of war is largely the art of inflicting injury without receiving it." We may say of Christianity that it is the art of loving our fellows without being loved in return; it is the art of loving others even when they are contemptuous, or abusive, or filled with hate. And It is an art in which most of us become proficient only through constant practice and inner training.

ITALIAN CONCHIE

We excerpt the following open letter from John Bull, London, for January 18 last:—

The CHAIRMAN,
Herts C.O. Tribunal.

Dear Sir,—I don't think Nemo Ermini will make a good soldier.

There's a good reason.

His father fought for us in the last war. This time he was interned, deported in the Arandora Star, and lost.

Before this, young Nemo had been turned down by the Home Guard because his father was an Italian. So he joined the A.F.S., but resigned on hearing of his father's death.

Yet he is expected to fight for us. Although sympathetic, you refuse to excuse him as a conscientious objector.

Sympathy won't sweeten injustice.—John Bull.

OUR APPEAL

As explained in these columns, to save The Word we need to raise £1971 11s 3d. This is the exact sum required. We are publishing no names until this sum is raised. Then we will publish a complete list and leave the matter. Last month, the balance had been reduced to £1954 11s 6d. Since then we have received about £15 9s 3d. This leaves the balance required £1939 9s 3d.

We are grateful to every comrade who has responded, but the response is useless unless it is immediate. We must reduce to 8 pages unless this sum is raised before the end of March. It is difficult to keep going and we do appeal earnestly to each comrade to come to our rescue. We expect that you will do so.

This pamphlet is addressed to Socialists for consideration and criticism. It is not intended to be an attack on Socialism, or a criticism of Socialist thought. The Author has no desire to cover with criticism the whole field of Socialist thought. He merely wishes to submit to Socialists, for their observation, another approach to the attempted solution of the problem of poverty and exploitation, the problem of social wrong. The Author desires to receive Socialist criticism: and to be corrected if the reader feels that he has fallen into error. Your consideration and criticism is invited.

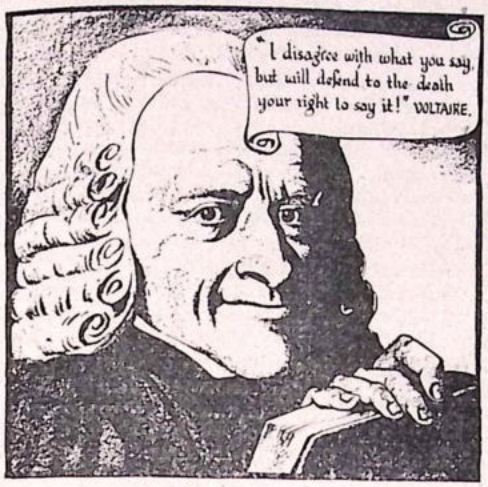
Truer than ever before!



This excellent cartoon was published in "The Daily Mirror," London, on January 17 last. It is reproduced with acknowledgments but without permission. Our contemporary published an excellent editorial in the same issue on civil liberty.

'THE DAILY WORKER'

The House of Commons discussions and voting in the suppression of The Daily Worker will be discussed in our next issue. There are constitutional principles involved which ought to be reviewed, even in war time. We have no sympathy with The Daily Worker, nor with the party that publishes it. They have justified the Soviet imprisonments without trial and staged executions. They have been the hirelings of a power that murdered Socialists in the name of Socialism, and rejoiced in describing Freedom as "a bourgeois superstition.' ' Without question, "Soviet Communism" is but a form of Fascism, closely allied to Nazi reaction. Whether this fact justifies the suppression of its organ, and the virtual declaration that the reading of the democracy is to be censured and controlled by the Home Office, is another question. Democracy means uncensored reading, in war time no less than in peace time, even of subsidised news and a hireling press.

If war comes, we are all going to be in for a difficult time again—all sections of the Labour and Socialist movement; and we must do our best, etch of us, to be as tolerant of our comrades who differ from us as it is humanly possible to be.

During the last war "Forward" gave hospitality to all varieties of Socialist opinion, which were honestly and competently stated in a comradely way. We must set ourselves resolutely to a continuance of that policy.

I can understand the whole-hog pacifist. I can understand the man who wants to pick and choose the sort of war in which he will fight. I can understand the man who has come (as I have) to give up hope for the world unless we can get an international police, and an international tribunal of equity. I can understand the Socialist driven so to hate the Fascist and Nazi violence and mentality that he will shoulder arms against their professors and supporters.

But each, let us not forget, is as honest and as sincere, as his neighbour. In this world there are not only blacks and whites. Sometimes there are greys.

—THOMAS JOHNSTON, M.P., in Forward, May 6, 1939.

STALINISM: PEACE AND WAR FROM WAR ZIG TO PEACE-ZAG

Last month a People's Convention, so called, was arranged in London, to organise a movement for a People's Government, also so-called. The aim of this People's Government was said to be peace. The convention was boosted in the Daily Worker. Shortly after the convention, the Daily Worker was suppressed.

The Convention Call, addressed to workers, socialists, trade unionists, the lower middle class, "democrats and anti-fascists," was signed by a long list of names which reads like a roll call of the Communist Party. No non-Stalinist organisation endorsed the Convention.

The Call presented the current line of the British Communist Party. The Tory Government was denounced for helping to place Hitler in power, and for getting the country into war; for profiteering, high prices, and taxes; for inadequate air raid protection. The Churchill Government was attacked for its failure to grant national freedom, and for its "scarcely-concealed hostility" to the Soviet Union. The Labour Party leaders were criticised for their participation in the coalition government.

The Convention Call demanded friendship with the Soviet Union, a People's Government, and a people's peace.

Every intelligent Socialist and Pacifist, every thinking working man and woman knew that the real purpose of this Communist Party Convention was to advance Stalinism. They knew that the policies of the Communist Party before and since the present war were and are dictated by the reactionary interests of the Russian Stalinist bureaucracy.

Before the present war when Stalin was flirting with the democratic imperialists of Britain and France, the English Stalinists were anxious to force the imperialist democracies into war against Hitler. When the present war broke out, the Communist Party of Great Britain was resolutely pro-war. So were the "Communists" in the Paris Chamber of Deputies who voted for war credits. The Central Committee of the party issued a statement in September, 1939, calling for "support of all necessary measures to secure the victory of democracy over Facism."

The Stalin-Hitler pact took Gallacher and Pollitt by surprise. But they still expected, childfishly, that the Soviet Union would remain allied with British and French capitalism. In the first days of the war, the Communist Party executive summarised the situation for the enlightenmen of Daily Worker readers thus:—

"Indeed, the essence of the present situation is that the people have now to wage a struggle on two fronts. First, to secure the military victory over Fascism; second, to achieve this, the political victory over Chamberlain and the enemies of democracy in this country. These two aims are inseparable, and the harder the efforts to win one, the more sustained the activity to win the other."

Moscow advised the British Party that their line was wrong. The Stalin-Hitler pact meant that the British "Communists" must oppose the British Government and the war. The "Communist" yes-men did as they were ordered; they opposed the war with the same intelligence and the same sincerity as they had exercised in supporting it; they opposed the war as hirelings, compelled to obey their masters' orders. In this spirit of serfdom and hire-purchase they organised the People's Convention, a convention which ought to have commanded no respect from any decent, thinking man or woman.

Of course such a volte-face did not command complete adherence. The much-boomed Left Book Club went west. The People's Fronters, Harold Laski, John Strachey, Aneurin Bevan, Victor Gollanz remained faithful to the pro-war tune.

In line with the pro-Hitler policy, the Communist Party urged the national independence of the colonial peoples. This was not a principle but a tactic in line with the dictated changed allegiance. Previously, when Stalin was allied with the democratic imperialists, the Stalinists were told that the national independence of the oppressed peoples had to be subordinated to "collective security" against Hitler "in the interests of defeating fascism, the mortal enemy of the working class," to quote the words of a leader of the Communist International, Manuilsky (March, 1939).

The British Communist Party issued a statement on "The Colonies and Fascism," elaborating on the idea that the "main enemy" of the British colonials was not British imperialism but rather German Fascism. It denounced the very propaganda it now advances, by averring that such propaganda, in the name of repudiating existing imperialist domination, in practice acts as the apologist of fascist aggressive aims in relation to the colonial peoples." (Labour Monthly, August, 1939).

As soon as Stalin's henchmen adjusted themselves to their Fuehrer's alliance with German Fascism, they wrote a new statement ("The Colonies and War") condemning Britain's attempt to drag the colonies into the war (that is, the policy they themselves had advocated), forgetting about their old bogey of Fascism as the "main danger" in the colonies, and hypocritically announcing that "Communists have always fought for the right of all peoples to complete self-determination. . . " (Labour Monthly, December, 1939).

The Communist Party old line called for a "People's Government," a coalition of the Labour Party, Liberal Party, and "anti-fascist conservatives"—such as Eden and Churchill—which in alliance with the Soviet Union would wage war "in defence of democracy against fascism."

To-day they call for "A People's Government, truly representative of the whole people and able to inspire the confidence of the working people of the world" and for "a people's peace that gets rid of the causes of war." This government would establish "friendship with the Soviet Union."

What does this Communist Party "People's Government" mean? It means any British government which forms a military alliance with the Soviet Union. All the rest is mere verbiage. So long as the Churchill Government does not serve the interests that govern Stalin and dictate his policy, the Communist Party will be against the war and for a Hitler peace. Should the Churchill Government ever serve the interests of the Soviet bureaucracy, then the Stalinists will be once again ardent upholders of the Union Jack. The genuine question of peace and commonweal, the real economic interests of the working class, has no place in the Communist Party programme of thought and action. It is the subsidised party of the Soviet reaction and ought to command no respect and no support from the workers in Great Britain.

When one recalls the Reichstag fire trial, the denunciation of poor, simple, executed Van der Lubbe, the applauding of Dimitrov, the denunciation of Trotskyists, and others as Social Fascists, and then thinks over the Stalin-Hitler Pact, one is amazed at the perfidies of "Communism" and "Socialism." On the occasion of the Twenty-third anniversary of the October-November Revolution, last November, Stalin prohibited the raising of a single anti-fascist slogan in the Soviet Union. Likewise taboo were any and all anti-war or anti-imperialist slogans. Any mention of fascism, war, imperialism, victims of fascism, colonial peoples, class-war prisoners, refugees, was proscribed. In the 42 official slogans issued by the Kremlin for the November 7th celebrations there was not even a direct reference to capitalism.

The only referenece to the world situation was contained in the following slogan: "Long live the foreign policy of the Soviet Government! The policy of Peace between Peoples and Assuring the Security of our Fatherland!"

This meant, in other words, "Long live the Hitler-Stalin Pact!"

Even such a ritualistic slogan repeated for years as "Long Live the Soviet Power in the Whole World!" was omitted in 1940.

The People's Front Policy started in 1938. At this time, even, the Kremlin was selling oil to Mussolini for the massacre of Abyssinia. Yet Stalin issued these slogans for the celebration of the Eighteenth Anniversary of the November Revolution:—

"Our Flaming Greetings to the Proletarians and Toilers of France, the Vanguard Fighters Against Fascism, Against Imperialist War!"

"Bolshevik Greetings to the Revolutionary Proletariat of Germany! Long Live the Heroic Communist Party of Germany! Long Live Comrade THAELMANN! Let Us Tear Him From the Clutches of the Fascist Hangmen!"

"Bolshevik Greetings to the Popular Masses of Abyssinia, Courageously Defending Their Independence."

"Fraternal Greetings to the Heroic Working Class and all the Toiling Masses of China. Long Live the Communist Party of China!"

"The Imperialists are Dividing and Enslaving China! Greetings to the Chinese People Fighting for Their Emancipation and Independence!"

The Kremlin dictators have shaken hands with "the Fascist hangmen." Allied to Japan, the same dictators have no time for the Chinese struggle.

In 1935, Stalin launched so many slogans against Fascism, that to do them justice we would have to devote several issues of this journal to their reproduction. Here are a few selected at random:—

"Fascism is the Most Savage Offensive of Capitalism Against the Toiling Masses!

"Fascism—this Means War of Aggression!

"Fascism — This Means Hunger, Poverty, Misery!

"Down With Fascism! Down With Capitalism!

"Fuse Into a Single United Front For the Struggle Against Fascism—The Bitterest Enemy of All Peoples!"

In 1940, there is a complete silence as to Capitalism and Fascism. The 42 slogans are mostly "greetings" and injunctions to the workers, engineers, and technicians, calling for increased production from crops to metals, calico to buildings, culture to chemicals.

Another set of slogans simply raised "demands."

"Create Mighty State Labour Reserves for Industry and Transport!

"Long Live the October 2nd Laws Instituting Child Labour in the Soviet Union!

"The Struggle Against Laggards and Disorganizers of Production is the Struggle for Strengthening the Might of Our Fatherland and Its Red Army. Long Live Labour Discipline and Exemplary Order in the Enterprises of Our Fatherland!"

This was asking the workers to give revolutionary cheers for Fascist Labour Laws that enslaved them: for child labour, above all things!

The "Long Live" slogans related to Trade Unions, Komsomols, Soviet Intellectuals, all of which had been purged during the previous midsummer. Two slogans in this 1940 celebration merit special mention.

There was a sudden and rather unexpected reference to "Our Socialist Espionage Service—the CHEKA." This was in connection with a slogan calling for the strengthening of the Red Army. The Cheka arose during the civil war. It gave way to the G.P.U. This name became so abhorrent that the secret police department was renamed the N.K.V.D. And now, with a Fascist alliance, we have the return to the name more significant of terror than the G.P.U.—the CHEKA! This was and is a direct threat of intensified police terror and martial courts.

The second slogan was:—

"Let Us Unfold the Criticism of our Inadequacies! Let Us Strengthen Still More the Might and Organised Power of Our State!"

This slogan is not a slogan of Socialism but of Fascism; a slogan of centralised power, of a totalitarian state. It is a slogan of falsehood, persecution and tyranny.

And so we are brought from the "Communist" War-Zig to the "Communist" Peace-Zag. In neither instance was the well-being of the working classes, or the final peace and commonweal of the world, the inspiring consideration of the slogan-mongers or hireling apologists for the Soviet Union. The "Communist" zig-zag policy is one of corruption, persecution, betrayal, and dishonesty. It is not Communism but Capitalism; not peace but militarism; not proletarian but power-mongering and power-pandering; a policy of exploitation and outrage. The Stalinists have no place in the proletarian struggle.

JOHN REED:
HONOURED AND SUPPRESSED

At Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A., at the end of last year, William Z. Foster—otherwise Zigzag Foster—chairman of the Communist Party in the United States, spoke at a Memorial Anniversary meeting for John Reed, Harvard alumnus and American revolutionist, author of the great eye-witness chronicle of the Russian Revolution, Ten Days That Shook The World.

Following Foster's eulogy, several persons asked the speaker how he could praise John Reed when John Reed's book is banned in the Soviet Union and suppressed by the Stalinists in all other countries.

Another question put to Foster was: "Isn't it also true that you wrote an extensive work in 1921, following a visit to the Soviet Union, entitled "The Russian Revolution"? And isn't it also true that you went John Reed one better by failing to mention Stalin's name even once, while writing a special commendatory biographical sketch of Trotsky?"

Foster answered briefly that John Reed had overestimated Trotsky, as had others (i.e., himself).

Foster "forgot" to add that Reed's book bore an introduction written by Lenin who shared Reed's erroneous view of Trotsky's place in the revolution.

In 1937 the London News Chronicle sought permission from the Communist Party of Great Britain to reprint serially John Reed's Ten Days That Shook The World." What happened was reported as follows in the London Evening Standard, November 12, 1937:—

"This contemporary account of the Bolshevik uprising was written by John Reed, the American Communist, who was a close personal friend of Lenin. When he died in 1921 he left the British copyright in his book to the Communist Party.

"When the 'News-Chronicle' approached the copyright owners for permission to serialize the book it was gladly given.

"The Communists asked no fee, and made only one stipulation—that all reference to Trotsky should be eliminated from the text.

"Confronted with this modern version of Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark, the Liberal organ abandoned the project."

And Willie Gallacher complains about suppression!

THOMAS JOHNSTON

On Friday, February 14, 1941, Thomas Johnston was installed formally as Secretary of State for Scotland, the ceremony taking place in the First Division courtroom of the Court of Session.

The Lord President presided, and there was a full bench of thirteen judges.

Johnston handed to the Lord President the notification of his appointment, which was thereupon read by his Lordship. Johnston then took the Oath of Allegiance to His Majesty the King and the official oath that "I will well and truly serve His Majesty in the office of the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal." Having signed the parchments, he bowed to the bench and retired.

He then proceeded to St. Andrew's House, where he formally took over from Mr. Brown, now Minister for Health.

We wonder if, during this ceremony, Johnston recalled his "Socialist War Points," published in Forward, during the last war; the suppression of Forward for the Lloyd George speech report; his attacks on Arthur Henderson; his pamphlet, The Huns at Home; his article on the late King, and the cartoon he published in Forward, illustrating same.

We ask our readers to ponder over the columns of The Commune; to recall our pamphlet, Socialism and Parliament, either the first edition or the completely revised and enlarged edition, both out of print; to consider our experience of Labour Parliamentarianism and our denunciation of the Labour Party careerists; and to consider how right has been all our statements of what would happen. How we were ridiculed for stating that Socialist Parliamentarianism stood for Imperialism against Socialism. But there it is in cold print, to be found in both editions of the pamphlet, and stated in different issues of The Spur. And now the workers face the facts. The reality is before them defining the accuracy of Anti-Parliamentarian prophecy. Labour Parliamentarism has organised Socialism and itself into careerist and time-serving oblivion. It has climbed into the power-land of nothingness and nowhere. To-day the Forward "Socialist War Points" seem to be but mean little comments, passing personalities wanting in depth and social sincerity. They served a purpose; not the purpose of making mankind think, but of advancing the political interest and repute of Thomas Johnston.

We hope that Thomas Johnston will prove that these words of censure are undeserved. We have before us excellent articles that he contributed to Forward for April 8, and also for May 6 and 27, 1939, on Socialism, Conscription, and War. We would like him to live up to these sentiments therein expressed. But can he?

Thomas Johnston stated eight objections to conscription in the Forward for April 8, 1939, and also stressed his demand for the internationalisation of Gibraltar aand Suez.

On May 6 Johnston denounced the idea of defending "the continued separation of Danzig (a German city) from the German Reich, and the Polish Corridor dividing East Prussia from Germany." He quoted Brailsford's "sorrowful" admissions on this point, and described the latter as "one of the leading eggers-on of forcible resistance to Fascism."

Johnston complained that the Government had no "conception" of an international solution for the problems that beset us." He asked where was the mentality that, or the statesman who, at the end of a successful war, would internationalise Gibraltar and the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal?

He concluded that another dictated peace would "but sow the seeds of still another war."

In this aarticle, Johnston boasted of the Forward platform during the 1914-18 war, and pleaded for tolerance to-day.

Will he convince the Government of the democratic need for tolerance?

In his May 27 article, he quoted from the splendid speech against conscription made by Creech Jones in the House of Commons on May 18, 1940. We intend to reproduce this speech in full, as a tribute of respect to our old-time Absolutist comrade. Readers will remember that Creech Jones' statement before his first court-martial was published in The Word for October 1939. That issue also reproduced statements by Dollan and Thomas Johnston. Although our comrade, Creech Jones, has come, most reluctantly to support the war, he has not forgotten the principle of conscientious objection. He upholds strongly the cause of present-day conscientious objectors and struggles gallantly against the evils of Imperialism as well as against those of Fascism. We felt friendly towards Thomas Johnston for the excellent quotation that he made, and also for his comment :—

"Not even Colonel Blimp himself could read such a story without indignation and disgust."

Thomas Johnston was installed in the Court of Session. The slums of Edinburgh and Glasgow continue, as though a conservative were installed. Those slums, as slums, will survive Thomas Johnston's tenure of office, unless the war brings great social changes that even a parliament of Labour placemen cannot avert. The most conservative and the most dangerous element in politics to-day is the Labour Parliamentary careerist. Crisis exposes his reaction.

As we go to press, we learn that Mr. Johnston has refused to accept the salary of £5,000 a year for his office.

He told his West Stirlingshire constituents on Sunday, March 2 :

"I am determined just the same as when I was Regional Commissioner for Scotland to make no addition to my personal income as a result of any service I can yield to the State during the war."

Mr. Johnston was entitled to £2,500 a year as Scottish Regional Commissioner, but he refused to take the money.

It is only fair to state this fact as an addendum to an article that is critical of Johnston's position as a Cabinet Minister.

DOLLAN & DUNLOP

During the Great War of 1914-18, when Dollan was being sneered at in Parliament and by the Judges in the Court of Session for his refusing to become a soldier or to accept the conditional exemption imposed upon him by the Tribunal, Glasgow's Lord Provost was known popularly as "Half-potato Dunlop." He insisted on the value of rationing and on the extensive food value of the small quantity of potato mentioned in his nickname. Dollan has followed in Dunlop's footsteps in many conventional patriotic respects and now he threatens to outstrip his predecessor as an authority on the food value of rationing.

The Evening Times for February 11, 1941, published the following interesting letter, which speaks for itself :—

FOOD AND HEALTH.

13 India Street, Glasgow, C.2.

It would be interesting to know the facts on which the Lord Provost based his recent expressed opinion that, prior to the institution of rationing, more people had suffered from over-eating than under-eating.

This view is entirely at variance with that of Sir John Boyd Orr, who estimated that in 1937 the diet of the poorer half of the population of this country was not adequate to maintain full health, while that of the poorest five million was deficient in every respect.

While there was, no doubt, a certain amount of "over-eating" among certain sections, it is likely that these are the people to whose standard of living the war and the rationing system have made the least difference, while the rise in prices and the scarcity of certain protective foods constitute a real menace to the health of the vast number of people who, even before the war, had barely enough to spend on food.

I do not think we shall help ourselves by wishful thinking and a refusal to face facts. The health of a people at war is a matter of extreme urgency, and every possible measure needs to be taken to prevent that lowering of stamina and resistance to disease which is the inevitable result of a period of inadequate nourishment.

MARY MARSH,
Secretary, the Children's Nutrition Council (Glasgow Branch).

CONDITIONAL EXEMPTION

Bernard C. Mitchell, of 17 George Street, Leamington Spa, was registered by the Birmingham Tribunal, on August 6, 1940, for agricultural duties. A month before the hearing Mitchell resigned his post as a registered architect in Local Government Service because the work he was called upon to do was incompatible with his conscience. He has been a member of the Peace Pledge Union for over three years. He is a Theosophist.

In his statement to the Tribunal, Mitchell said :—

"(1) I renounce war because I am a Theosophist. The foundation of my philosophy is based upon the 'Universal Brotherhood of all Humanity, without distinction of race, creed, sex, caste, or colour. . . .

"I regard war, from whatever side it is fought, as being the very reverse of Brotherhood and by my Theosophical convictions I must characterise as brutal, inhuman and immoral and the senseless argument of unevolved man. It degrades both the individual and society and destroys the creative elements in life. To my mind it is a futile and wrong method of attempting to bring peace and security to the peoples of the world. . . .

(2) I refuse to kill because I do not believe in the domination of physical force in any respect. I take a very firm stand against the murder of man by man and I deny the right of any man or Government to impose upon another the obligation to kill.

"I believe that no soldier wants to kill; but killing is the essence of war. Part of a soldier's training is based upon destruction and brutality; he must cultivate hatred, anger and insensibility; it takes fine fellows and perverts them to its horrible uses, that is its supreme crime and tragedy. . . .

"(3) I cannot be associated with a branch of the Armed forces whether combatant or non-combatant. I regard non-combatant duties as being in the same category as combatant duties; the former being partly dependent on the latter. . . .

"I am quite willing to serve the Cause of Humanity as a civilian, doing civil work—however menial that work might be—under civil control."

On October 23, Mitchell received a formal communication from the manager of the Local Employment Exchange concerning the condition of his exemption. He replied and received a letter from the Birmingham Tribunal, dated November 5, 1940, stating that his reply reported a failure to observe the conditions of his exemption in accordance with Section 5 (s.s. 8) of the Act.

Mitchell replied to this letter on November 11 at some length. Part of his reply reads as follows :—

"It is not correct to say that I have failed to observe the conditions imposed on me as I have sincerely endeavoured to obtain the type of work specified, but circumstances, quite beyond my control, have rendered the fulfilment of this condition difficult —if not remote. . . .

"The reasons which have made my endeavour to comply with the Tribunal's requirements difficult are as follows :—

"(1) Lack of knowledge and training in agriculture.

"(2) Reluctance of farmers to employ Conscientious Objectors.

"(3) My widowed mother is dependent on me.

"(4) Unsuitability for this type of work.

He continued by enlarging upon these points and by showing how the provisions of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, were, as far as C.O.s were concerned, flouted in every way, both by Local Authorities and by private employers, by bans and conditions which made it almost impossible in many cases for the C.O. to fulfil the conditions of his exemption however much he might desire to do so. He drew attention to several bad cases of victimisation and attacked Town Councils for not having something better to do than indulge in "Conchie Heresy Hunts."

Dealing with C.O.s who had been ordered to do non-combatant duties and who had the temerity to stand up for their conscientious beliefs and refuse to perform the duties, he likened the treatment received by some of them to the treatment meted out in Nazi Concentration Camps. This treatment, designed to "break down" their resistance included bread and water diet, days in dark cells, long stretches of fatigue and actual physical violence.

He concluded by stating that as the original decision of the Tribunal was unanimous he could not see the purpose of putting his conscience to the test again, but asked the Tribunal to alter their conditional exemption to absolute and unconditional exemption.

The new statement which accompanied the above letter comprised his original statement with an addition which consisted mainly of an enlargement upon his Theosophical views. He ended it by advocating a negotiation now, rather than continue this debasing conflict to the bitter end

For the longer the War continues the more difficult will it become to create a New World Order—neither will there be the moral energy to do so."

Mitchell subsequently received a notification that he had been placed upon the Military Register for non-combatant duties only. In writing for an appeal form so that he could appeal against their "Unwarranted decision" he said :

"On August 6 the Tribunal were unanimously agreed that I am a conscientious objector, now the Tribunal are unanimously agreed (without stating any reasons for the reversal of their decision) that I am not a conscientious objector. I intend to remain a conscientious objector, in word, act and deed."

Mitchell added that he was quite prepared to go to prison for his convictions if need be.

Mitchell's case is not an isolated one. But it does serve to draw attention to the humbug of "Conditional Exemption" under the terms of the Act. It shows the futility of passing a Law to give rights to a Minority without at the same time making it compulsory for the Majority to accept the implications of that Law.

BASQUE CHILDREN APPEAL

Dear Friend Aldred,—As many as 300 of the Basque Children are still in England. Nearly all the elder children are supporting themselves in employment. Many others are still young and dependent on the voluntary support of their sympathisers. This recalls the two and a half years of work at Langham. Although the Colony closed a year ago, I have on my hands some little assistance to be given to one or other of them.

At Carshalton there is a Colony of twenty of these younger children, whom the responsible Committee has for three and a half years been able to maintain by appeals in the district. For various reasons (such as evacuation, the needs of the homeless victims of air-raids, and of Co.'s) support has been dwindling to the extent that the continuance of the Colony is now in great danger. Unless, in brief, more financial support comes in, and from wider area, the home cannot avoid being closed down and the children dispersed.

Clearly it is cheaper when the twenty children are kept under one roof. Individual adoption both makes a heavy demand on any family who offers, and breaks up the Spanish atmosphere by which the children have so much benefitted. The Committee is convinced that a Colony best serves the interests of the children, by developing responsibility and preserving their "Spanishness."

Three of the children who were formerly at Langham are now under the care of the Carshalton Committee. I am hoping that those who believed in the struggle against Fascism in Spain, even amid all the other wartime demands, will take it upon themselves to raise 30/- a week to keep these three children. Will you ask your readers to make a big effort to ensure some proportion of this weekly sum? The position is simply that the maintenance of these children must be spread over a wider area. Regular sums, however small, are really valuable.

Would you undertake to raise this appeal before the U.S.M. groups, or among Word readers. Contributions promised, weekly or monthly, should be remitted to me. I ask that it should come through me, in order to relieve Carshalton of the secretarial work, and to send them at least a clear 30/- a week. I may add that I am in personal touch with the Colony and know how difficult it has become to ensure even a reduced standard of living; but these children must not, even now, "become forgotten people."

Yours sincerely,
LEONARD READ.

THE DUKE AND THE VICAR

On the 4th of February, the national capitalist press published a sensational account of the alleged sacking of his vicar by the Duke of Bedford. The Scots Daily Express, for example, set out the story under big headings as follows :—

WHY I SACKED THE VICAR.

—By THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.
Daily Express Staff Reporter.

The Duke of Bedford explained last night that he is to discontinue the stipend of the Rev. Henry Martindale, vicar of Woburn, Beds, because:—

1. My income, owing to war taxation, is about a fourth of what my father's was.

2. I intend leaving the Church of England.

3. I am linked up with a peace movement. I feel the support of the Church of England to the war is wicked and anti-Christian. I feel, therefore, I am not justified in paying the stipend of a minister of that Church.

Mr. Martindale said yesterday: "I cannot go on living on nothing. So I have to leave Woburn. The bishop of St. Albans has offered me the living of Ashwell, Herts, and wants me to go as soon as possible."

St. Mary's, Woburn, was built in 1868 by the then Duke of Bedford at a cost of £35,000, and succeeding dukes have always paid the vicar's stipend (lately £350) and the church expenses.

The Daily Telegraph endeavoured to obtain a special interview on the subject. This was refused, as the Duke of Bedford had experienced past press misrepresentation.

The Sunday Dispatch, for February 9, varied slightly the statement of reasons published in the Daily Express, and added to the statement of facts :—

He also informed the vicars of Ridgmont and Husborne Crawley, neighbouring parishes on his Woburn estate, that he does not propose in future to pay the rents of their vicarages.

The Duke, in an interview, said he had three reasons for withdrawing his support from St. Mary's Church.

1. "My income has been reduced by war taxation to about one quarter;

2. "I expect to join one of the Free Churches very shortly;

3. "I regard the general attitude of the Church of England towards the war to be utterly un-Christian and wrong.

"I want nothing more to do with a church which as a body supports mass murder and organised sin."

The Sunday Dispatch published what was said to be a reply to the Duke from the pen of Dr. W. R. Matthews, Dean of St. Paul's. This was displayed across the leader page, under a picture of St. Paul's, beneath the caption: "Why the Church Supports the War—An Answer to the Pacifist Duke."

Actually, the Dean's article was a very vague, metaphysical statement, and at no point answered the Duke. He made only one small reference to the Duke's action—and that reference was false. We reproduce the opening paragraphs in which the offending passage occurs :—

A certain peer has felt compelled to cut off the contributions formerly made to the stipends of certain clergymen on his estate, and among the reasons given for this step is that "the Church supports war," which, one gathers, is not the attitude of the peer in question.

I do not here touch upon the rights and wrongs of the luckless vicars, but I will take the peer's charge against the Church and ask: "In what sense is it true that the Church supports war, and what justification has the Church for so doing?"

In the full and complete sense of the word "Church," it has no policy and cannot be said to support the war. . . .

What people mean when they say "The Church supports the war" is that the vast majority of Christians in this country are solidly behind the war effort, and, further, that they are convinced they are doing their duty not only as citizens but as Christians. This is certainly true.

This statement by the Dean of St. Paul's is as glib as it is erroneous. The Duke of Bedford withdrew his support from the Church of England, and from certain churches within that Church, whose priests upheld war. This has nothing to do with the "Church" in a wide or universal sense, but with a special ecclesiastical organisation which is held by many members of the Church Universal to have no place in the Christian Communion, and to be opposed to the traditions and teachings of Jesus. Since the "Church" exists in all the warring countries, it obviously has no war policy. It is at sixes and sevens on the matter. The Duke's contention is that, everywhere, the Church ought to have a policy—the policy of God's Fatherhood and Man's Brotherhood, the policy of ending war and establishing peace on earth. If it cannot do this, its existence is a mockery and it has no claim to be a church. This is a clear and firm challenge. To this challenge the Dean of St. Paul's made no reply. He refers instead to "the rights and wrongs of luckless vicars." Why are they luckless if the Duke has not wronged them?

The Duke did not "sack" the Vicar, and no question of right arises, except the right of the Duke to decide in what way and in what church he shall worship God. He holds that this is a personal question that concerns his own conscience and is not the concern of the ordinary press. In a statement to The Word, made on February 11, the Duke says :—

"I believe in religious toleration and if other people prefer to worship Mars, it is not for me to interfere with them. They must, however, support their own Priest and not expect me to do so. At Woburn, apparently, they did not value the services of the Priest sufficiently highly to be willing to do so, although the effort would not have involved great financial sacrifice, for Woburn is a small town and not a village."

Five days later, Archdeacon Martindale preached his last sermon at St. Mary's, Woburn, Bedfordshire. His congregation wept, according to a report published in the Daily Express when the Archdeacon confessed that he had failed in his ministry.

Speaking to a reporter on the Friday night, Mr Martindale said that he had decided to carry on unpaid. But there was much indifference to the church in the village and he believed it was felt that he ought to leave in the hope that under a new priest the church would have better support.

The Duke's action led to tremendous newspaper discussion. Cassandra criticised him in the Daily Mirror for February 6, and published his reply in that journal for February 18, on the very just grounds :—"not because I agree with him, but because even in these days of suppression, he is entitled to have his say from the same forum that attacked him."

Cassandra admitted that, if the Duke believed war to be "mass murder and organised sin," he had "fairly good reasons for declining to give financial help to a Church that supports war."

"He goes on, however, to criticise me for giving reduction of income owing to war taxation as a subsidiary reason for discontinuing payment of the stipend of the Vicar of Woburn. Even, however, if my spendable income were that which Cassandra estimates—which it is not by a very wide margin—would he deny that there are by now enough deserving victims of the war, as well as deserving causes, to make it easily possible for me to spend, on their behalf, five times the amount of my income without wasting money on the upkeep of a Church which, with certain honourable exceptions, worships a hybrid Martian diety instead of the Father of Jesus Christ who it professes to serve?"

Cassandra commented :—

"The charitable frame of mind that can contemplate spending five times the amount of income that the Duke now receives, should go one iota further and still spend the three hundred odd pounds that is the stipend of the Vicar of Woburn.

"The best form of charity, to my way of thinking, is not bound by rigid principles. It recognises that other people may be sincere as well as misguided, and in its deep understanding of humanity would hesitate to take action that would deprive anybody of his livelihood."

If the Vicar was a heretic, or in a minority, we would endorse Cassandra's conclusion. But Cassandra knows that the vicar is on the popular side and is not likely to be victimised.

The Star, London, for Tuesday, February 11, reproduced a letter it had published already, challenging the Duke, with his reply, beneath the heading, The Duke of Bedford Replies:—

POSER FOR DUKE.

To the Editor of "The Star."

Sir,—The Duke of Bedford has stopped the stipend of the Vicar of Woburn because the Church of England supports the war.

But what on earth would the Duke say if one of his tenants declined to go on paying him rent because he objected to his political activities?

CHRISSTOPHER HALE.

Battersea Park, S.W.11.

The Duke's reply was as follows :—

To the Editor of "The Star."

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Hale, asks, in reference to my decision to discontinue giving financial assistance to the Church of England, owing to the latter's support of the war, what I should do if one of my tenants refused to continue to pay rent because he objected to my political views?

Although there is little analogy between the two cases, I might feel led to adopt towards my militarist tenant the same tactics as I have adopted when dealing with the Church militarist.

I might see if frank and friendly discussion resulted in my being converted to the truth of his viewpoint, or in him being converted to the truth of mine.

If, however, he remained obstinate in what appeared to me to be error defended by weak arguments, I might feel led to take further steps appropriate to persons with such a mentality and outlook.

I might tell him that, since his objection to my pacifism prevented him from paying rent, my objection to his militarism prevented me from doing any landlord's repairs; wherefore, seeing that our respective convictions prevented us from rendering one another mutual service in these matters, it would be well if the relationship between us were terminated by his removal of himself elsewhere!

As proof, however, that I bore him no ill-will, I should be pleased to send him a personal letter of recommendation to Sir Robert Vansittart!

Yours very truly,

BEDFORD.

Cavalcade, for February 22, carried the story beneath a caption explaining: "Duke of Bedford Ends Six Centuries Patronage of St. Mary's, Woburn."

The letter-press opened :—

"In 1550, the Court and taverns were the main centres of London gossip. Late in that year, Edward VI. provided a new tit-bit of a not unusual topic by granting the lands of the monastery of Woburn, Bedfordshire, to friend John Russell, Earl of the said county."

The article gave the history of the Russells, declaring that "the Russells have often occupied the headlines." It spoke of the present Duke of Bedford as the Marquess of Tavistock entering dramatically into the war news with his peace proposals, and spoke of him as being "strongly pacifist, and ready to risk ostracism in the Cause."

Describing the situation at Woburn, our contemporary says :—

"Resenting attack on one-thirty-ninth of its income more than on the whole thirty-nine articles of its faith, as a famous wit once said, ecclesiastical authority declared it would probe the records, invoke the law if it found the Duge's contribution was not a gift but some kind of statutory payment.

"'It would appear,' said Registrar Hartwright, of the Diocese of St. Alban's, 'the Duke is under the impression that the stipend has always been a voluntary payment,' and promises a full inquiry into its origins."

Cavalcade quotes Martindale's confession of failure, as indicated by "the neglect of worship here—hundreds never entering God's house."

Our contemporary concluded :—

"Before departing for new duties at Ashwell, the Archdeacon found some consolation for failure in a visit from the new Marquess of Tavistock. Not sharing his father's views, the Marquess is said to regret the break with a living that had been under Bedford patronage for six centuries."

We cannot understand the attacks that are made on the Duke of Bedford for being a pacifist. A Labour M.P., who is very pro-war, has sent us a cutting from Land and Liberty for February. We have the paper and did not need the excerpt. Under the heading "The Bedford Estate," the Henry George organ reprints, from the News Chronicle for December 17, 1940, a description of the Bedford Estate. It then quotes the following passage from Cassandra's article in the Daily Mirror for December 2, 1940 :—

"I'm sure it must have struck everyone of us in this, our finest hour, to hear that the twelfth Duke of Bedford has now succeeded his father . . . His right to claim this huge slice of God's good earth extends to the Middle Ages, when the main qualification of being a successful landlord was to be an expert robber. We can safely assume that one of our main objects is to protect this vast historic loot."

These attacks would be pertinent if the Duke of Bedford was opposed to pacifism, if he were asking the people to fight to defend his land. He is not doing so. He is opposed to war. Also, although Socialists may not agree with his remedy, the fact remains that he is opposed also to the present social system. The Duke would agree probably with Cassandra's reference to "historic loot" and object to workers sacrificing their lives in its defence.

EX-CONVICTS' TEA PARTY

Under the heading, "Should Convicts Fight?" Forward for February 8 published a letter from the Duke of Bedford, recalling an experience of the last war :—

Newton Stewart,
January 1, 1941.

Sir,—"Ikonoblast's" article on the value of convicts as soldiers reminds me of an incident in the last war when I had the rather unusual privilege of having tea with three murderers at once!

The aforesaid murderers had been released from Pankhurst, where they were serving life sentences, to swell the ranks of the Army. Our host was the chaplain of the battalion and I have attended many tea-parties since in less enjoyable company.

The murderers, as one might expect, did extremely well in the Army, but two of them, poor fellows, did not come back. The third we assisted to make a start in business (a new line, of course) when he was demobilised.

Yours very truly,
BEDFORD.

On February 12, the Duke addressed a letter to us, recording an amusing sequel to the tea party mentioned :—

"My friend, the Chaplain, who is a really fine fellow and a true Christian, so touched the three men by his hospitality and interest in their welfare that they decided that they would like to make a start in the Christian life, themselves. He warned them, however, that if they knelt down and said their prayers in the Barrack room they would have to be prepared to stand a good deal of 'chipping.' On being told this, the eldest murderer looked at my friend and said, with a slight twinkle in his eye, 'Sir, they won't chip us!'—and no more they did! So great was their religious zeal that they even went further and insisted on having grace before meals in the Barrack room and, as my friend put it, quoting the words of Scripture, 'No man said ought unto them!'"

OUR APPEAL

Last month, the sales of The Word were exceptional. We had repeat orders from every part of Britain, and we reprinted several times. Our circulation was 18,000. Socialist and Christian readers of various descriptions, including ministers of four denominations, wrote commending the general tone of the Duke of Bedford's analysis of the peace debate in the House of Commons. John McGovern's remarks also came in for praise. Despite the fact that so much praise haas been received, and that our journal was circulated widely without any advertisement in any other paper, or any notice by any section of the so-called Labour or Socialist press, even against boycott, the response to our appeal for funds has not been good. Unlike other papers, we lose on every copy of The Word we sell.

As explained, we need to raise £1971 11s 3d to save The Word. Last month the balance had been reduced to £1939 9s 3d. We have received £25 4s 11. This leaves a balance required of £1914 4s 4d. Unless this sum is raised before the end of March, we must reduce to 8 pages or less. We ask you to respond to this appeal now. When the exact sum needed has been raised, we will list the names and leave the matter.

Special mention muust be made of the splendid propaganda zeal of our comrade, W. C. McDougall, of the A.P.C.F., and editor of Solidarity. His circulation of pamphlets and papers is a feature of Glasgow activity in war time. Last month he circulated nearly 300 Words. Comrade McDougall is an indefatigable propagandist for Anti-Parliamentarism, United Socialism, and the N.C.L.

COUNCILLOR WEST

Councillor John F. West (35), 12 Rossie Square, Ferryden, Montrose, was refused exemption from military service by the South-East of Scotland Local Tribunal for the registration of Conscientious Objectors, in Edinburgh, on January 30. Sheriff C. H. Brown presided over the Tribunal.

West said that, although in a reserved occupation, he had no intention of sheltering under that reservation. He wanted his case heard, and the decision of the Tribunal given. He was a conscientious objector, and sought unconditional exemption.

West contended that war could only be ended by a change in the system of society. He was an active trade unionist in the County of Angus, and had served on various committees attached to the Ministry of Labour. For 17 years he had opposed war, and, as a public speaker, had endeavoured to convince his fellow-men that war was wrong. He joined the "No More War" movement in 1928, and had held the position of local secretary in Montrose.

It was his belief that wars were fought for economic gain, and not for any of the slogans used by any of the warring peoples. They would not get rid of war until capitalism was replaced by a new economic order. West believed there should be a negotiated peace. He declined to define his views as being political.

In 1924 West joined the Independent Labour Party because he felt that its views were the closest to his own principles. He was disappointed in this, however, and in 1926 became a member of the Society of Friends.

Councillor West publishes every week a small sheet, called The Village Crier. In the issue February 8, he writes :—

"I WANT TO SAY SOMETHING.

..."I was on trial yesterday. Not a criminal trial. My conscience was on trial. Yes ,I was pleading my conscientious objection to war. The Tribunal wanted to defer the hearing until such times as I could no longer be regarded as a worker engaged in a reserved occupation. I got my way, and the case was proceeded with. My friend, the Reverend Thomas Mearns, M.A., came along and verified my statement. The members of the Tribunal appeared to know my history. One of them asked me, 'Are you a member of this and that?' and referred to some of my activities in the County.

"The five gentlemen who sat on the Bench appeared to me to be old. This struck me forcibly. Imagine five old gentlemen deciding on anyone's conscience! Question time was interesting. At one point I had two or three questions thrown at me at the same time. I protested to the Chairman, who asked one of the gentlemen to repeat his question. He replied, 'I have forgotten the question I asked.' I believe the new call-up has something to do with the decisions of these Tribunals. The job of these gentlemen is to get as many men in the Forces as they can. They don't discuss conscience. They don't ask questions on conscience. I told them that, in my opinion, I considered they were part of the Capitalist machine—the machine that keeps the workers in poverty and the rich in affluence."

TO H. M.

(C.O. and Land-worker in the Last War.)

Strange man, who, in your days of lusty youth,
Fearing, you said, to take your brother's life
(Fearing, it seems, the prison gates as well),
Found in an orchard refuge from the strife;

What change befalls you that, with words of war
And patriot fervour, now you need not fight,
You keep in dungeons even friends of yore
Through the long horror of a raiders' night?

Critic of Hitler, yet a tyrant too,
Glorying in your power to bind or loose,
What of the future? May you one day learn
Sauce for the gander's also sauce for the goose!

C.O. APPELLATE TRIBUNAL. CATHOLIC C.O. DECISION

The Northern Appellate (England) Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors opened its sessions in Manchester on Tuesday, February 4. Sir (Reginald) Edward Stubbs presided, and sitting with him were Sir Miles Mitchell and Mr. F. Dickinson.

Sir Edward Stubbs is the youngest son of Dr. William Stubbs, Bishop of Chester, and later of Oxford. It has been said that the Bishop's Constitutional History of England is more notable for its scholarship than for its liveliness of style. In its day, it was a universal text-book. In these days of totalitarian war, and government by decree and prescription, its authority may be open to question.

Sir Edward retired in 1937 after a distinguished career in the Colonial Service. He was born in 1876. On leaving Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he entered the Colonial Office. He was engaged on a special mission to the Malay Peninsula and Hong-Kong in the years 1910-11, after which he held many responsible colonial appointments, including those of Captain General and Governor-in-Chief of Jamaica, 1926-32; Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Cyprus, 1932-33; and Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Ceylon, 1933-37.

During part of this time his predecessor in the chairmanship of the Appellate Tribunal, Sir Philip Macdonell, was Chief Justice of Ceylon, a position from which he retired in 1936. In 1938. Sir Edward was vice-chairman of the Royal Commission on the West Indies.

The work of Sir Edward and of Sir Philip overlapped when the latter was president of the West Indian Court of Appeal, and the former was Governor of Jamaica. It may be said, therefore, that Sir Edward took over an old colleague's work.

The only interesting decision at this hearing was that of Leonard Brookes, of Whit Lane, Salford, who was registered by the local Tribunal for non-combatant service. Brookes is a Roman Catholic. He urged that he believed military service was opposed to Christian teaching, and that conscription had been condemned by Papal Encyclical. Under conscription he would be expected to do things against his conscience, and would be bodily and spiritually in bondage. He admitted that he had not heard or read the recent address broadcast by Cardinal Hinsley.

Sir Miles Mitchell: Would you suggest for a moment that Cardinal Hinsley would urge young Catholic men to do something that would put them bodily and spiritually in bondage?—What he said would be binding on me except when my conscience tells me that to accept military or non-combatant service would be wrong. His Eminence considers it would not be the case, but my conscience tells me it would.

Will you take it that the general tenor of his message as head of your Church in this country is that Catholic young men should do everything they can to defeat the attack that is being made on their co-religionists all over Europe?—I will accept that.

The appeal was allowed, and Brookes was registered as a conscientious objector unconditionally.

WAR DEFENCE POWERS

18B: ITS AMENDMENT AND OPERATION

The War Defence Regulations were reproduced at length in The Word for June, 1940. In practice and in principle, these powers attack the rights and liberty of the citizen, contrary to the constitutional rights of freedom from arrest without charge and trial established by the struggle by our ancestors. This attack is being operated not by a Tory Government, but by a Tory and Labour Government, by men who were imprisoned as conscientious objecors during the last war, and who are members of the so-called Socialist movement. This movement is supposed to be grounded in the struggle for Freedom and to be jealous of Liberty of Speech, Writing, and Association. It has been our opinion since May, 1906, when we resigned from the Social Democratic Federation and the parliamentary "Socialist" movement, that parliamentarianism does not protect or advance liberty or commonwealth. We believe most "Socialist" parliamentarians prated "Socialism" to gain the support of the down-trodden, and to exploit their fellows in the pursuit of careerism. We believe most Labour parliamentarians to be utterly destitute of principle and to be as mean careerists and opportunists as any of the burgh-mongering politicians of the Castlereagh and Reform Bill days. Hence our opposition and antagonism.

We believe in the Socialist commonwealth. We believe in Socialism because we believe in liberty and well-being for all mankind. We believe that liberty is the goal and that liberty is the method. We are opposed to all arbitrary power assumed by any executive, whether so-called Socialist, Communist, or Fascist, or nominally democratic. We believe in constitutional rights. Under plea of war and military necessity, and with no intention of restoring the rights so hardly won by the suffering of our forefathers, the executive, blue, red, and pink, is invading the homes of the citizens with powers of arbitrary arrest. This must cease. Just as so-called forces of Right and Left have united to challenge and to deny the principles and safeguards of Liberty, so must counter-forces of Right and Left, jealous of such Liberty, unite to defend the citizen from the attacks of the Executive. The challenge is very simple. There must be no more detention and no more arrests without charge and public trial. There must be no more trials in camera. No executive, not even an executive of angels, can be trusted with arbitrary powers.

THE DEFENCE REGULATIONS.

WAS PARLIAMENT MISLED?

There has been a number of protests, in the Press and in Parliament, against the Defence Regulations which affect the liberty of the subject particularly against Defence Regulation 18B. It is therefore important that there should be a general understanding of this Regulation and of what it means, in principle and in practice.

IN PRINCIPLE.

The Original Regulation 18B.

The original Defence Regulation 18B (Statutory Rules and Orders, 1939, No. 978) was made by Order in Council on 1st September, 1939. It provided that certain restrictive orders, including a detention order, might be made against "any particular person" by the Secretary of State, "if satisfied" (for the defence of the realm, etc.) "that it is necessary so to do."

It also provided that a detained person might make objections to an advisory committee, appointed by the Secretary of State himself, the advice of which the Secretary of State was not bound to accept, thus making him judge in his own cause.

Public apprehension having been aroused as to the arbitrary and far-reaching powers which this Regulation gave to the Secretary of State (and, in practice, to unidentifiable officials), there was, on 31st October, 1939, a motion in the House of Commons to the effect that the Order in Council be annulled. In the debate which followed, the Regulation was severely criticised from all quarters of the House. It was defended by only one Member besides Sir John Anderson, then Home Secretary.

Mr. Herbert Morrison, the present Home Secretary, in his attack upon the Regulations, said (Parl. Debates, Vol. 352, col. 1844):

> "I am not going to use the argument usually put forward as a matter of courtesy that we do not believe the present Minister would be wicked but that we are afraid his successors might be. I think that any Minister is capable of being wicked when he has a body of regulations like this to administer."

Mr. Morrison ended his speech by saying that he was "exceedingly apprehensive." That was the view of the present Home Secretary.

At the conclusion of the debate, Sir Samuel Hoare, then Lord Privy Seal, gave an assurance that amended Regulations would be introduced within two or three weeks, after general agreement had been reached with the Members who had been critical. The House accepted this assurance, and the motion for the annulment of the Order in Council was accordingly withdrawn. This appeared to be a triumph of parliamentary rule over despotism.

The amended Regulation 18B was part of an Order in Council made on 23rd November, 1939 (S.R. & O. 1939, No. 1681).

Paragraph (1) of this amended Regulation is now as follows:—

> "If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile origin or associations or to have been recently concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the realm or in the preparation or instigation of such acts and that by reason thereof it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained."

An additional paragraph (1A), which was added by Order in Council on 22nd May, 1940 (S.R. & O. 1940, No. 770), authorises detention orders by the Secretary of State if he has reasonable cause to believe any person to be a member of, or to have furthered the objects of, any organisation "as respects which the Secretary of State is satisfied that" it comes into a category of dangerous organisations as specified in some detail in this paragraph of the Regulation.

Paragraphs (3), (4), (5) and (6) elaborate but do not materially alter the provisions for the appointment, by the Secretary of State himself, of an advisory committee, or committees, to which persons detained may make representations, also for monthly reports to Parliament as to the number of persons dealt with under the Regulation and the action taken.

The Difference Between the Regulations.

It is noticeable that the revised Regulation 18B, unlike the original Regulation, does not authorise detention orders "against any particular person" by the Secretary of State "if satisfied" that "it is necessary" for certain reasons. The revised Regulation lays down that the Secretary of State must have "reasonable cause to believe" certain specified facts concerning such persons or that he has done certain specified things.

Why Did Parliament Agree?

It might appear to some that there is, legally, a considerable difference between being "satisfied" as to some particular thing and having "reasonable cause to believe" some particular thing. No one can argue whether another person is, or is not, "satisfied" as to certain facts or necessities. The other person can maintain that he is satisfied, and that is the end of the matter. But it may seem to some that it is possible to argue whether another person has or has not, "reasonable cause" to believe certain allegations, even if it is quite clear that the other person honestly believes himself to be reasonable.

It is evident that Parliament took the view that the two expressions meant something different. There was no motion that the revised Regulation 18B be annulled, although, apart from the alterations in the wording referred to, there was no important difference between the old and the new Regulations.

There was every indication that, owing to the alterations made in the wording, the Members of Parliament particularly concerned to defend the constitutional rights of British subjects believed that any person genuinely aggrieved by a detention order would be able to obtain ultimate redress by applying to the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which would lead to an investigation into the facts by an impartial and independent Court of Justice.

Habeas Corpus.

In August, 1940, an application was made to Divisional Court of the King's Bench for a writ of habeas corpus in respect of a British-born subject who had been detained under Defence Regulation 18B. In his affidavit, supporting this application, the individual detained denied the allegations which had been given as the reason for his detention. The affidavit of the Home Secretary, who opposed the issue of the writ, was to the effect that he "had reasonable cause to believe" the allegations because they had been reported to him by officials whom he deemed reliable. It was also urged by Counsel for the Home Secretary that these officials must remain unidentifiable. The Court dismissed the application without hearing evidence as to the facts in dispute. Later, the Court of Appeal upheld this judgment, also without hearing evidence as to the facts in dispute, although the individual detained had been released by order of the Home Secretary shortly after the appeal had been entered.

It cannot be disputed that statutory law is not so much what the legislature intended it to be as it is the interpretation placed by the Courts upon the actual wording of Statutes and Statutory Rules and Orders. The judgment in this case of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal must therefore be accepted as a true reflection of the law, unless a judgment which in some way reverses it is at some time given by a higher Court.

The Present Position.

(1) As matters now stand there is no judicial safeguard for the liberty of the subject against arbitrary acts of the executive. This may be a matter of small concern to those who have confidence in the present executive and its unidentifiable officials. But such people should remember that we are at war and approaching an economic crisis of the first magnitude. These conditions may produce considerable changes in the executive and its unidentifiable officials and lead to a situation in which arbitrary powers may be used against persons quite different from those who have been detained hitherto

(2) The judgment of the Court of Appeal implies that the principle of habeas corpus has been abrogated, as never before, without a specific enactment to that effect. It has been abrogated covertly, without the full knowledge and understanding of Parliament. In past years, in times of grave civil strife, habeas corpus has been suspended for defined periods and, most often in defined areas, such as Ireland. Every such suspension, however, has been effected by an Act of Parliament intended for that purpose. Whatever their faults may have been, former elected representatives of the people would never have proposed, far less agreed, that so far-reaching an encroachment on the prescriptive rights of the people be made, even in an emergency, other than openly and in the full light of day.

(3) It has now been shown that Regulation 18B has made a revolutionary change in the British Constitution. The Regulation has provided a loophole whereby the executive can evade the principle that ordinary citizens and members of the executive are absolutely equal before the King's Courts of Justice. This equality before the law has always been a fundamental right of British subjects and a bulwark of their freedom.

IN PRACTICE.

The foregoing notes should give a general idea of the seriousness of Defence Regulation 18B in its effect upon the traditional rights of British subjects. The notes below, which might be added to considerably, should indicate the degree of injustice suffered.

(1) When the Government was successfully challenged over the Defence Regulations in Parliament on 31st October, 1939, there were only thirty-five persons detained under Defence Regulation 18B. Eleven months later, on 30th September, 1940, the latest date for which figures are available, 1628 persons had been arbitrarily detained and 247 persons as arbitrarily released. Of those who have thus been detained some are naturalised British subjects, some are aliens other than enemy aliens, but 853 are British-born subjects.

(2) It is not disputed that the period between a detention being made and the person detained being given access to the advisory committee has been generally about three months but in some cases nearly four months. During this period the person detained has not known the grounds on which the detention order has been made against him, or her.

(3) On 28th November, 1940, speaking in the House of Commons (Parl. Debates, Vol. 367 col. 324-5) Mr. Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, stated that a detained person is not necessarily given full information as to the reasons for his detention. He said that "the committee is perfectly free to exercise its discretion in giving full information. . . "

(4) It is admitted that detained persons have not been granted legal representation before the committee (as is always given, for example, to persons charged with murder). At the meetings of this committee the prisoner is examined, but no evidence is given, so that there is no cross-examination, and the proceedings in no way resemble a judicial trial. (Parl. Debates, Vol. 363, col. 611.)

(5) It is admitted that, in some cases, detained persons have had difficulty in communicating with and interviewing their solicitors; and it is also alleged that, by order of the Home Secretary, detained persons have not been permitted to communicate with their Members of Parliament (H.C. Paper, 164, 9th October, 1940, page 18).

(6) It is alleged that the conditions of imprisonment of detained persons are unusually severe, seeing that they are neither charged with, nor convicted of, offences against the law; and it is also alleged that they are refused access to members of the boards of prison visitors, as is authorised for remand and convict prisons (Section 2 of the Prison Act, 1898, and similar statutes).

(7) Defence Regulation 18B has been invoked for the purpose of detaining a Member of Parliament without charge or trial while Parliament is in session, thereby preventing him from discharging his duty to the electors and depriving his constituents of Parliamentary representation. The executive has sought to use the Regulation as a means of evading the principle of Parliamentary privilege. The continuance of Parliamentary government, and of our constitutional monarchy, demands a searching and impartial investigation of all the details of this particular detention order.

CONCLUSION.

It may be argued in support of Defence Regulation 18B in its present form that it is unfortunately inevitable because we are at war. All are agreed that, in time of war, the authorities must be empowered to act promptly in apprehending suspected enemy agents, but any special powers given to the executive for this purpose make it more important than ever—not less important—that there should be adequate safeguards against injustice to the King's loyal subjects.

British subjects who are detained must be given effective opportunity of access to impartial and independent tribunals, where justice is administered under the recognised rules. Those found guilty of treasonable conduct should be executed according to law. Any argument of the executive that such trials "would involve too many difficulties" must be an admission of timidity, or of insincerity, or else of incompetence in the civil and military departments concerned.

The state of affairs brought about by Regulation 18B is totally at variance with the principles of justice which we are fighting to uphold. For the credit of our cause it must be terminated forthwith. This can be done simply and quickly by means of revised Regulations, which should be ordered WITHOUT DELAY.

(End of Manifesto)

In addition to the above manifesto, the Liberty Restoration League, through its secretary, published the following letter, at first in the Weekly Review, and later as a leaflet, on the subject of the COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES.

Sir,—There seems to have been little, if any, public comment upon one aspect of the report of the Committee of Privileges, and of the ensuing debate in the House of Commons, regarding the detention of the Honourable and Gallant Member for Peebles and Southern Midlothian.

Seeing that the present practice of arrest and imprisonment of His Majesty's subjects without trial is, happily, foreign to British traditions, there is, it seems generally agreed, no precedent to act as a guide in this particular case. The Committee of Privileges, and those who supported its report in the debate, preferred therefore to rely upon certain authoritative statements, such as resolutions of the House of Commons. Erskine May's views were quoted incompletely, while the opinions of Blackstone, Anson, and Lord Simon, the present Lord Chancellor, were swept aside.

These opinions conformed to the resolution of the House of 20th May, 1675:

> that by the laws and usage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every member of the House of Commons in all cases, except for treason, felony and breach of the peace.

The Committee of Privileges, however, emphasised a resolution of the House of Commons in 1641:

> privilege of Parliament is granted in regard to service to the Commonwealth and is not to be used to the danger of the Commonwealth.

This resolution of 1641 was the only authority quoted by Mr. Attlee, the Lord Privy Seal, in opening, and by Sir Donald Somervell, the Attorney General, in winding up the debate in the House of Commons.

It has never been suggested that privilege should be used "to the danger" of the State, but the resolution of 1641 is less explicit than that of 1675, which makes it clear that a definite charge must be brought and does not leave it open to the Executive to decide arbitrarily what may, or may not, be "to the danger" of the State.

The Parliament of 1641, whose resolution is now deemed weightier than the others, was the same Parliament as that which brought about the execution of the King in 1649. It was itself dissolved by force, in 1653, with Cromwell's order to "remove this bauble." In 1660, all its enactments except the earliest were reviewed: those thought beneficial were re-enacted, and the remainder were held to be unconstitutional and therefore null and void.

It is unfortunate for the electors that the present Parliament—the Suicide Parliament—was influenced by arguments based chiefly upon so indifferent an authority.

CONCHIES: IN THE EMPIRE AND THE UNITED STATES

AMERICAN ACT EXPLAINED

Recently, we received The Hindu, Madras, for October 4 of last year. This contained the report of an interesting case heard by the Appellate Tribunal at Kuala Lumpar, on September 16, 1940. The chairman of this Tribunal is Mr. Justice Gordon Smith.

This Tribunal upheld the decision of the Perak Local Tribunal, removing the name of Mr. R. W. Smith, of Cecily Estate, Teluk Anson, from the register for conscientious objectors, and registering him as a person liable to be called up for service as a non-combatant.

Dismissing the appeal, the Chairman made the following utterance:—

"We disagree with you on your views. We certainly agree with your moral objections to war. We all think war is wrong. It has been forced on us. In this war it is a case of having to organise practically the whole of the British Empire—some parts for war, other parts for forming organisations for alleviating suffering. These organisations must remain effective. We do not feel we can allow your appeal. The order made by the previous tribunal will hold. You will be registered as a person liable to be called up for service as a non-combatant."

This is a very courteous and also a very curious statement. The Chairman does not suggest that the appellant was not conscientious. He turned down his appeal on a rule of expediency which, if applied correctly, would mean that all conscientious objectors are wrong.

Before the Perak Local Tribunal, R. W. Smith said:—

"I have a moral objection to war and all it entails. I do not think that war is justified under any circumstances. The cost of human life and suffering is far too great."

Smith stated that he was 22 years old. He was born in London and was a member of the Church of England. He joined the P.P.U. in January, 1938. He added:—

"I believe in passive resistance. War is not inevitable. Passive resistence should take the form of non-co-operation with the enemy. Disobey his laws and don't do what he orders you to do. If the whole of the nation was so trained to passively resist the invaders, then the nation will be stronger morally and be able to exercise control over the people who have over-run the country."

Capt. C. H. Dakers, one of the members of the Tribunal, made the amazing remark that passive resistance in peace time was very good but when war broke out it was useless.

Smith replied that the gesture of passive resistance had been made throughout the ages. It was the employment of moral force instead of physical force.

Replying to Mr. J. S. Ferguson, another member of the Tribunal, Smith said that his parents lived in London.

Answering other questions, Smith said that there would be no point in his taking active part against the enemy by joining the air force or such bodies. Bombing and machine-gunning of civilians and refugees were indiscriminate actions as opposed to discriminate action and were part of the horrors of war.

Applicant further added that he would not be prepared to do civilian work if it was connected with the war.

CANADIAN CASES.

The Journal, Edmonton, Alberta, on November 16 of last year, published a statement on the C.O. question, beneath the streamer heading: "'Conchies' Are Problem, Official Cry: 'What To Do!'"

The letterpress stated:—

"Conscientious objectors here are proving a headache for government authorities faced with the problem of what to do with them.

"There are two groups, both having to do with educational institutions. One is the group of university students who have refused to take military training, set down as compulsory for all male undergraduates. The second is a group of public school children who have created a dilemma by refusing to salute the Union Jack after the school board said the salutes were compulsory."

The Journal explained that the "train or get out" ruling had not been applied. It added:—

"The double-play in the non-salute cases was still more varied. When the school board found the students wouldn't salute, it found that it had not set out a penalty along with the ruling. So the board sent a report to the city police. The city police sent it to the R.C.M.P. The R.C.M.P. sent it back to the city. The solicitor's department sent it to the attorney-general's department. . . .'

"Meanwhile 9 of the children aren't saluting the flag. Originally the figure was 11. Two changed their minds."

"'He will be ordered to put on the uniform—and he will put it on.' This was the flat ultimatum of Lt.-Col. R. B. Harkness, officer commanding the compulsory military training camp at Newmarket, when Wilhelm Hansler refused to wear a uniform on the grounds he had religious objections." Hansler formerly belonged to Jehovah's Witnesses, which has been declared an illegal organization.

"When he reported at the camp, he refused to obey orders. He is at present in hospital but on his return to the camp, there'll be no argument about it, according to Col. Harkness. 'William Hansler is under military law, just like any other of the 950 men in training here," he said. 'When he comes back he will be ordered to put on the King's uniform. He will obey that order. If he doesn't obey the command, he will pay the penalty.'"

The Evening Standard, London, on January 28, reported that M'Gill University had reinstated two conscientious objectors who agreed to submit to compulsory drill without musketry and bayonet drill. They will be required to practice stretcher-bearing and trench-digging instead.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

Norman Thomas, Socialist party leader, told Rutgers University students at Brunswick, N.J., on December 8, 1940, that he "felt my sympathies going out to those students of the Union Theological Seminary who had the courage to take the hard way, the unpopular way out and fight conscription."

Mr. Thomas, guest speaker at the university's chapel, said the students, convicted of failure to register for the draft in New York City, now "reside in prison cells, but their courage in their convictions is still remembered."

Conscientious objectors are not slackers, in the opinion of Dr. Thomas E. Jones, president of Fisk University, Nashville, as stated in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, for December 24, 1940. Dr. Jones was visiting Philadelphia to direct the placing of men who object to military service.

"They are as patriotic as anybody but don't know exactly how to serve," he added.

Dr. Jones was former national secretary of the Young Friends Movement. He has served on the faculty of the University of Keio, in Japan. He discussed, with the Ledger reporter, the problem of finding suitable spots for the thousands of conscientious objectors in the United States.

The American Friends Service Committee, which appointed Dr Jones, will pay for the support of those who do not actually enroll in Governmental service. The officials believe there will be 5400 objectors in every 800,000 drafted.

"There are numerous classes of conscientious objectors," explained Dr Jones. The first class will have nothing whatever to do with war and goes to jail. The second class will serve in some capacity but not under military or Governmental supervision. They are willing to work eight hours a day in reforestation or soil conservation and the demand for camps will be great.

"Class 3 will work under the civil governmental authorities and will be assigned to health service. Class 4 will serve in the non-combatant branches of the army, anything excepting the Infantry, Engineers and Air Force."

Dr. Jones did not object to absolutist objectors being jailed. He held that absolutists were willing to face such punishment. "Society has the right to pronounce a penalty," he declared.

"In the World War no provision was made for conscientious objectors," concluded Dr. Jones. "They reported in camps, refused to wear uniforms and were roughly treated by top sergeants. The present detailed programme is the result of many years' work by the Friends."

NEW ZEALAND BAPTISTS.

The New Zealand Herald, Auckland, for October 25, 1940, reports the attitude towards conscientious objectors placed on record by the annual assembly of the Baptist Union of New Zealand, held that week at Dunedin. It was decided to reaffirm the following resolution adopted in 1935:—

"That the Baptist Union reaffirms the historic faith in the principle of liberty of conscience for every man, and applies this equally to conscientious objectors to military service as to all others."

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—I enclose a donation of 5/- towards your paper, which I consider is doing good work for the cause of pacifism. I believe that the spirit of nationalism, with the militarism which invariably accompanies it, is the greatest of all barriers to progress.

Yours faithfully,

C. GASKELL.

January, 25, 1941.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—One series of articles that I think would be of interest to your readers would be a study of other religions apart from Christianity. For some reason, many people seem to be attracted by Eastern religions, such as Buddhism, Taoism, etc. A series of essays exposing the superstitions and fallacies of these religions would be most useful.

I have not been getting on too well of late. I have been on agricultural work on a farm, which has fallen into disuse, about 14 miles from here. In all I am inclined to believe that giving agricultural work to C.O.'s is a cheap way of getting work done, that otherwise would not be done except at greatly increased cost. It is a scandal that anyone should have to work 48 hours a week for 38/-. Out of this food and fuel and other necessities have to be purchased, which leaves little to spend.

All the fellows with me so far, with one exception, are Christians of the most primitive variety, fearing hell, tongues of fire, etc. They seem to be of the "sinner converted" type.

I am at least convinced of the complete futility of parliamentarism. Even the so-called revolutionary left parliamentary groups seem to present no real challenge to capitalism. The anarcho-syndicalist way of the C.N.T.-F.A.I. groups is the only way out.

What exactly is your point of difference with the Anarchist Federation? It is strange that most of the English Anarchist writers were bores. Malatesta, Kropotkin, and Bakunin are the real theorists of the movement. It is a great pity that so much fine Anarchist literature is untranslated here.

With every good wish.

Yours sincerely,

ALBERT McCARTHY.

Shirley, February 9, 1941.

RAYLEIGH N.C.L.

Dear Comrade,—The following resolution was passed unanimously by the Rayleigh District Branch of the No Conscription League at a recent meeting:

"This Group views with deep concern the recent announcement by Mr. Bevin and Mr. Morrison which mark the extension of Conscription to the spheres of Industry and Civil Defence.

"It notes that the extension of Conscription to Civil Defence removes the right of the conscientious objector to military service to obtain complete exemption from such service.

"It would point out that the C.O.'s have in many cases volunteered for Civil Defence, and have frequently formed their own units for this purpose, but it is aware that many C.O.'s would object to such activity. It therefore condemns the lack of provision for conscientious objection in the Order.

"It condemns in particular the extension of Conscription to Industry, which abrogates the rights for which the working class have struggled, and makes every individual a cog in the war machine.

"It believes that these measures are a step towards totalitarianism, which will destroy the freedom of individuals.

"It is determined to resist these measures with all the means at its disposal.

"It expresses its sympathy with all those who by reason of their conscientious objection to Conscription feel it their duty to refuse co-operation with the Govenment on this issue."

Comments will be welcomed.

Yours fraternally,

L. ADEANE.

THE CHURCH AND ITS DOUBTFUL ALLIES

By the Rev. HENRY JAMES ADLARD.

[The following essay is a summary of about half of the sermon preached by Mr. Adlard to the congregation assembled at Trim Street Church, Bath, on December 29, 1940.—Ed.]

Many people and churches have tried to serve "God and Mammon," and have become morally cross-eyed in so doing. To such, a timely word in modern dress comes from Jeremiah, one of the world's great pacifists, and true prophet-statesmen: "What will you say when you feel the sway of those you trained as allies" (Moffat translation).

Jeremiah saw the inevitable result of calling in certain neighbouring nations as allies, for the ally may rise to place of master, usurp the leadership, exploit the situation, and enslave those who brought him in. The realists of those days despised Jeremiah. He was a dreamer, impractical. This has ever been the answer of the realists, or the disciples of Machiavelli, when the ethical side of national questions has been raised. "The source of our world confusion," says a world-famed thinker, "is our contemptuous dismissal of ethics."

Leaving courageous Jeremiah, this prophecy of calling in questionable allies on the grounds of success or expediency fits in at several points with startling exactitude with the history of the Christian Church. With all the wailing, the self-examination and questioning as to the ineffectiveness of the church to-day, this matter of queer allies has not been honestly recognised. I propose to look at it in three or four spheres.

(1) When Christianity became the State Church.

Here, many historians think, and rightly, that the cardinal, epochal error of the Christian Church was made, and why to-day it is not preaching the essential gospel of Jesus. To find out where this fatal twist was taken we must return to the fourth century. The early Christian Church, composed in the main of common people, was taken over by the State under Constantine—and ruined.

Someone has said of that period it was as though the church entered a tunnel. It went in at one end with a simple, vital, courageous, buoyant world-challenging gospel. It emerged complacent, wily, time-serving. Its valiant note was gone. It was now popular, if not prudent, to be a Christian. It was not now a case of rendering unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's. Jesus was brought under the heel of Caesar, and has been there ever since. The ruin of the religion of Jesus was its undue friendliness with "the powers that be."

Referring to the Middle Ages, to show the vast temporal power of the Church, J. A. Hobson says, that it owned one-fifth of the cultivated land of Europe, and, say it slowly, "the Son of Man had not where to lay His head."

(2) The Church of England.

The ruler of England must be a member of that Church. That Church must support him and the State. I have a good deal of affection for the Church of England—its noble buildings, its great scholars, its superb music, its liturgy, dignity and traditions. That is its credit side, but it is in many senses a kept, favoured, privileged church with its hand and tongue too much tied. It has never been served by more devoted, liberal, socially-minded men than to-day, but in a national crisis it is gagged. It cannot very well attack the State which is not Christian. On the contrary, a truly free church, based on democratic principles, is free to proclaim, prophesy, and declare let the chips fall where they will.

We think of the sources of its income, its patronage, the gift of livings, which means, and must mean in many cases, that the incumbent must everlastingly keep his eye on his donor and be just right. There is a Rectory not far from where I write, where the occupant must be just what the Manor House ordains. Where the gospel of the insurgent Jesus will get its chance it is hard to say. The Church of England is inevitably tied up with military pomp, parades, with flags and banners, yea, in the sanctuary itself—I recall Military Sunday in York. The United States has no State Church. State and Church are rigidly sundered. Religious freedom obtains; but there are times even there where the State says: "I am a jealous god and thou shalt have none other gods before me." The famous case of Prof. Mackintosh of Yale, who sought citizenship, but demurred at the oath to fight, is still fresh in some minds.

(3) The Ally of Wealth and Privilege.

The Church cannot be run without money; but there is some money it cannot afford to take. The vast temporal power of Rome has already been cited; but we may come nearer. We all know of the man who subscribes heavily, wants to dictate and call the tune, those who try to "own" the minister, intimidate him, make him their private chaplain, until he scarcely dare say "booh." It is very alluring to some ministers to be in with the "best families.' It smooths things for them. It also takes the iron out of their gospel.

I knew a loveable Congregationalist minister in America. He lost two churches during the last war through his Pacifism. Later he "came back," secured a splended new church, but he had one man, his biggest subscriber, who, in his own words, gave my friend "a hell of a time."

I recall the words of a man replying to an annual budget appeal.

"For good reasons, which are sufficient to myself, I cannot subscribe to your church budget this year."

It was cleverly worded. He was a lawyer, and I must have spoken a painful truth one Sunday. I recall my friend, John Haynes Holmes of the Community Church, New York, scholarly, devoted, crystal-clear in his preaching, full of social passion. When he came to the church 30 years ago he was as a breeze from heaven, he cleared out the wealthy drones just by what he said; but as they departed by the front door, "offended at his word," he preached others in at the back, and is to-day one of the great fearless voices of the U.S.A.

There is the inescapable matter of how the wealth of church members is obtained, how they treat their employees, what wages they pay, what unholy tenements' rents may swell their income, whether they are brewers, whether they profit from armaments. I am not advocating wholesale attacks on such, or proposing some definite economic solution, I am pointing out the subtle danger of wealthy allies. Wealth is not unwelcome, but it must be clean, for when one man owns a church, a church of Jesus, it ceases to be one. The preacher is henceforth gagged, bull-dozed and silenced.

To which I am by no means insensible. It is an ally to worship. It meets psychological, aesthetic and emotional needs. In fact, art is part of religion; and religion itself is the greatest art of all. Art has quickened and sensitised the spiritual aspirations of man. The Puritans and Quakers were mistaken in throwing it out.

I am all for beautiful places of worship. I love order, beauty, dignity. We need the construction of a rational ritual, such as has been built up by Dr. Stanton Coit of the Ethical Society.

To-day, in the desperation caused by crumbling creeds, the world chaos, the perplexed hearts, many people are turning to Rome or Anglo-Catholicism; not always, I am persuaded by their intellectual appeal. No, but from the spiritual anodyne they offer in the way of art. It involves no particular belief. It makes one feel good, secure, comforted, quiet. It is psychology rather than theology. Architecture, music, ritual, liturgy, even vestments have rendered some service to organised worship. They all meet human needs. Frail humanity needs a lot of crutches, but all too often they have usurped the throne. The ally has become the king. Form has enslaved the spirit. The ends have been forgotten in the means. To many these are but raptures and ecstacies of the moment. The question is: how do they impinge on, or relate to, life. Christianity, as Jesus taught it, minus all its frills and ecclesiastical millinery, is a terrific ethical and spiritual adventure. It is simple but strong, it allows no compromise or coddling. Meeting-house and market-place must, somehow, be vitally connected.

State—our State Church—wealth, and privilege, and art may be allies. They are part of the picture as we see it. To wholly uproot them is difficult. They must be dealt with however.

I hold that a State Church is a contradiction in terms, and that the State must have no power over the human soul. Wealth is here, but it must have no privilege. Rather it should lay to heart the lesson of the rich man and Lazarus. Art must not becloud the real issues by images and incense.

The church's right to exist, its justification, is that it has a way of life to offer which is sharply different from that of the world. It is to "overcome," not to be overcome by the world. It is to challenge society, "turn the world upside down," and change it.

Hobson says of Calvanism, "Mammon in fact was taken into the service of God as a junior partner." He adds: "It is the almost complete failure of the church to apply Christian ethics to the theory and practice of social reform that explains its loss of hold on the people to-day."

Until the Church deals faithfully with the matter of how wealth is acquired—not spent—until it realises that all wealth is socially acquired, it will go on finding good reasons to believe what it wants to believe—Let the Church beware of its allies. A man is known by the company he keeps. If the Church is a sort of omnibus where anyone may get on and ride no matter what his ethical concepts, then the sooner will the word "Ichabod" be daubed on its doorposts —and serve it right too.

LETTER BOX.

Dear Comrade,—I was rather astonished to read your "puff" for "Vanguard." I received a copy of this recently and I find it disgustingly anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic. It is true it is anti-war but the other exhibitions nullify this, for the true pacifism is tolerant of other persons' beliefs.

You may be interested to know that I was registered for non-combatant service by the Birmingham Tribunal in July last and my appeal was dismissed at London on December 13th last. I have been in my present job since last May, but this does not apparently "cut any ice" for the Tribunal, for in my statement I said I would do work of "international importance." At my appeal I told the court that I believed in saving the women and children of the next generations from being bombed. My objection was on political and philosophical grounds. I have just resigned my membership of the I.L.P. and I now take the Anarchist position which I feel is the only one consistent position with pacifism.

Yours in the Cause,

JOHN ROBINSON.

Birmingham, Jan. 13, 1941.

[We have written to Comrade Robinson privately. We never "puff" papers or persons. We write freely, as we think; and we expect our colleagues to do the same. We really believe in Freedom—Freedom of Thought, Speech, Writing, and Living. We hate dictatorship and imposed ideas, religious or irreligious, Fascist or alleged anti-Fascist. Comrade Robinson ought to know that, in these columns, we have defended Catholic C.O.'s; published an account of Pax, which is really a Catholic "conchie" association, although not exclusively so; and upheld the stand of Philip Boyle, who is a Catholic and one of our best friends. We are opposed to the Catholic Church, but we do not share all Mr Ratcliffe's views in this matter. We object to many things he says. Also, we are not opposed to the Jews. We believe in the equal right to happiness and well-being of all men and women, irrespective of race, creed, language, or colour. That is democracy. The fact remains that Mr Ratcliffe writes vigorously on the war issue and we approve of his fearless expression. In these columns, we quote Unitarians. Mr Ratcliffe insists, in The Vanguard, that a Unitarian cannot be a Christian. We insist, in our pamphlets, that, theologically, a Unitarian is nearer true Christian teaching than a Trinitarian. We would unite all enemies of war and all friends of non-violence in one great federation, if we could.—Ed.]

MARY S. ALLEN

Under the title, "Lady In Blue," Mary S. Allen, O.B.E., Commandant of the Women's Auxiliary Service, tells the story of her life. This work was published in London, by Stanley Paul & Co., Ltd., in 1936.

The list of illustrations include the following:

"Commandant Allen Working as a Suffragette." Facing page 16.

In connection with the last picture, on pages 93 to 95 of this book, Mary Allen describes how she organised the women of the country into the defence services, to defeat the so-called, but mis-called, general strike of 1926. This strike of the industrial workers, in support of the miners' struggle against their evil conditions, this woman describes as "a Communist coup." What has Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, to say to this description? Can Thomas Johnston reconcile it with his Forward articles? Can Lord Provost Dollan reconcile the statement with his 1926 pronouncements?

On pages 148 to 155 of this book of memoirs, Mary S. Allen eulogises Hitler and Goering, and describes Hitler as "the barrier holding back the tide of Communism." We reproduce this eulogy as a separate article.

This woman has not been interned for her enemy associations, but small shopkeepers and ex-servicemen are interned to-day for the duration, without any charge being made against them. Here is a woman who rejoices in having sabotaged the General Strike of 1926 honoured under a Government, whose Cabinet includes Bevin, Greenwood, Johnston, Attlee, and Morrison. We put the facts to the workers of Britain and demand an end to the scandal. We do not ask that Mary Allen should be interned, for we do not believe in internment. We ask only that the workers read her eulogy of Hitler and Goering and we demand her dismissal from the Women's Auxiliary Service.

The Mary Allen scandal must cease.

Hitler: The Barrier Against Communism

By

MARY S. ALLEN, O.B.E.

Commandant of The Women's Auxiliary Service.

[This tribute to Fascism is extracted from Lady In Blue, pages 148-155, chapter XI. This work was published in 1936, and is referred to under another heading. Remember that strike breakers of the Mary Allen type built up Hitlerism in Europe and so assisted to make the present war inevitable. Now she enjoys official position in the Services, under a Government which includes alleged Socialists and Trades Unionists, who were supposed to represent the workers' struggle in 1926. The entire business is a disgrace to public life and a scandal that ought to be concluded. Mary Allen should be dismissed from the public services and our Labour Leaders who associate with her should be expelled from the Labour Movement.—Ed.]

In 1934, I went abroad again on one of the most interesting foreign visits of my career. I was invited to Germany, just after the burning of the Reichstag Building in Berlin and the great Nazi development.

I had always been particularly anxious to see a successful Women Police movement in Germaany, because of the Cologne Experiment which I had initiated. The German women whom we trained then in police duties had proved themselves invaluable to the country after the British troops and policewomen had been withdrawn, and had formed the nucleus of a force of German policewomen several hundred strong.

But when Herr Hitler came into power, he swept away much of the existing police organisation, and most of the policewomen in Prussia went with it. On my visit to Berlin, I sought to discover why this had happened, and to see whether a new force of Women Police could not be built up in accordance with Nazi principles.

I was fortunate enough to reach Germany in time to be present at the enormous meeting following the Reichstag burning, when Herr Hitler explained his policy in full for the first time, not only to the thousands of waiting Germans, but to a breathless and uneasy world.

For two and a half hours I sat absolutely entranced beside the Chancellor's charming sister, listening to the great Dictator. When he sat down at last, I looked at my watch thinking he had been speaking about half an hour!

My German is elementary, yet this man's hypnotic gestures, his passionate, forceful voice and his visionary eyes held me spellbound.

He is one of the greatest orators who have ever lived.

In the packed theatre listening to his speech were thousands of German war veterans. They were grey-headed men, but their lined faces shone with sheer worship, and more than one blinked back tears of fierce emotion as they watched the Fuhrer speaking.

Rotund German Generals in frayed and faded war-time uniforms, their bald heads pink with excitement, ceased to seem pathetic or comic and became symbols of a great national pride that can never die while Adolf Hitler lives. Rubbing shoulders with them were thousands of members of the Stalhelm and of the new German Youth Organisations—potentially some of the finest soldiers in the world.

I have never in the whole of my public experience known such waves of emotion as one could feel sweeping through the theatre, while irrepressible growling cheers punctuated each new sentence of "The Leader."

The following night he was present at the Berlin Sports Palace for a great musical festival, and was ushered in by the crash of military bands.

I sat not far from him with Countess von Bernstorff, and watched with interest the intense excitement created by his presence. His love of music is well known, and his appreciation of the programme was obvious.

I felt afraid that, with all this extraordinary activity going on, there might be no time for the interview with Herr Hitler which had been arranged for me. I need not have been apprehensive, for at the close of what must have been to the Chancellor a day of superhuman mental and physical strain, I was told that he would receive me at midnight.

It is a recognised psychological fact that succesful Dictators are invariably men of exceptional physique, and Herr Hitler is no exception to the rule. He works eighteen hours out of each twenty-four, and yet keeps fitter than most of his staff.

He sent his representative, Dr. Ernst Hanpfstaengel, to the Kaiserhof Hotel to fetch me, and together we crossed the square, covered in snow and wrapt in midnight silence which our muffled footsteps did not break. We entered a large house in the Wilhelmstrasse.

A few moments in the lift, a short walk through anterooms piled high with flowers, and I was in the presence of one of Europe's most remarkable men. He rose, made the famous Nazi salute, shook hands, and asked me to be seated.

In private, he is a charming man, courteous, quiet, patient. But the steadfast eyes and the unflinching mouth do not let one forget that sincerity and fixity of purpose which have carried this "little corporal" from political refugee to virtual ruler of one of the greatest nations in the modern world.

I told him that I had been responsible for the Cologne Experiment of 1923, and asked him why policewomen in Prussia had since been disbanded, and whether we might hope soon to see a new force inaugurated.

Very courteously, he explained that the disbanded units were not of his political persuasion, and that it was impossible to retain officials who did not subscribe to the United Nazi front. He compared such action with the idea of enrolling Communist agents, who refused to take the oath of allegiance, in the British Police Force.

He was, however, much interested in my arguments in favour of Nazi policewomen, and said that General Goering had provisionally agreed to enrol a hundred policewomen in Berlin under his own charge.

Herr Hitler assured me that I was most welcome in Germany, and reiterated that he was very friendly to England, and had a great admiration of our methods. He said that Germany would prefer the friendship of England to that of any other European country, and that Germany and England together could ensure peace in the world.

Our conversation was held in German, and it revolutionised my ideas of the Fuhrer. I had gone to Germany insensibly influenced by the propaganda used in England against him, prepared to find a man ruthless in his power and impatient of everything except the progress of his own advancement.

Instead, I discovered a patriot whose sincerity and faith in his country's future enables him to mould the passions of somewhere near a hundred million people, and whose first-hand experience of trench warfare, of which he carries permanent scars, makes him one of the greatest factors in preserving European peace to-day—a greater factor than many European statesmen who, in the last twenty years, have grown famous in office.

I recognise in him an enduring friend of England, and a blood-brother of the ordinary decent people of Europe, whatever their nationalities, who want peace for their trade and safety for their children.

Before I left him, the Dictator suggested to me that I might like to visit the Secret Police Headquarters, and see the Communist exhibits collected by the German police during the recent rising.

"You in England do not realise how closely Communism threatens you," he said as we parted. "You think we are fanatical here? Well look over the exhibits in that Museum and see whether they confirm your views. You will be one of the first women ever admitted there."

I saw the Exhibition, which I considered a great privilege, as it is an official police collection, rather like the Black Museum at Scotland Yard.

When I entered the main room, I stood still for a moment in horror. With uncanny German thoroughness, life-sized models have been arranged in realistic poses about the place, evil-faced rebels crouching over machine-guns, torturers operating on victims with devices worse than the "Boot," the "Maiden" and the "Rack" of the Middle Ages, warders wielding knouts filled with glass and steel over shrinking prisoners (similar knouts were taken recently by police from Communist rioters), and all sorts of incredibly foul and blasphemous pamphlets scoffing at religion, decency, home-life—in fact, everything the normal man and woman hold sacred.

One part of the Exhibition was fitted up as an actual Berlin street scene during the coup when Herr Hitler overcame the ruthlessness and violence of the German Communists. With its groups of riflemen, machine-gun nests and barricades, it looked terribly vivid.

From my knowledge of crime and underworld organisations here and elsewhere, I believe we should have this sort of thing in England within six months of Adolf Hitlers fall, unless strong police and military precautions were taken to prevent it.

Hitler and no one else is the barrier holding back the tide of Communism from Western Europe. The Communist-fed propaganda against him in England is spread at the instance and expense of Moscow because, once he is gone, Moscow expects to gain control not only in Berlin but in London, when a handsome return would be taken from our banks for all propaganda moneys spent up to that date.

A Special Branch Detective-Inspector of Scotland Yard, formerly a Royal detective and not at all the sort of man who would make exaggerated statements, wrote recently of a Communist plot in England, led by an Irish Colonel of one of His Majesty's regiments, which was worked out in detail to seize banks, churches and arsenals, and enforce a Communist Dictatorship here.

The plot was frustrated when two shiploads of rifles and ammunition were discovered in the Thames, the cargo covered by a camouflage of timber. The Colonel was arrested and imprisoned, and the plot broken up.

That plan was not the only one of its kind to be exposed during the last few yeears. If we want street fighting and mass murder in England, the surest way to attain it is to continue the hysterical anti-Hitler propaganda in which certain of our newspapers have recently been indulging.

A significant feature of the material taken from the Communist Headquarters was some elaborate apparatus for forging passports. This included beautifully made seals, coloured inks, printing machines, and samples of papers used by various Governments. There were examples of passports for every big country, including a forged British one. I was told that it was practically impossible even for an expert to detect such forgery until the use of ultra-red and violet rays was discovered. How easy for revolutionaries to enter with subversive propaganda any chosen country, with several such passports at their disposal!

During my visit, I had a long interview with General Goering, Prime Minister of Prussia, Minister for Air and then Chief of Police. More soldier than politician, he is quick to make big decisions, stern in action, a magnificent airman and a fluent speaker. He says what he thinks, no matter to whom he speaks. Like other famous men, he does not lack enemies who take down his words, alter them, and try to make him look ridiculous.

They may succeed to some extent outside Germany, but in his own country he is worshipped.

He informed me that he was going fully into the matter of appointing Nazi policewomen, and he will keep his word. He spoke freely of affairs outside Germany, and I was specially interested when he told me that the chief aim of German policy is to get Paris, London and Berlin together to keep the peace of the world.

It was General Goering who gave me some idea of conditions in Germany immediately prior to the Nazi régime. What had happened was that two revolutions had clashed—nationalism and internationalism, loyalty and disorder. The police, the political parties, the financiers and leaders of Germany were divided into two camps. On them Hitler came down like a wolf on the fold.

He did not subscribe to the Communist ideals, and simply swept them out of existence. He was ruthless; for he saw that Bolshevism, which had been gaining ground since the end of the war, must be firmly checked, or there would be no freedom for the German people and no safety for the nation. He believed that the Communist plan was to spread from Russia, first to Germany, then to France, then to England, and he found ample proof that these suspicions were correct.

I am not in a position to comment on Herr Hitler's methods except as regards the German police. He went through the police with a small-tooth comb, and he was right to do so. When he came into power, the police force was riddled with Communist propaganda. Many policemen were loyal and courageous, but others were ready to turn their revolvers on the populace they were paid to protect, and loot the houses they were detailed to guard.

We in England only know a perfectly reliable police force. What would happen in the country if any civilian might be beaten on the head with a police truncheon because of his political views, or any shopkeeper might find a posse of uniformed figures emptying his till into their own pockets on the ground of political expediency?

Herr Hitler weeded out his police force, caring nothing for name, length of service or rank, and retained only men whose loyalty to Germany was beyond suspicion. As a result, he opened the way for the splendid and courteous force that operates in his country to-day.

In addition, by restoring public confidence, he saved Germany from Communism and disaster, and restored a spirit of national pride that had almost faded away. That pride itself may conceivably grow to undesirable heights, but without it nations sink to obscurity, squalor and despair.

One of the points which I put to General Goering during our interview was whether the Nazi policewomen, when appointed, should wear uniform. His reply was enlightening.

"No one can do official work without the right to wear uniform," he said. "It inspires confidence and ensures authority. It divides the policewoman from the agent provocateur and the spy."

That exactly sums up my own views on the subject, which is one of the most controversial matters concerning policewomen all over the world.

I left Germany much impressed with the new régime and its bearing on the enrolment of Women Police. Undoubtedly, in the interests of the women in the country, the need for policewomen is very great.

If Herr Hitler and General Goering between them can evolve as fine a service of policewomen as they have of policemen in Germany, they will be doing a great service not only to their own country but to the cause of Women Police throughout Europe.

SOCIALIST AND ANARCHIST REMINISCENCES

By MATT KAVANAGH.

I came into the Anarchist and Socialist movement at a most interesting time. The old Socialist League was in existence still, although on its last legs. Its organ, The Commonweal, was edited by David Nicoll who had, just previously, been running The Anarchist from Sheffield. He had not then been in prison over the Walsall affair, and was at his best. So also was Mowbray. The latter was a different man from the Mowbray whom Guy Aldred knew. America ruined Mowbray and turned him from an idealist into a charlatan. At the time that I knew him first, he was a great open-air speaker, possessed of tremendous drive and energy. I would not call him an intellectual speaker. Perhaps his want in this respect explains his later opportunism, which cost him his reputation for integrity to very little advantage to himself. Kitz was a fine speaker. He was at his best, also, at this time and did splendid propaganda.

Apart from the good speakers and workers that constituted the Anarchist and Socialist movement of those days, the period was exceptional. It was the time of Ravachol, Henry, Santo. London was the home of Kropotkin, Stepniak, Malatesta, Merlino, and Louise Michel. To term oneself an Anarchist was to be notorious. Public speaking was an attraction. There were no cinemas.

When I first came to London, the Anarchist and Anti-Parliamentary movement possessed four papers: Freedom; The Torch; Commonweal; Liberty. The Anarchist was, in addition, being run from Sheffield. There were active groups in Sheffield, Leeds, Leicester, and Manchester. We started a group in Liverpool which was destined to become one of the most active Anarchist groups in Britain. At a later date, this group was assisted by Portett, who held a post at Liverpool University, until, as Ferrer"s heir, he returned to Spain to take over the Modern School property and publishing house. Ferrer stayed in Liverpool for a fortnight and we held a meeting to welcome him, and he spoke in English. His vocabulary was good. His knowledge of English literature was comprehensive. But his accent was bad. He impressed the audience by his sincerity. We recalled this visit later, when he faced the firing squad in Montjuich.

There are very few comrades alive to-day who could have known Marx in the flesh. I have both pleasant and unpleasant recollections of persons who knew him intimately. Foremost was his daughter, Eleanor Marx. She had the misfortune to be associated for the greater part of her life with that brilliant scoundrel, Edward Aveling. They kept to the strict Marxian line so long as Frederick Engels was alive to pay their bills and to enable them to live a bourgeoise life in the respectable suburb of Sydenham. Eleanor Marx rarely mentioned her father on the platform. For the greater part of her life she advocated all manner of economic nostrums, which were miles away from every semblance of revolutionary Socialism. She and Aveling flitted from one political organisation to another, many of them of a most distinctly reactionary character. It is noticeable that the self-appointed custodians of the Holy Temple of Marxism in Leningrad, wisely, ignore his family; like the Roman Catholics who ignore the rest of Mary's family. Marx's youngest daughter was one of his favourites but she left no mark on Socialist history. She led a tragic life and died by her own hand.

I also knew, most intimately, Fredrick Lessner who, although he is hardly remembered to-day, was himself an intimate of Marx—perhaps for a longer period than anyone else except Engels. Though Lessner was the complete hero-worshipper, he was not blind to the faults of his "Master." He realised the rot that had set in when the Party became immersed in Parliamentary politics. But he lacked the strength of character of Most, and, instead of fighting it, became the tool and toady of Wm. Liebknecht and Bebel. He became the agent in London for the German Social Democratic Party, which meant diving into the filthiest depths of political intrigue. Finally, when the party organisation was used to betray Most, and the comrades who were helping him to secretly distribute his paper Freiheit, to the police, Lessner justified that action, although it was completely foreign to his nature, simply because Marx said it was right.

Lessner remained friendly with Marx until the latter's death. But when, afterwards, the seat of authority was moved to Engels's residence at St. John's Wood, he did, at last, assert his independence. When Engels, under the influence of the Avelings, advised all Marxians to leave the S.D.F. and join the I.L.P., Lessner refused, pointing out that the I.L.P., in those days, denied the class struggle and was purely reformist and anti-revolutionist.

It remains a pity that Lessner did not write his reminiscences for, with his intimate knowledge of Marx and of his faults, he could probably have destroyed many of the fictions that are being circulated, for their own interest, by the present-day Marxist factions.

A. S. Headingly is another whose name conveys little to the comrades of to-day. He too was a contemporary, and at one time a friend, of Marx. Actually his real name was Adolph Schmidt and he took the name of Headingly from a Norfolk village where he lived for a time when he first came to England. He had lived for some time in Paris and participated in the Commune. He went back to Germany and, in the days before the canker of parliamentarianism had killed all idealism and enthusiasm, he was always in the van. When the Bismark repression came he escaped to England which he made his home. He did much writing and lecturing, mainly for the old S.D.F. He had been friendly with Marx in Germany and in France and it was he who introduced Hyndman to Marx and, to some extent, brought him into the movement. But later Headingly was continually slandered by Marx and Engels because he refused to have anything to do with the charlatans and adventurers, like John Burns, who later surrounded Marx. And when Bakounin and Morris were variously attacked in the course of the Marxist intrigues, Headingly defended them. It is probably because he preferred to retain his integrity rather than participate in these intrigues, which in these days are carefully suppressed, that Headingly, though a man of considerable ability, has not passed into history. He, and others like him, who refused to bow the knee and become hero-worshippers are ignored in favour of the sycophants and toadies. Nevertheless they are the men who have really built the movement, the nameless ones whose work will live on, an inspiration and guide to those who yet will carry the banner to victory.

Wilhelm Leibknecht and his son Karl formed as great a contrast as it is possible for two mer to form, the father with his eyes on the past, the son living with his visions of the future. The father's mind was warped and limited by political expediency, the son's full of revolutionary zeal, and prepared to take any action for the cause of the workers. Some time before the Great War I met Karl Leibknecht in the Communist Club in Charlotte Street. At that time, in conjunction with a few others, we ran an Anarchist Sunday School which was affiliated to Francisco Ferrer Modern Schools. Parents and visitors were encouraged to come and see what our methods were like. This particular aftenoon our only visitor was a tall, dark man, who was evidently very interested, especially following the remarks of the children closely. After the school was dismissed we had tea, and discussed the question very thoroughly. He wanted to know what were the reactions of the children to the various topics, and how far they were capable of grasping abstract questions. How in the absence of any discipline it was possible to control. Above all he was keen to know all it was possible to know of the man Ferrer, whose dastardly murder by the combined forces of the Church and State was still afresh in the minds of everyone. This crime against humanity had united all sections of thought in a solid block of protest throughout the world. All in vain. The Past triumphed over the Present; the Dead Hand of organised Authority crushed in the person of Ferrer the hopes of a Free Humanity. This is where one saw the limitations of a great soul, and of a great mind, by the policy of slander, which has been consistently pursued by the Marxists, of both the Social-Democrats, and the Communist school. The elder Leibknecht was one of the worst offenders, especially against Bakunin. Karl Leibknecht was undoubtedly influenced by these lies.

Like the Rationalists, he was loth to look upon Ferrer as an Anarchist, and would have like to claim him as a mere educational reformer. Stranger still, in the light of subsequent events, was his attitude towards revolt, which was surging in Spain at that time against the foreign policy of the Spanish Government. He deprecated organised violent revolt, and thought all legal methods should first be exploited. It was pointed out to him that most Anti-Parliamentarians had like Ferrer arrived at their position through bitter experience rather than by armchair reasoning. Life itself had driven them to see the folly of ever being able to use the State as an instrument of class-emancipation. The same forces drove Leibknecht into the same position in spite of, and not because of, his political philosophy. History has proved his honesty of purpose and the strength of our position. His name will be known when the names of his traducers will be forgotten.

GOD AND THE SOCIALIST

(By S. D. FRANCES)

The benefit of mankind, the betterment of man's outlook on life, co-operation, freedom and justice. All these things are desired equally by the christian and the socialist. Yet the christian and the socialist rarely find that their paths are the same even though their goals be so similar.

An understanding of the fundamental differences between the two opinions may well set Christian and Socialist alike, thinking.

Our Socialist is logical and likes to have reasons for what he believes in. He is not prepared to accept this doctrine or that ideology purely because it has been sold to him by a good orator who has appealed not to his reason but to his emotions. It is known only too well how people's opinions may be played upon to produce certain reactions. The last war and the emotional propaganda that accompanied it was recognised only when it was shown for what it was. The lurid tales of pillage, rape and injustice of the "Huns," the emotional cries of "the war to end wars," "Hang the Kaiser," "Britains never will be slaves," etc., were recognised as political strategy, only when its need as political strategy had disappeared.

Our Socialist is made of sterner stuff however. And in the same way that he looks askance at Government propaganda so does he also eye with suspicion any faith or belief that is not based on fact and is based only on emotion.

He will adopt the attitude that all men are born into this world without any preconceived ideas. How then should man come to believe in God? The Christian will state definitely that he believes in God and knows God exists. The Socialist cannot immediately agree to this. Unless the Socialist has reason to believe in God he cannot, with justice to himself, accept God. To the Socialist, to accept God without reason for doing so is to make himself a hypocrite. Having witnessed no miracles, having not seen a divine manifestation, not having even received any idea of God except through religious connections, the Socialist, learning something of Christianity, is immediately struck by the thought, "how does a Christian know that God exists?"

Being of an enquiring turn of mind, and probably finding much in Christianity which appeals to him, our Socialist immediately seeks information. "How do you know there is a God?" he asks a Christian friend. It is at this point that the breach between Christian and Socialist widens. The Christian undoubtedly believes in God; he also states emphatically that he knows there is a God; but how he knows or why he knows is a question he can never answer. An argument ensues, the Christian, hard pressed, may even go so far as to point at nature and say "how do you think all this came about if it were not created by God?" and eventually, if he is honest, will say "I do not know why I believe in God, but I have faith."

Our Socialist ponders on this. The Christian believes in God. He has no reason to believe in God—he just has faith. Surely this is the result of education and propaganda. A child reared in a family which believed implicitly that the world was flat and supported on the shoulders of a giant; a child which was taken to a place of worship and taught to say prayers to this giant, might well grow up to have 'faith" in the existence of this giant, even though he had no proof of its existence. Now, when science has proved to man's senses that the world is not flat but round, to believe otherwise would be to deceive oneself. Science has not disproved God, but nothing of practical experience of anyone living has given credence to it. Our Socialist therefore, with some justification, looks upon the Christian as having an unreal conception of life. The Christian however gains something by his faith that is denied to the Socialist. By his belief in God he is happy. He need only do good to people to merit the pleasure of God. The trials and tribulations of life are shouldered readily and with the confident belief that divine guidance is behind all things. The catastrophes of life, the wars, the poverty, the injustice, all these things are all part of a large scheme which God has knit together in his own mysterious way for the subsequent revelation of "good." The Christian must play his part within God's framework and this world is not the end for him; even though he endures a veritable hell on this earth, eternal happiness awaits him in the next.

Our Socialist, perhaps, would be only too pleased to embrace these ideas. If these things were true our Socialist could remove the burden of man's destiny from his own shoulders, knowing that it was being borne more efficiently by God's. But instead, being honest with himself, our Socialist considers it his duty to mankind to look at stark reality and produce his idea of the Kingdom of Heaven with the raw material at his disposal. At the same time his opinion of the Christian lessens considerably.

The next step forward is again a step away from the Christian path. Economic circumstances our Socialist recognises as responsible for most troubles. With much patient research and trouble both the Christian and the Socialist realise that inequality of economic status gives lopsidedness to man's character and unhappiness in many cases. To remedy this is the aim of both. The Christian, however, resorts to his prayers and to the "true" nature of individuals. The wrong that people do must be made apparent to them. The trouble and suffering that is caused by economic circumstances should be righted. But only by the evildoers realising that they are doing wrong. And this realisation will only come to them by the preaching of Christianity and by the grace of God. Our Socialist again, believes this to be a much better way of changing conditions but cannot accept the belief that preaching to hard-boiled munitions manufactureres will have very much effect. At the same time, if God is going to co-operate he might be a little more alive. Poverty and unhappiness have endured for generations, and our Socialist, soft of heart and indignant at injustice, is by nature quick to right a wrong. Our Socialist therefore finds the Christian methods lacking in determination and effectiveness as well as in foundations.

The Christian, willing and anxious for a change, wants the change to come about by people's ideas becoming less narrow, by the development of a brotherly feeling, by a spontaneous desire for all people to live happily and in harmony. But the Socialist sees only an economic structure that sets man against man, nation against nation, greed and lust against fraternity and "love of thy neighbour." And in the Christian himself the Socialist sees a man, a victim of environment, weighed down by his belief in the unknown, and too, because of this belief, setting himself against his brother—the Socialist. The only remedy the Socialist can see being, in changing those things that made man what he is, and changing those things into something that the Socialist and Christian alike want to see in existence. That change the Socialist recognises to be important and necessary, and if humanity is at stake, well surely then drastic means may have to be adopted. Yet he can expect no co-operation from the Christian.

Is he justified then in believing Christians to be acting against the interests of humanity?

Over the plough the joyful peewit tumbles
Or beats through his domain on humming wing.
Over the moor the curlew's rippling music
Proclaims the coming of another spring.

Only for man, blind man, engrossed in slaughter,
Though God hath given to him the widest range
Of power to vanquish suffering, sin, and sorrow,
The changing seasons bring no joy in change.

ROBERTSON.—In March, 1941 (by enemy action), William Aitkenhead, Auxiliary Fire Service, aged 36 years, dearly beloved husband of Una Burt Beatson, 62 Kirkton Avenue, Knightswood, Glasgow, W.3, and second son of Mrs. Margaret Robertson and the late Mr. John Robertson, 173 Parliamentary Rd., Glasgow; deeply regretted.

SHARP.—In March, 1941 (by enemy action), Jeanie Munro Sharp, sister-in-law of D. G. Reavey, of 59 Whitecrook Street, Clydebank.

THOMSON.—In March, 1941 (result of enemy action), William Howie Thomson, his wife (Isabella McAndrew), their family (John, Margaret and Lena), also Mrs. John McAndrew, grandmother, of 144 Earl Street, Scotstoun (late of Springburn).

WOODLOCK.—On 13th March, 1941, death came to Barbara Barclay, aged 34 years (beloved wife of Fred. H. Woodlock), and Audrey, aged 2½ years. Peace.

Note the ages of the victims. A child of 1½ years; a woman, 90 years of age! Fancy building the plane that sent death from the skies to these! Fancy launching the bomb or land-mine!

What criminal irresponsibility! Fancy returning home and expecting to receive the welcome smile from children or to be embraced tenderly by women, after committing such outrages!

And this is war! Against it, in no country, must he or she who thinks and feels, utter one word of protest under threat of being charged with cowardice or anti-patriotism!

We utter no protest. We are living and must be silent. We reprint but cold records. We pay sorrowing tribute to the recently dead of whom these records tell. We bid their cold lips frame, in the silence of the grave, the censure on contemporary civilisation that we would speak from the warmth of living indignation. For they are dead and speechless and may be heard. They rest beyond fear. We are able to speak and to us none will listen. For we, being alive, are yet dead, and dwell in fear. The silence that possesses the living is with us. It will make the world a mortuary unless the voice of the dead be heard in all lands, above the drone of planes, the explosion of bombs, and the thunder of guns. Let the dead speak that the living may be no longer speechless. Let their graves deliver us from the continued crime of sudden and violent death. They have sacrificed and have been sacrificed. Their sacrifice must not be made a vanity.

Baptists Defend Conscientious Objectors.

In the January issue of The Word, we published an article, headed "Baptists and Conscience," in which we criticised the Rev. M. E. Aubrey, General Secretary of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland. Mr. Aubrey feels that the comments contained in that article were unjust. He would not have sought to correct the injustice, had he not thought that the injustice rose from respect for the conscientious objector and the right of heresy, and was therefore unintentional. He has placed before us facts that prove that the Baptist Union is not indifferent to the right of conscience.

The Baptist Times for May 11, 1939, reported in part the speech made by Mr. Aubrey at the Baptist Assembly at Birmingham the previous week. Speaking to that part of the Report which dealt with Baptists' responsibility to youth, Mr. Aubrey said:—

"The Conscription Bill places on all the Churches a heavy obligation. Many of our young men, Sunday-school teachers, leaders of our young people, and others, will shortly be drafted into the Army, where they will have to face new and strange conditions which will test their manhood and their faith. Those among us who regard a measure of conscription as inevitable or necessary deplore the necessity. Those who do not, deplore it even more. We shall probably all deplore it. I have felt it incumbent upon me already to inform the Government that, unless it carries out in the spirit as well as in the letter its pledge to conscientious objectors, it may expect trouble from the Free Churches."

Commenting on this utterance, in his notes "From The Secretary's Chair," Mr. Aubrey said:—

"That declaration was warmly endorsed by the Assembly which, in effect, supported it by passing unanimously a little later a resolution on Religious Freedom which called upon the Churches to stand by men who were honestly convinced that in loyalty to Christ they could take no part in war. . . . Our own attitude on the question of conscientious objectors is, I am assured, that which will be taken by all the Free Churches."

The following is the resolution that was passed by the Assembly:—

"That it is the duty of all Christian Churches to stand by any who, in their honest interpretation of the will of their Lord, declare themselves unable to join the military forces and to urge the State to provide for these such forms of service to the community as shall not violate personal convictions. They regard such concern for personal freedom as conducive to the true welfare of the nation which has in fact no more precious asset than the fearless witness of its citizens to what they believe to be right and true."

We are glad to give space to this resolution. We think Mr. Aubrey will agree that the terms of the first portion of the resolution ought not to have confined its application to Christian objectors. There are Atheist and Ethical objectors, Socialist, humanitarian and Buddhist. Why not have included all by implicit declaration?

In practice, the Baptist Union did not limit its concern to Christian objectors, as is evident by its concern at the treatment of the Liverpool C.O.'s.

When allegations about the conduct of the A.M.P.C. Camp at Dingle Vale, Liverpool, were brought to its notice, the Baptist Council, in November, 1940, passed the following resolution:—

"The Council of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland (while appreciating the provision made to meet the convictions of conscientious objectors and also the consideration shown to them by the Chairmen and members of many of the Tribunals), having heard allegations made that in some instances objectors who have failed to secure exemption have been subjected to ill-tratment, welcome the official inquiry promised by His Majesty's Government, after discussion in the House of Commons; urge that it should be concluded as speedily as possible and a full report made public so that the nation may be assured that the law is being observed and the declared intention of the Government that sincere objectors should not be victimised is being carried out in the spirit and in the letter."

This resolution was drafted by Mr. Aubrey. It makes plain his attitude towards all conscientious objectors. He is concerned not about being misunderstood personally, so long as the denomination, which it is his privilege to serve, should not be misrepresented and any impression get abroad that Baptists have not been as eager to stand for the rights of conscience during this war, as they have throughout their past history. They claim to have a fairly clear record in this respect, and are tenacious of their tradition and jealous of their good name.

Mr. Aubrey, replying to our criticism, says:—

"I know there are some tribunals in which conscientious objectors do not get proper treatment, and I may say that I have protested in the proper quarter concerning this. I can well understand your feeling strongly concerning the "volte-face" of some politicians.

"In the article to which you took exception there was not the slightest desire on my part to contrast favourably the objector to combatant service with the absolutist, and I am sorry if it should have made that impression upon you."

NON-COMBATANT C.O.'S
CECIL WILSON'S COMPLAINT

Cecil Wilson, M.P., told the Northern Appellate Tribunal for conscientious objectors, sitting in Manchester on February 24, that there was a case in the hands of the War Office of a man in the non-combatant corps being sentenced to three days' solitary confinement with four days' remission of sentence for refusing to name the parts of a rifle.

Mr. Wilson was giving evidence for Harold W. Barratt, of Handsworth, Sheffield, whom the Leeds tribunal had registered as for non-combatant service in the Army.

The Chairman (Sir Edward Stubbs): If a man in the non-combatant corps is called on to do combatant duties it is a breach of the Act of Parliament.

Mr. Wilson: You are not suggesting that if the necessity arose the War Office and the Army are not going to over-ride an Act of Parliament.

Sir Edward: You mean that in a state of emergency a man may be called on to take up a rifle?—In the case I am referring to, without any emergency, they are going behind an Act of Parliament.

Sir Edward: That, as you say, is sub judice.

The appeal was allowed and Barratt conditionally registered as a conscientious objector.

As Aaron's serpent swallowed snakes and rods,
As God alone is greater than the gods,
As all stars shrivel in the single sun,
The words are many, but THE WORD is one.

War, Suez, and Gibralter
BY THOMAS JOHNSTON, M.P.

[The following important article is reprinted from Forward, April 8, 1939. It was published by the present Secretary of State for Scotland under the title, "No Conscription, Why?"—Ed.]

I do not oppose conscription upon the grounds taken by some of my pacifist friends. I am not a non-resister to Evil. I do not believe that incantations or invocations or prayers for mercy to the Cavemen and Concentration Camp bullies serve any purpose. . . .

What I should like to do is to set down half-a-dozen reasons which appear to me as a Socialist and as a citizen to be good and sufficient justification for Socialist and citizen opposition to Conscription:—

(1) Conscription does not mean equality of sacrifice as some people pretend it does mean. There can in fact be no equality of sacrifice between the millionaire and the pauper. There can be no equality of sacrifice between the man who has no dependant children, and the man who has several dependant children, between the man with a widowed mother to maintain and the man who has no aged relatives to support. Even away back in the times of Henry V, five centuries ago, there was a clear appreciation of the fact that equality of sacrifice was impossible. . . .

(2) Conscription places business and commerce under the control of the military mind, with disastrous results to the nation. Officers commanding and military service tribunals are frequently incapable of wise decision in selecting the men whom they believe should be compulsory withdrawn from industry and commerce. One heard during the last war of key men in business who were conscripted, and when they had gone the industry or business they had left all but collapsed. Army conscription in the Great War crabbed the output of military material as well as production and distribution of civilian necessities; and I read—I think it was in the "Times"—of a key man chemist in an important industry who was discovered in khaki as a C3 soldier going about Battersea Park picking up waste paper!

(3) Conscription has been used certainly in France as a means of breaking political or economic movements of the working classes. Men called to the colours are then under military law and prohibited from taking futher part in their civilian activities.

(4) Men like Captain Liddell Hart, the military correspondent of the Times and Sir Auckland Geddes, who during the last war was Director-General of Recruiting are opposed to conscription on both economic and military grounds. . . .

(5) The people who are urging conscription of life, are not urging conscription of capital wealth. Indeed they are opposed to conscription of capital.

(6) The last war, you will remember, was to be the war to end war. When it was over the ruling classes in the victorious countries seized everything stealable. They set up no Tribunal of Equity for the future, and I hear of no proposals even now for the internationalisation of the Suez Canal and Gibraltar.

Might it not be that a proposal for such an international control of the ingress and egress to the Mediterranean would take Italy out of the "Axis" and so be worth twenty military divisions to us. . . .

Even if we have a war: even if we "won" the war, we should still require to internationalise the highways of the world if we want peace.

So why not propose it now.

I submit that as a security for our lives and our civilisation, such a proposition is worth twenty conscriptions!

The only remedy for the errors that pervert the minds of mankind from one end of the world to the other is mutual tolerance.—VOLTAIRE.

FATHER BADLY TREATED MANCHESTER ASSESSOR'S PROTEST

The action of the aliens authorities in July on a complicated nationality problem led a Manchester man living in Moss Side, who believed his father to have been badly treated, to register as a conscientious objector. The chairman of the local tribunal, Judge Burgis, on March 7, while holding that the appellant, on his statements, did not come within the provisions for conscientious objectors, commented that the father had been badly treated. The case must be a matter of great regret to every right-thinking citizen.

The appellant was Nicholas Solar, an assistant assessor under the Board of Trade, living at Raby Street, Moss Side. He is 20 and the British-born son of a man of Ukrainian extraction, who came to this country from Galicia 28 years ago, when the country was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. In the settlement after the last war the territory was restored to Poland, and it was one of the parts of Poland which were occupied by Soviet Russia early in the present war.

Solar, in his written statement, said that his father was interned in July, 1940, in spite of assurances by the aliens authorities that he would not be. He could not fight for a country that had so ill-treated his father. He alleged that his father had an eleven-hour wait at a Manchester police station without food and that the food in the camp was bad and inadequate—on his first day only two pieces of bread and margarine and some tea. He also complained of lack of opportunities for his father to communicate with his family.

His father's interests and associations, he added, were entirely British and he had no connections whatever in Germany or Austria. He could not speak the German or Austrian language. The Home Office had informed him that until he registered as a Polish national he would not be released.

Judge Burgis, the chairman of the tribunal: Your father was interned because he was a citizen of the German Empire?

Solar: Yes, but he was only made an Austrian in 1939. Officially he was down as a Ruthenian. The aliens office decided that he had better be treated as an Austrian.

Ernest Kurkjian Sentenced
JUDGE EXPRESSES REGRET

In the February Word we reported in some detail the case of Ernest J. Kurkjian, divinity student, of Temple University, Philadelphia.

On January 6, Kurkjian appeared in the Federal District Court, Philadelphia, and read a six-paged treatise, explaining why and how his conscience would not permit him to register for the draft.

Kurkjian declared that to register for the draft "will not promote God's will." He added that "every man who believes in God must oppose conscription."

Kurkjian pleaded guilty to refusing to register. He justified his guilt as obedience to the higher law of God, and said:—

"In registering I would have only dropped incense on the fire now burning on the altar of hate. . . . If I do not obey the law and accept the penalty for its breach, this action involves sacrifice itself."

Judge George A. Welsh said that millions in the United States of America, and in Europe, had "high ideas of Christianity" and were "just as strongly against the hate" Kurkjian mentioned. But they had to face the realities of the war thrust upon them by Totalitarianism and Fascist aggression. The English-speaking peoples were opposed to war and did not want war. They hated the idea of conscription, but they must defend democracy against dictatorship. He did not wish to sentence Kurkjian, who was "thoroughly sincere." But Kurkjian ought to have registered as a conscientious objector and so have met the law's desire to recognise his genuine conscientious objection to war and militarism. American law did not wish to persecute conscientious objectors and it did recognise that valuable services were rendered to progress by conscientious objectors. As it was, the law, and Kurkjian's own attitude, compelled him to pass the sentence prescribed by statute. Kurkjian must serve a year and a day in the Federal Penitentiary at Lewisburg. If only Kurkjian conscientiously had felt able to record, officially, his conscientious objection in the manner required by the Act, he would not have been called upon to suffer such imprisonment.

"Dogmas Discarded" or Adopted?
A UNITARIAN CRITICISM
BY THE
REV. FRANCIS WOODRUFF
(Minister, High St. Unitarian Church, Warwick)

Warwick, 28/2/41.

Dear Sir,—What a remarkable young man you must have been. No intellectual problem frightened you. Not only did you solve the riddles of the Universe, but set up as public instructor at a tender age. Though calling your autobiography "Dogmas Discarded," you show none of the broad, liberal, non-dogmatic spirit. "Dogmas adopted" would have been an equally apt title, but to your credit is a readiness to go anywhere that the search for truth appears to be taking you. This readiness to change your convictions is indeed helped by your lack of reverence for your teachers, however venerable.

You show your independence of mind by picking quarrels all too easily. Sometimes, as with your Anarchist friends, there is no real difference of conviction, only a personal dislike of some of their methods and personalities. And when one thinks that Mr. Voysey was a venerable septuagenarian when you became his disciple, one might have thought that reverence for such a master might have made you pause longer to think before deserting him.

Personally, I have had much occasion to discard dogmas; I was a Roman Catholic Priest and now I am a Unitarian Minister. I did not leave the Roman Church lightly, but had over a year of mental and spiritual searching. As a Unitarian I have had many occasions to disagree with the dominant spirit among Unitarians, but I am held to their free fellowship and am not out to pick a quarrel.

This lack of reverence for elders and teachers in your make-up gives the clue to your failure to appreciate Martineau, for that eminent Unitarian puts "reverence" at the top of human activities in ethical value. By it he means that homage we pay to all forms of greatness wherever perceived. The good, the true, and the beautiful, all deserve "reverence," and what we recognise as worthy of supreme reverence is God for us. Hence you have no use for the "Worship of God," which means giving reverence to what is highest and best in existence.

Belief in a "Personal" God is simply the recognition that in personality we touch something greater than "impersonality" can ever achieve, but no term is applicable to the absolute in any but a limited or relative sense. Absolute reality is personal, seems nearer the truth, than Absolute reality is impersonal. Similarly with many other terms.

Your attempt to link work for humanity irredeemably with a materialistic dogmatic atheism is on a par with the Catholic attempt to make belief in Catholic dogma a sine-qua-non to good works. Any who try to co-operate with you must either share your dogmatic position or suffer constant jibes and attacks on their cherished convictions. That is why, despite your abilities you are not the leader of a great movement. If you were only liberal-minded enough to respect other philosophies, and to keep your socialistic writing more on the point, things would be different. You may see aspects of truth that others don't, and conversely others may see aspects hidden from you. You may think an Anti-God Movement an essential part of Social Reform, as the Pope thinks no social reform can come until the Theology of the Church holds the minds of men. Liberalism wants men to co-operate whatever their philosophy, and to respect each other's convictions.

I have practically confined myself to my stronger reactions to your writings, but of course I find much more to agree with. Your humanitarian sympathies, your conscience about War, your appreciation of Jesus as a Man (though you don't appreciate his insight into the nature of reality), all seem good to me though your main philosophy of materialism is impossible to my mind. In fact the extreme view of the Christian Scientists in which Mind alone is real, and Matter an illusion, is moore thinkable to me. Your Publication of material re Mr. Adlard's activities shows that I need not point out that there is room in Unitarianism for such as you. But remember that any free movement is likely to contain an erring majority, so you would have to tolerate it.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS W. WOODRUFF.

[Our view is that Mr. Woodruff's criticism is, unintentionally, unjust. Nevertheless, since we criticise freely, we are open to criticism. Readers' and friends' opinions are welcomed: and we are prepared to publish the most severe criticism without necessarily wishing to reply.—Ed.]

Protestantism, Pacifism, and Tolerance

By ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE

I have noted Mr. John Robinson's objection to The Vanguard as "disgustingly anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic," and perhaps you will be good enough to permit me to deal with his rash charges which, I take it, are made in ignorance, but, I hope, without malice.

The Vanguard is neither anti-Semitic nor anti-Catholic if to be anti-both is to be against individual Jews and Roman Catholics. The Vanguard is essentially a Protestant Christian journal as it represents Protestant Christians. It is no more anti-Catholic than is The Word.

The Word, I understand, is against the false claims of the Papacy; so is The Vanguard. The latter paper has not once sought to attack Roman Catholics, individually or collectively. But it attacks the Roman Catholic system.

Perhaps Mr. Robinson will try to bear in mind that to be anti-Catholic is to be against the "Catholics" in every possible sense. We would be anti-Catholics were we to seek to deprive Roman Catholics of the civil and religious liberty which they enjoy in this Protestant country, and which Protestants do not enjoy in most Roman Catholic countries. Were we anti-Catholic, we would urge the absolute boycott of Roman Catholics everywhere, and in every manner. Instead, we contend for the rights of the Romanist, as we do for the rights of the Protestant. In a word, we are out for equal rights for all, and special privileges to none.

As for being anti-Semitic, this is another absurd charge. To be anti-Semitic is to boycott the Jew; to deny him his civil rights; to ban him from the professions, etc. We do not stand for that sort of thing. But we are not at one with the Jews when they claim to be God's Chosen People. Our main controversy, however, on the Jews, is not with the Jews. It is with those who are not Jews, but who say with the Jew that the Jews are God's Chosen People. We contend for every civil and religious right for the Jew, as for the Romanist or Protestant.

An example: when I stood for Glasgow Town Council I battled for the Jews having the right as enjoyed by Protestants and Roman Catholics to have their children receive religious instruction in the day schools. As a matter of fact, the last time I stood for Glasgow Town Council I published literature revealing and exposing the anti-Democratic policy of the Labour Parties that stood, and still stands, for religious instruction for the Gentiles in the public schools, but none for the Jews. When a member of the Council, I spoke out, and this in the presence of Jew members, against the manner in which Jews were treated in this connection.

I am inclined to the opinion that Mr. Robinson is, or has been, a Roman Catholic, for I do not think that anyone but a Romanist would so write regarding The Vanguard.

I do not expect Mr. Robinson, or even the Editor of The Word, to agree with even half the things that appear in The Vanguard, neither being Christian. At the same time I expect the person who makes profession of tolerance, himself to be tolerant.

Mr. Robinson's claim that "true pacifism is tolerant of other persons' beliefs" is a true statement; but if Mr. Robinson is not tolerant of my beliefs, then how can he be a disciple of "true pacifism"? I am tolerant of the beliefs of all, but surely that does not mean that I am not to try to show that such beliefs are wrong and even dangerous, if I so believe them to be! Why should Mr. Robinson be at liberty to advance his views so that others may be as he, whilst I am not to be allowed to advance my views in order that others might see eye to eye with me?

I do hope your correspondent may be able to get rid of his prejudice against The Vanguard, for only by being tolerant of the views of others, as Mr. Robinson points out, can one be a true pacifist.

Might I be permitted to add that I will gladly send a specimen copy of The Vanguard with a copy of my two non-religious pamphlets "Are we fighting for Democracy?" and "Mr. Churchill on Trial" for six penny stamps to any address in Britain.

TOM MANN

In another column, in the essay on Nemesis, we mention Tom Mann.

Mann died at Grassington, Yorkshire, on March 13, aged 84. He was cremated at Lawnswood Crematorium, Leeds, on Sunday, March 17.

Mann was born at Foleshill, near Coventry, in April, 1856. When nine he began work on a farm, and at ten went into the pits. His family moved to Birmingham, where he became an engineer and attended evening classes. In 1877 he went to London.

In the London dock strike of 1889 Mann led the men with great success. The dockers' victory gave a great stimulus to trade unionism. Mann was then made president of the Dockers' Union. As a result of his campaign for the municipalisation of the London docks the London Reform Union was started. Mann was a member of the Royal Commission on Labour in 1891-4, and signed the minority report. In 1894 he became secretary of the I.L.P.

During the next 15 yearsMann spent much time in organising abroad. On returning to England he decided to introduce an "avowedly revolutionary" type of Syndicalism. The Transport Workers' Federation was formed and the Industrial Syndicalist Education League. In 1911 he assisted in the seamen's successful strike. The following year he was involved in the "Don't Shoot" leaflets prosecutions.

His conduct in connection with these proceedings, in seeking defence by Counsel, was one of the complaints we made against him at the time. We also attacked him for his Australian activity, and for his association with South Africa. The willingness for labour leaders to be defended by counsel and solicitor, when in trouble—as contrasted against their desire to dominate meetings—has been a ground of criticism taken by us since our entrance into the Socialist Movement. We object to such behaviour on principle. It is absurd for an alleged spokesman of the movement to be so great in the public meeting, or private gathering, so anxious to brush aside any possible rivals for fame or recognition; and then to stand in the dock, a cowed and silent figure, an inarticulate cadaver, whose case is urged, in broken tones, by some legal climber, who rarely enters into the spirit of the defence. Tom Mann does not stand alone in this reprehensible conduct. It is a feature of parliamentary Socialist activity. The conduct was repeated last month by John Barfield Barclay, of the Peace Pledge Union.

In 1919 Mann became general secretary of the Amalgamated Engineering Union, and he was sent to Moscow as delegate to the congress of the Red Trade Union International. This visit led to his becoming a confirmed Communist. He was made honorary chairman of the National Minority (Communist) Movement. In May, 1926, he returned to Russia to get help for the miners on strike.

It was typical of Mann that he retained his allegiance to the Moscow bureaucracy, through all the persecutions engaged in by the ruling clique. He said nothing against the crimes of the Cheka or of the Ogpu. He saw Anarchists, Anti-parliamentarian Communists, and Social Democrats cruelly persecuted by the so-called Communists in the Soviet Union and uttered no word of protest. When Trotsky fell, and the Trotskyists were persecuted and murdered, he was silent. Since Stalinism was established, he was Stalinist. The Anarchists ought to have known of this opportunist characteristic that defined Mann's career. At one time they praised him and only repudiated him after he had repudiated them.

When he was 76 he was sent to prison for two months because he would not give an undertaking about his future conduct. Comrades will remember that no charges were made against him and that his internment at Brixton Prison was an Emergency Power detention at the instance of the Ramsay MacDonald Government. It was ordered by the magistrate, but without charge made, and so was on the way to the total suspension of habeas corpus.

At the time, the newspapers featured George Lansbury's vain trek to Lossiemouth, in an endeavour to persuade Ramsay MacDonald to release Tom Mann.

On another occasion Mann was tried, with Harry Pollitt, on a charge of using seditious language in South Wales. Both were acquitted.

Mann's writings express and exhibit no deep thought. They include "From Single Tax to Syndicalism," "Russia in 1921," "A Socialist's View of Religion," "The International Socialist Movement," and his memoirs.

PEACE SPEECH FINE

John Barfield Barclay, national organiser of the Peace Pledge Union, was fined £10 at Liverpool, on Friday, March 7. Barclay's age was given as 45, and his address as Ellerton Road, London, S.W. He was accused of making statements likely to cause alarm and despondency.

A second charge of having endeavoured, by a false statement, to influence public opinion in a manner likely to be prejudicial to the defence of the realm, was withdrawn.

Barclay was alleged to have said at a P.P.U. meeting in Liverpool:—

"Anyone found reading the newspapers or listening to the wireless should be shot at dawn. . . .

"Wholesale looting is going on in the flats of London. The people are down in the Tubes. Nobody lives in the upper flats. . . . Fascism will rise in this country when the people are so cowed that they don't want to go on with the war. . . .

"How can he (the Archbishop of York) possibly say that it is right for any young man to drop bombs on Germany. . . .

"No. R.A.F. man can be able to say that he is hitting his target and not hitting people.

"Say so. They can't have you up for the truth. They can only have you up for sedition.

"The outcome of this war will mean that this country will become a poor agricultural country because the whole of the money power of this country has passed to Wall Street.

"Willkie came here determined that this should come about.

"If you want to overcome your enemies you have got to love them."

Detective Constable Ferguson, who took shorthand notes at the meeting, agreed that one theme of Barclay's speech was that all had got to be strong enough to bear what was coming to them. The audience was drawn mostly from religious people, and the speech made reference to love being the predominant motive in life.

The chairman said they had been greatly cheered by the speech.

Barclay was defended by Mr. Platt Mills. The latter cross-examined the witness:

Did you see anyone who had been caused to be despondent?—No.

Don't you think that if people know all that is going on they will stand up to it better?—Perhaps so.

The reports we have seen do not make it clear how far Barclay denied having uttered the statements accredited to him.

This case co-relates itself to the complaint made in the article entitled Nemesis, which we have written in the first person singular. Also the complaint made in the short comment on Tom Mann.

QUO VADIS?

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

There is an old legend that when St. Peter was in Rome at the close of his missionary career and the threats of implacable enemies grew ever more menacing, his nerve failed him as it had failed him on two previous occasions, and he started to make his escape from the hostile city. But as he was fleeing for his life our Lord met him and asked him "Quo Vadis?"—"Where are you going to?" and, at the reproach of those words, St. Peter turned and went back to Rome where he faced a martyr's death bravely, by crucifixion.

Although the writer is on principle opposed to war which he believes to be foolish, wrong, and quite unnecessary, this article is not written for those who, with a clear conscience and believing war to be a crusade for liberty, or at least an unavoidable evil, act in obedience to such political leaders of this country as are upright and efficient; either in the fighting Services; as members of the Secret Service trying to find out the plans and dispositions of the enemy, or as employees of the Censorship, preventing thoughtless or disloyal persons from transmitting information of value to the enemy; or as members of the police engaged in their normal duties or shouldering those extra responsibilities which it is natural and unavoidable for them to undertake in time of war.

This article is however addressed to those who, for the protection of indefensible policies or unworthy individuals, may be required to act with injustice, falsehood or meanness: to judges who may be called upon to repudiate the authority of the law that State officials may usurp it for purposes, or to an extent, not to be defended by any democracy, even a democracy at war: to prison officials who may be directed to deny to political prisoners rights to which they are by law entitled; to police agents called upon to snoop and spy upon the words, actions and correspondence of loyal citizens whose legitimate criticism of those in high places is resented and feared: to other agents sent out to trip, by falsely simulating hostility to the war, war-weary people into making criticisms of the war or of the government, criticisms which are then used as a means of securing their imprisonment; to editors of newspapers and B.B.C. staff called upon to disseminate news which they know to be false, or views which they cannot feel to be in their country's best interests—to all these I would say "Where are you going to?" "What do you think you are doing?" "Where is this going to land you—you and others also—at the finish?"

There are two answers that might be given to my questions.

Some might reply that they hate having to do these things and have no respect for those who order them, but we are at war and faced by a dangerous and powerful enemy and it would not do to weaken the country by division or by giving cause for distrust. When the war is over a day of reckoning can and should come, but for the time being the appearance of a united front must at all costs be maintained, even if the innocent have to suffer and the guilty have to be helped to a coat of whitewash which they do not really merit.

This point of view is one which I can both understand and respect but for all that the arguments are not sound arguments. The graver the crisis the more urgent is the need that at the head of affairs we should have men of ability and integrity and such men only; and conversely the greater is the danger if the incompetent or unprincipled are allowed to continue to wield an authority they do not deserve. Let the enemy scoff if he will and the foolishly confiding experience unpleasant surprises; the purge is none the less necessary to safety and to strength.

Others may reply, "Well, we don't exactly like doing this, but if we were to refuse we should lose our jobs." No one who, like myself, has never had to face the sufferings and anxieties of unemployment has a right to condemn too readily those who hesitate to take the risk of losing their jobs and if he decides to offer criticism he should do it in a spirit of real humility. Yet in that spirit I do suggest that there are occasions, of which the present is one, on which a man should take that risk and suffer that martyrdom sooner than act as an instrument of tyranny and falsehood and a protector of the foolish and the guilty at the expense of the wise and the innocent. Such conduct can only help to prolong needlessly the slaughter of war if by wise diplomacy and a plain statement of peace aims a just peace can now be concluded: and if a just peace be not yet attainable, it must increase the risk of defeat, preserving an outward appearance of solidarity while the inward canker of tyranny and inefficiency makes final collapse more certain and more devastating.

Prudent men, even in their own interests, also do well to look to the future. If they choose to be the tools of tyranny and inefficiency what will be their fate when their masters fall—as fall they must? Some may hope that their connection will be overlooked or forgotten in the social upheaval following the war. It may be; or it may not. But even if they succeed in hiding their ill deeds from men they will not hide them from God and what they sow that will they most certainly reap.

Many, I have no doubt, do not believe in God, and if this be so there is another way in which the question can be presented. No man can get away from himself. Tighter than Sinbad the Sailor's Old Man of the Sea will his past meanness cling round his neck. More inexorable than his own shadow will it follow him. Sinbad got rid of his human burden by making him drunk, but no dope will rid you of the company of your unworthy self. Only by refusing to be the accomplice of evil can you throw it off, and the longer you delay the harder the task will prove and the mo re bitter, in after years, will be the burden of memory.

THE DUKE EXPLAINS

[The Star, London, published the following letter from the Duke of Bedford in its columns for March 1. The Duke replied to points raised by readers of the Star, who wrote after he had published the letter reproduced in the February Word. Our London contemporary does not identify itself with the Duke's opinion.—Ed.]

To the Editor of The Star.

In reply to Mr. Webber, the Duke of Bedford to whom he refers was not one of my ancestors.

Even if he had been, however, I do not feel that what my ancestors did in the remote past, when most persons who had the power to do so indulged in somewhat predatory behaviour, should in any way affect the decisions which I make with regard to the sensible and right use of my income.

In reply to Mr. Lucas, I would point out that anyone who exercises his power of choice to give money to one object rather than to another, helps or handicaps the object in question according to the amount of the financial help he gives, transfers, or withholds.

The source from which he obtains his money has no bearing whatever on the amount of influence which he exercises, to promote what is, in his opinion, a desirable object, or to weaken that which he considers undeserving.

One cannot, however, enforce views by granting or withholding financial support; one can only assist, or fail to render assistance to, those who entertain them.

I consider that the Fascist and Nazi regimes have both good and bad features. The bad features are, of course, unnecessary interference with the liberty of the individual; undue exaltation of the State at the expense of the individual; the persecution of minorities on political, religious or racial grounds; and a tendency towards militarism.

I do not get as excited as the majority of my fellow countrymen over the evil features in the Nazi and Fascist regimes, not because I do not deplore them as much as anyone, but because I realise that, human nature being what it is, they are in every country the usual result of periods of great hardship and suffering, especially when these are accompanied by fear induced by economic warfare or hostile military alliances.

In regard to Spain, I was never able to get enough reliable information to form any decided judgment on the war.

In reply to Mr. Heysham, if my fellow countrymen decided to deport me to India on account of my pacifist convictions, giving me a letter of recommendation to Mr. Gandhi, I might, when having a glass of goat's milk in the company of the Indian sage, remark that, everything considered, I was perhaps fortunate in having been assisted, like Lord Halifax, to get out while the going was still good!

SOCIALISM

What the United Socialist Movement Seeks to Establish

The following statement of aims and purposes will be accepted by all who call themselves Socialists. It is a declaration of what the members of the United Socialist Movement stand for.

Knowing that social, political, and economic equality is necessary to the development of human personality, the Socialist wants to remove class distinctions of all kinds.

There can be no "upper and lower classes," no rich and poor, under Socialism. Socialism implies a classless Society where none have privileges and where ALL have equal status, equal rights and equal opportunities.

The Socialist maintains that Labour is honourable service to the community and must cease from being bought or sold or exploited.

In the common interest the Socialist seeks to establish the social ownership and control of natural resources, substituting for their exploitation for private gain the organisation of their use as a public service to satisfy human needs.

By the social control and the workshop planning and administration, the practical democratic industrial organisation of wealth production and distribution, the Socialist seeks to make an end of present-day suffering from poverty. He would remove insecurity in all its forms from every home. He seeks to increase the actual personal, or "consumptive" property of every human being.

The Socialist aims to enlarge human freedom. He repudiates every form of coercion and dictated rule. Socialism is democracy and has freedom for its aim and liberty its working political method. The Socialist desires to effect a revolutionary change in society by the authority of a consenting and informed public opinion. Socialism objects to hereditary and to self-selected rulers alike.

Socialism is Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity in actual practice as the established order of life in a civilised community.

The United Socialist Movement is opposed to all capitalist war and militarism. It is opposed to those who would turn the class struggle within society, and within every nation, into a national struggle between nations. The United Socialist Movement is at once a revolutionary and an anti-militarist organisation. Its history dates back to 1906, and it represents a direct record of struggle for the ideals of human well-being.

If you accept this programme, join the United Socialist Movement. Found a group in your district. Become a member at large. If you live in Glasgow, attend our meetings and enable us to demonstrate our influence. Write ETHEL MACDONALD, SECRETARY, U.S.M., BAKUNIN HALL, 29 CASTLE STREET, GLASGOW, C.4. All comrades wishing to become members at large should send 1/- annual subscriptions.

BAKUNIN HALL.

Bakunin Hall, the headquarters of the United Socialist Movement, has to be vacated in May. The factor has refused to renew the missive. We are anxious to obtain a suitable, good-size hall in the centre of the city. Any comrade who knows of such a hall should communicate with the Secretary. The objection is to the Anti-Militarist and Pacifist Associations of the organisation, not to ts general Socialist propaganda.

Bakunin Hall is over £50 in debt. We would like to clear that debt before removing to our new headquarters. These will be announced next month.

NEMESIS: THE MARCH OF POWER

FROM 1909 TRIAL TO 18B

When I turned from Theism to Atheism in 1904, I made a study of the "life" of Richard Carlile. I read eagerly his trials and those of his brave shopmen and shopwomen. My study of his struggle was not second-hand but first-hand. From reading his Republican, Lion, Prompter, etc., and his Address to Men of Science, I passed to a close examination of the literature of the time. I bought, by a process of dispensing with dinner, all manner of pamphlets covering the period from 1780 to 1848. Some of the literature, under the stress of poverty, later I was compelled to sell, not merely to publish other literature, but to obtain food after various releases from prison, and some cold reception. But I had mastered the works and there are certain libraries in which other copies of the originals may be consulted. Some I have by me still.

There is the "Genuine Verbatim Edition" of The Speech of Lord Brougham on the Second Reading of the English Reform Bill, with Earl Grey's Reply to the Opposition, and a list of the majority and minority. There is a "Corrected Verbatim Edition" of The Speech of Earl Grey, delivered in the House of Lords, October 3, 1831. There is a House of Commons (1830) Speech of C. Poulett Thomson, M.P., on the incidence of taxation. A host of papers and pamphlets on the Corrupt State of the Church of England. And so on. My study of this literature, covering the Republican to the Chartist period, roused an interest in jurisprudence and developed a tendency towards Anti-Parliamentarism, largely because I believed in the constitutional rights of man. I believed in the first principles of human liberty. My approach towards the study of the problem was based on the attitude and views of Richard Carlile, himself a disciple of Thomas Paine: a disciple and something more. I liked the something more about Richard Carlile.

This explains how I came to write the story of Richard Carlile in the columns of Saladin's Agnostic Journal. Saladin did not possess the deep regard for the memory of Carlile that I had developed. That regard made the Secularist and Rationalist failure to appreciate Carlile's work and worth, their neglect of him as a political thinker and libertarian, offensive to my mind. This explained my objection to both the National Secular Society and the Rationalist Press Association attitude. For organisations based on the traditions of Freethought, their present practical concept of the importance of civil liberty would be humorous if it were not so tragically farcical. But it is in line with their attitude towards Richard Carlile at the time that I joined the Freethought ranks, even though I believe they were unconscious of the trend of their thought. Chapman Cohen at that time could never conceive of himself becoming a militarist. Did not stupid Jewish Anarchists in Victoria Park mistake him for a Free Socialist? Lord Snell, present leader of the House of Lords, in these days of crisis and critical war-time attacks on civil liberty, will find it hard to recall those days when, as Harry Snell, he sponsored us before the Camberwell Ethical Society. The Harry Snell of those days would not have visioned himself becoming the Lord Snell of to-day. I did not anticipate such strange progress either. But I did sense the trend of his propaganda. It wanted the virility of real Freethought. It lacked the worth of the Carlile tradition. It was the shadow of Secularism and Ethicism; it was parlour liberalism; but it was not Freethought. Cohen's Secularism had a little more body than Snell's Rationalism, but they were both wanting badly.

PARLIAMENTARISM OPPOSED DEMOCRACY.

I carried the Carlile tradition, the belief in the Rights of Man, with me into the Social Democratic Movement. I left the Radical Democratic League because it was not Radical, and because I felt that its liberalism would turn to despotism. Carlile's spirit of thoroughness inspired me to repudiate the parliamentary Socialists in 1906, in terms, as my Justice letter showed, that tended to Anti-Parliamentarism. I saw parliamentarism as a departure, not only from Socialism, but from Radicalism and the constitutional struggle for the rights of man. It was the historic negation of the very suffrage agitation and the earlier Republicanism of which it seemed to be a conclusion. Parliamentarism is not the progressive consequence of agitation Richard Carlile engaged in from 1819 to 1832, nor yet is it the triumph of those who agitated for ballot boxes and universal suffrage. It was reaction joining issue on the parliamentary field with the forces of progress in order to establish reaction. It is the negation of individual society for military society, with parliamentarism as the bridge. That bridge has never been in the possession of the progressive forces in society. Dull-witted Socialist parliamentarians have never wished to face that fact. To-day, at the close of the era of pseudo-Socialist parliamentarism, the Richard Carlile tradition is more important than ever.

Socialist Parliamentarism, as we know it, was born of international proletarian disaster. After the Commune of Paris, the Socialists of Europe abandoned international principles and policy, and passed under capitalist national yokes, playing at impossible reformism, and upholding militarism and war. There were Socialist parliamentarians in Europe in 1848 but they flourished only for a while and liquidated themselves in reaction. It has never been difficult for Socialist parliamentarians to become reactionary. The position of the working class movement in the world is an organisational monument to the reactionary nature of the parliamentary Socialist movement. Not merely have the Socialists miscalled sacrificed the workers' lives to capitalism, but they massacred the workers' hopes.

1909 TRIAL AND AFTERMATH.

I saw that this would be so when I stood in the dock at the Central Criminal Court, London, in 1909, charged with Indian sedition. The legal and ordinary press reports of that trial are reproduced in The Word for September, 1940. Since 1909 we have witnessed the 1912 arrests of Tom Mann and Crowsley; the monstrous sentences passed at that time on Guy Bowman and the Buck Brothers; the 1915 debate in the House of Commons on the Munitions of War Bill, extending state power over the workers by Royal Proclamation; the 1924 operation by Ramsay MacDonald of the Emergency Powers Act by Royal Proclamation; all leading up to the later militarist and parliamentary reaction throughout Europe, and the War Emergency measures of to-day; a steady evolution of reaction.

Even though reactionaries have suffered under the measures of to-day, a reward for having maintained the milder reaction of yesterday when their liberty was not at stake immediately, I am not indicting them. They lived in a conventional world and did not know better. In my view what has happened since 1909 has been a necessary consequence of the disgraceful cowardice exhibited by the so-called revolutionary and Socialist movement at that time. Its indifference granted the Executive a licence that time has extended. Socialists had no right to be indifferent to the principles of civil liberty, for they are the guardians of human rights, and they ought to be the pioneers of commonweal for all mankind.

In 1909, a man named Horsley, a small jobbing printer, compromised the right of the free press with an apology, and suffered four months in the first division. He typified capitalism in its poorer sense. The man had types and a small press. He knew how to set and he had to live. And so he printed handbills and small papers for a living. The history of the press, the idealistic importance of the machinery of the press, its worth as an agency in the emancipation of his neighbour and his neighbour's and his own children, never disturbed him. What a blasphemy! To have a press and to want a soul! To have a press and to own a mind consumed by fear! Yet how sadly typical! And so Horsley betrayed his birthright as a man in the hope that he might maintain his mess of pottage as a printer. Greatness was thrust upon him in vain.

I saw the menace of Horsley's apology for printing the Indian Sociologist, a paper that I had not seen up to that time. So I got into touch with its owner and editor and published the next issue in defiance of the Government and without agreeing with its editor. I repeated Horsley's offence and took twelve months in the first division. But I disturbed the complacent assurance of the Attorney-General and of the London Times. Both had made the undemocratic boast that no one would print the paper in face of Horsley's apology and sentence. They were wrong. I was jealous of English radical tradition—I knew nothing about Scotland at that time and was not interested in her distinct National traditions—and I was not prepared to tamely surrender the rights of the people to the whims and power of the Executive. I say whims because the Executive, in a panic, often suppressed papers and people without the least sober reflection. Krishnavarma's Indian Sociologist was a gesture and protest rather than an effective piece of propaganda. He did not inspire action, but commented on the action after it had been accomplished. My own action proceeded from suppression, as an answer, and contained no original incitement. It was protective of public right and not assertive of revolutionary struggle. That I had associated with Anarchists, then the subject of libellous attack, did not affect the matter. Here the Government and its henchmen resorted to clamour. I was portrayed with horror as an Atheist and an Anarchist. Yet an Atheist was sitting in the Government that prosecuted me and there were Atheists sitting among its supporters in the House of Lords. To-day, we have an Atheist leader of the House oof Lords. Anarchism but defines intense individual faith in conscience and liberty and Tolstoy, a mystic and Anarchist, rightly or wrongly, has been the subject of tribue by liberal writers throughout the world. The combination of Atheist and Anarchist gives a horrible sound, but the separation is reputable. To create such a false suggestion by the mere use of sound is trickery. But such trickery, and not regard for jurisprudence, is the way of Government.

Justice, "the organ of social democracy," said that my attitude "was an ebullition of foolish vanity." The editor forgot all about the essays I had contributed freely to its columns, my parliamentary correspondence, my unceasing propaganda in Islington which, to my discredit, built up the movement that afterwards returned W. S. Cluse to the House of Commons. Freedom, the "journal of Anarchist Communism" (!), stated that my prosecution was a personal matter between the Government and myself! Here is the exact phrase reproduced from the columns of Freedom for October, 1909:—

> "The position taken up by Aldred was a purely personal attitude as to the action of the Government against 'THE INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST.'"

I do not write with personal bitterness, but with grim reflections at the consequences of this woeful lack of understanding. The Government was given a good inch, and that inch has been stretched down the years into something more than the proverbial yard. I do not believe that the war-time repressions of 1914-1918, or the Emergency Powers of 1924 and 1926, arose from the conditions of crisis only. I do not believe that the suspension of habeas corpus is an incident of the present war-time necessity. I believe that the Executive tendency to repression is developed by the indifference of the democracy to the worth and reality, the urgent necessity of freedom of speech, word, and living. I believe that the War Emergency Powers are due as much to the indifference of the Socialist and Anarchist Movement to my stand in 1909, as to any sense of the need for protection against alleged Fascist or Nazi plotting. I believe that not the least sympathy with Hitler or Mussolini exists in this country outside the House of Commons, where ex-admirers occupy Tory benches, or in the clubs where retired colonels doze away the winter of their discontent.

When I was sentenced in 1909 for believing what my reading of Thomas Paine, and my study of Richard Carlile had taught me, the need for untrammelled freedom of the Press, only one pen in Britain defended me. That pen was anonymous and only expressed itself because some other anonymous pen had joined in the censure. Here is the lone voice of protest, culled from the correspondence columns of Reynolds' Newspaper, September 12, 1909 :—

GUY ALDRED.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "Ishmael," says "we all sow our wild oats," but judging from his erroneous remarks on Guy Aldred, one must conclude that "Ishmael" has nothing to sow but chaff. Allow me to correct his false statements. Aldred is not a politician; he is not a tool of an Indian agitator; he is not vain; neither is he in need of a Judge's advice nor an "Ishmael's" sympathy. He is a fluent and logical speaker, a good writer, and an intelligent exponent of philosophic Anarchism; and as for friends, he is a participator in that universal Spirit which is the torchbearer of progress and the most potent factor in Society.

B. P.

I never discovered the identity of "B. P."

WIDENED POWERS OF PROSECUTION.

In 1909 the Government founded its prosecution on a definition of sedition that belonged to 1818, and a Newspaper Act that belonged to 1871. In 1912 it produced an Act that belonged to 1797, and secured a conviction of hard labour where the judiciary ought to have passed a sentence of the first division only. Instead of being met with defiance, it was treated to a defence of compromise and complaisance.

Every political offender should insist upon defending himself instead of seeking the aid of counsel. Guy Bowman, in 1912, employed counsel—with what results? There was no defiant plea of justification, no impeachment of governing-class terrorism, and with two counsels engaged for the defence, the Government secured an apology and a total sentence of one year and nine months' hard labour, as against the twelve months in the first division and no apoloogy in my case.

Then we had Tom Mann, the orator of Labour, charged, and he employed counsel also. What a mistake! In addition, after nearly a week's imprisonment, he promised not to repeat his "incitements" pending his trial, in order to secure his release on bail. There is something unsavoury and offensive about such a promise.

Commenting on Mann's attitude in the Herald of Revolt, for April, 1912, I recalled a dialogue that took place between Richard Carlile and Mr. Justice Bailey, at the Guildhall, on Tuesday, June 15th, 1819. It was as follows :—

Mr. Justice Bailey: I recollect the defendant being brought to my chambers for this indictment, and that a promise of forbearance was made to him, provided he would give an undertaking to discontinue the sale, and that the defendant refused to give an undertaking to that effect.

Richard Carlile: I conceived, my lord, that the publication could not be considered an offence, until a Jury had decided to do so.

Mr. Justice Best: You may be wrong there.

Leigh Hunt's vindication of Carlile's attitude in this matter ought to have been studied by the Socialist movement at this time. It would have yielded a better dividend to the lovers of intellectual liberty than too close a perusal of the Electors' Handbook. It would have made interesting reading for Tom Mann. To his complaisance, unfortunately, we had to add the cowardice of the printers, who, so far from being ordinary printers, were well-known in Walthamstow as Social Democrats.

If only the Socialist movement had sacrificed its parliamentary ambitions to engage in more persistent "ebullitions of foolish vanity"; if it had possessed a little more understanding of the import of those private matters between Governments and the citizen upholders of the flag of liberty; if it had realised that such defiance epitomised the struggle between the new order that must come and the old order that must go; there might have been no 1914 world war, no Versailles Treaty, and no aftermath. The world might have turned to Anti-Militarism and to Socialism instead of progressing, through war and parliamentarism, towards war and Fascism, and a growing world chaos of despair. At least there would have been some integrity alive, making for peace and concord, justice and liberty, instead of a careerist movement that has careered the working class faith and organisation into a sneering oblivion.

If only the aroused Socialist movement had seen the force of an insistence on the free Press in 1909, if only it had understood the necessity, if only it had realised that the suppression of the Indian Nationalist Press meant the suppression of the English Proletarian Press, then 1912 prosecutions might never have taken place. The monstrous convictions of Bowman and the Bucks for issuing Anti-Militarist leaflets placed a premium upon the militarist ideal of thoughtless murder and senseless obedience. If patriotism has any meaning, it should show itself in a devotion of soul that is not opposed to reason, that is enriched by thought, and does not insist on passive obedience at so much a day. Even soldiers have a right to think if democracy is right. The class laws that murdered Ireland's patriotic genius, Robert Emmet, are laws that consecrate no real principle of patriotism. A soldier that obeys but does not think is a menace to society and the tool of despotism. Capitalism is obliged, by its economic exigencies, to uphold, and to insist on the menace to progress of the soldier who does not think That is how Capitalism develops Fascism.

In the House of Commons, Rufus Isaacs, later to become the Marquess of Reading, assumed "full responsibility" for the prosecutions and exonerated the Cabinet from all blame. But why? If the prosecutions were just and constitutional, if they were essential to the well-being of society, why should the Cabinet have needed to be exonerated? Surely "responsibility Rufus" must have felt that there was something wrong. He was afflicted with a sense of uneasiness. We wonder why?

FORREST FULTON.

The conduct of Sir Forrest Fulton, the Recorder, in the Bowman-Buck case reminded me of the reference that I made in the Indian Sociologist for August, 1909, to the clamorous reactionaries and time-servers whose anti-social instincts are the levers that set in motion the ponderous anti-constitutional machinery of political persecution :—

"But we have also laid stress upon the misrepresentations, prejudices, passions, and ignorance of those whose boast is law and order, whose rule is chaos, and whose temperamental lack of anything like a sense of judicial calm is the basis of their qualification to discriminate between the niceties of seditious libel and the privileges of individual liberty as understood in law."

This statement was subsequently justified by the attitude adopted by Sir Forrest Fulton, the Recorder, who, in charging the Grand Jury to return a true bill against me for sedition, stated that I published "pestilential literature." The Recorder had no right to urge such a charge. His duty, like that of the magistrate, is either to direct the throwing out of the case against a defendant, or else to urge that there is a case to go to the properly constituted judge and jury. Yet it is left to men of his temperament to sit in judgment upon persons charged with seditious libel. At that time, I have no doubt, many of the men now interned, if they read reports of the trial, accepted the diction of the Recorder without question. To-day they are condemned, without trial, but on the same dangerous grounds, which should convince them that the language of power is clamour and not jurisprudence. Had they been wiser in 1909, they might not have been victimised thirty years later. But they accepted the dictates of power and considered such dictates law.

In the 1912 Bowman-Buck case Forrest Fulton distinguished himself by delivering a violent and ignorant attack upon Syndicalism in his charge to the Grand Jury, although the defendants were not charged with Syndicalism, but only with a specific offence, viz., incitement to mutiny, which is a question of fact and not of theory.

THE MIRACLE

Unity, the conscientious objectors' organ, Chicago, Ill., for December 16, 1940, published an editorial, headed "The Miracle of England." We make the following excerpt :—

"It is a miracle. And not merely in the field of national defence on the field of battle! We are thinking at this moment rather of the miracle of a democracy still functioning freely under the pressure of a war to the death. Take the matter of non-registrants under the military conscription law! One would think that it would be England that would be excited and severe in the treatment of men who not only refuse to fight, but refuse even to recognise and obey a law to raise an army, whereas America, not at war, and in no danger, would be comparatively mild and indifferent. But it is just the other way around! Our non-registrants under the draft law we are branding as felons, with forfeiture of all citizenship rights, under prison sentences of a year and a day or a year and six months. . . .

Then there is the matter of printing! Our heart still skips a beat as we read the papers which come to us from England—an opposition labour paper, an anarchist journal, several pacifist magazines. These papers vary in content and tone. . . . But they all oppose the war and plead for peace—and the government does not interfere! In these papers we read announcements of anti-war meetings and pacifist conferences, which are held apparently as freely as in pre-war days. . . .

"We count all this a miracle—and to the everlasting glory of England. Would we Americans do the same? Not if our last war experience is any criterion. And England herself, it must regretfully be noted, does not always do the same outside the British Isles. In India, for example, where the people live under an iron rule of repression and cruelty! If democracy works so bravely at home, why not there also?"

THE GREAT RED MYTH

SOME COMMUNIST DELUSIONS ABOUT THE U.S.S.R.

BY H. W. HENDERSON

The average Communist prides himself on being a scientific man. Not for him the myths and superstitions of the faithful.

Yet a greater mythology has been built around the Communist Mecca—Soviet Russia—than that associated with any of the world's religious faiths.

The Soviet Union—every Communist informs us—has solved the unemployment problem and is the only country to have done so. Now what is the actual truth about this economic miracle? In November 1930 the Soviet Government closed all Labour Exchanges, and ordered the unemployed to be put to productive labour wherever their services could be utilised, no time being wasted on bargaining over rates of pay. They then proclaimed to the world that the unemployment problem had been "solved" and Communists have gone on repeating it ever since.

Britain could solve her unemployment problem in a similar manner at any time. Compel the unemployed to work for a wage no larger than their unemployment benefit and the trick is done. But one can imagine the howl the Communists would let out about "capitalist tyranny" if that occurred in Britain!

Another Communist myth was beautifully summarised in the Soviet press recently on the 17th anniversary of Lenin's death. Warnings were uttered in the customary manner about the dangers of the "land of Socialism surrounded by capitalist enemies."

Will it be believed that in the "Socialist" Soviet Union (as distinct from the "capitalist plutocracies") it is possible for one worker to earn as much as thirty times the wages of another—in some cases a hundred times?

"The real earnings of the Stakanovists often exceed by twenty or thirty times the earnings of the lower category of workers. And as for specially fortunate specialists their salaries would in many cases pay for the work of eighty or a hundred unskilled labourers. In scope of inequality in the payment of labour the Soviet Union has not only caught up to, but far surpasses, the capitalist countries."

—Leon Trotsky in "The Revolution Betrayed."

Nor is this all. The fortunate specialist, after earning a hundred times the wages of his fellow-worker, can invest his savings in Government bonds at seven per cent. or lend them to the savings bank at eight per cent.—free of both inheritance and income tax. (Investors in "capitalist" countries would be glad to obtain half of that return on a similar investment).

The average Communist imagines that the Revolution freed the workers from the tyranny of the ruling class and is never tired of comparing the "equality" of the Soviet system with the extremes of wealth and poverty prevailing under "capitalism." A picture more at variance with the truth could not well be imagined. Two hundred thousand individuals—party leaders and the higher functionaries—dominate the Russian people. Below these, and associated with them, is another and a larger group which Trotsky estimates at ten million (out of a population of about one hundred and eighty million persons). And into the lap of these favoured categories flows a tribute surpassing the profit of any "capitalist" class in any "capitalist" country.

"He (Stalin) has four palatial residences in the South of Russia along the shores of the Black Sea, and several comfortable summer palaces in the suburbs of Moscow. All these homes are equipped with everything from billiard rooms to motion-picture halls. . . . Stalin's estates employ hundreds of servants and guards the year round, and are always ready for his visits. The expenditures for all this are never charged to Stalin himself, but are covered by the state budget as disbursements for road improvement, public welfare, etc."

—"Readers' Digest," May, 1940.

It is the testimony of disillusioned Communists who have visited the Soviet Union and sampled its living conditions that the favoured Party members live in luxury—with motor-cars, servants and magnificent villas of their own—while the mass of the inhabitants live in squalid poverty. Here are a number of the facts gathered by outsiders who have visited the Soviet Union during the past few years for the purpose of investigating conditions for themselves:—

Russian Wages—Sir Walter Citrine's estimate ("I search for Truth in Russia"), 12/6 per week.

E. L. Hubbard's estimate ("Soviet Money and Finance") 9/- per week. "The average Russian can buy with his week's wages about as much food as the Londoner can buy with nine shillings."

W. H. Chamberlin's estimate ("A False Utopia"). "The standard of the majority of the Russian workers is that of the unemployed, rather than of the employed in Great Britain and the United States."

Andrew Smith ("I was a Soviet Worker"). "Standard of Russian workers equivalent of standard of unemployed in large capitalist countries."

Eugene Lyons ("Assignment in Utopia"). "Poverty everywhere."

The names of all these men are internationally known. The majority of them lived for years in Russia and write from personal experience. Two of them went to Russia as enthusiastic Communists.

How does this exceptionally low standard of living compare with Tsarist times?

Listen to the testimony of another disillusioned Communist, Victor Serge, a life-long fighter for the Party:—

"Did they live better before the revolution? People of forty are unanimous in affirming it, in all three respects of food, clothing and lodgings. Statistics confirm it. A worker of the textile industry, who in 1912-1914, received 300 kilograms of bread per month, a miner who received 600, today get an average of 150 (the equivalent of 150 roubles."

—"Twenty Years After."

"Under the Tsar," complained Aleksandra, washerwoman to the American Communist, Andrew Smith, "I made 15 kopeks a day, but I could buy more with 15 kopeks than I can buy with the 75 rouble I get in the factory." ("I was a Soviet Worker.")

W. H. Chamberlin (for twelve years representative in Russia of the "Christian Science Monitor") says:—

"Before the war (1914-1918) the monthly wage of the Russian manual worker was nominally twelve and a half or fifteen dollars, but as the cost of living in pre-war Russia was very low, the real wage of the Russian worker was probably equal to eighteen or twenty dollars a month." To-day "The purchasing power of the monthly average wage of the Soviet worker or employee works out at twelve American dollars."

"A False Utopia."

When we consider that, in addition to their reduced standard of living, the people of Russia (the "freest democracy in the world"!) have neither a free press nor freedom of election; are liable to arrest and execution for theft (children from the age of twelve years upwards are included, under the infamous law of April 1935); are sentenced to imprisonment for mistakes made in the course of their employment (Russia is the only country in the world with cells attached to the factories); and may be subjected to ill-considered projects like "collectivisation of the farms" (in the course of which, between 1932 and 1933 upwards of 4,000,000 persons perished of starvation) . . . when we consider all these facts, attested on incontrovertible evidence, often by Communists themselves, is it not astonishing that, even to-day, there are, in this country, innocent and gullible persons continually succumbing to the well-paid propagandists of the Great Red Myth?

Socialism Before the Tribunal

COUNCILLOR WEST'S CASE

Last month we published an account of the Tribunal hearing at Edinburgh in the case of Councillor West, of Ferry Den, Montrose.

Comrade West's statement was published in full in The Montrose Review, for February 7 last. It read as follows:—

"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, on Saturday, 9th November, 1940, I registered under the Military Training Act, 1939, as a conscientious objector seeking unconditional exemption.

"I did so on moral and Socialist grounds. My studies taught me that war was wrong. I feel that everyone thinks war is wrong. Unfortunately, the great majority never try to right that wrong. I am convinced that war can only be ended by a change in the system of society.

"Morally, war is wrong. These millions now in uniform, striving to kill each other, were never born on this earth to die at the behest of people who want to hang on to large parts of that earth for a selfish interest.

"With these points in mind I registered as a conscientious objector. On that 9th day of November I had three courses from which to decide:—(1) Refrain from registering. I dismissed this course. I have never run away from anything yet. I have represented the wokers before Courts of Referees, Hardship Committees, etc. In fact, in my position as a responsible Trade Union leader in the County of Angus, I sit on various committees of the Ministry of Labour. (2) I could have registered in the usual way and avoided Military Service meantime. I am in a reserved occupation. (3) I registered as a conscientious objector because I had no intention of hiding under a reserved occupation. I wanted to be honest about it.

"Since 1924 I have taken an active part in various anti-war organisations. In 1924 I joined the I.L.P.; in 1926 I became a member of the Adult School Movement—a subsidiary to the Society of Friends; in 1928 I joined the No More War Movement. Ever since I took to public speaking in 1926 I have made many speeches denouncing war. I need not say more. I think that should suffice to prove that I have opposed war.

"When war broke out I felt that the testing time had arrived. My advocacy against war was propaganda in time of peace. Now I had to live up to what I had preached. I couldn't turn hypocrite.

"I firmly believe that the basic cause of war is greed which is inherent in the economic order we call capitalism. Wars are fought for economic gain and not for any of the slogans used by the warring imperialisms.

"I believe that the world will not be finally rid of war and of all the misery and torment that war entails until Capitalism is replaced by a new economic order. Capitalism, having solved the problem of production, fails to solve the problem of distribution. The rival capitalist imperialists in the world seek to monopolise land, gold, and raw materials. In their rush for the necessities of the world these rival imperialisms clash and war is the result.

"But for this greed of land, gold, and raw materials, the world could enjoy the abundance which the earth produces. To eliminate this greed we must consent to share instead of monopolising, to co-operate rather than compete, to assist others instead of exploiting. War merely prevents us from adopting these new methods and assists the vicious old system of greed to continue.

"I can only credit Capitalism with solving the problem of production. The distribution problem has created this world crisis. The very fact that Capitalism has created this crisis proves its inability to be an economic system.

"The Capitalist Class calls on the workers of this country to fight for freedom and democracy. I look over the past 20 years to examine the freedom and democracy my class have enjoyed. I can see the sufferings of 1921 when the unemployment figure reached a problem as a result of the Versailles Treaty. The General Strike of 1926 and the resultant Trades Dispute Act. The means-test on the unemployed of 1932. The Sedition Act of 1933. All through these years we find means-tests for the workers and doles and subsidies for the rich. In 1939 our Capitalist Government conscripts flesh and blood. The workers are called upon to defend rent, interest and profit. The workers are called upon to protect their liberty and their means tests, their slums, their malnutrition. If Capitalism is sincere; if Capitalism believes in freedom and democracy, let it do the honest thing and conscript wealth.

"This system of society calls on me to defend it. Since 1924 I have opposed it. I continue to oppose. I have long since dedicated my life in the interests of my fellow-men. Before the machinery of Capitalism I have defended my fellows. I hate suffering. The workers in Germany, in Italy, and the rest of the world are like me—flesh and blood. National barriers have been created by a system which divides us. Over these barriers I rise. At the other side mothers, children, and the infirm exist. I bear no hatred to them. Was it not Buddha who said: "Never in this world does hatred cease by hatred—hatred ceases by love." I want them to enjoy peace. Peace can only be the lot of the common people on this earth when we end the system of society which provides poverty and war.

"You, gentlemen, have been appointed to discuss and decide on my sincerity. Irrespective of your decision a higher Tribunal has already made its decision."

The Montrose Review summarised the questioning thus:—

"Asked how far he believed in the Russian regime, Mr. West said that he agreed with a certain amount of the internal policy because it had been developed on the co-operative system, but unfortunately he could not agree with their foreign policy as far as Finland and their attitude to Fascism was concerned.

"Asked if he wanted this country invaded, Mr. West replied in the negative. He wanted peace, and to achieve that they should approach the German people by broadcasting to the world that they had something better to put in the place of Fascism. He referred to the recent peace debate in the House of Commons and said he agreed with the views of the I.L.P. members.

"In answer to further questions the applicant said he was not religious and was not a member of a Church. He believed, however, in Christian ethics."

Comrade West complains of this report:—

"You will notice that the questions are sparely reported.

"Perhaps the most important question was 'Do you wish to see this country invaded?' No—I believe a negotiated peace on the lines expressed by the I.L.P. members in Parliament is better than the possibility of invasion.

"I am appealing against the decision. I had the vote of one member. So the decision was not unanimous.

"Perhaps I should state that Tom Barron, the T.U. representative on the Appellate Tribunal, was Labour Candidate in Montrose Burghs in October, 1924. Tom did much to convince me to Socialism as it was in that year I was converted."

"Armageddon Incorporated"

Under this title, the Strickland Press is circulating a pamphlet giving the true story of the Jehovah Witnesses. The pamphlet is priced 3d., postage being 1d. extra. Comrades are invited to secure a copy of this record of fact.

The Empire News for October 27, 1940, published a statement by Judge Rutherford which adds to our knowledge of this strange Fundamentalist sect.

Judge Rutherford defended Pastor Russell in a lawsuit at Pittsburg in 1907. After Russell's death in 1916, two members of the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, Messrs. Fisher and Woodworth published a book, called The Finished Mystery. It consisted largely of a collection of essays written by Pastor Russell during his life. This book was used against Judge Rutherford when he was prosecuted during the Great War.

An indictment was procured and a trial held, in which a judge sentenced each of the defendants, including Rutherford, to 80 years in prison and refused to grant bond on appeal.

Immediately application was made to the United States Court of Appeals for bail bond and was heard before Judge T. Manton, who refused to grant bail. Manton, who was sitting on the United States Bench at that time, is now serving a term in the penitentiary upon conviction for defrauding the United States Government and selling justice.

Application was then made to the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of habeas corpus, which court ordered the Court of Appeal to grant bail pending appeal. Appeal was taken to the higher court, 125 errors appearing in the record.

The Appellate Court reversed the judgment, and the Government voluntarily dismissed the case.

Arthur Leonard Green, 35, of Sirdar Road, Wood Green, told the London Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal at Fulham on March 6, that he was one of Jehovah's Witnesses and spent his day preaching, which was "far more important than A.R.P. work."

Judge Hargreaves, chairman, said: "There is no reason why you should not do something useful in life even if you are preaching the Gospel. One would imagine from what you say that you lead as useless a life as there could be."

Exemption was refused.

The following day, before the Appellate Tribunal for the North of England division, at Lancaster, Frank Swindells (33), a traveller in druggists' sundries, of Dale Avenue, Kendal, appealed unsuccessfully against being removed from the conscientious objectors' register. He based his objection to military service on the Bible. As a Jehovah's Witness he felt it impossible to take part in a non-combatant corps..

Answering Sir Miles Mitchell, the witness said he was not a pacifist.

Sir Miles: Under what conditions would you fight?

Appellant: If my house was attacked I would look upon it as right to defend it.

Would it be competent for you to defend your next-door neighbour's home if it was attacked?—No.

Then the part of the Bible you do not agree with is "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." If a plane was flying over your house carrying bombs, would you fire a gun at it to stop it dropping them on your house?—Yes, in self-defence.

Then your belief prevents you from doing anything to save defenceless people unable to carry a gun?—I could not do it.

The only thing your faith would permit you to do would be to save yourself and let others die?—That is the only stand I could take.

Two days before, the same Tribunal had refused the appeal of another Jehovah Witness, William Marsden Collinge, a silk-worker, of Earl Street, Skerton, Lancaster. Collinge appealed against being registered for non-combatant duties by the local Tribunal.

Collinge was asked by Sir Edward Stubbs if it were a matter of indifference to him which side won, and he replied "Yes, absolutely."

The Chairman: Is it also a matter of indifference what would happen if this country was successfully invaded?—I should probably be placed in prison or concentration camp.

Collinge was represented by Mr. Ellis Houghton, of Warwick Avenue, Lancaster, who described himself as the local secretary of the International Bible Students' Association, of which Collinge had been a member since 1938.

Addressing Houghton, the Chairman stated: Your client is apparently prepared to take advantage of the benefits provided by the community, but is not prepared to do anything for it.

Houghton said that Jehovah's witnesses, to which he and Collinge belonged, were absolutely neutral. They did not persuade people to stay out of the war or go into it, but left it to the individual.

The Chairman: Several members of your community have stated that they were prepared to fight to establish a theocratic kingdom?—Houghton: That is correct.

How do you reconcile that with the keeping of the Commandment "Thou shalt not kill"?—The fight does not involve fighting with carnal weapons.

When the Chairman commented that representatives of Jehovah's witnesses had definitely stated that they were prepared to fight for a theocratic kingdom, Mr. Houghton stated that there must have been a misunderstanding, because Jehovah's witnesses never took up the sword.

The Chairman: There was no misunderstanding. Your statements are a flat contradiction of those made by others.

We live in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it.—T. H. Huxley.

THE WORLD'S REBELS

(Written in Bristol Hospital, March 1941).

Salute the world's rebels!
With knuckles bare to the bone,
Who fought embattled wrong.
They fought—and oft alone.

Their protests were not mute.
They shouted loud and cried;
Stern "Baptists" in the wilderness;
Some broke their hearts—some died.

They strove by pen and tongue,
By attic printing press,
To smite the Philistines
Who gorge on man's distress.

Down through the dusty years
We see their pennon fly,
A ribbon of revolt
A-towering to the sky.

In hostile court and lonely cell,
Mid faggots flaming pile,
Like vermin hunted down,
Or sent to far exile.

"Fanatics, fools and crazed, Madmen, unwise, insane."
Thus spoke the mindless mob
Still fast in slavery's chain.

Hail! to the deathless army,
Who tramp the trembling earth,
Who've seen the Golden City
And travailled for its birth.

The men of the human dawn,
Who breasted the hills of fate,
Endured the bloody sweat,
But kept a gallant gait.

—Henry J. Adlard.

OUR APPEAL

We almost wrote that appeal! Although the circulation is rising steadily, and although we are receiving offers of articles and poems from all sides, including a number of men and women distinguished as writers and publicists who hitherto have shown no sympathy with our anti-militarist and anti-parliamentary views, the response to our financial appeal remains ineffective. We rejoice in circulation. Yet each copy is produced at a loss, and circulation does not answer our need for funds. We need to keep up our stock of paper. We have all kinds of pamphlets in hand. We have a postal mission to sustain.

As explained away back in November 1940, on our Hyde Park Free Speech Struggle, we were short, £81 1s. 3d. On the press—the paper and pamphlet production—we were short £1590 10s. We made a total appeal for £1971 11s. 3d. This did not take into account our postal mission work. Since then we have added to losses. But we continue our work if we can overcome the deficit mentioned rapidly. The response must be made by every reader. You must feel that we are addressing you personally and respond accordingly.

Last month the balance had been reduced to £1914 4s. 4d. We have received £28 9s. 7d. This leaves a balance of £1885 14s. 9d. If comrades will raise this sum in one month we will maintain the size of the paper, and close the appeal. When the total required has been raised, we will list the names, as promised, and leave the matter. Our finance, like our propaganda, is straightforward; and we intend that there shall be no secret as to the sources of our income. This is an unsubsidised propaganda of public usefulness, inspired by affection for humanity, and horror at exploitation and war.

EVILS OF CAPITALISM

WHAT IS THE REMEDY?

The Duke of Bedford's essay Are Socialists Right? has produced a huge correspondence from our readers. Their criticisms will be published as space permits. The attack made by our comrade, Flora Collar, was from an unexpected angle and so we submitted it to the Duke of Bedford as being a direct personal challenge. It is published together with his reply.

A CHALLENGE FROM THE LOWER PAID

Dear Friend,—I gather from the two articles written by the Duke of Bedford in defence of Capitalism and Christianity that his Ideal in life, as mine, is to help to establish on the earth a true Brotherhood of Man —God's Kingdom of Love on the earth.

Now, if I am right, surely the point he dismisses so lightly, namely, "there may be a moral problem," is the most important?

Socialism and Christianity stand for Equality; Capitalism for Inequality, which surely sows the seeds of War in some individuals, and—in a larger way—between nations? So strongly did I feel this, that I decided that I must voluntarily accept the standard of life of the lower paid workers.

My husband not seeing things in this light, my life has often felt so hard and lonely, since I left him five months ago, that I have been very tempted to return to ease and luxury.

I wonder, would the Capitalist system be Christian if all the Capitalists lived in my present standard?

To return to the article. Why is "paid work for all not a permanent possibility?" Why haven't the advantages of labour saving machines been passed on to the workers in shorter hours of work, leaving time for "a useful creative occupation," or rather hobby, such as Writing Music, Research, etc., etc? You see, why not endow adequately, from a financial standpoint, the leisure of all, not just a privileged few? Will "improved education provide the right mental and spiritual equipment?" Is this not inherited?

The following is not a very good example, but it is rather interesting from the "improved education" standard.

A well-educated woman (mental worker) marries an uneducated man (physical worker). Two children are born to them—have exactly the same home environment, and education—yet the elder seems well-educated, the younger uneducated even to the "Cockney" accent! Does this not prove that God intends there shall always be two classes of workers in the world? If this is so, unless there is financial equality the gulf between the two classes will never be bridged.

Again, due to the financial advantage, many people are mental workers who would be much happier as physical workers—more useful too. Why should six men only out of a hundred work—why not shorter hours still and the hundred work—in shifts? e.g., 6—4 hours each, 100—1 hour each. No envy then.

Now for "the main point of enquiry," and the answer (4 points). In his own words, Re employer's or investor's profit.

(1) Hoards it—Anti-social.
(2) Invest it in Government Securities—Anti-Social.
(3) Invest it in Industry—He does under the present system create a shortage of purchasing power (Change monetary system).
(4) Spend it—.

It would therefore seem that under the present system "profit" is Anti-social, and even with a change in the monetary system it would only improve (3) as above.

Re (4) too:—

An employer buys 1 good car or his wife 1 fur coat —£400.

Instead of employees buying their 40 wives 40 £10 coats.

In the first case only 1 has benefited: in the second case 40 have benefited—and so on ad lib.

10/- profit to employer—1 10/- theatre ticket.
10/- divided amongst 10 workers—10 1/- theatre tickets.

Pleasure for 10 instead of 1.

I should like to ask the Duke if he has ever visited the Cotswold Bruderhof Community at Ashton Keynes? It's a wonderful experience—a group of 200 Christian people (150 children) of 11 nationalities, living as one big family—a life of love, poverty, equality, Unity. But what has struck me very forcibly during the last five months is this, if those people can be so happy and healthy living in poverty, why cannot we lower-paid workers also be happy? Pride? I noticed the same thing when reading Working Class Wives. In one case —one of the most poverty-stricken—the woman said she and her children were quite well and happy and she had no complaints.

What is really needed?—a change of Government policy or a change of heart? The capitalists to voluntarily accept the lower standard of living in the hope of gradually raising it for all?

One point which still puzzles me though—the luxury of which there will never be enough to go round, e.g., fresh salmon—in community one could enjoy it in turn, but outside community, how?

Best wishes from FLORA COLLAR.

Rushington, Sleaford, Lincolnshire.

THE DUKE'S REPLY

Sir,—I have a great respect for the self-sacrifice and sense of duty displayed by those who, like Mrs. Collar, feel led to reduce their standard of living to that of the poorest paid workers, even if I cannot altogether agree with their judgment in regard to the best and quickest method of removing the evil of a poverty which cripples and degrades the lives of so many thousands.

In the first place I should like to point out that my article is not intended as a defence of Capitalism. It is merely written to indicate what I believe to be the defects in certain common criticisms of the Capitalist system. I make but a brief reference to a moral problem which arises in the course of the article, not because I do not recognise the supreme importance of moral issues, but because practical and technical details are important also and it is with these latter that the article deals.

Even if equality of incomes be a right and attainable idea, I do not think that inequality necessarily leads to war, either between individuals or nations. It all depends on the nature, extent and cause of the inequality and upon the character of the individuals concerned. We know that inequality of income fortunately is not of necessity a barrier to the closest friendship or the most complete understanding.

The provision of paid work for all is not a permanent possibility because there is a point beyond which the reduction of hours and increasing of shifts, due to labour-saving inventions, cannot be carried further without inconvenience and absurdity. I entirely agree, however, that the advantages of labour-saving inventions ought to be passed on to the workers to a much greater extent than has been done hitherto, but for this to be done adequately, the reform of the financial system is one of the necessary conditions.

I used the term "education" in the fullest and widest sense, to include the right kind of religious teaching and also the right kind of manual training.

In my opinion, class divisions are less due to differences of income than to differences in cultural matters such as manners, speech, accent, etc., which really adequate education and sensible ideas in regard to the dignity of labour would do much to remove. By sensible ideas in regard to the dignity of labour, I mean the recognition of the fact that all forms of useful work are equally honourable and equally possible for a true "gentleman," whether the work be that of cleaning out a sewer or holding an important post in the Cabinet.

When dealing with the question of the four different ways in which profits may be utilised by the person who receives them, Mrs. Collar has failed to realise that the effect of hoarding wages or investing them in Government Securities is just as anti-social as the effect of hoarding profits and precisely similar in its evil results. Similarly, wages invested in industry cause, under the present system, an inevitable shortage of consumer purchasing power in precisely the same way as the investment of profits.

In her "fur coat" example, Mrs. Collar is guilty of the fallacy which I tried to expose in my article of imagining that when a rich person buys an expensive article, he is able to do so without at the same time making it possible for poorer people to buy what they require. If the firm from which the rich man's wife bought the fur coat for £400 used that particular sum to pay wages, then forty wives of forty employees might be able to buy their £10 coats as well.

I have met members of the Cotswold Bruderhof and have heard interesting accounts of the wonderful spirit which existed in the community. To my great regret, however, I was prevented from visiting the Community, as on one occasion I tried to make arrangements to do. I heard a little while ago, with deep regret and great indignation, that the Home Office was pushing this fine body of people out of the country and that they were settling somewhere in Central or South America where, perhaps, they will find more liberty and Christianity than here!

The acceptance by capitalists of a simple standard of living would not, without the reform of the monetary system, render possible that steady and continuous increase in prosperity for all, which is both possible and exceedingly desirable.

The difference between my policy and Mrs. Collar's may perhaps be summed up by an analogy. Let us imagine that she and I and all the other members of the community are a collection of persons in a boat which has lost its oars and which is floating in broiling summer weather in the middle of Lake Superior. We have on board a very limited amount of water, most unequally divided. Mrs. Collar and I have plenty, but other people have next to none. Mrrs. Collar shares her supply with her thirsty companions. I suggest taking a scoop over the side with a bucket, seeing that Lake Superior is a fresh-water lake!

In view of the fact that in peace-time the production and import of enough goods for all is prevented by money shortage and the work-complex, more than by any other factors, my first step would be to ignore the work-complex and arrange for enough money to be supplied to enable the community to consume and produce all that it desired of what its industries and commerce, working to full capacity, could put on the market. Seeing that the only people who would lose by this arrangement and therefore, when all the facts were known, would be disposed to resist it, would be a tiny handful of moneylending financiers, I could expect the reform to go through quickly and without that degree of opposition which is apt to involve delay with consequent protracted suffering for those who have suffered too long already.

My next step would be to allocate, from the increase in the money supply, a sufficient percentage to give the deserving poor that really decent standard of living which they have never yet had. This too should go through quickly and without delay, because the new money used for this purpose would not be obtained at the expense of other classes of the community and few even of the well-to-do are so completely heartless and evil that they would grudge the poor a share in the financial advantages of a reformed system from which they themselves were also to derive great benefit.

The final stage would be when Mrs. Collar and her friends came into action, demanding not only an increase in wealth for all but an equal distribution of wealth for all. Here, however just her claim, I foresee that, human nature being what it is, there would be tremendous conflict and opposition, involving, it might be, considerable delay before she gained her ultimate victory. But if even the poorest already had a reasonable share of the necessaries and amenities of civilised existence, the delay would not involve a continuance of those hideous and unnecessary evils which are all too common at the present time. Therefore, I do not say to Mrs Collar that she is wrong, but that I think that her tactics could be improved on and that even if, while the battle is still going on, she feels it right to accept the standard of living of the lowest paid workers, she must at all costs not be content with this great personal sacrifice as her only contribution to the problem, but must fight hard and intelligently for monetary reform as well.

Yours truly,
BEDFORD.

Newton Stewart, February 20.

BEN GREENE

Benjamin Greene, a former member of the Labour Party and a Hertfordshire J.P., applied on Wednesday, March 26, for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that since May 24, 1940, he had been detained under the Defence Regulations by order of the Home Secretary without a charge being preferred and without trial.

Mr. J. W. Williamson, appearing in support of the application in a King's Bench Divisional Court, said that Mr. Greene, who was 39, had sworn an affidavit submitting that the detention was illegal.

Mr. Justice Humphreys pointed out that the advisory committee had reported that Mr. Greene was detained on six grounds.

TO ARGUE OWN CASE

Mr. Williamson—Those were not the reasons put forward in the order of detention. Hostile association was alleged but that was denied.

The Court adjourned the application so that notice might be served on the Home Secretary and the governor of Brixton Prison, and Mr. Williamson said that Mr. Greene wanted to argue his case in person when it again came before the Court.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Caldecote) and Justices Humphreys and Singleton intimated that facilities would be given to enable him to do that.

"CONCHIES" OR—?

Dear Friend,—I do not like the word "Conchies." Why not use "C.O.'s" or "No! Men" in your paper instead of the word used by the Beaverbrook paper?

ALFRED CURZON.

"MR SMITH AND MR SCHMIDT"

HERBERT MORRISON STATES THE CASE

A comrade has written to us asking us to prove our good faith in the cause of peace, by commending Herbert Morrison on his war pamphlet, Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt. The comrade feels that, to give praise where praise is due, will lend strength to our work for peace, the Socialist solution of the present social struggle, and the release of 18B. prisoners.

Morrison's pamphlet is a very different publication from Sir Robert Vansittart's unfortunate broadcasts, in which he labours to prove that, for over 1,800 years, all Germans have belonged to the criminal classes.

With the aid of excellent photographs, Morrison gives the history of the achievement wrought for the people of Germany by the Socialist and Pacifist Weimar Republic in the fourteen years after the last war, 1918-1932—the years before the Devolution led by Hitler.

From its outset, the Weimar Republic's efforts were sabotaged by the reparations and repressions exacted by the framers of the Versailles Peace. Future historians will establish the collusion that existed between armaments-capitalists of France and Germany to impose misery upon the miners of the Ruhr. The terror of Bolshevism gave Hitler supporters in many countries beside his own.

Morrison can write quite well on the theme of Fascism when he wishes. In the Forward for January 16, 1937, he published an excellent essay on "BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND FRANCO."

Morrison opened this article as follows:—

"Every successive stage in the Spanish drama provides increasing evidence for the view which some of us have held all along: that the soundest policy for peace on the occasion of the oath-breakers' revolt against the constitutional Government of Spain was for Britain, France and Soviet Russia to supply arms promptly at the beginning to the Spanish Government in accordance with their rights under international law.

"Our own Government was not willing to do so because it has no love for Governments of the Left. The French Popular Front Government was too nervous to do so, or was unable owing to its Coalition character. Soviet Russia did not do so because, so Communists say, it did not wish to disagree with the Governments of France and Britain.

"So the supply of arms to the Spanish Government was more or less stopped under an embargo; sanctions were applied to the lawful Government; the Fascist Powers were asked to agree to the non-export of arms to Spain and ultimately officially did so; but before, during and after the negotiations and the non-intervention agreement they did supply arms to the rebels, which was a breach of the obligations of one Government to another.

Morrison details all the Labour and Socialist protests, and the delays of the Fascist Powers. He concludes this article on the following note:—

"Who is so simple as still to believe in the good intentions of the members of Mr. Baldwin's Government towards Spain? Throughout this business they have, as a whole, put their international class interests before the interests of their country, and certainly of democracy. But when it is very, very clear that British Imperialist interests are vitally, finally and openly threatened by the Fascists, they may become the Champions of Democracy with a big 'D' as in 1914, and let things rip in another world imperialist war.

"Then these precious Ministers of our who betrayed the League of Nations, the Disarmament Conference, China, Abyssinia, and democracy and constitutional government in Spain, who never by voice, pen or gesture protested against the bloody hand of tyranny ruthlessly destroying liberty in Germany, Italy and Austria, will expect us all to believe in their war-time declarations for liberty, freedom, democracy and . . . war to end war.

"But the fight may then be more strictly related to oil wells, markets and mineral deposits. . . .

"The position may therefore well be: British citizens of to-day, by order of the Tory Government, are prohibited from fighting for democracy in Spain. But to-morrow they may, under conscription, be compelled to fight for imperialism anywhere. . . .

"The risks of a war for democracy were small if lawful and proper action had been taken at the beginning for the Spanish Government would soon have triumphed; but the risks of a terrible war for imperialism now grow. Foreign policy for Mr. Baldwin's Government is class policy. Those who believe otherwise will live to regret their belief."

This is well said. But we find it hard to square this clear and expressive thinking and utterance with Morrison's present position in the Cabinet. In the Forward for March 5, 1938, denouncing Tory statesmen as public enemies, he repeated his indictment with emphasis. He also published a qualification which is at variance with some of the present declarations of his Cabinet colleagues, who were yesterday admirers of Hitler and Mussolini. Wrote Mr. Morrison:

"On this point Labour must be clear for just as we condemn the Government for being unwilling to co-operate with Russia in the interests of peace, so it would be wrong for a Labour Government to refuse to co-operate with the Fascist Powers in the interests of peace, presuming that they would be willing for such co-operation."

Herbert Morrison's Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt makes easy reading. He makes a telling and damning quotation from Hitler Speaks by Hermann Rauschning. These are Hitler's words:—

"There will be a Herren-class, an historical class tempered by battle, and welded from the most varied elements. There will be a great hierarchy of party members. They will be the new middle class. And there will be the great mass of the anonymous, the serving collective, the eternally disfranchised, no matter whether they were once members of the old bourgeoisie, the big land-owning class, the working-class, or the artisans. . . . But beneath them there will still be the class of subject alien races; we need not hesitate to call them the modern slave class. And over all of these will stand the new aristocracy, the most deserving and the most responsible Fuhrer personalities. . . .

"As surely as everything we have discussed here to-day must be kept from burdening the mind of the ordinary party member, equally surely must we put an end to what is known as universal education. Universal education is the most corroding and disintegrating poison that liberalism has ever invented for its own destruction."

Nevertheless, the pamphlet suffers from many omissions. Picturing "Mr. Smith telling the world," Morrison says nothing about the 1926 General Strike and Baldwin's measures against the strikers. He omits all reference to 18B, under which any person who criticises the war or its continuance could and can be interned. He explains the vast activities of the Labour and Parliamentary Socialist Movement in Germany. But he does not explain how this movement lost its power to the Nazis. This failure is significant, for the Nazis could not seize power out of the blue, by a mere conspiracy of will. Had Morrison told this story he might have condemned himself and would have condemned, most certainly, parliamentary Socialism. The passage from parliamentary constitutionalism to despotism is a natural evolution, as natural as the opposition evolution, to Freedom and Democracy. It depends in which direction one travels. The parliamentary Socialist travelled the wrong way. Is Morrison sure that the road of war, conscription, and 18B internment, is the right way? Has not parliamentary Socialism been travelling the wrong way in every country since 1874?

Hitler came to power in 1933. Morrison depicts accurately the sorry consequences of that event. He makes no effort to point the lessons of the Socialist collapse and defeat. It was his business, if his aim was truth, to explain how and why Socialist parliamentarism failed.

In Germany, as Morrison states, the working-class was well organised. The trades unions encompassed millions, and the enormous vote given, at the polls, to the Socialist and Communist Parties, testified to a widespread desire for Socialism. This desire rose from Germany's terrible economic plight, which was becoming steadily worse. The Socialist parliamentarians in Britain, like their Tory colleagues, did nothing to ease the plight. Rather, they aimed to aggravate it. This fact gave a tremendous impetus to the growth of German Fascism or Nazism. The stability and growth of working class organisation in Germany was possible only if their workers' organisations had taken control of the economic life of the country. Reality demanded an address of courage that was not forthcoming. Socialists were called upon to solve the economic problem and they played at politics and power. They enjoyed the luxury of incompetence. Morrison weeps at the result only that more weeping may follow.

Hitler's power grew and fed on the refusal of the working-class leaders to tackle the economic problem. The unemployed, the youth who had never had jobs, the ruined middle class—all the demoralised and declassed sections of the population—served as the reservoir from which Hitler drew his support. Official society had squeezed them from its pores, transformed them into hoodlums and gangsters. Hitler rallied and organised them. He gave them a mission, an evil, anti-social mission, of criminal power and revenge. He gave them a banner, a banner of power and degeneration. He told them that the labour organisations had no time for them or their problems. Backed by these economic outcasts, he addressed himself to the anti-Socialist interests of the manufacturers' associations. These facts explain the concentration camps, and the gangster character of Nazism.

The Social Democrats—the section to which the Labour Party in Britain allied itself at one time—have been since 1874 the leaders and betrayers of the German workers. They dragged the German workers into the World War, and then, as the armistice ended in a German revolution, prevented them from setting up a Workers' Government. In the course of suppressing the Socialist revolution Ebert, Noske, Scheidemann and the other Social-Democratic leaders slaughtered thousands of workers. Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht were assassinated by Junker officers under the command of the Social Democrats. For the next fourteen years, the Social Democrats were either the Government or its chief prop. In Prussia they ruled throughout. Social Democratic workers on strike who felt the blows of the police could, if they chose, comfort themselves with the thought that the police chief belonged to the same party as they did.

The Social Democrats supported Bruening, then Von Papen, then Von Schleicher; supported all the capitalist governments as these swung ever further to the right under Nazi pressure. Their last stand was to help re-elect Von Hindenburgh, the President. And on January 30, 1933, he called upon Hitler to form a cabinet.

Even then the Social Democrats did not change their policy. In the Reichstag they voted for a motion of confidence in Hitler's foreign policy. They offered to support Hitler if only he would tolerate the continued existence of the Social Democratic political apparatus.

Why does Morrison not relate these facts and tell us how the German Social Democrats betrayed Mr. Schmidt to Fascism?

The Communist Party, Willie Gallacher's impossible brigade, was no better. At this time, Moscow gramophones were busy blaring forth the thesis of "social fascism." Stalin and his henchmen, in miles of high-sounding stupidity, declared that Social Democracy was "the moderate wing of Fascism," and the true proletarian policy was to support "an open Fascist dictatorship." In other words, the ineptitude of the Socialist Parliamentarians conspired, with Tory parliamentary jingoism and reaction, to establish war and Fascism in Europe. So Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt, perfectly lovable suffering human beings, are fighting each other, ruining cities, murdering women and children, enduring a nightmare of horror, because each relied on careerist talkative politicians, instead of coming directly to grips with the problem of economic well-being. Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt must end war and get together as friends; rebuild their ruined cities; shake hands in sacred and solemn sorrow over the graves of their dead; regard the earth and the fulness thereof as the wealth of all mankind, and sincerely and solemnly and firmly declare that never again will they be parties to war or outrage. In solemn and sincere conclave, with hands firmly clasped, they must forgive and equally they must remember the past, and so outlaw violence for ever.

The sky was never intended to bring terror to the cities. The sun was never destined to rise on scenes of ruin and despair. The sun was never meant to set on scenes of widespread death and havoc. With our brawn and our brain, our hands and wits, we were destined to serve each other, to make the world glorious with joy and mutual service, with love and laughter, and the romance of happiness.

We must end the violence of war and power, the sorry careerism of politics for ever. We must build the kingdom and the republic on earth, enter upon the magnificent conspiracy of world commonweal. We must do it now.

HERBERT MORRISON

We do not know all the details of Herbert Morrison's exemption as a C.O. in the last war. One comrade writes that he was exempted on condition that he worked on the land and that he worked on a fruit farm in Hertfordshire. It is said that he married the farmer's daughter.

Our comrade, C. H. Norman, published the following letter in the Railway Review for May 24, 1940:—

ANOTHER SOMERSAULT

Sir,—When one examines the list of the new Cabinet one's heart can only sink. These are the words of one of them, Mr. Herbert Morrison, conscientious objector in the 1914-1918 war and now Minister of Supply, speaking at the Albert Hall on Sunday, 5th December, 1926, in support of the Peace Letter Campaign of Mr. Arthur Ponsonby:—

"And what has been the purpose of the campaign? It has been to bring before the individual citizen the attitude of the citizen towards a future war, if a future war should break out, and in order to secure from individuals a signed declaration that, in the event of our rulers involving us in another war, we give the Government notice in advance we are not taking part." (Hear, hear.)

Did Mr. Morrison give in his notice in advance?

"We know from past and all too real experience how the declarations of Parties and individuals towards wars are likely to fail when the testing-time comes, and it may be that even many of those who have signed this declaration will fail, for wars have a terrible effect upon the public mind and upon the public psychology."

Apparently Mr. Morrison is one of those individuals!

"Many of us here will remember the outbreak of the last war, when men of all classes, all political Parties, and of all religious persuasions one week were demanding that our country should maintain neutrality in the Great War and the next week had switched over to the opposite view and were identifying themselves with military policies and the military outlook. Let us admit that there were few men, even in the Labour Party, who could withstand the onslaught of war at that time, and, as Mr. Ponsonby has said, let us ask ourselves what is to be our position if another war comes; I ask you, therefore, to dedicate yourselves anew to the great cause of international peace. It is for you to let the Government know, and others know, that so far as you are concerned you are finished with war and that you will take no part in it either collectively or individually."

One wonders, after years of experience, who can ever be trusted to stand by anything he says for two weeks.—Yours, etc.,

C. H. NORMAN."

As Norman says, in a private letter:—

"What I object about the recanting C.O.'s is their jingoism. The cant of conscientious objection was bad enough in the last war, on occasion, but the recant of conscientious objection in this war is infinitely worse."

THE CLYDESIDE BLITZ

DOLLAN—BEFORE and AFTER!

In The Word, as our readers know, we have recalled, in detail, P. J. Dollan's "conchie" past. We have reprinted, from contemporary records, his 1917 Police Court hearing when he was "handed over" by the then Stipendiary Magistrate; his appeal to the Court of Session when counsel pleaded his case, the comment of the Bench; his advice to C.O.'s entering Wormwood Scrubs; and the questions and answers re his "conchie" imprisonment and exemption in Parliament. At that time, Lord Charnwood, in the House of Lords, was demanding the deportation of conscientious objectors, M.P.'s were threatening them with perpetual disfranchisement, and soldiers were promised a land fit for heroes to live in. To-day, Sir Patrick Dollan is an honoured patriot, a 1917 Conscientious Objector is Home Secretary, and ex-servicemen from 1914-18 of various ranks are interned in various parts of the country under 18B. We write as one who was a conscientious objector in 1916-1919 and remain a conscientious objector to-day. We find the situation somewhat confusing and intriguing.

Many of our readers do not sympathise with our impeachment of Dollan's military age conscience and his over-age militarism. If our demand for consistency is an offence against political good taste we apologise. We never suspected careerist politicians of scruples of taste. But Dollan believes to-day in war. He has been honoured as Chief Magistrate of Glasgow for believing in war. The Evening Times, and other papers, published pictures of him in a khaki uniform that made him look like a general. He has spoken with authority on the defences of Glasgow. Is the Clydeside satisfied?

To-day, we cull from a morning paper this paragraph, which indicts war, and all those who believe in war:—

"In two months Mrs. James Whittock would have been 100 years old.

"But the bombers came to Clydeside. Among their many victims was Mrs. Whittock.

"She has died in a Stirlingshire casualty hospital—99 years and 10 months old, killed in the front line."

Her death indicts war. It indicts German bombers. It indicts European war-mongers. It indicts irresponsible civic chiefs.

Our comrade, H. W. Henderson, as we go to press, places before us some extracts from the New Statesman. We pass them on to our readers.

On November 2, 1940, the New Statesman published an article from the pen of Ritchie Calder, entitled "The War in the North." This article contained the following reference to Glasgow:—

"I know the Glasgow slums and the working-class tenements pretty well, and without official escort I went to see for myself. The conclusions were disturbing. Baffle walls at the open mouths of the entrances to tall tenement buildings do not seem good enough to me. Even if I accepted the safety-factor, I know those 'closes' on a winter's night and I would no more shelter in them than in a refrigerator. Alternative surface shelters seemed far from adequate. Glasgow is a city of indispensable workers. They need sleep. Where will they get it if all-night raids start? They themselves will tell you 'in oor beds.'"

The rest of the article was in a similar mild strain, the author relating that he was told that Glasgow was "built on a rock."

On November 16, 1940, Lord Provost Dollan made an indignant reply to Mr Calder's "badly informed and ill-advised references to our city" which Dollan considered almost inexcusable and, in some respects, "the essence of absurdity." Dollan added:—

"Mr. Calder does not know what he is talking about when he sneers at the baffle walls as a protection for tenement closes and stairs. The close staircases are the strongest-built sections of a tenement, more likely to survive bombing attacks than other part. That is why, after many tests, they are protected by baffles and strutting. Glasgow tenements, moreover, are built more strongly than the houses in the East End of London, which collapse from concussion. I have seen several tenements surviving after bombing operations. Scottish houses will stand up to attack with a fairer chance of survival than the shack houses in the East End of London. Scottish houses have more resisting power. The walls of most of the tenements are built of stone, other floors are at least twice as strong as those of house floors in the London boroughs.

"Mr. Calder says that even if he accepted the safety factor he would no more shelter in a tenement close on a winter's night than in a refrigerator. The people of Glasgow are not so afraid, and complain when closes are not baffled or strutted. It is unlikely, moreover, that raids on Glasgow will be as fierce or prolonged as they have been on London and other part of the South of England. There are physical and scientific reasons for this that should be known to Mr. Calder or any other 'New Statesman' contributor. Scotland has not escaped raiding, but it has not been on the same extensive scale as has been experienced in South England.

"It is not for me to criticise London's complicated and overlapping civic organisation, but I am convinced, after seeing it in operation, that Glasgow's preparations will stand a strain as severe as that which happened in London. County Council and Borough officials in London were unanimous in stating too many exaggerated reports had been published regarding air-raid damage in the Capital. They are right. The reports about provincial cities are probably just as reliable as some about London."

We remind Dollan of his statements and make no comment.

In the same issue of the New Statesman, Ritchie Calder replied. Here is an extract:—

"I am quite impenitent about those tenement entrances protected by baffle walls. What causes me most concern is the Lord Provost's complacent estimates of the risks. Neither he nor I, nor any other "New Statesman" contributor can have sufficient evidence, scientific or otherwise, from which to assess the future effects of raids on Clydeside."

The Sunday Express, March 23, 1941, said:—

"A final post-mortem on the Clyde blitz has shown Glasgow to be 'mentally and materially half-unprepared.' Many Clydesiders thought it could not happen here."

The same paper states that Lord Provost Sir Patrick Dollan, in an early Saturday morning broadcast to the people of the United States of America, said Clydeside had a "black-eye" after the Nazi bombing, but was still "fit and ready for the next round."

To Lord Provost Mitchell, of Aberdeen, Dollan wrote, praising the bravery of Clydeside civilians, and adding:—

"We have had a knock or two, from which we have made an effective recovery, and we are going all out to win the war.

"We have had more than our share of casualties, but our people are not complaining. They recognise that they have to take their part in the general sacrifice essential to success."

Can death, can the human tragedies of war, be brushed aside as being but "a knock or two, from which we have made an effective recovery"? Do the sufferers recover? Do the terms employed by the Lord Provost belong to the language of Socialism? Are they the phrases that ought to be employed by one who was one a conscientious objector?

Emrys Hughes' Anti War Stand

Emrys Hughes, editor of Forward, the Glasgow Labour journal, is a Bailie at Cumnock, and a member of the Labour Town Council. This council decided not to take part in the South Ayrshire War Weapons Week. The District Council has decided to take charge of arrangements and it is reported in the capitalist press that Cumnock proposes to censure the Town Council by contributing most in the district.

When the Town Council considered the matter, Police Judge Holland said:—

"The Government would get all the weapons it needed without the assistance of voluntary workers creating an atmosphere to encourage people to put their last penny into War Savings in order to feed the guns to kill people, an act which would return on themselves."

Emrys Hughes seconded. He said:—

"The Government could get the money the same way as it got the lives of their young men—by conscription. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was not doing his duty going round with the hat on Salvation Army lines."

The Labour majority carried their point by five votes to two.

The District Council has taken the matter up and claims to have made arrangements for a successful appeal.

WHEN I WAS A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

A Seven Minutes Speech in the House of Commons

By

A. CREECH JONES, M.P.

[We publish John McGovern's and K. Pickthorne's attacks on Creech Jones in this issue. Also an account of his political career. Below we reproduce, from H.C. Official Parliamentary Report, Volume 342, No. 105, Thursday, May 18, 1939, Cols. 1697-1699, the excellent description of his experience as a C.O., made by Creech Jones in first opposing, and then amending, the Military Training Bill, in opposition to the Attorney General's Motion. The speech lasted 7 minutes, from 6.12 p.m. to 6.19 p.m.—Ed.]

I can speak with some very real knowledge of the procedure that was followed on the occasion of the last War. It may be that the conscience Clause was introduced during the period of war on the last occasion, but, nevertheless, the administration of the Act gave rise to an overwhelming sense of injustice in thousands of men who had genuine conscientious objections. I would emphasise the point that it did happen that hundreds of men were refused either absolute exemption or work of national importance because the tribunal felt that they ought to perform non-combatant service in the Army. They refused to form part of the military machine. They had deep objections on ethical, moral, and sometimes political and religious grounds, but the fact remains that there were hundreds of men for whom both the local tribunal and the appeal tribunal refused the kind of service which was deliberately laid down in the Military Service Act. Those men were taken into the Army. They refused to obey orders, and ultimately they were court-marshalled and sent to prison.

It was because the administration had become something of a scandal that a national appeal body was set up. There were literally thousands of men who were taken from Wormwood Scrubs Prison to that tribunal and adjudicated on, and large numbers of these men passed out of prison to Dartmoor Prison, where national work was being provided for them. We are most anxious that, where injustice has been done to the genuine conscientious objector who has been caught up in the Army, he shall not be treated in a military prison but transferred to the control of the civil authorities, and that, if he is to be punished, the punishment shall take place in a civil prison. I also urge that not only should that punishment be in the civil prison, but there should be some finality in regard to the imprisonment.

May I illustrate my argument by my own personal case? I was one of those persons whom the local tribunal declared to be an objector entitled to absolute exemption, but that absolute exemption was denied to me because it was argued that other conscientious objectors did not receive that absolute exemption and had gone into the Army, Therefore, it was decided that I should go into the Army. That decision was upheld by an appeal tribunal, irrespective of my past or the work in which I was actually engaged. I went before a court-martial and, being an absolute objector, I was sentenced to a period of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. I served my period of six months' hard labour and was then taken back to my regiment, given a military order, court-martialled afresh and sentenced to one year's hard labour. That sentence I also served. I was again taken back to my regiment, given another military order, refused to obey, was court-martialled again and had to go for two years' hard labour. I served the two years' had labour and went back to my regiment four months after the War was over. I still refused to obey military orders and was sentenced to another period of two years' hard labour. In point of fact I actually served periods amounting to about three years and six months. All the time the cat-and-mouse rule operated as far as I was concerned. It was recognised all through this course that I was a perfectly genuine person. Nevertheless, I had been caught up in the military machine and the cat-and-mouse arrangement began to operate.

I do suggest that there is some force in this new Clause. There ought to be some arrangement whereby these men, who are perfectly genuine in their opposition to war and in their opposition to being part of the military machine, should get reasonable treatment under the civil code, and that when they have paid the penalty for the crime of having a conscientious objection they should return to civil life. I agree with the Mover of the Clause that it is really absurd that the penalty in these cases for having a conscience should be as much as two years' imprisonment. If that is to be the penalty, the conscientious objector will pay. There ought, however, to be some arrangement whereby these cases could be lifted right out of the military organisation, that the punishment should be in a civil prison, with the right of review, once the man reaches the civil prison, or before, and that once the sentence has been served the man should be no longer a soldier but should return to civil life.

I hope that further consideration will be given to this very reasonable clause.

NATIONAL SERVICE ACT

SECOND READING DEBATE

JOHN McGOVERN'S SPEECH

[In another column we detail the voting on the Second Reading of the National Service Bill, when John McGovern moved the rejection. John McGovern's speech, and the cross-questioning between him and Mr. L. Silkin, the member for Peckham, which followed, are detailed in Parliamentary Debates, H.C. Official Report, Vol. 370, No. 42, Cols. 626-638 inclusive. Silkin followed McGovern and Rhys Davies followed Silkin. Rhys Davies's excellent speech is reported in columns 643-647. The date of the debate was 26th March, 1941.—Ed.]

Mr. McGovern (Glasgow, Shettleston): I am afraid I cannot agree with most of what has been said by previous speakers either as to the fine qualities of this Bill or the proopsals embodied in it. We propose to attempt to divide the House against it, because we think it a thoroughly bad Measure in its intended effect upon conscientious objectors. I cannot say that I am amazed, but I think it rather singular that it should be sponsored, among others, by three Members of the Labour party, who took no part in the last war, and two of whom, at least, had conscientious objections to war in every shape and form. The Minister of Labour was in a reserved occupation, and the Secretary of State for Scotland conducted his battle as editor of an anti-war journal in Glasgow, urging everyone to resist and encouraging conscientious objectors to refuse service of any kind, and supporting them in their objection. As a matter of fact, I should say on reflection that some of the propaganda carried on by the right hon. Gentleman came perilously near being pro-German propaganda rather than anti-war propaganda. Nevertheless, that excess might have been attibuted to the zeal of the individual as a war-hater. I suppose he will not be here to-day. I expect he has a pressing engagement. He usually has in these circumstances. At the last Election, he gave a pledge to his constituents that in no conditions would he support war of any kind, no matter what were the alignments of party in the House or in the country.

The Minister of Home Security conducted his struggle in an orchard during the last war and refused to accept anything connected with it at all, so deep was his loathing of war. I can imagine the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary, with his shaggy red head, sitting back over a glass of whisky and a cigar enjoying themselves immensely at the position of the three Labour defenders of freedom sponsoring a Bill of this kind against conscientious objectors. I do not know what part the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Home Security played in the last war, but for a number of years previous to this war his spiritual home was in Moscow, which was also the spiritual home of the hon. Lady who is now Joint Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry, when she was in the Communist party and flirted with it for many years. We must remember the words of Mr. Priestley, that "Labour is walking into a trap, and the reactionaries will do it across them at the appropriate time."

They have them in position now. The Minister of Labour said, previous to this war, "We want to teach our children that resistance to war is more glorious than to take part in it." He said something more about his chief——

Mr. Deputy-Speaker (Colonel Clifton Brown): I must ask the hon. Member to come somewhat closer to the Bill.

Mr. McGovern: I am surely entitled, when opposing a Bill, being the only Opposition Member who has spoken, to analyse the conduct of Members who are sponsoring it, and to compare their services in the last war, with their attempt to penalise conscientious objectors in this war. With this small quotation I will pass on to the Bill. The Minister of Labour said, regarding the present Prime Minister,

"It would be a Godsend for this country if Churchill was out of office for evermore. It is not that he is not brilliant; but it is not safe to leave the destiny of millions of people in the hands of a man of unstable mind."

That is what the right hon. Gentleman said as far back as 1926. The Measure seeks to penalise certain conscientious objectors. It first takes power to call them for Civil Defence. Those who are associated with it, especially on the Labour side, should know that there are various categories of conscientious objectors, and very often the man whom you are going to penalise is a complete pacifist, very often a Christian objector, who would have nothing to do with war of any kind. That individual is to be selected for attack and for the brutality of the imprisonment and the fines that will be imposed on him if he is convicted in the courts. There are some people who are political objectors. I, myself, was a conscientious objector in the last war. I appeared before a tribunal, and I had to appear before Labour magistrates, some in Glasgow, who were keen advocates of the war. In that war I was a political objector, but I did not subscribe to complete pacifism. I believe that ultimately it may be necessary at times regrettably to use a measure of force in order to achieve the ends for which I stand. A large number of people are Christian conscientious objectors and some are Socialist absolutists who refuse to have anything to do with war at all.

The Minister of Home Security in an aside said to the hon. Member on the Labour Front Bench who had spoken that the absolutist was protected. That is not true, however. The absolutist who gets through the tribunal is protected, but the absolutist who is refused exemption is not protected and will be an early victim of the application of this Bill. There are men who have gone through the tribunals and have been given conditional exemption. Many men who are determined not to enter the military machine in any way take the view that the best way, sacrificing principle as little as possible, is to get through the war in the easiest manner by accepting the decisions of the local or appellate tribunals. They would be willing to take land, forestry, land reclamation or drainage work, but they would refuse to go into Civil Defence work because they would then become part of the machinery of the war to which they have a decided objection. It would have been well worth while appealing to those who are registered as conscientious objectors to see how many were prepared to serve in some useful capacity in a voluntary way and then to have allotted them the tasks for which they volunteered. That would have recognised the position of the absolutist and would have avoided the imposition of penalties of any kind. I went to Liverpool three weeks ago and met ten conscientious objectors. Nine out of the ten were religious objectors, and I am satisfied that nothing would persuade them to take part in Civil Defence of any kind. They are determined to remain completely aloof from any kind of war service. Men who have been allotted to certain work of a civilian nature will in many cases, therefore, if they are asked to do work on Civil Defence refuse to go any further than they have done in recognising the decisions of a tribunal. Is it to be the opinion of Members of this House that because a man fails to go through a tribunal he is not a genuine conscientious objector? Let me quote the petition of a Member of the House showing the absolutist position:

That was the statement of the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Creech Jones), who is now Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Labour. He was an absolutist, and I cannot square that statement with his association with this Bill and this Ministry His statement represents the point of view of the absolutist who refuses to serve or in any way to be drawn into the machine.

I am amazed at some of the statements made here to-day. The hon. Member for the Combined English Universities (Mr. Harvey) talked about toleration, but I have not been able to find it. Go to the Glasgow Tribunal, for instance, and see the comfortable, smug, callous individuals sitting on the bench and asking trick questions of the applicants. See their insults being hurled from the bench towards applicants because they have convictions. Principle has never entered into their lives, and they cannot understand other people having principles and consciences. The Minister of Labour, whose attention has been drawn to it, has tolerated people on the tribunals who every day go to great lengths to insult applicants. If an applicant retorts, he is put down as impertinent, and the last word is with the tribunal, for it can turn him down if he dares to assert his manhood in any way. Cases have happened all over the country of people who have had their heads dipped in buckets of water and their hair shaved, and who have been beaten in secret because they have had consciences. How far has the Labour party fallen since the days when, as a boy, I was enamoured of its stand for freedom. Now it is handing over every prestige of freedom, giving men and women the false statement that we are engaged in a struggle for human freedom and liberty. That is if they believe that, though I do not believe it, because I cannot see any difference between this war and any other war. It is just a commercial struggle between two competing groups. That has always been the economic position in modern war. But even if they accepted the position and believed that this was a different war, would we not have expected a different attitude from that Front Bench? The Front Bench of the Labour party is expected to house men who are prepared to defend every form of minority, but how many words have been spoken since this war began—outside the few pacifists in the Labour party, or by those who were conscientious objectors in the last war—by Members sitting on the Government benches in defence of men whose principles are involved and who are to be penalised if they refuse to obey the call to Civil Defence? It is to be a fine of £100 and up to a maximum of two years' imprisonment.

I remember the present Secretary of State for Scotland, during the last war, turning his intolerant, narrow, biting pen on the Thomases and the others who had supported that war, writing every word of condemnation he could of those men because they supported the war. I could imagine him, as he did in the last war, turning with all his vitriolic personality against those who have stood aside and allowed these men to be persecuted in this war. I should expect Conservatives to take their present attitude towards conscientious objectors, because is not the war a defence of the interests of the Conservative and Liberal elements in this country? They regard themselves as fighting for their lives against an opponent who is trying to gain commercial and imperialist supremacy, and they will fight like beasts of the jungle to protect their interests. Now the Labour party has been taken into the Government—taken in in more than one sense—and now the whole organisation for the suppression of every form of speech and protest is supported by these individuals who have secured positions in that Government.

THE FALLACY OF THE INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE

When the war ends and there is a chance to address ourselves to the task of building a new and happier world, there will be a danger of time being wasted, energy dissipated and unnecesary conflicts aroused by people pursuing various red herrings instead of concentrating on those policies and reforms which are really worth while; wherefore, in preparation for that day, important service can be rendered by getting rid of as many red herrings as possible.

One of these objectionable fish which at present captivates the minds of some of our most active reformers and zealous advocates of peace, is the so-called International Police Force, which, in point of fact, would not be a police force at all but an army which an international authority would have at its command to punish a potential aggressor State.

The fact that an army was not composed of men of the same nationality but was a kind of new edition of the French Foreign Legion; and the fact that its operations were under the control, not of the statesmen of one government, but of a body composed of representatives of various nations, would do absolutely nothing to remove the fundamental differences between an army and a police force—differences which, in a sub-Christian world, permit the police force to be of some practical utility in maintaining order and promoting good behaviour; whereas the army, when engaged in the operations of ordinary war, must inevitably fail to do anything of the kind.

The policeman arrests the real criminal who is responsible for the trouble and who, in most cases, either knows that he is doing wrong or at any rate has no moral conviction that he is doing right. The soldier, on the other hand, deals with the man who has little, if any, real responsibility for war and is convinced that he is defending his country's safety and honour.

The policeman is expected to use the minimum amount of violence when arresting the criminal and bringing him to justice. The soldier is expected to inflict the maximum amount of damage on his opponents as long as they remain combatants.

The policeman is an agent for bringing the criminal to trial before an impartial tribunal, but the soldier, even of an international army, could hardly do so, for one cannot imagine the international authority "trying," in any legal sense, prisoners of war. The proceedings, if such were instituted, would tend to resemble not the operations of an ordinary court of justice but the strivings of a tribunal attempting to deal with conscientious objectors! This would be so because there is no such thing as a "criminal nation," and this fact, by itself, makes the idea of an international police force absurd.

Another important point to bear in mind is this: behind the whole machinery of justice in any reasonably well-governed State—and closely and vitally connected with that system of justice—is a government endeavouring, to the best of its ability, to attend to the needs of all classes of its citizens and to see that all legitimate grievances are dealt with.

If the international force maintaining order is to be a real police force and not an army, we must therefore postulate that the international authority behind it not only concerns itself with the maintenance of order, but, like an efficient government, also concerns itself with meeting the needs of all races and classes under its jurisdiction and seeing that their legitimate grievances are remedied. So long as this were done, for the reason already stated that there is no such thing as a criminal nation, there would be no more danger of any nation which recognised the international authority desiring, or being misled by some leader into desiring, to break the peace by attacking one of its neighbours, than there is of a body of citizens within a well-governed State desiring, or being led to desire, to attack a group of their fellows. An international army would, therefore, be unnecessary, as the maintenance of order would be carried out perfectly well by the ordinary police of each country. No additional force would be needed since the grievances which give rise to war would not exist, owing to the presence of adequate machinery, which was always dealing with them, and, unlike the League of Nations, had been allowed executive power by those who respected, and had seen the need for, its authority.

In regard to countries which did not recognise the international authority, much the same arguments would apply. If the international authority treated, as it should, the peoples of those other countries with the same consideration, generosity and justice with which it treated its own peoples, they, too, could not be induced to attack it. If, on the contrary, it did not treat them with justice and generosity, the international police force would not be a police force at all but merely a combination of the fighting Services of an alliance of States prepared for ordinary warfare with States outside the alliance.

Finally, let us never forget that the methods of modern warfare, by reason of their indiscriminate and destructive violence, can never be the agents of a "police force" in any real sense of the term. As someone wittily remarked, a bomb with the label tied to it "With love from Geneva" would be just as cruelly destructive in its effects and just as likely to injure and destroy the innocent as any bomb dropped by the airman of a national army.

It is not on armies, national or international, that the stability of peace will, in the future, depend, but on a new diplomacy, i.e., an honest and open diplomacy, and a new spirit in international relationships which finds expression in seeking to discover the just grievances and meet the legitimate needs of the people of other nations before such action is compelled by force or the threat of force.

MARY S. ALLEN

The question of Mary S. Allen, whose eulogy of Hitler was reproduced in the March "Word," has been raised in the House of Commons on several occasions. Colonel Wedgewood has demanded that she ought to be interned equally with other Fascists. We agree with the argument but we are opposed entirely to the policy of internment and to the suspension of habeas corpus.

In the House of Commons, on Thursday, April 30, 1940, J. Parker, Labour M.P. for Romford, asked Mr. Oliver Stanley, then Secretary of State for War:

"Whether he is aware that Commandant Mary Allen is a member of the British Union of Fascists, spoke on Sir Oswald Mosley's platform at Friends' House on April 13, and is contributing a series of articles to 'Action.'"

On Friday, April 26, the Daily Mirror published an interview with Mary Allen She said:

"The Women's Voluntary Service is not active at the moment. I do not belong to any Government body.

"In the years I have been running my auxiliary service I have trained thousands of women to do patriotic work for their country.

"Since the war I have done nothing. Why should I? I have not been asked to train any women although I feel I should have been.

"As regards the question of my political views, I say quite openly that I am a member of the Fascist Party. . . .

"I did speak at a meeting at which Sir Oswald Mosley was present—but it was a women's peace meeting. I certainly said nothing unpatriotic."

To the question, "What is your attitude towards Hitler now?" she replied:—

"I have no opinion to give. Once my country is at war its enemies are my enemies."

Soon after the Great War broke out, Mary Allen went to Scotland Yard and offered her services, becoming one of the first women police. Her Women's Auxiliary Service began as a body for training women as police officers.

THE RETURN OF PONTIUS PILATE

By C. H. NORMAN

In primitive times, the first privileged class was the priesthood, which, by playing on the fears of the mass, acquired considerable wealth, which, exciting envy, caused the priesthood to create an armed force attached to the religious authority of the community, which, in turn, in later times developed into a military aristocratic class, the second privileged class in the community. From these two beginnings, later there arose the nobility, and then, the financial and trading bourgeoisie.

The extent to which fraud was used by the priestly caste to maintain its authority may be instanced by the first known use of steam as a mechanical force, by the priesthood of ancient Egypt, thus described by Gerald Heard in his "Source of Civilisation," page 176.

"How clearly the priesthood of Egypt understood what they were doing, and that their task was to dupe the ignorant and poor to make them submit. We have proofs from the earliest steam engine known, which is a device whereby steam pressure will make a pot placed under the floor turn on its axis, so wind a rope round itself, and this rope, running through a god's statue standing above, causes the image's arm to wave a Hitler salute to the people."

The vapour was emitted from the god's mouth as though the god were breathing.

To induce people to sacrifice their lives in war (which was involved in the protection of the property of the theocracy), the priesthood invented the theory of the immortality of the soul, by which the people were led to believe in the possibility of some projection of life from this earth on to a separate universe, in which, if the canons of the priesthood were obeyed on this earth, there was due reward guaranteed; while those who obeyed the priesthood were promised a second existence of everlasting or painful punishment. Eventually war was excused by all religions on the interesting casuistry under which individual murder was condemned but collective murder hallowed and justified as righteous and noble conduct by its participants. It is not without significance that all nations in wartime invoke the aid of God: yet God, if He takes any interest in the matter, cannot well be on both sides in war, the purpose of which is the achievement of victory by one side at the expense of the other. In the 8,780 wars which have been recorded since historical times there has been no clear evidence that God has taken sides by any supernatural intervention. During this war it has been pointed out that the intercession prayer services have apparently produced in various states the opposite effect to that for which the services were designed. So much so that a correspondent in "The New Statesman and Nation," in its issue of June 21st, 1940, urged that the English Archbishops should institute intercession services for Italy and Germany as a means of procuring the defeat of those countries!

One of the difficulties which lie in the way of the conscientious objector and the pacifist is in relying upon religious objection to war rather than resting their repulsion to all forms of war upon moral principle. The conscientious objector, when stating his case to any Court, is at once met by the argument from authority, which declares with absolute truth that the authorities of the Roman Catholic, the Anglican, the Mohammedan, the follicon, or the Judaic theocracies, have not only never condemned war as a general principle, but have justified it always on the particular occasion. Quaker and other sects (which do not acknowledge authority in religious doctrines) tend to support the pacific view of life; but, here again, there is no unanimity.

One example can be given of the difficulty in deriving any certainty of guidance from religious bodies on this important question by two quotations from the Old Testament, a book which was asserted for six centuries to be inspired, and to be treated as the voice of God speaking to man. Micah, chapter 4, verse 3, contains the following direction from the Almighty guide: "And they shall beat their swords in ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not life up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." In Joel, chapter 3, verses 9 and 10, the following instruction is given: "Proclaim ye this among the gentiles: Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near; let them come up. Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears." Those two passages can hardly be paralleled in literature for the radicality of their contradiction on the same subject matter. It is not surprising, therefore, that humble-minded conscientious objectors can easily be tripped up by the modern casuists who have succeeded the Roman Procurator in sitting in judgment on one view of the Christian ideal. Yet a moment's reflection would show the reason for this contradiction. As all the religious hierarchies rest upon economic privileges and sanction the principle of the exploitation of labour involved in the system of the private ownership of land and capital, it is natural for them to support the military profession in all its forms and actions.

Yet those who most fiercely criticise the conscientious objector entirely overlook the fact that most wars end by one army refusing to continue the fight any longer, as indeed most battles end. Very few armies in practice adopt the politician's adjuration to their people to "fight to the bitter end." This is an absurd phrase, for why fight if "the end" is to be "bitter," as the context would imply? The conscientious objector is only doing at the beginning what the soldier does at the end. In 1917, Russia went out of the war because the Russian Army refused to go on fighting. At Kut, one section of the British Army declined to continue the fight against the Turks and surrendered. A section of the Italian Army has just done the same thing in Lybia. The German Army in 1918 refused to fight any further, as did sections of the Polish Army in 1939, and as did sections of the Belgian, Dutch and French armies in 1940. Armies will only continue in the field provided there is a reasonable chance of success at not too great a loss of life in casualties. Armies also know that those who urge them "to fight to the bitter end" will be the first to flee to safety when things have gone against their particular side on the battlefield. The political leaders only indulge in vicarious fighting "to the end" by their speeches, addressed from say, Canada, Madagascar, Indo-China, or from London to Vichy.

Oscar Wilde, in his charming essay, "The Decay of Lying," remarked that Life imitated Art much more than Art was inspired by Life, pointing out that the English never knew there were such things as sunsets till Turner painted them! This piece of gay raillery had a singular justification in recent times. Mr. Bernard Shaw, in his play, "Major Barbara," in Act 3, puts these words into the mouth of Undershaft, the munitions millionaire: "I am the government of your country. You will make war when it suits us and peace when it does not." In the investigation held by the Special Committee of the United State Senate into the U.S. Munitions Industry and its responsibility for the entry of the United States into the war of 1914-1918, a memorandum was produced of July 23, 1923, from the Du Pont-Nemours Company, written by Major Casey, an official of that Company, in which the Major declared in criticism of the attitude of Congress towards the Munitions Industry: "This is our Country and not the Country Congress," meaning that the Munitions Industry controlled the United States, as Undershafe said of Great Britain in the play. Whereupon Senator Clark commented: "That is about the coolest statement that has yet been made, Major, as to the ownership of this country." But it was the fact, as the recent histories of Germany, Italy, Russia, France, Britain, Japan, and the United States amply show to those who care to face the facts without fear or favour.

The successful preparation for and carrying on of war is dependent upon two so-called moral principles: (1) Patriotism (which is the abnegation of the mind and, therefore, has no moral validity at all); (2) Discipline (which is the perfection of self-coruption in its doctrine of absolute obedience and, therefore, equally is without moral validity). It is here that the conscientious objector should take his stand in asertion of his statutory right rather than involve himself in the contradictions of religious doctrines, on which those who speak with authority can be arrayed against the humble mind. True, the founder of Christianity, himself a humble man gifted with the tongue of men and angels, in Matthew 5, 6 and 7, declared himself in a manner utterly inconsistent with any belief in war as a sanction in human society, as did Paul in the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians, chapter 13; none the less, Pacifism is not a religious principle in any exact meaning, but a moral principle resting on conscience, not on superstition or authority.

The tribunals which are engaged in judging the good faith of conscientious objectors seem rather in the position of the Procurator of Judea, as described by Anatole France in his story recounting the conversation between Aelius Lamia and Pontius Pilate during the latter's retirement. "I learn by chance," said Lamia, "that she had attached herself to a small company of men and women who were followers of a young Galilean thanmaturgist. His name was Jesus; He came from Nazareth, and He was crucified for some crime, I don't quite know what. Pontius, do you remember anything about the man?" "Pontius Pilate contracted his brows, and his hand rose to his forehead in the attitude of one who probes the deeps of memory. Then after a silence of some seconds—'Jesus?' he murmured, 'Jesus of Nazareth? I cannot call him to mind." Nor, apparently, can many of those sitting in judgment on the conscientious objector in Britain.

WHY JESUS WEPT

The Vanguard, Glasgow, for March, 1941, quotes two items from the January Word, one dealing with Sir Patrick Dollan, and the other with the Orpheus Choir Ban.

The same issue of our contemporary notices "Why Jesus Wept." The editor, Mr. A. Ratcliffe, says:—

"Why Jesus Wept," by Guy A. Aldred. . . .The author is an atheist, and one wonders why he should be so interested in the fact that Jesus wept. For to Mr. Aldred Jesus was just an ordinary human being! This pamphlet is really a series of essays, and we do not think that much of it is of interest to Protestants. The popular theory that Jesus wept because of the hypocrisy of the religionists is plainly urged by the writer, and it seems to be claimed that Jesus has reason to weep to-day for the very same reason. Our opinion as to why Jesus wept differs from the popular view. We think that Jesus wept because of the faithlessness of his followers: we believe that what grieved the Lord was that His followers did not have sufficient trust in Him. To read Mr. Aldred's pamphlet of 72 pp. will not, we believe, greatly help the believer in Jesus. At the same time, a reading of "Why Jesus Wept" cannot do anyone any harm.

We invite our readers to buy the pamphlet and so judge the issue for themselves.

CONSCIENCE AND EDUCATION

BY ANNESLEY G. ALDRED

When, under the terms of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, opponents of militarism were graciously granted the legal right to have a conscience, the so-called democratic method of government was considered to have justified itself by this one act of tolerance alone. It was taken for granted that the Conscientious objectors to this war would receive both understanding and justice and that there would be no victimisation "this time."

Of course that was in the months when, though the shadow of war was heavy, we were still at peace. An uneasy peace, to be sure, but still without the hatred and bitterness engendered by war. Then came the war and any illusion that understanding and justice could survive in such an atmosphere was speedily destroyed.

The C.O. Tribunals started off, for the most part, by really trying to do their jobs, even if they did make it rather obvious that they considered those who appeared before them to be both adolescent and mentally backward. But the temper changed rapidly, and soon it became a question not of trying to judge conscience but of forcing the last ounce of compromise out of the applicants, with no attempt at concealing their hatred and spleen towards those who refused to surrender their conscientious beliefs.

At the same time the economic victimisation of C.O.'s also gathered momentum. In spite of pious hopes expressed by the Ministry of Labour, which carefully took no steps to enforce them, headlines such as "Town Council Sacks C.O.'s" became so common that they hardly merited notice, and the only surprise was when some rare Council showed that they still had a sense of equity by refusing to victimise those of their employees who stood by their conscience.

The fact is that, notwithstanding the ever-increasing number who are going to prison rather than forsake their principles, the economic weapon has, up to the present, been regarded as a far more efficient way of bludgeoning C.O.'s into some form of compromise. And it is because of it's very efficiency in that direction that the wholesale dismissals have been accepted as serving that purpose and that purpose only.

But is that, in fact, the case. A closer examination of the individual cases of victimisation reveals the fact that there are an extraordinarily large number of teachers amongst them. Moreover in the rare cases, already referred to, when some Council has declined to dismiss them, there has inevitably been a determined protest from the local "Colonel Blimps" informing the world what they would do with all pacifists, and being righteously indignant at the idea of pacifists teaching their children.

All this raises the question as to whether there is not a strong reason why such indignation should be aroused, and why such a determined attack should be made on teachers. Is it not possible that one of the particular "objectives" aimed at during the seemingly indiscriminate attack on pacifists is to destroy this pacifist sphere of influence? An attack which is impelled by the fear that if the younger generation should have an opportunity to hear both sides of the question they might refuse to have anything to do with another war, even if they are too young to have an immediate influence on this one?

It has long been an accepted axiom of power and place-seeking religious and political bodies that, if they had the opportunity to exert their influence on children during their most impressionable years, they could easily instil a belief in their doctrines, however false or bigoted those doctrines might be.

Pacifists and Socialists, on the other hand, have, because of their inherent belief in freedom of thought, refused to accept such methods as legitimate; have, on the whole, refused to stress their ideas before children, preferring to give them only the unbiased truth and leaving them to form their own opinions when the power to reason was matured.

But even the opportunity to do that occurs all too seldom and the task becomes the almost impossible one of creating understanding in mature minds which have been hopelessly warped by the falsehood and hatred which has been inculcated into them.

Little wonder, then, that Pacifist propaganda has failed to overcome the ruthless propaganda methods of the munition-monger and war-profiteer. Little wonder that the war-mongers are afraid that the Pacifists have learnt that, for the sake of civilisation, they must overcome their scruples in this direction.

These war-mongers and militarists know, as well as we do, that in the end the flood-tide of human knowledge and understanding will overcome all obstacles. They know, too, that a day will dawn when mankind will refuse to resort to violence.

Their task is to postpone that day; ours is to speed it. Nor must we let our confidence in the ultimate triumph of our ideals cause us to relax our efforts even in these dark hours when those efforts may seem wasted. The attacks on those Teachers who proclaim themselves Pacifists can only be explained on the grounds that there are some who are already looking towards the next war.

Our resolve must be quite definite. By every ounce of influence, by every method of education, on every occasion we must proclaim the truth of our ideals. Every bombed-out adult who asks why this has happened to him, or her, should be told the truth as we see it; should be made to realise that in all the many cities of the world, where the people are suffering they are asking the same questions. Every frightened child who wants to know why bombs are dropping should be told how wrong and silly it all is; should be told to be brave because other little children are brave in "other cities, even enemy cities;" should have it explained that one day such horrors will end for ever.

The issue is quite clear for every Pacifist. It should be equally clear to every Socialist, even those who feel they must support this war. Never again must worker march against worker in military array. The end of this war must be the end of all war.

JOAD'S "REPENTED PACIFISM."

At a sitting of the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal held at Reading on Tuesday, April 15, Ralph Edwin Joad, 20-year-old son of Dr. C. E. M. Joad, applied for exemption from military service. Joad is an agricultural student at Reading University and he based his claim on ethical grounds.

Dr. Joad wrote stressing to the sincerity of his son's views. He pointed out that he himself was a conscientious objector in the last war, and for some time was chairman of the National Peace Council. He added:

"I have since repented my pacifism and am convinced that we must beat the Nazis, and I am pretty actively engaged in the war effort."

Ralph Joad was ordered to do full-time agricultural or civil defence work.

DEMOCRACY MEANS TOLERANCE.

The following excellent letter to the editor was published in the Baltimore Sun, U.S.A., for March 1, 1941, under the heading, Conscientious Objectors:—

Sir,—Every act of tolerance is a vote of confidence in democracy. I am a militant Methodist, but I rejoice that conscientious objectors are to be allowed to serve in camps of forestry and not be thrown into prison.

Moreover, I speak up for those who "conscientiously object" to saluting the flag. Foolish as it seems to refuse, it is not an act of treason, and neither parent nor child should be punished for the refusal by the exclusion of the child from school.

PICKTHORN'S UNHAPPY CONSCIENCE

Conchies to Fight—M.P.'s to be Exempt!

In Truth, London, for April 4 last, Kenneth Pickthorn, M.P., who sits for Cambridge University, reviews the debate in the House of Commons, on Wednesday, March 26, last, when John McGovern moved the rejection of the second reading of the National Service Bill. The voting was as follows:—

Ayes: 176, plus 2 tellers. This included C. G. Ammon, who was a conscientious objector during the Great War, and has been exposed by us in Government By Labour (1924) and At Grips With War (1929).

Noes 4, plus 2 tellers:

Buchanan, G.
Gallacher, W.
Salter, Dr. A.
Sloan, A.

Tellers: James Maxton & John McGovern.

Pickthorn's article opens with a sneering definition of conscience:—

"What is conscience? It used to be what made cowards of us all, and now it is what makes martyrs of as many of us as choose to take just enough stock in it, in a limited liability kind of way. . . . If suffering is the badge of conscience, it is not enough of a distinction nowadays: there are too many who suffer, and the martyrs do not suffer enough."

Pickthorn proceeds to describe the debate, selecting for special notice John McGovern and Rhys Davies:

"What the champions and spokemen of conscience tell is not very helpful. The House of Commons, for instance, has recently heard the voices of Mr. Rhys Davies and Mr. McGovern, voices neither still nor small, but not very clear either, unfortunately. It might be excessive to say that Mr. Rhys Davies was more turgid than usual, but it is only fair to say that Mr. McGovern was less clear than he can be.

"Mr. McGovern quoted the present Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Ministry of Labour, who, in the days when his conscience prevented him from military service, wrote: . . ."

Here follows an excerpt from the Court-Martial Statement.

We publish an article on Creech Jones in another column. This Court-Martial statement has appeared in these columns already, and was quoted presumably by McGovern from them. There is no need for further repetition. Pickthorn seizes on the passage in which Creech Jones told the Court-Martial that, since he had devoted his life to change the social system, he could not, on moral grounds, form any part in a military organisation.

Pickthorn attacks this excellent statement, and even Creech Jones for making it, in order to denounce McGovern. He comments:—

"Mr. McGovern objected that this (and there was much more of it) was inconsistent with service at the Ministry of Labour and with support of the National Service Bill. The objection may be valid: but what is much more interesting is that it never occurs to a man of Mr. McGovern's perspicacity to question whether this sort of stuff is consistent within itself. Is it conscience that makes a man self-conscously 'give the whole of his leisure in earnest work to uplift his fellows'? Should not conscience be too keenly on the look-out for non-sequitur to jump all the steps from the consciousness of superiority and benevolence to: therefore I cannot allow myself to be shot at, or even to help those who will?"

This is not an attack on McGovern merely. It dismissed Creech Jones's statement made at his Court-Martial with the sneering, "this sort of stuff." Would friend Pickthorn have had the courage to face the Court-Martials, and to endure the long weary imprisonment that was endured by our comrade, Creech Jones? Of course it was conscience, and the vision that makes conscience a vital element in human character and social progress, that made Creech Jones struggle for the emancipation of humanity.

Pretending to defend Creech Jones, Pickthorn admits the force of McGovern's charge of inconsistency, and then by sneering inference, accuses Jones of being a prig, self-consciously superior and benevolent to his fellows in attitude of mind. Pickthorn indicts Jones as a coward hiding behind snobbery: for he makes Jones say:

"therefore I cannot allow myself to be shot at, or even to help those who will."

The emphasis on the "therefore" is made by Pickthorn. It charges Jones with moral insensibility.

Pickthorn and Jones may sometimes vote in the same lobby. They may tend to support the same Government Coalition. But they are miles apart in their understanding. Pickthorn's attack on Jones proceeds not merely from an objection to scruples of conscience. He objects to Jones for political and class reasons. Jones subscribes, as well as a parliamentary Socialist can, to the Socialist conception. He believes in the working-class struggle. Pickthorn looks forward with dread to that struggle renewing itself and supplanting the war effort. He hates the reality of the social war; and he hates Creech Jones as defining that reality. The deepest of all hatred, class hatred, is behind this sneering, treacherous defence of the attitude at present adopted by Creech Jones.

Pickthorn makes this fact clear in his very next sentence. He says:—

"If there is here, as I believe, inconsistency, and if Mr. McGovern, who does not generally miss much, fails to spot it, that is probably because his eyes are clouded by some unwillingness on his own part to comb and card the verbal wool: he champions 'political objectors,' who 'make no bones about it.'"

He proceeds to discuss what is meant by a religious objection, a conscientious objection, and a moral objection. He adds:—

"How does 'political objection' fit into this series? It is not self-evident, and we ought to be told. I suspenet that what is meant is that an objection on grounds of policy is a conscientious objection if it is really held and not merely simulated. The truth is that a political objection to the action, especially the warlike action, of the legitimate government of one's country is conscientiously held only when it has been painfully and regretfully thought out, and that even then it is not necessarily a conscientious objection."

And who shall say that Creech Jones did not painfully and regretfully think out his objection to war in 1916? Who shall say that it was not allied to a moral and to a religious objection? Who shall say that the Socialist objector to the present war does not think out his objection painfully and regretfully?

Pickthorn proceeds to attack Rhys Davies:

"Mr. Rhys Davies's notion of the connection between conscience and politics was at once simpler and more muddled than Mr. McGovern's. He seemed to think it important, and the more important because the Home Secretary knew it, that 'the vast majority' of conscientious objectors 'are members of the working class, and that a large number are probably members of the Labour Party.'

"He threw another sidelight also on the relation between conscience and politics; he was much concerned lest a conscientious objector might 'be conscripted to be a War Reserve policeman.' It did not seem to occur to him that this raised the whole question whether a conscientious objector to military service is entitled to avail himself of civil government. And, indeed, when the Home Secretary said that 'it would not suit' him to call up 'conscientious objectors to the use of violence to serve in the police force,' it did not (apparently) occur to him that this raised the question when and why he himself had given up his conscientious objection to the use of violence.

"And there was another question which Mr. Rhys Davies raised without appearing to be aware of it, the question whether all Christian objectors object to war because they are Christians or whether some of them are Christians because they find that the most convenient way of objecting to war.

Rhys Davies was right, and the comment made by Pickthorn is dishonest. It conceals the fact that Davies was referring to the penalty of 2 years' imprisonment or £100 fine or both. He argued that working-class youths could not pay such a fine.

The comment on the War Reserve Policeman hits at the argument put up by Bevin in defence of the measure. Bevin urged, wrongly in our opinion, that one could have a conscientious objection to war, but not to the State nor to the State's right of compulsion. If Bevin's argument is sound, Pickthorn's logic is nonsense.

The curious reasoning as to which comes first, Christian conviction or conscientious objection to war, is Pickthorn's reaction to the reply made by Mr. Davies to an interruption by Mr. Pickthorn. Mr. Pickthorn quotes the reply:—

"If any hon. Member can prove to me that the Saviour who died on Calvary two thousand years ago would join the British, French, German or Italian armies at any time, I would never darken the door of a Christian church again."

Pickthorn makes the stupid aside comment: "This is to darken counsel indeed." It is to do no such thing. Davies was coming to grips with reality and demanding that Christians embrace in their own lives Christian teaching.

Pickthorn should have given the prelude to this remark of Davies. The latter was speaking. He said:—

"Not very long ago I stood on a mount called Calvary, where the greatest of my Hon. Friend's noble race died for conscience, and not all the power of the Roman Empire could alter His attitude. He preferred to die for his conscience rather than submit to the rule of the tribunals of the Romans.

"Mr. Pickthorn (Cambridge University): 'He did not claim to be exempted.'"

This is quoted from the Official Report. Rhys Davies retorted as quoted. And he was right. The argument shows no muddle in Davies's thinking. Only in Pickthorn's. If Jesus did not claim to be exempted, as Pickthorne says; if he would not have gone before a Tribunal; then he would have been victimised under this very Bill that Pickthorn supported. The Bill is designed to victimise such as Jesus, who would not have claimed to be exempted, and to protect those who claim exemption successfully. That is Bevin's test of conscience and entire argument. Obviously, Pickthorn obeyed the Whips, and voted in the wrong lobby.

We need not follow the argument further. Pickthorn writes a great deal more about conscience's claim to special indulgence, courage, hypocrisy, and the ex-conscientious objector, who accepts office of importance. But he says nothing about the claim of the pro-war, anti-conscientious objector M.P., who claimed that no M.P. should be liable under the National Service Act.

Pickthorn moved in this direction on April 1. This claim was strenuously attacked by McGovern and was not pressed to a division. All the speeches on this phase of the question ought to be read. The main ones we will reprint or quote fully as occasion permits.

It would seem that Pickthorn has no religious, nor moral, nor political objection to war. He has merely a parliamentary objection to war service. He claims special indulgence in the matter. Would he say that the arguments we have analysed entitle him to obtain the special indulgence he claims. Ought he to be exempt because he sits, somewhat stupidly, for Cambridge University, whilst Christian and Socialist objectors to war, genuine friends of humanity, are compelled to kill their fellow human beings with the weapons of modern totalitarian war, or endure persecution for their refusal to do so?

We submit the question to the consideration of the workers outside the House of Commons. They know the attitude of the University-elect towards the workers during the 1926 so-called General Strike.

"ON TWO FRONTS."

Corder Catchpool served with the Friends' Ambulance Unit during the Great War until conscription came. Then he returned to England to resist conscription. He received 4 Court-Martials. When his last sentence was read out, he wore the Mons ribbon for bravery in saving life under fire. His story is told in On Two Fronts and will be retold in our columns. There can be no question as to the physical or the moral courage of Corder Catchpool. He proved that he did not fear to lose his life saving life on the field of battle, and he did not fear to oppose public opinion in war-time.

As a member of the Friends' Committee concerned with 18B detainers, Corder Catchpool brings to consideration of these cases knowledge acquired in prison during war-time. Among the cases placed before the Committee is that of John Beckett.

Was I not justified in referring to a Government that relied on such men as Fulton, assisted by the clamour of the then Blumenfeld-edited Daily Express, as a conspiracy against the Constitution, a despotism flourishing on treason against the Constitution, a despotism flourishing on treason against the liberties of the people? Was I not justified in laying stress upon "misrepresentations, prejudices, passions, and ignorance of those whose boast is law and order"?

APATHY AND THE DRIFT TOWARDS DESPOTISM.

There are many persons alive to-day who realise the part played by clamour in entrenching social wrong. In 1909 these folk were unwilling to recognise this fact and even endorsed the clamour. From this indifference, apathy, or stupid concurrence, has flown that tide of war and suffering along which the world is drifting to chaos and a revolution of hunger rather than of mind. In 1909 I was the constitutionalist, not the barrister who appeared against me; not the jury who convicted me, nor the judge who lectured and sentenced me. My desire was to save the world from chaos.

I ask my readers to turn to the legal reports of the 1909 trial and to note the names of the legal luminaries who appeared on behalf of the prosecution. It is amazing to reflect that it required more lawyers than warders to consign me to durance vile. Nearly all became judges or police court stipendiaries or received high legal appointments. How few of them aimed at being jurists, and so using their academic training to serve the people, to uphold principles of law and social concord, to develop conditions of justice! Let the reader consider the destiny of my opponents, proud of their wig and gown distinction, and then return to the record of the lawyers of the Paine-Carlile periods. They will discover a similar study of progress from bar to bench, of servitude to power, of reason perverted to gain and status. A story of legal drift to social disaster, of intellect skating on the carpet of class pretension stretched across an abyss of oppression, of culture doomed for want of thought and social understanding.

The judges of the Carlile period, and the judge who condemned me in 1909, with the barristers and solicitors who earned their bread by procuring condemnation, created the precedent of clamorous ignorance which pretends that the suspension of habeas corpus, and denial of civil liberty in the terms of 18B, are firm expressions of constitutional law. My condemnation in 1909, the subsequent prosecutions of 1912, the graver prosecutions of 1921, cleared the way for further extra-judicial inroads upon the liberty of the individual who dares to think, speak truly according to his lights, and boasts some amount of public spirit.

THOMAS JOHNSTON'S OPINION IN 1912.

In 1911, I revised and rewrote the "life" of Richard Carlile and published it serially in the columns of the Herald of Revolt, before reissuing it in booklet form. Forward, edited by Thomas Johnston, in its issue for March 30, 1912, reproduced nearly the whole of the second chapter of that "life," and credited me with having gathered

"Some interesting historical information on the persecutions of the Mutiny Act period—the period that the Attorney-General and his capitalist backers regard as the 'Golden Age.'"

This was said well. Only, through parliamentarism, Johnston now finds himself for the second time in the Cabinet and for the third time in the Government. The present 18B Government looks back to the Mutiny Act period as the "Golden Age," which they fain would have us enjoy as our forefathers did before us, ere they revolted!

It is not my intention to detail, in the present essay, the 1921 Glasgow High Court trial of Rex v. Aldred, Patrick, and others; to consider the career of the late Lord Skerrington, who presided and denounced me so vigorously as a ring-leader; and of the late A. M. MacRobert, K.C., who prosecuted.

The 1921 trial was an improvement on the 1909 London prosecution. No one pretended that the prosecution was a private matter between the Government and myself. John McGovern, now M.P. for Shettleston, had no idea of entering Parliament at that time. My 110 days' imprisonment, without bail, pending trial, found him most vigorous in my interest. After my sentence he loyally and actively identified himself with my cause and spared no effort to serve me. William Gallacher—with no prospects of a parliamentary career before him, and not yet called upon to defend the wholesale suppressions, persecutions, and murders of Moscow—eulogised my defence in the columns of The Worker. Harry McShane, not yet a Communist Party parrot, reported the trial very fully in The Socialist. Patrick Dollan, not yet Lord Provost, and so still unknighted, reported my arrest, trial, defence, serially in the columns of The Daily Herald, then controlled entirely by the Labour Movement. Dollan noted every effective point made in my speech for the defence and eulogised my stand. These reports belong to the history of the social struggle and will be reproduced in due course. The present status and activities of the persons I have mentioned prove that, despite appearances to the contrary, I was still alone in what the ruling class apologists term my seditious tendencies.

SOCIALISM AND 18B.

That essential loneliness explains my almost isolated Socialist protest against the 18B arrests of to-day. Most of the victims were, at some time or another, associated with Fascism. In my eyes that does not affect their right to be charged and tried by judge and jury. In my time I have demanded justice for Anarchists. During the last war I had to protest against clamour against conscientious objectors. I still uphold the constitutional right of citizens, irrespective of opinion. I look back to the 1921 prosecutions.

The then discretions and alliances of the parliamentary Socialist, not yet arrived, were but the diplomatic expressions of reformist opportunism. Time has shown that such opportunism is fatal to every principle of democracy and to all requirements of jurisprudence. My 1909 stand was correct. My admiration of Paine, and, even more, of Carlile, was correct. Parliamentarism defines neither justice nor democracy: parliamentarism has no respect for the principles of jurisprudence. The learned definition of sedition given by Mr. Justice Coleridge in 1909 was unfair as an indictment of my attitude towards freedom and the social struggle. The denunciation of my low notion of parliamentarism by Lord Skerrington in 1921 was no less unjust. Skerrington implied that I had no respect for constitutional justice as a principle of nature, as the essential element of the social contract, invisible but vital, that link men and women together in society, that is higher than all class division and all military conflict. Such constitutional justice is superior to decrees of kings inspired by the frenzy of divine right illusions, and above all Star Chamber decrees. The principles of such constitutional justice are greater than the legislative enactments of any suicide parliament sacrificing the right of the individual to think and speak and act except as the tool and subject of the State executive.

To-day, we know that Socialist Parliamentarism has continued the rule of militarist and class society; that it belongs to the same category of clamour as Radical Parliamentarism that went before; to the same category of clamour as Tory Parliamentarism. Socialist Parliamentarism has broadened the basis of class-society's political corruption and so extended the structure of the pyramid of tyranny.

PARLIAMENTARIANS AND THE STAR CHAMBER

If the present Dukes of Bedford or Wellington read the reports of my 1909 trial in the London Times, or accounts of my 1921 trial in the general press, I do not suppose that they reflected on the significance of such prosecution. On the contrary, doubtless they felt that I was wrong. But I feel that the indifference to the principles of the 1909 prosecution; and the non-understanding of the import of the 1921 case, which bristled with illegalities, that no one considered important, has led, through the growing executive power of the post-war years, by the power of clamour over reason, to the present 18B destruction of constitutional rights of the citizen. Tory and Labour parliamentarians have united in Britain to re-establish Star Chamber justice, actually asserting in modern form the old stupid dictatorship ideal of the divine right of kings or of the central executive. They have done this, because in Europe, parliamentarians, Tory and Socialist, failed to establish commonwealth and so plunged civilisation into the violence of chaos.

Thus it is clear that I was right, when in 1909, I asserted that I stood alone in the Old Bailey Court Room for constitutional right: that my jailers, my prosecutors, the judge and jury, were all using legal terms to perpetuate constitutional wrong, and so finally to annul or to overthrow constitutional right. It is clear that I was right during the panic days of 1921, in once more attempting to uphold constitutional right when, after passing through the various preliminary stages of arrest and detention, I found myself in the dock with my few comrades in the Glasgow High Court, facing prosecutors, judge, and jury again. On both occasions I was accused of violence because I disbelieved in violence. On both occasions I was accused of planning constitutional outrage when I was upholding constitutional rights. I pleaded in vain to be heard. Clamour silenced me. To-day, my very enemies are forced to realise that I was right. And so, expecting at last to be heard, I assert the constitutional rights of man against all appearances of law and all expressions of power that deny the rights of man.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN

The Rights of Man were defined in the American Declaration of Independence, although no longer subscribed to by many American politicians. The Rights of Man were defined by Thomas Paine and Richard Carlile. Lawyers have ridiculed these Rights of Man, but they remain the bulwark of human happiness and human well-being. It is the duty of citizens, inspired by a sense of public affection, to uphold those rights in these days of stress and storm. These Rights, maintained, conserve society. Denied, they will revolutionise society.

Proudhon had a clear idea of how militarist society must give way to industrial society. He had a clear vision of reaction being but the prelude to revolution. His notion of parliamentarism was no less correct. Proudhon, the enemy of violence, the anticipator of free society, has described how social change must come until the rights of every human being are established finally for ever: "Like the Nemesis of old, whom neither prayers nor threats could move, the revolution advances, with sombre and inevitable tread, over the flowers with which its devotees strew its path, through the blood of its champions, and over the bodies of its enemies."

Nemesis is the goddess of vengeance, prepared to reward the virtuous, and to destroy the vicious. She is one of the infernal deities, and is the daughter of Nox, who is the daughter of Chaos. Nemesis is the grand-daughter of Chaos. Which is proof that pagan mythology is not far removed from truth and an appreciation of the first principles of modern social struggle.

THE SCOTTISH SECRETARIAT

THOMAS JOHNSTON'S EVOLUTION

In this Journal we have dealt, very thoroughly, with the career of Lord Provost Sir Patrick Dollan. That story belongs to the history of Parliamentary Socialism in Scotland. It is our intention, at an early date, to collect our exposures into one pamphlet, devoted to this record of failure and careerism. Important chapters in that work will be devoted to the career of Thomas Johnston, M.P., at present Secretary of State for Scotland.

Johnston's political comments and activities have been discussed in these columns as follows:

(1) October, 1939. On his appointment as Regional Defence Commissioner for Scotland. His Forward writings during the Great War, and his later attack on John McGovern, are recalled and quoted.

(2) February, 1940. Under the title "A Calendar of Codology," Johnston's description of Barnes and Henderson, for entering the War Cabinet, "whilst capital class-consciousness was in control of the State," as doing so "on the decoy duck principle."

These issues are obtainable still Pending the publication of the new pamphlet mentioned, and until the small stocks in hand are exhausted, comrades should secure copies, if they have not kept those issued by them. To-day, they make better reading even than when first published.

References, with full quotations from his political commentary, are made to Thomas Johnston in Socialism and Parliament, 1934, revised edition, as follows:—

Chapter III., Page 15. This comments on the suspension of Wheatley, the tameness of the Labour Party in the Cabinet, and the need for Socialist opinion in the country.

Chapter IV., Page 19. His attack on the Parliamentary Labour Party, for decreeing that the Party must stand to "God Save The King." This refers to the Neil MacLean incident and Jack Jones's censure. The full quotation from Johnston contains this sentence:—

"The average Socialist spits on the ground and crosses himself when he thinks about the Parliamentary Labour Party."

Appendix VII., Page 81. This is an appendix to chapter xiv. of the book, tracing the political history of Ramsay MacDonald, and showing how the I.L.P. supported him in his political vagaries, digressions, and devious evolution. In 1917, MacDonald urged a Balfour-Asquith Government. Notwithstanding MacDonald's record, Johnston, in May, 1925, eulogised MacDonald as "The Covenanter turned Prime Minister." Johnston's fulsome eulogy is quoted at length in this appendix. It should be added that it was published with the consent and with the approval of the I.L.P.

With these facts and references before him, we ask the reader to study these further chapters on the evolution of Thomas Johnston.

I. THE ARMED FORCES VOTING.

Ramsay MacDonald retained William Adamson as Secretary of State for Scotland in his 1929 (Second Labour) Government. But he dropped J. Stewart (St. Rollox), the barber, as Under-Secretary. In his place, he appointed Thomas Johnston. The reappointment defined the reactionary character of MacDonald's second Labour Administration. The 1931 National Government consequence was in line with MacDonald's 1917 ideal of a Balfour-Asquith National Government. Not immediate crisis, but the trend of MacDonald's political mind dictated this course. Johnston's membership of the Churchill Government in 1941 shows how completely Toryism belongs to Labour politics, and how unreal have been past Labour Party denunciations of the present Prime Minister.

Adamson's reactionary toadyism during the war period was notorious. Ramsay MacDonald commented on it frequently, and Thomas Johnston often denounced it in scathing terms. The denunciation was merited.

In Government by Labour (1928), page 34, we reproduce Ramsay MacDonald's attack on Adamson for depriving "the Socialist sections of their direct contact with the Socialist International" (Forward, April 18, 1918). We quote the Labour Leader's attack on Adamson for his "feeble criticism" of Government (April 24, 1919), also the same journal's denunciation of his militarism, November 1, 1917. But our best excerpt is culled from an article contributed by Thomas Johnston to the Forward for June 5, 1918.

Johnston depicted Adamson's toadyism in these uncompromising terms:—

"More men who wear the livery. Wm. Anderson, M.P., takes a Privy Councillorship. . . . We waste no sympathy upon them. The Government dragged its net wide this time. Thousands of jokers have been ennobled, including three already ennobled Highnesses, but only five Labour men appear to have fallen."

In 1918, Johnston denounced Adamson as one of the fallen, one of the men who wear the livery. Eleven years later, he shared the livery with him. To-day, Adamson's complete mantle has fallen upon him. We are sure that the Capitalist press, which eulogised Johnston, will endorse this statement; because that same press praised Adamson when Johnston denounced him. So that, from the viewpoint of Johnston's capitalist admirers, it is the same livery. Which is our most just complaint.

That Adamson was indeed one of the fallen, in thought as well as in fact, he laboured hard to make clear in a circular that he issued as Secretary of State for Scotland, in April, 1924. Here is a remarkable extract:—

"Mr. Adamson made it his first task to acquaint himself with the actual facts. It was A REAL RELIEF TO HIM to find that his apprehensions as to the wide prevalence of avoidable hardship were unfounded."

Why did Adamson not acquaint himself with these "facts" before taking office? Was his "real relief" justified? Was there not a wide prevalence of avoidable hardship still extant when Thomas Johnston became Scottish Secretary in 1941? And may we be forgiven for smiling at Adamson's quaint third-personal reference to himself? Quite a touch of pomp and circumstance, an undeserved sense of importance.

On pages 34 to 43 of Government By Labour, we tell the story of the Army Annual Bill being considered in Committee, April, 1924. We tell the famous and intriguing story of the five amendments, and list the members of the 1929 Labour Government who voted with Adamson in 1924. Some of these persons are dead. Others are no longer M.P.'s.

Adamson voted against the following four amendments:—

(1) The abolition of the death penalty.

(2) Right of Appeal against death sentence by Court-Martial to the Court of Criminal Appeal.

(3) Right of a soldier to refuse to be used in industrial disputes.

(4) Attendances at church parades or religious service to be voluntary.

The following persons—who became members of the 1929 Government with him, and sit in the House to-day—voted with him against these amendments in 1924:—

(1) C. G. Ammon, a conscientious objector during the Great War, and Parliamentary and Financial Secretary to the Admiralty in 1929.

(2) William Lunn.

(3) Major C. R. Atlee.

(4) J. R. Clynes.

The following member of the House to-day, and of the 1929 Government, voted with Adamson against the abolition of the death penalty in 1924:—Thomas Kennedy.

Major Attlee, as Under-Secretary of State for the War Office, opposed the Second Amendment. Thomas Johnston urged the House to accept the Amendment and denounced the Death Penalty. He declared that Attlee had not answered the point of the Amendment, which proposed to give a man convicted by Court-Martial and sentenced to death the right of legal appeal. Specific cases existed where a man had been shot under circumstances that outraged feelings. He added:—

"Hon. Members may find a case reported on the 12th April last year in the Official Report, a case vouched for by the present Colonial Secretary and by the Financial Secretary to the War Office. I think that it was the Financial Secretary who read out the gruesome details to this House. I have never read a more atrocious story in my life. The case cannot be disputed at all. I think it alone affords a very strong argument why the Amendment that has been moved from these Benches should be accepted by the Government, and, indeed, by the whole Committee."

"Surely no hon. Gentlemen opposite who are Army officers or ex-Army officers can take exception upon grounds of discipline to this Amendment, and I trust that the Government—the Front Bench who supported this Amendment a year ago—will accept it now. For the life of me I cannot see how the attitude towards a condemned man suddenly becomes wrong when we cross the floor of the House.

"Hon. Member—Wait till you are on the Front Bench.

"T. Johnston—If I change my views because I go on to any Front Bench, then I shall lay myself open, and justly so, to the taunt that I am making now."

Johnston later made himself open to the taunt that he made in the House of Commons on April 2, 1924! For one thing, despite his 1924 indignation, in 1926 he concealed deliberately both the truth and his indignation. By calculated lying on this very question of the death penalty on soldiers, he aimed to help his party to power or place a second time.

In Forward, for January 29, 1927, was published, across two columns, the following advertisement:—

"NOW READY.
"The Propaganda Pamphlet.
"For Sale at Meetings.

"SIXTEEN PAGES (Brevier Type.) ONE PENNY

"The Year 1926 Under Tory Profiteers.

"By THOMAS JOHNSTON, M.P.

"This Pamphlet meets the universal demand for a Penny Propaganda Pamphlet. Every fact is culled from the columns of 'Hansard' or the 'Forward.' It is a most conclusive indictment of Tory Profiteer Government.

"It is a collection of the most damning facts of the year 1926, collated after the style of Thomas Johnston's Pamphlet, 'The Huns at Home.' 200,000 copies of 'The Huns at Home' were sold, and its sale had a marked effect upon public opinion prior to the Labour victories of the General Election of 1922.

"This new Pamphlet, 'The Tory Profiteers in 1926,' will have an even greater effect.

"A huge edition is being run off as an advertisement for the 'Forward.' It is obvious that the Pamphlet is being sold under cost of production.

"The offer cannot be repeated. It is first come, first served.

"One Labour M.P. has asked for 5000 copies for his Division."

There followed a statement of terms, and then the appended "boost":—

"Absolutely indispensable for Socialists.

"A complete armoury with which to assail the unconverted."

In later announcements, this diary was said to have contributed to the success of the Labour Party at the polls.

Johnston commenced the publication of this "Socialist Diary" in Forward, for August 14, 1926. No. 4 of the "Diary" was published in the columns of that journal for September 4, 1926. We reproduced its title, and one portion of the "Diary" verbatim in The Commune supplement, dated, September 12, 1926—that listing the M.P.'s who voted for the Death Penalty.

"UNDER THE PROFITEERS.

"A SOCIALIST DIARY FOR 1926

"APRIL.

"THE DEATH PENALTY.
"21/4/26.—House of Commons votes by 269 to 123 in favour of retaining Death Penalty in the Army.
"Among the members in favour of retaining this barbarous 'punishment' were:—"
Here followed a list of 26 Tory Members who had voted for the Death Penalty.

We parallelled this 1926 "Diary" with the following 1924 record:—

"UNDER THE ANTI-PROFITEERS.

"A SOCIALIST DIARY FOR 1924.

"APRIL.

"THE DEATH PENALTY.
"2/4/24.—House of Commons votes by 207 to 136 in favour of retaining Death Penalty in the Army.
"Among the members in favour of retaining this barbarous 'punishment' were:—"
[Here, excluding three members who died before the 1929 Parliament, and two who had retired from parliament owing to 'political' illness, we listed 23 Labour M.P.'s who sat in the 1929 parliament].

So much for the Socialist Diary that Thomas Johnston compiled! His electioneering picture of Wicked Tory Blue versus Righteous Labour Pink was answered by the deadly parallel of fact! The picture served its purpose. It enabled him to be returned to Parliament as a Pale Pink in order that later he might sit in a Tory Blue Cabinet.

The Forward list contained the names of Tories who voted in favour of the Death Penalty in 1926, the Tories being in office!

Our parallel contained the names of the LABOUR M.P.'s who voted in favour of the Death Penalty in 1924, the Labour Party being in office. It did not exhaust the names of the Labour M.P.'s who voted for the Death Penalty. But it included only the names of those members who were Johnston's colleagues in the House in 1924; and yet again, with the five exceptions noted, when as Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, he enjoyed the fruits of his compilation and its effect on the electorate.

II. THE MINISTERIAL SALARY.

Thomas Johnston's change of front goes much further and deeper than the question of his attitude towards the Army Annual Bill.

On January 10, 1920, he wrote, in the columns of Forward, his view of Cabinet Ministers' salaries:—

"And now the I.L.P. must begin to prepare itself for a Labour Government, Messrs. J. H. Thomas and J. R. Clynes already modestly indicating, in the columns of the Capitalist Press that if the King were to send for them, they would, ahem! sacrifice themselves upon the altar of their country's needs, and put on their tile hats. . . . No member of a Labour Cabinet should get a penny more than his salary as M.P. . . . He is entitled to his £400 salary, certainly; and if his office entails extra personal expenses (the Foreign Office might do that!) let these expenses be submitted and paid. But no £5000 salary: no £5000 pension for life. That will at once be popular electioneering, and tend to prevent a Labour Premier being log-rolled and wire-pulled into packing his Cabinet with old stage incompetents."

To-day, Johnston declines the Cabinet Minister's salary and retains his ordinary M.P.'s salary of £600 per year. That is so much to his credit. We do not think that he acted up to his principles in 1929. We do not remember any announcement on the subject. If we are wrong, it will be our duty to make known our ignorance. If we are not wrong, then Johnston stumbled in 1929.

But why does not Johnston call upon his Cabinet colleagues, to a man, to sacrifice their salaries during the present crisist?

Johnston indicted Thomas in 1920. The circumstances under which Thomas retired from public life lend point to Johnston's indictment. Did Johnston remember that indictment throughout the interval?

Statesmen live on crisis just as history is written by misery. Remove war and persecution and history is dismissed. There is nothing to record. Society must be in danger always that statesmen might flourish by making fine speeches and decreeing despotisms. The politician lives by clamour. That is how Thomas thrived. Clamour brought Thomas and Johnston together. Thomas Johnston partly served under J. H. Thomas in the Unemployment Campaign of the 1929 Administration. We wonder how Johnston behaved towards Thomas. For Thomas Johnston denounced Thomas in Forward for January 26, 1924, for "skinning" the I.L.P. of £2,000 and pretending that it was "Russian Gold." The full quotation is reproduced in Government By Labour.

Prior to 1929, Johnston's opinion of Thomas was one of fixed contempt. The Forward for June 27, 1925, published a study by "Ikonblast," entitled: "Adonis at Ascot."

This study was set out in the form of a poem. It makes Thomas boast of having risen from cleaning engines at Newport "to be the pal of Steve Donoghue," Lord Astor, and Solly Joel. He regrets that the Prince of Wales is in Africa with the Zulus instead of at Ascot with Jimmy. It makes him declare: "How I hate all this talk of Class War. I have been in Grand Stand with the Lords and Ladies. George was there drinking water, and the Queen smiled on me," etc.

In all, this satire makes 100 lines, and is divided into four verses. The verses are built up on the principle of The House That Jack Built, repetition, only the verses do not rhyme. The verse ridicules Thomas, Royalty, Ascot, and the idea of Empire.

As Colonial Secretary in the 1924 Labour Government, Thomas accepted responsibility for, and defended strenuously, the condition of affairs prevailing in Kenya. Thomas boomed Kenya at the Wembley Exhibition of 1925. But Thomas Johnston, in Forward, for May 16, 1925, stated:

"Wherever the Union Jack waves, men are free-he-he! But Harold Cox, one of the diligent scribes of the Boss Class, dealing with Kenya . . ."

Johnston quoted Harold Cox's article from the Sunday Times, for May 10, 1925, examining the evidence of Dr. Norman Keys, and concluding that a native chief, who wished to be on good terms with the Government—in this case, J. H. Thomas—"must put pressure upon the people in his district to work for European employers."

Johnston reproduced with horror two gruesome stories related by Harold Cox. In the first case a European settler, thinking that a native whom he saw in the distance had been robbing his farm, fired at him twice. The second shot brought him to the ground, and the European left the man there to die. When tried he admitted the facts, but was acquitted by a jury of his countrymen. In the other case a European Employer flogged one of his men to death. He was tried and found guilty of committing a "grievous hurt" and sentenced to the ridiculously inadequate penalty of two years' imprisonment.

Office reconciled Johnston to this record of Thomas. The fact of the indictment cannot be expurged.

III. "OUR NOBLE FAMILIES."

Johnston owes much of his popularity in the working-class movement to the fact that he wrote his scathing work, Our Noble Families.

Bearing this work, and its terms, in mind, turn to Hansard for Tuesday, 18th March, 1941.

The Official Parliamentary Report reads as follows:—

SCOTLAND.

LAND OWNERSHIP.

22. Mr. Gallacher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make an inquiry into the circumstances under which much of the land of Scotland has passed into the hands of the present owners, with a view to action to bring it into the fullest measure of cultivation?

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. T. Johnston): I am not quite clear as to how an inquiry into titles to land ownership would have any bearing upon the bringing into better cultivation of the soil. Agricultural Executive Committees already have the power to require owners and occupiers to carry out cultivation or other measures necessary to secure, in accordance with Government directions, the proper utilisation of the land in war time irrespective of by whom, on the method by which, it was acquired.

Mr. Gallacher: Is the Minister prepared to consider an investigation made by Mr. Thomas Johnston, who declared that this land was acquired by graft, rapine and murder, and is it not desirable that this land should be taken back out of the hands of those who have got it by such means? If the Minister would like to look at the investigation, I will give him a copy of the report.

Mr. Johnston: The answer to the first part of the Supplementary Question is in the affirmative. The second part of the Supplementary Question does not arise.

BOMBING AEROPLANES

The Clydeside "blitz" directed our attention to the question of bombing aeroplanes. We have no personal fear in the matter of death, but we object to the bombing of London, Glasgow, Berlin, Hamburg, and every other city. We object to death descending from the skies. And we object to man directing the destruction of his fellows. Accordingly, we are interested in knowing what attitude some of our statesmen adopted towards this horror of aerial warfare.

In 1939 the Labour Party Executive issued an indictment of Liberal Ministers in relation to the abolition of the bombing aeroplane. Sir Archibald Sinclair, now Secretary of State for Air, replied to this indictment in a speech that he made in the Holderness Division on Thursday, February 9, 1939. Two days later, Hugh Dalton, M.P.—now Minister for Economic Warfare, and Sir Archibald's colleague in the Cabinet—answered Sir Archibald in a speech at Accrington.

It will be noted that the indictment of the Liberal Ministers was made not only by Mr. Dalton, but by the Labour Party Executive.

Mr. Dalton's speech was reproduced in the Forward for February 18, 1939, beneath double-column captions:—

"WHEN ITALY PROPOSED ABOLITION OF BOMBING AEROPLANES."
"Why Britain Wouldn't Agree."

At this time, Thomas Johnston was acting nominally, if not actually, as editor of Forward. He was contributing regularly to the columns of the paper and clearly endorsed the article. Like Dr. Dalton, Mr. Johnston now shares Cabinet responsibility with Sir Archibald Sinclair. Crisis makes strange colleagues.

Forward published the following excerpt from Dalton's speech:—

"There can be no dispute about the facts. The Disarmament Conference met at the beginning of February, 1932. The Liberal Ministers did not resign till September 28, 1932. In those eight months the damage had been done, the Conference had missed the boat, Arthur Henderson's great work had been ruined, democratic Germany had been rebuffed, Hitler had been given new grievances to exploit, and was now on the doorstep of power. The Liberal Ministers resigned solely on Free Trade.

"In their resignation letter they said that on other questions, including disarmament, they were 'happy to remember that no differences had arisen.' They therefore bear full responsibility for all that was done by the British Government at Geneva up to the date of their resignation.

"On February 10, in the first debate of the conference, Italy proposed the abolition of all bombing aeroplanes. Germany, Russia and other States supported. The United States of America was friendly to the idea, and in June President Hoover definitely came out in favour.

"From the first Sir John Simon and Lord Londonderry resisted and obstructed; and on July 7 Lord Baldwin, on behalf of the Government opposed abolition, and proposed instead that limits should be defined within which air bombing should be legtimate."

"Nearly three years later Lord Londonderry told the world that in 1932 when 'the Disarmament Conference assembled, almost its earliest discussions were centred around the possibility of the total abolition of . . . the bombing aeroplane. . . . I had the utmost difficulty at that time in preserving the use of the bombing aeroplane.'

"But he succeeded, and his Liberal colleagues of that time helped him to succeed. The consequences of that success are written in letters of blood in China, Abyssinia and Spain. And maybe the end is not yet."

Clydeside knows that the end is not yet. So do all the cities and ports of Europe. Mr. Dalton was an excellent prophet. Does he ever discuss his prophecy with Sir Archibald Sinclair.

As our readers know, we have no sympathy with Hitler or Musolini. They may not have kept an agreement not to bomb. But, owing to the Liberal Ministers' attitude, they were never given the opportunity of being put morally in the wrong.

In the House of Commons, on March 9, 1939, Dr. Dalton exposed the interests that maintained the bombing aeroplane. He said :—

"We are being grossly over-charged and gigantic fortunes are being made, which will, perhaps, be revealed when the owners die. But why we should be making millionaires nearly as fast as we are making acroplanes I cannot think."

Mr. Dalton went on to explain that aircraft prices were determined according to an arrangement known as the McLintock agreement which,

"is now recognised to give something more than a square deal to the manufacturers, and something less than a square deal to the taxpayer."

Mr. R. R. Stokes is regarded as a kind of pacifist Labour M.P. He is this—and also an armament manufacturer!

He said of the Government :—

"They seem to think that by dabbling about with cost accounts they can arrive at a satisfactory result. Every business man knows that cost accounts alone are no use. . . ."

Which brings us back to Capitalism and high finance. Behind the bombings and the destruction, responsible for the slaughter of the innocents, is—profit! The sacrifice of humanity and truth to Mammon. Said one of old time: "Ye cannot serve two masters, ye cannot serve God and Mammon!"

We have elected to serve Mammon, and we expect to enjoy the Kingdom of God, to experience the joy of living and the freedom from disaster that belong to the Commonwealth of righteous living, the mutual service of brotherhood. We maintain Capitalism and expect to enjoy Socialism. We trust to Militarism and anticipate liberty. We are horrified to reap what we sow.

WHAT'S THE USE OF BOMBING?

BY A. J. COOK

In times of peace, the welfare of ordinary people, regardless of nationality, and a realisation of our immense cultural debt to them, helps to make a unity of loyalty at least to European civilisation, if not to the world. But nowadays, moral degradation, which war involves, is the price asked and demanded to "defend" national independence. As part and parcel of the war-machine, we now see the result of this plain barbarism and insane policy of bombing. Ordinary people everywhere are driven into shelters, cellars and under the stairs, helpless to protect either themselves or their homes. It is quite possible that those who release the bombs never see the result of their actions, and are led to believe that they are defending their homes, freedom, democracy and the rest of it.

In urging that we stop bombing immediately, is not that I am arguing for complete submission to this detestable Nazi business. To me, Britishers and Germans are far too submissive to those who claim to have control over us. Our political leaders are ordinary people, yet we defer to their judgment against our highest feelings, and as citizens accept, as regrettable necessities, actions which nothing would induce us to perform as individuals. We appear to be the slaves of fear, which makes us behave stupidly and cruelly.

The Germans were beaten in the last war, and then kept forcibly by the Allies in conditions of hardship and political inferiority. Since then they have been bullied and terrorised by their own dictators, and this treatment, unfortunately, has not improved their behaviour. So we are now trying to educate the Germans into democracy by bombing German cities and towns, and British propaganda exults and claims a triumph for Britain. The Germans bomb our cities and towns, while Lord Haw-Haw claims a triumph for the Reich. But what does Europe gain? Nothing. Her cities are damaged, her humanity is horrified and her civilisation is wrecked. And in the twentieth century we are almost expected to believe that this is a contribution to world betterment.

BEN GREENE

As stated in our April issue, Ben Greene has applied to the High Court of King's Bench for a writ of habeas corpus against his detention under Regulation 18B. By the time these lines are in print the case may have been decided. As we write it is sub judice. The following summary of Green's activities since 1920 is not intended to prejudice the issue. The statement is published as a matter of public interest. Our comment on the result will be made later.

In 1920 Ben Greene left Oxford to spend a year in Russia with the American Relief Commission administered by the Society of Friends distributing relief to the famine areas in Russia. In 1921 he spent nine months with the same organisation doing similar work in Berlin.

He then joined the Labour Party, doing much public speaking throughout the country, and standing as labour candidate at Basingstoke and Gravesend, and prospective candidate at South West Hull. He was responsible for forming the Constituency Party Association in the Labour Party, working for direct representation from the constituency parties on to the executive committee. In pursuing this work he came into direct conflict with many of the Labour Leaders and was more than once threatened with expulsion.

At the time of the Saar Plebiscite, he was chosen as Chief Deputy Returning Officer by the League of Nations, and soon after the plebiscite was sent out to the Saar by the Society of Friends, of which he is a prominent member, to investigate cases of reported ill-treatment of Jews in the Saar area. At the time of the November pogroms, 1938, he was again sent to Germany by the Society of Friends to organise a scheme of relief for the German Jews. During this time he was arrested by the Gestapo and released through the intervention of a German government official. He had to go on to Holland to consult with Dr. Collin, the Dutch Prime Minister. In his speech to the House on November 21, 1938, Sir Samuel Hoare referred to the Quaker who had furnished him with his information. This Quaker was Ben Greene. There was some correspondence with Dr. Bohler, who helped in his release from the Gestapo. This correspondence, in any case slight, naturally ceased on the outbreak of war.

Ben Greene came into conflict with the Labour Party execeutive, when he wished to take a party of Trade Unionists to Germany, at the invitation of the Mayor of Saarbrucken, to investigate the conditions of the German workers. He was forbidden to take this party, and he submitted to the decision of the executive on this matter.

At the time of Munich, Ben Greene found himself so opposed to the foreign policy of the Labour Party that he resigned from the Party, and consequently relinquished his candidature of South West Hull. He was bitterly attacked as a result by many Labour leaders, and accused of being "pro-Nazi." As a Quaker, he was opposed to war. Whole aspects of the Nazi regime were entirely repugnant to him. But he did not believe that the way to defeat Nazism was militarism.

In January, 1939, he formed the Peace and Progressive Information Service, sending out bulletins on international affairs to subscribers. He stopped the service immediately war broke out, and no further bulletins were issued.

He was appointed J.P. in 1936, but some months after his 18B detention his resignation was demanded. He refused to comply but his name was removed by fiat of the Lord Chancellor. He served six years on the local Town Council and two years on the Herts. County Council.

Greene is an opponent both of Communism (meaning Russian Sovietism) and Fascism. He feels no copy of a foreign system should be applied to Britain. He joined the British People's Party, which is parliamentary reform party.

After the invasion of Poland by Germany, Ben Greene still favoured peace by negotiation. When the possibility of negotiations passed, he resigned from the People's Party and all political activities. While there was still a chance of peace he spoke for it. When clearly peace was no longer possible, he gave up all political work and devoted himself entirely to the management of his business.

This business is the only wood split pulley factory in England, and was listed as a work of National importance.

For the last twenty years, as a Quaker, and later as a member of the Meeting of Sufferings, Ben Greene has been consistent in both his social and political work. He has worked for international peace, and at home for the improvement of social conditions along democratic lines.

UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT.

A statement of the Socialist and Pacifist principles of this movement has been issued in leaflet form. Post Free, 1d stamp. 100 copies, 6d. Comrades are invited to become national members and to form local groups.

The Rev. W. M. Teake, M.A. (Edin. & Camb.), and B.D. (Camb.), who has made a life-long study of the Foundations of Eastern and Western Religious Thought, has joined the U.S.M. Comrade Teake has joined the U.S.M. because he believed that Christians must uphold peace and struggle towards social justice.

18B DETAINEES.

John Beckett's case is being considered by the Society of Friends' Committee appointed to inquire into the case of the 18B detainees. Under the recent Act, he will be removed, most likely, to the Isle of Man. Beckett's case against his continued detention, and the feelings of the Friends as to the truth or otherwise of the allegations made against him, will be published later. Jennie Lee, in her autobiography, states that Beckett left the Labour movement because he was driven into disgust by the behaviour of Ramsay MacDonald as Prime Minister.

CREECH JONES

In other columns we defend Creech Jones against the somewhat sly attack made upon him by Mr. Kenneth Pickthorn, M.P., in Truth, and we reproduce the speech in which John McGovern quotes his 1916 Court-Martial statement. At the present moment, A. Creech Jones is Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Labour.

In so far as John McGovern's quotation emphasised the fact that the resistance offered by Creech Jones to conscription from 1916 to 1919, and his discharge as an absolutist, placed him in the same category as those absolutists not considered in the National Service Bill, the citation was sound argument. But the lumping together of the names of Creech Jones, Herbert Morrison, and Thomas Johnston was not justified. Neither Morrison nor Johnston offered the courageous resistance to military service during the Great War that was offered by Creech Jones. Both could be indicted for Jingoism to-day. Creech Jones's attitude is open to no such censure. In the cases of Johnston and Morrison, their past had to be recalled. In the case of Creech Jones, he stated it openly and clearly in the House of Commons.

Creech Jones does not repent his 1916-1919 resistance. He insists on it, modestly, firmly, and sincerely. He is trapped by the failure of the Government—including the Labour Government of 1924 and 1929—since 1918 to make a success of the Armistice and Peace interlude. He is handicapped by the errors of Parliamentary Socialism, but Creech Jones has never seen his way to be other than a Parliamentary Socialist. The failure of Parliamentary Socialism in Europe—in Britain to destroy Imperialist Peace Terms, and in Germany to arrest the Counter-Revolution—has given us the menace of Fascism or Nazism. Slowly and reluctantly, Creech Jones has developed the view that, however involved, whatever the explanation, and no matter how clear and reasonable that explanation, the issue to-day is not, who is to blame for Fascism, but how are we to destroy Fascism. This consideration has brought him to a militarist conclusion, and he feels he must play his part in defending democracy against Fascism.

In our view, Creech Jones has reached an unfortunate conclusion, in which many Socialists and many Christians find themselves to-day. We believe that, in the end, the war-weary people of the world will condemn their want of vision, the surrender of their faith in civil resistance and struggle, the development of our new-found belief in militarism. Creech Jones writes and speaks with cautious dislike, yet certainly, of national security. In our view, a Socialist, who opposed the Great War of 1914-1918, has no ground for developing this concern for national security in 1941. The contrast seems strange. To his credit, Creech Jones does so with no enthusiasm. He takes his stand gravely, with a heavy consciousness of the world's errors, and not seeing what else he can do. Yet he has never once forgotten that he was a conscientious objector in 1916. In his present position he has spared no effort to secure justice and fairer treatment for those who are conscientious objectors to-day. He views their situation through the eyes with which he once peered through a prison cell window, when standing on a stool, the time that a warder was not peeping through the spy-hole.

The New Leader for April 5, 1941, reproduces the main text of John McGovern's speech, beneath the heading: "How greatly have the Labour Leaders Fallen." A sub-heading explains "John McGovern's Flaming Speech in the Commons." Of course only a paragraph is reproduced from the Court-Martial of Creech Jones that McGovern quoted in full. We believe that one result has been that Creech Jones has been subject to a great deal of abuse for his attitude towards conscience and the new National Service Act. Creech Jones did not vote for the Second Reading. Actually, he votes very cautiously. He cannot be described as too loyal a party man. He recorded a vote in a division, which he conceived to be in the better interest of C.O.'s than the amendment proposed by James Maxton for the I.L.P. In moving his amendment, Maxton was helping to make the Bill an Act just the same. We would favour the Maxton amendment, but the question, at this stage, was a very open one.

It is incorrect to say, or to suggest, that Creech Jones has abandoned his stand for the right of conscience or the proper treatment of C.O.'s. All his work at the Ministry of Labour will testify to his active and anxious concern for the conscientious objector.

In his speech, John McGovern referred to his own stand as a conscientious objector in 1916, and to the position of his son to-day. These important passages are eliminated from the New Leader report, although it claims to publish a "full report." How can it be a "full report" when important statements of alleged fact are omitted?

We have no private quarrel with John McGovern, but we do ask for studiously fair and truthful statement in this matter of criticism. We know that John McGovern was opposed to the war, but we believe that there is no record of his having been imprisoned for his opposition. We would like to know exactly how he fared and to what extent he resisted. John McGovern's son is not an absolutist objector to-day. Even James Maxton was not an absolutist objector. In the discussion on the Isle of Man Detention Bill, Maxton told the story of his own and William Gallacher's imprisonment during the war. But neither Maxton nor Gallacher were imprisoned for resisting military service. Gallacher worked at war work and Maxton accepted a ridiculous conditional exemption. We do not write this in attack of either Maxton or McGovern. We have quite friendly feelings towards Maxton privately. We record these facts in fairness.

The trouble after the last war was the fact that the I.L.P. and its leaders, MacDonald and Snowden, cashed in on the I.L.P. opposition to the war. To-day, the I.L.P. is trying to repeat this criminal folly. In the issue that reports McGovern's speech, a long leader protests that Miss Ellen Wilkinson must not lie about the I.L.P. It proceeds to describe how persistently the I.L.P. opposed Nazism. It dates its story back in 1931, and the speeches made in that year by James Maxton and Fenner Brockway at Vienna and Zurich. But why begin the story with 1931? Nazism was on the March in 1919, 1924, and 1929. What was the I.L.P. doing during these years? The answers are recorded, in cold and deadly detail, in Socialism and Parliament. The I.L.P. was part and parcel of the parliamentary Socialism that made Nazism inevitable. If the I.L.P. believes in criticism, why not face the facts. The I.L.P. cannot escape any of the blame due the parliamentary Socialists for the present state of Europe.

If we return to the prison anti-war record of Members, no Member of the present House of Commons merits more regard than Creech Jones.

In 1916, Creech Jones was Secretary of the Camberwell Trades and Labour Council. He was Secretary of the Dulwich I.L.P., and a member of the National Union of Clerks. Creech Jones was an imprisoned member of the Dulwich No-Conscription Fellowship, which issued a splendid statement in July, 1917, entitled: "What Are Conscientious Objectors?"

At that time, in Dulwich 75 Conscientious Objectors (of whom Creech Jones was one) had been arrested. 63 of these had been judged genuine by the Central Tribunal in Wormwood Scrubs Prison. They were offered work by the Home Office at various camps, and 28 accepted, 35 refused. Only 5 gave in and joined the Army. 27 of the arrested men were members of the Independent Labour Party, and 17 were unattached Socialists; 27 were Trade-unionists.

How Creech Jones fared was told by him to the House of Commons on May 18, 1939, when he voted against the Military Training Bill, that afterwards became an Act, and preceded the National Service Act. We reproduce that speech as a separate article because of its length and importance.

After his release from prison, Creech Jones led an active propagandist career.

At the 1935 Parliamentary General Election, he stood for Shipley, and his supporters were able to describe him as: The Organising Secretary, and one of the founders of the Workers' Travel Association; 10 years a National Secretary of the Non-Manual Section of the Transport and General Workers' Union; representative of the L.C.C. on the Metropolitan Water Board; Governor of Ruskin College; Treasurer of the W.E.A. (London); Executive Member, British Institute Adult Education.

At that time, Creech Jones had been Vice-President of the National Federation of Professional Workers; President International Federation of Commercial Employees; member various National Joint Industrial Councils and the Co-operative Arbitration and Conciliation Board; Research Officer of the Labour Research Department; Industrial writer for the New Leader. He had been actively concerned about racial problem in Africa, and democracy in the Crown Colonies, and been active in war resistance and peace movements.

On that record, he stood for Shipley.

His election address was dated from the Co-operative Hall, 1st November, 1935. In his opening paragraph he said:—

"The keynote of my policy is SOCIALISM and PEACE."

In a later paragraph, headed "The Vital Need for a Peace Policy," the election address stated:—

"Peace is not found by Re-Armament and trying to outbuild other nations. That method leads to alliances, anarchy, and war. Peace is found by a collective peace system, and Disarmament through the League, by respect for law and international authority, by applying the axe to the economic roots of war. Imperialism and economic Nationalism must be checked, and the private manufacture of armaments stopped."

The reference to the League shows that Creech Jones ought to have studied our pamphlet on Socialism and Government, or our book, At Grips With War. What is needed to be stopped is all manufacture of armaments.

The speakers at Creech Jones's meetings included Ernest Bevin, Arthur Greenwood, Herbert Morrison.

Creech Jones has made himself an authority on Colonial questions. All that he said at the 1916 Court-Martial is borne out by the tone of his questions and speeches in the House of Commons. His sincerity and scholarship are obvious. He has worried the Front Bench continuously and consistently on the conditions in Jamaica.

On April 8 he questioned the Under Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on the question of restoring self-government to Newfoundland. He insisted on the urgency of the re-establishment of democracy.

Two days later, on the House being adjourned for the Easter Recess, he made a striking speech on the conditions prevailing in the Northern Rhodesian Copper-belt.

We have not seen his Copper-belt speech reported outside of the Official Report. The reason is that parliament is not a sounding board. In our Anti-Parliamentary columns we will reproduce this speech later, so that the Socialist and working-class movement may study its terms.

We recall the magnificent stand made by Creech Jones against war and militarism from 1916 to 1919, not in criticism, but in admiration. He has the bravest record of direct war opposition, of uncompromising anti-militarism, of any member of the House of Commons. He is one of the ablest and most thoughtful members of the Parliamentary Labour Party. He has made a close study of Socialist history and biography. We recall his past in terms of comradeship and in the hope that, ere long, we shall be fighting, side by side, to the common good of humanity and the overthrow of war and capitalism. We are unwilling that a brave and able man, one who has witnessed unhesitatingly and consistently for Truth and Freedom, should be mistaken for an enemy of the people. With his genius and his talents, Creech Jones must prove himself one of the most worthy champions the working-class movement has produced. In the social storm-period we are entering, our faith is that he will take his place with the same courage as he exhibited in 1916.

Sir,—If my memory is not at fault, a correspondent wrote in a recent number of "The Word" that he would be interested in articles comparing Christianity with other great world religions and showing in what way the former was superior, and he made, I think, a special reference to Buddhism.

This correspondent would find much to interest him in the Rev. William Paton's excellent little shilling book, "Jesus Christ and the World's Religion," published by the Edinburgh House Press, 2 Eaton Gate, London, S.W.1. The writer handles his subject with great sympathy, knowledge and fairness. In dealing with Buddhism, he draws attention to the beauty and truth of much of the ethical teaching of Buddha, but points out that Christianity is a more helpful religion than Buddhism for a number of reasons, among which the following are, perhaps, the chief:—

Jesus Christ led men to a God Whose character is like that of a good father. Buddha is silent about God.

The Buddhist outlook on life is very pessimistic, for it declares all desire to be evil, whereas Christianity proclaims that desire, rightly directed and controlled, can be a noble instrument leading to happiness. Buddha, aiming at assisting men to get rid of all desire, suggested that distaste for life should be increased by reflecting on the foulness of a decomposing carcass. Christianity teaches us to regard the human body as the temple of the Holy Spirit.

The ultimate goal of life for the Buddhist is hardly to be distinguished from annihilation. Christianity teaches that it is the perfecting of the character, so that the soul may become fit for the companionship and friendship of God.

In spite of the kindliness of Buddha's teaching, his view of life is negative and not favourable to progress and development, and for this reason no Buddhist country can really be said to have taken up the labour of life and faced the future with the will to win it for God.

Buddhism has no message for the soul which finds the struggle to live the virtuous life too hard and falls in the fight. Christianity discloses to the human soul the source of a power to help it in an effort which it has found too hard for its own unaided strength.

Yours very truly,

BEDFORD.

Newton Stewart,
March 17, 1941.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Perhaps you will be able to find room in your columns for this letter, which may be of some assistance to Comrade M'Carthy and others.

He states that it is a scandal that anyone should have to work 48 hours a week for 38/-. I agree that it is, and it would appear to me that he is quite definitely being exploited. There is a minimum wage scale in operation for farm labourers as follows:—

For the month October to March, 1/1 per hour for a 44 or 48-hour week.

From the beginning of March to October the rate of pay is 48/- for a 52-hour week.

When engaged on the threshing of wheat or oats (which other C.O.'s who have done it will agree is an arduous task) the pay at any time of the year is 1s 2d per hour.

For those who are engaged as cowmen or stockmen the pay is 55/- per week all the year round. The hours on this job are much longer as they work 5 week-ends out of 4, having only a day and a half off per month.

The overtime rate for most farm labourers is 1s 1d per hour.

It may be that Comrade McCarthy is engaged upon a scheme where he is paid 38/- per week whether he is prevented at any time from working by bad weather, or not. To the uninitiated the acceptance of a "wet or fine" wage is the only alternative to casual labouring where one is paid by the hour and "stood off" in bad weather. I would say from experience, however, that in most cases this should not be necessary for more than a few weeks. Most C.O.'s who are on farm work will agree, I think, that it does not take very long to get "the hang" of most farm jobs, it is mainly the physical effort that is difficult at first.

This brings me to my main point. We C.O. farm labourers have as our example the farm labourer born and bred. He knows his job, he's done it for years, and he is as a rule a very willing teacher. In most cases it will be found that he will not take employment on a farm unless he receives an assurance that he will be found work during wet weather. Such a man is wise, for, as a mate of mine (an old hand) said to me, "I can't live on thin air."

If we desire to show solidarity with our fellow farm labourers, an all-important objective in my opinion, then we should back them up. As soon as we feel physically fit and capable of doing a full day's manual labour, then we, too, should ask for and get wet weather work and, therefore, a full week's wage.

It would appear to me to be the greatest folly for C.O.'s to allow themselves to be used as cheap labour. They reduce their own standard of living, and what is probably more important, they help to pave the way for a reduction in the standard of living of the ordinary farm labourer, which is quite low enough already.

I agree with Comrade McCarthy that the Anarcho-Syndicalist way of the C.N.T.F.A.I. groups as the only way out. Let us, then, sow the seed by achieving solidarity with our fellow farm labourers, and by so doing, play our part in the struggle.

Yours fraternally,

KEN BRYAN.

Dear Comrade,—Congratulations on the March issue of "The Word." I think it one of the most interesting and provocative numbers you have yet produced, and hope you will be able to continue to publish in present format.

Yours fraternally,

C. C. SIMMONS.

Barnet, Herts, 14-3-41.

Dear Guy Aldred,—As a Buddhist may I hope that you will do as requested, and expose the superstitions and fallacies of Buddhism, especially those telling you to abstain from the taking of life, both human and animal, to abstain from intoxicants and drugs, etc.

Matt. Kavanagh will be interested to know that Lessener did publish his reminiscences. The book used to be on sale at the Communist Club in Charlotte Street, when I joined some 25 years ago. I had a copy; lost or sold it long since. It had a portrait of the old man that I well remember, as he had an enormously long white beard. It was called "Fifty Years in the Socialist movement," or similar title, and was published about 1908 by the S.D.F. A copy should be in the British Museum.

Yours,

H. W. EDWARDS.

Newbury, 18-3-41.

Dear Sir,—As a Christian Pacifist I greatly appreciate the stand taken against the wickedness of war and injustice to mankind by your journel, "The Word," and especially do I appreciate the articles, etc., written by the Duke of Bedford.

Trusting your appeal will be fully met,

Yours faithfully,

Clifton, 11/4/41. (Mrs.) ALICE GOODRICK.

Dear Guy Aldred,—For some time I have noticed your periodical advertised in "Peace News," and intended sending for a copy, but procrastination and a hectic life are responsible for the delay.

Looking at to-day's date reminds me that it was April 9th, 1916, when I was arrested in Scotland.

I think the early C.O.'s fared better this time, although it is getting more difficult now, especially with the economic pressure. The cases of men in some of the military camps seem to have a familiar ring.

You have been in Glasgow some years now as I remember my people meeting you when they were on a visit to my sister Edith and the late George Ballard. I often wish he was still alive.

Best wishes, yours fraternally,

Bristol, 9/4/1941. STANLEY OXLEY.

Dear Friend,—Good luck to you in your longstanding work for freedom of the individual. I suppose the Authorities allow such publications as yours to go on because they usually only reach the "converted" and are not likely to be read by the poor people who lap up the daily press, not knowing or believing that the said press is under constant threat of suppression if it dare to say half as much as you do.

Yours in freedom of spirit,

New Barnet, 29/3/41. T. W. WILLIAMS.

SIR WALTER STRICKLAND—WANDERER AND SCHOLAR

Social and Political Ideals. Why He Attempted To Change His Nationality

[We have published articles on the career of the late Sir Walter Strickland in The Word for February, July, September, and October, 1940; and January, 1941. Below we reprint the essay we wrote for the Malton Messenger for May 20, 1939. There are some slight corrections. In a later issue we shall reproduce the letter we contributed to the Malton Messenger for April 8, 1939, defining Strickland's political and literary ambitions. When these articles are completed, they will be brought together, with some of his letters, essays, and poems, and complete catalogue of his writings, in volume form. This will be published at a popular price to secure wide circulation. Ed.]

Walter Strickland died thirteen months before the outbreak of the second world war. That crisis made front page news of the countries and peoples with whose manners, customs, interests, and dialects Sir Walter had been familiar for forty years before his death. He knew all the Slav languages and had wandered intimately, at distances of years, through the Slav countries. He had an intense admiration for ancient Bohemia; had translated its love songs and romances into English; had befriended the fathers of the Czech Republic during their exile; had furthered their dreams, and when the Republic was established had proudly styled himself "A Citizen of Prague." He died shortly before the Czech Republic was destroyed. During the last two years of his life he anticipated its passing.

To the man in the street, and to the average journalist, the career pursued by Walter William Strickland seemed a romantic and unconventional one. Even Rudyard Kipling viewed it as such, and mentioned the ninth baronet in several of his writings under a slightly fictitious covering, as the "Wandering Baronet." Kipling's references were aggravated by the fact that Sir Walter's father, the eighth baronet, was depicted as "Mad Martin' in Tom Brown's Schooldays. The impression was created that there was something very strange about the Strickland family in general, and about Sir Walter, the ninth baronet, in particular.

Disappeared from Marseilles.

This impression was strengthened by the Press, when, in December, 1912, Sir Walter Strickland disappeared from Marseilles and suddenly reappeared at Cordova, Spain, at the end of February, 1913. During the interval his London lawyers had advertised for him in the London Times and the Press had dubbed him "The Missing Baronet." The explanation was very simple. Sir Walter had requested the British Consular authorities to extend his passport to China. They had refused. He was known to be the friend of the Chinese Republicans and the advocate of a new and united China, reorganised on some kind of semi-socialist basis. At least, he wanted a democratic China.

At this time Sir Walter Strickland was unpopular with the Indian Government. He was opposed to the imprisonment of Indian Nationalists, and was very indignant at the breach of the right of asylum by the French and British Governments in the case of the Indian nationalist, Savarkar. He had exposed fearlessly the conditions in the Andaman Islands, and dealt with the horrors of prison life there. Strickland wrote with considerable first-hand authority on the Indian question, and if he used too much invective at times, it was from a fierce respect for liberty. He believed that it was the Englishman's duty to rspect liberty, and he developed, first from surprise and later from anger, an anti-English complex when he found his fellow-countrymen complacently taking for granted their own social wrongs and those of the subject races. He expressed these views in pamphlets that were suppressed by the Indian Government and specially proscribed in certain areas.

This proscription, and the refusal to permit him to travel to China, plus the imprisonment of his closest Indian friends, like Tilak, persuaded Sir Walter that his liberty, if not his life, was in danger. So he disappeared. He explained all this in a letter that he wrote at the end of February, 1913, from Cordova, Spain, to the London Evening News. His last communication prior to his disappearance, had been addressed to the secretary of the Malton Museum, to which he sent a package of very curious shells.

Czech Citizenship Question.

Nearly ten years later the passport question again arose, and this led to Sir Walter's assumption of Czech citizenship. Of course this was an illusion that Sir Walter played with till the day of his death. We know now that he never became a Czech citizen. And he must have known it himself, for his permit to land and to reside in the Dutch East Indies, declares, in his own writing, that he is a British subject. We have the actual document and photostat copies and so can establish this fact. But he liked to pretend that he had assumed Czech citizenship. It may have been in good faith, at first, that he had his Yorkshire lawyers publish the following announcement in the columns of The Malton Messenger for January the 5th, 1923:—

SIR WALTER WILLIAM STRICKLAND, BART.

As solicitors and agents for the above named, Sir Walter William Strickland, Baronet, now residing abroad, we hereby give notice that he has now become a citizen of Czecho-Slovakia, he desires in future to be known and designated as Walter William Strickland only, and correspondents are requested to address him as such, accordingly, in future.
Dated December 28th, 1922.

16 Coney Street, York.

Despite his implied citizenship in this advertisement, Sir Walter's assumed Czech citizenship was not his real reason for dropping his title. He aimed to change his nationality because of his passport grievance; but he had dropped his title for practical purposes since 1912, and had always requested me, and his other friends to address him as plain Mr. Strickland. His politics were radical and his social and philosophical thought was Liberal and anti-militarist. He had no use for titles, and waived his own from conviction. When he died, in August, 1938, one weekly paper commented that the fact that Sir Walter dropped his title was "a change from the numerous cases of people who moved heaven and earth to get titles."

This was, of course, very true, though somewhat sarcastic comment. In 1913, when the announcement was published, however, Sir Walter's request was made the subject of a very entertaining article by the well-known journalist "The Londoner," in the Evening News, under the title of "Walter the Czechoslovakian."

"The Odd Baronet."

This journalist remarked that, at a time when the world was puzzled to find a way out of its troubles, he had much comfort in reading about "The Odd Baronet." He continued:—

"For his sake I must not call him Sir Walter, nor Baronet. He has advertised everybody of his wishes. He who was lately Sir Walter William Strickland of Boynton in the County of York, ninth Baronet, lets us know that he is become a plain citizen of Czechoslovakia, and that henceforward, those who love him will call him Walter William Strickland without any of the ancient trimmings to the name.

"I shall do my best to please him. For me he shall be Walter William Strickland from this day onward. It was not much to ask of us. No man can say on what road he shall travel before he dies. Yet I guess I shall never tread the pleasant paths of Czechoslovakia. And if fortune should take me that way, Czechoslovakia is one of the largest of the new countries on the new map of Europe; I may not meet with Walter William nor have speech with him if we should meet face to face.

"He and I are strangers to each other. He is now a Czechslovakian; it is not to be thought that, on meeting a strange Czechoslovakian, I shall say at hazard, 'Good day, Sir Walter!'

"Not everybody asks the courtesy that may be so easily given. Sir Walter does but say 'call me Walter.' I have known men who would have it the other way round. I have been invited to salute as Sir John one who puts forward vague claims to a dead and gone baronetcy. My head is full of pedigrees; I guess that the gentleman is Mr. John and no baronet. What does courtesy demand of me in such a case?"

The Londoner proceeded to give instances of men who took names that were not their own. He described how Mr. Schellenbube "my fellow-citizen by letters of naturalisation," wanted to be addressed as Mr. Shelley. He commented: "I tell you that I am unwilling to hail his blithe spirit by that name."

He proceeded to tell of a Scottish gentleman who, exiled in London, wanted his name of Bethune pronounced as Beth-ewn instead of Beaton. The Londoner added: "I said that, if he could not say his name in the right old Scottish fashion, I could. And there was an end of it."

"The Londoner" continued his comment:

"But Walter William Strickland does not command me to translate Walter nor William into a Czechoslovakian shape. He has not yet taken to himself a Czechoslovakian surname that could not be pronounced in Yorkshire. All he asks is that he may be allowed to live as one who is not a ninth Baronet.

"Between me and Walter William that is a matter easily to be arranged. He will find it harder to come to terms with the Editor of the "Peerage and Baronetage," who will obstinately display the name with the distasteful title, the coat of arms with the bloody hand of baronetcy. The Editor will say that a man cannot at his pleasure put off such honours. There is old precedent for the degrading of a knight who has done unlikely deeds. A very petty ceremony it was; the master cook cleaving the knight's spurs from his heels with the kitchen chopper. Something of the sort would serve for a wicked Baronet.

"But in none of the old books is it written how a Baronet may take his own chopper and chop off his own spurs. If I had been Walter William I should, without any advertisement, have let myself slip into the Czechoslovakian crowd where nobody knows what a Baronet may be. As things are, he has made himself a famous Baronet. Yesterday none of us spoke of Sir Walter William Strickland. Now he is famous as the Baronet who does not want to be a Baronet: few Baronets come to such notoriety as that."

His Attitude to Life.

This satiric comment sums up a great deal of the approach of the average person towards Sir Walter Strickland. He has been described as "the Wandering Baronet," "the Odd Baronet," and "the Baronet who sought fame by not being a Baronet." All this shows a failure to appreciate the man and his attitude towards life.

Out of that attitude, as I have stated already, arose Strickland's craving for Czech citizenship. He may have been sincere in his attempt but he was quite unable to overcome the effect of British Acts of Parliament, which made it impossible for him to become a Czech citizen whilst living in Mexico. The Czech Code did not forbid him becoming a Czech citizen under such circumstances, but it required him to lose his British citizenship first. And this he could not do without living in Czecho-slovakia when he assumed Czech nationality. Althought he had lived in Prague a month or two before going to Mexico, and although he returned to the famous Bohemian capital for a holiday a few years later, his naturalisation was granted whilst he was living in Mexico. It was invalid therefore.

Behind his declaration of Czech citizenship was his opposition to the British Foreign Office for withdrawing his passport, and also a permit valid for life to stay in the Indian province of Travancore.

In 1898 Sir Walter Strickland was granted a passport and was informed that that passport would be valid for life. In 1921 he wished to visit the East and to dwell on the shores of the Pacific in order to occupy himself with study of natural history and some scientific pursuit. The Foreign Office made him surrender his passport and refused him permission to travel. A lengthy correspondence resulted, and Sir Walter finally published a pamphlet containing the whole of this correspondence, dealing with what he termed the passport menace. He claimd that the people of the earth should be free to travel anywhere and everywhere without requiring passports, and denounced the departments of State as obstacles to the progress of mankind.

OUR APPEAL

In November, 1940, we appealed for £1,971 11s. 3d. to cover the deficit on our propaganda. There are no extravagant office expenses. The loss arose from our desire to produce good literature at popular price. It has been explained. Last month the deficit had been reduced to £1,885 14s. 9d. We have received since then £36 9s. 11d. This leaves the deficit at £1,849 4s. 10d. We explained last month that every month adds to our losses. We cannot continue our work unless a real effort is made to clear this loss before the end of May. We thank every comrade who has helped and we ask the others to respond. After you have read this appeal, send what you can at once. The paper is needed. You must help.

WAR, PEACE AND THE FUTURE

The Churches Attitude

The Council of the Baptist Union, in its 1940 report, referred its members to a letter which appeared in The Times London, December 21st, 1940. This letter offered a Christian Basis for Peace. Its text was as follows:—

"The present evils in the world are due to the failure of nations and peoples to carry out the laws of God. No permanent peace is possible in Europe unless the principles of the Christian religion are made the foundation of national policy and of all social life. This involves regarding all nations as members of one family under the Fatherhood of God.

"We accept the five points of Pope Pius XII as carrying out this principle:—

"1. The assurance to all nations of their right to life and independence. The will of one nation to live must never mean the sentence of death passed upon another. When this equality of rights has been destroyed, attacked, or threatened order demands that reparation shall be made, and the measure and extent of that reparation is self-determined, not by the sword nor by the arbitrary decision of self-interest, but by the rules of justice and reciprocal equity.

"2. This requires that the nations be delivered from the slavery imposed upon them by the race for armaments and from the danger that material force, instead of serving to protect the right, may become an overbearing and tyrannical master. The order thus established requires a mutually agreed organic progressive disarmament, spiritual as well as material, and security for the effective implementing of such an agreement.

"3. Some juridical institution which shall guarantee the loyal and faithful fulfilment of conditions agreed upon and which shall in case of recognised need revise and correct them.

"4. The real needs and just demands of nations and populations and racial minorities to be adjusted as occasion may require, even where no strictly legal right can be established, and a foundation of mutual confidence to be thus laid, whereby many incentives to violent action will be removed.

"5. The development among peoples and their rulers of that sense of deep and keen responsibility which weighs human statutes according to the sacred and inviolate standards of the laws of God. They must hunger and thirst after justice and be guided by that universal love which is the compendium and most general expression of the Christian ideal.

"With these basic principles for the ordering of international life we would associate five standards by which economic situations and proposals may be tested (see "The Churches Survey Their Task," pp. 116, 117):—

"1. Extreme inequality in wealth and possessions should be abolished;

"2. Every child, regardless of race or class, should have equal opportunities of education, suitable for the development of his peculiar capacities;

"3. The family as a social unit must be safeguarded;

"4. The sense of a Divine vocation must be restored to man's daily work;

"5. The resources of the earth should be used as God's gifts to the whole human race, and used with due consideration for the needs of the present and future generations.

"We are confident that the principles which we have enumerated would be accepted by rulers and statesmen throughout the British Commonwealth of Nations and would be regarded as the true basis on which a lasting peace could be established."

FROM SCHOLAR TO SOCIALIST

WILLIAM MARSHALL TEAPE, M.A.

The Rev. William Marshall Teape, M.A., B.D., would not have identified himself with Socialism and the United Socialist Movement, but for three important facts: his intense religious sincerity, which demanded a fundamental truthfulness in the actual social living as well as the intellectual interpretation of Christianity; a natural love of scholarship which seeks expression in secular truthfulness and so leads to a fundamental integrity of living; and the second Great War, which horrifies the conscience of every thinking man and compels Christians to consider what is wrong with the world, and the place and attitude of the Church in the world. These factors have operated both to compel and impel our comrade Teape to take his stand by the side of strange companions like the editor of this journal, for peace, Socialism, and the reconstruction of society on the basis of social justice and liberty.

William Marshall Teape has been a seeker for a truth, and a keen student, from his early years. His academic knowledge is evidenced by his degrees, although such degrees are not, in themselves, always testimony to the real worth of this knowledge. In argument against an orthodox world they have their importance. In 1882 he became M.A. of Edinburgh University, and Medallist for Hebrew and English. Three years later he became B.A. of Durham University, and also B.A. of St. John's College, Cambridge. Nine years later he became B.D. of Cambridge.

Ordained priest at Durham, in 1886, Mr. Teape became Curate of Rainton, 1885-88; Priest-in-Charge, S.E. Missionary District of Australia, 1889-91; Stockton-on-Tees, 1892-94; St. Barnabas, Hendon, Co. Durham, 1894-1900; Vicar of South Hylton (or Ford), 1900-22. He was licensed to officiate in the Diocese of Winchester in 1928. In 1930, he published a work entitled Westcott's Fear, and in 1932, his most important study, The Secret Lore of India. To this he issued, in 1934, a supplement, consisting of further translations from the Forest Fathers, with notes.

When William Teape was in his nineteenth summer, a venerable missionary from Bombay, the Rev. J. S. S. Robertson, came to spend his closing years near the Teape home, and entreated William's father to allow his son to be taught the Sanskrit letters. Missionary Robertson had brought with him from Hindustan a bundle of reed pens, which he carefully sharpened, taught William how to hold, and how therewith to form the letters simple and compound of the sacred tongue. So was the reading of Sanskrit made possible. Those were the days when no one thought of printing Sanskrit in roman characters.

The result of Mr. Robertson's zeal was not seen until some years after William Teape's ordination, with a missionary sermon he preached. In it he described the Final Conflict for Christ which he was confident was nigh, even the battle of Armageddon, when the sixth golden bowl of the wrath of God should be poured out and the war of the great day of God the Almighty should begin, foretold in the Revelation of St. John. Where should it be fought and with whom? Plainly in India and with Hinduism, Islam and Buddhism.

Such his mind, the preacher recognised that he must try to understand the forces with which the conflict should be.

As his studies went on and the character of the forces to be met was more clearly discerned, Hinduism stood forth as the one power that must be grappled with. That conquered, he saw the Victory of the Cross secure.

To gain knowledge of Hinduism, however, he must evidently be able to read Sanskrit. So he sought out a paper, long forgotten, on which he had in copy the quaint alphabet and certain letters parted into their detail with hints for their composition, laid by since the days when the venerable white-bearded missionary had volunteered to teach him. He realised now that he had then made a crossing that had brought him into the field where he should both fit himself for the conflict and meet with the foe.

Foe? Yes. At first a foe was this strange untoward power, of whose character he had had some superficial knowledge, and of whose might and temples and idols he had by this time seen something, when, as a traveller ever pushing on, staying a while here and there, he had passed through India, between the incident of the reed pens and the preaching of the missionary sermon. Yet never a bitter foe or regarded with bitterness; and when, as his first experience, again taking up Sanskrit, he found himself learning something of the Upanishads, the instructions given to pupils "sitting near" ("sitting near" being the literal meaning of the word "Upanishad") by the Forest Fathers in the distant past, a surmise seized him that this Secret Lore, as its name "Upanishad" implies, might contain much wisdom of living.

As his studies broadened, Teape discovered that many of the world's thinkers he had always understood to be worthy only of condemnation were really friends that were helping him to understand better what he was eager to know. Reparation was needed.

The master that opened the author's eyes to the worth of these Eastern teachings was Professor Deussen. With wonder Teape read through Deussen's Philosophy of the Upanishads in A. E. Geden's translation, mystified thoroughly, as a tyro, yet every now and then caught up by the thoughts there laid open. Further enlightenment as to Unpanishad thought was afforded by the perusal of Deussen's General Introduction [to Philosophy] and Philosophy of the Veda up to the Upanishads. That is the first volume of Deussen's monumental Allgemeine Geschichte der Philosophie. Teape also found of great value Deussen's edition of the Sechzig Upanishad's with translation analyses and notes.

Deussen brought to Teape a grasp of the message of the Forest Fathers. The learned Professor to whom he owed his first clear general view of the documents of their teaching was R. E. Hume in his translation published in 1921 of the Thirteen Principal Upanishads. There, at last, these lay before him in intelligible English, divided into sections, each with its caption. Hume's translation Teape took as the basis for his versification. He felt that versification was better than prose for the presentation of the Upanishad announcements. Rendering into verse demanded, he soon found, a more thorough sifting of the meaning of words than a colourless prose requires. Besides, the frequently wearisome repetition of the same word, which was the Upanishad teachers' custom, made it advisable to use different allowable renderings.

For the ascertaining of the significance of passages Teape turned to two Indian scholars, Professors Belvalkar and Ranade, the Creative Period of Indian Philosophy, written by them conjointly; to Professor Ranade's Constructive Survey of Upanishadic Philosophy; and to Professor Belvalkar's Lectures of Vedanta Philosophy. Dr. Crespi's Contemporary Thought of Italy contained just the side-lights he wanted from the thought of to-day. Side-lights he also found in certain English mystic poets.

What of the exposition of Christian doctrine? For that the author has found as a congenial authority, giving just the exposition that facilitated the comparison of the doctrine of the Eastern sages with that of Christian teaching, Brooke Foss Westcott, Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and afterwards Bishop of Durham. Here, as side-lights, Teape discovered not only certain mystic English poets, but also the great astronomer, Sir James Jeans, and the inspiring thinker and statesman, General Smuts.

When Teape came to write his work on The Secret Lore, he divided the book into Three Parts. The First is an Introduction in which the progress of the Sacred Tradition is traced from its beginning among the original Indo-European stock, from whom the Aryans, the people of the eventual Sanskrit tongue, are descended, to its culmination in the Secret Lore. The Second Part consists of Specimens of the said Secret Lore, being a few chief passages and some passages that have taken the author's fancy, together with Notes thereon, chiefly modern illustrations, and a Vocabulary of certain important words. The Third Part is a Conclusion, in which he notes how, to his mind, with Westcott to help him in his analysis, the Upanishad fathers are like prospectors who have caught sight, in outline and with not a little mist obscuring their view, what has been revealed in greater fulness and clearness to the Christian. Revelation has a history. A waiting of the world has to be until the Fuller Light breaks in.

So here is not strife but a recognition of Fellow-seekers after Truth.

Yet a battle there is, and the enemies to be encountered are those mentioned in the Epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. vi, 12) "the principalities, the powers, the world-rulers of this darkness, the spiritual hosts of wickedness in heavenly places," which beset and hinder the understanding and the endeavours of all men in their pursuit of a life of devotion to the Highest.

Important it is for India and the world that India should have its due place, concluded Teape the scholar and student of comparative religion, as a civic entity, in the comity of nations, but how much more important for India and the world that India have its due place as a spiritual member in the wisdom of world thought, the living Church of God?

In studying and translating the Forest Fathers, our comrade Teape was brought to a very close study of the poetry of Walt Whitman. His poetry of Freedom and of Individualism expresses much of the thought of the Forest Fathers as though written by a disciple unconscious of the existence of the Masters. From a study of Whitman and a belief in his magnificent assertions of living, it is but a step to pause at the claims of the world, especially in war-time, and to realise that all one's scholarship, one's quest of knowledge, one's love of learning, has forced one into rebellion against the claims of false gods. And so William Marshall Teape, a scholar, sitting near the Forest Fathers, whilst living in the midst of Western Civilisation, has become a Pacifist, and Anti-Militarist, and a Socialist. Knowing that the editor of this journal styles himself an Atheist, he reaches out the hand of fellowship, and says:—

"Comrade, let us unite that war and want and oppression may be banished from the world for ever; that hatred may pass away; that the darkness of the night may end; and that the dawn may come of a day that will never end in gloom; a day of justice, peace, and social service. Let us unite, that mankind may dwell together for evermore in peace and fellowship."

We accept the hand of brotherhood. We welcome the Rev. William Marshall Teape, M.A., B.D., to the Socialist movement. Discarding titles, descriptions, and academic honours, we say:—

"In the struggle against war and all despotism and terror, to the army that believes militarism will never destroy militarism, that civil justice must finally conquer all authority of man-power and might, we welcome you, Comrade Teape. We are strange companions but we live in strange days and we are fighting a strange fight. The end of Commonweal may be accomplished in wondrous and strange ways. As equals, believer and unbeliever, yet also both believers in the triumph of Truth, Liberty, and Justice, let us unite. Comrade Teape, welcome!

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PAMPHLETS

Mr. Alexander Ratcliffe in The Vanguard for May, 1941, reviews the new editions of the Duke of Bedford's Why Have This War? and Parliament and Peace. Both these pamphlets are issued from our press, at 2d. each, post free, 3d.

Reviewing the first pamphlet, our contemporary says:—

"The second edition of this helpful brochure is timely and very necessary for the present time. This publication, first appearing some years previous to the present War, gives one furiously to think. Indeed, it is matter for the thinker. The disclosures it makes are startling and convincing. We leave our readers to procure copies for a full examination of the text of the Duke of Bedford's rare and reasoned discourse. Christians especially will benefit by its contents."

The reviewer reproduces the author's quotation from Mr. Duff Cooper's article in the Daily Mail for April 4, 1940, on the need to violate the neutrality of the smaller Powers. On this he makes telling comment.

Of the second pamphlet, Parliament and Peace, the reviewer says:—

"A digest of the Discussion in the House of Commons on proposed Peace Talks (5/12/40). A very helpful guide on the subject of the need for sane people considering every proposal that might hasten the end of the present War."

In a footnote to these reviews, the editor of our contemporary says:—

"Note.—We are so much impressed by these two publications that we have taken over a quantity for sale. . . . The Duke of Bedford, be it noted, is a Christian Protestant."

The Duke of Bedford's other pamphlets will be reissued from the press as rapidly as possible, duly revised, in addition to new writings from his pen.

THE COMMON MAN'S DREAM

Rev. H. J. Adlard's Radio Indictment of Capitalism.

[We have published two portraits of the Rev. H. J. Adlard—both taken at Duluth—in these columns. Also a picture of the First Unitarian Church, Duluth, of which he was minister for so many years. The interesting announcements of the many excellent lectures he delivered in Duluth and also in Sioux City were reproduced—texts and philosophies in themselves. Finally, we directed attention to Adlard's work at Bath. These records and Mr. Adlard's poems have roused much interest, especially in the United States. Mr. Adlard used to contribute to the columns of "The Labor World," Duluth. The present editor of that journal has typed from its pages for March 19, 1938, an account of Mr. Adlard's radio speech attacking Capitalism. This we reproduce gladly. Comrades should get in direct touch with "The Labor World," Duluth. We would like to see this lively and interesting Labour journal commanding a large circulation in Britain.—Editor.]

REV. HARRY J. ADLARD DECLARES MACHINE HAS BECOME WORKERS' TYRANT AND MASTER

PASTOR OF FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH AVERS SYMPATHY AND JUSTICE ARE NEEDED TO PULL AMERICA OUT OF SLUMP, TELLS RADIO AUDIENCE OF DREAM OF COMMON MAN.

The machines, which in the last analysis mean power, have been mismanaged. Instead of becoming man's servant, lightening human toil and giving man increased leisure, they have become his tyrant and master. This charge was made by Rev. Harry J. Adlard, Pastor of the First Unitarian church, Tuesday night, March 15, 1938, over the radio, speaking from WEBC broadcasting station under the auspices of the Federated Trades Assembly.

Mr. Adlard referred to America as once the "dream of the common man." "To-day that dream is in danger," he said. "The common man in the bitterness of his heart is beginning to wonder if it was all a mistake." He charged that want of sympathy and the denial of justice formed the base of social and economic maladjustment. He defended the unemployment insurance system of Great Britain, and declared the workers after all were more interested in employment insurance. The full text of the speech follows:

HUMAN FACTOR FIRST.

It is written in a very old and very wise book that the strong ought to bear the burdens of the weak. It is one of the oldest unwritten laws of humanity that the more fortunate shall help the less fortunate; that wherever there is power there is also obligation and responsibility and that in all desperate situations the human factor comes first.

The needs of Duluth are great enough to wring the heart of any man who loves his fellow man. Happily they are not nearly so bad as elsewhere. I am amazed and gratified at the fine morale and splendid behaviour of Duluth's jobless workers. It proves that we have sound material in our midst, and its very soundness is its own most effective plea that justice be done tho the heavens fall.

FIRST PRINCIPLES.

In looking at this time of depression and colossal unemployment, I want us to get back to one or two first foundation principles, principles to be found as far back as the Hammurabi Code, the Decalogue, the Sermon on the Mount or the Declaration of Independence.

Henry George, that great and fearless prophet of social righteousness, stated that the law of progress was "association in equality," that any sound society was held together by the twin principles of sympathy and justice.

Search wherever you will, and you will find that whenever these two basic principles are disregarded chaos and misery ensue.

The ethical roots of all our economic ills, our periodic panics, our perennial poverty lines, our atrocious, inequitable division of wealth, our present millions of men who would work, and cannot find it, reveals a denial of these fundamental principles.

DREAM OF AMERICA.

Theoretically, those two principles lie at the very basis of the great dream of America. In a recent outstanding book, The Epic of America by James Truslow Adams, the author again and again emphasis the fact that America is the "dream of the Common man."

When I use that word "common" it is not one of disrespect. I mean the common people who, years ago, heard gladly the words of a carpenter prophet of Nazareth.

We need to think in terms of that dream once more. Jefferson first proclaimed it. He dreamed of the common man, and whilst our tremendous growth and vast industrial complications have produced a country utterly beyond Jefferson's conception, the dream still holds good.

Andrew Jackson, spite of all his roughness, again proclaimed the dream. Lincoln sounded it in homespun words. Whitman, the first typical American poet, sounded it in megaphone tones over the housetops of the world.

IMPERSONAL FORCES.

Woodrow Wilson in his inaugural address restated it yet again as he saw it endangered by the encroaching menace of vast, impersonal forces, which thought in terms of profit rather than in terms of men.

For 150 years, through all the breaking of new frontiers in America, over the Alleghanies, across the broad Mississippi, stretching away over the great and fertile plains of the west, scaling the Rockies, until the last frontier was reached, the Pacific Ocean—through all the struggles, hardships, unthinkable privations, there loomed this dream—"America and the common man."

INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION.

There came the Industrial Revolution. The machine age struck America. The wheels of a thousand factories hummed, great cities arose. Still, the dream of the common man persisted.

And what was the dream? What has it ever been for the millions who have battled with nature in order that they might build a home and live in happiness and safety? It was the dream of a fair chance. "Equal opportunity for all and special privilege for none." It was the dream of a just reward for work well done. It was the dream of a right to work, a right to be, to live; a full, round life. It was a plea for simple, human, inalienable rights.

My friends, that was, and that is, the dream of America. Through all the corruption, all the graft, the political trickery, the mammoth monopolies, the privileged franchise, in spite of them all, the common man, in some fashion or another, has held to that dream.

DREAM IN DANGER.

To-day that dream is in danger. The common man in the bitterness of his heart is beginning to wonder if it was all a mistake.

The machines, which, in the last analysis mean power, have been mismanaged. Instead of becoming man's servant and lightening human toil, giving man increased leisure, they have become his tyrant and master. The common man has been exploited by means of the machinery which should have increased his happiness and well being.

We stand aghast to-day at the spectacle of millions of idle men, millions of idle looms, millions of wheels not turning.

We stand aghast at the fact that in the most highly favoured, most richly endowed land, where there has been no shortage on nature's part, that men willing to work, men with families needing the common necessities of life, with nature ready to supply them, are barred from access to the means whereby they can supply them.

WORKING WITHOUT PLAN.

Until we have faced and given some sort of answer to that question we have not looked at it fairly. We have not got to the roots. But when we do we shall see that it is a denial of the fundamental principle of "association in equality."

The fact is we have had no plan. We have been planless. Our social and economic order has just grown up like Topsy. Our social organisation has not kept pace with our material advance, and the development of the machine age. The result is the situation in which we find ourselves, a situation well described by Goldsmith, "where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Whether we think of it or not, every bit of salvage work, every effort to find a man a job, rests on a philosophy of the dignity and worth of man. John Ruskin said in unforgettable words that, "there is no wealth but life," and by that he meant well, well-being; and no matter how much material wealth we are able to produce by marvellous machines, what a mockery it is of the real wealth, when men cannot buy what they have produced.

PENALTY IS UNEMPLOYMENT.

Rather the penalty they pay at such times as these is the dreadful one of unemployment. The whole thing is not only stupid, it is a crying iniquity. What we need to do is to see that fact to admit it, and with it the further fact that the whole basis of our present economic order is challenged.

We hear to-day not a little about unemployment insurance. There is a great deal of misrepresentation about it too. It is spoken of with contempt as "the dole." If it is a dole, it is a dole to which every man below a certain wage makes a contribution. Unemployment insurance is in operation in every important European country. It has gone beyond the experimental stage.

In England, where I have examined it, at some length first hand, it has been demonstrated beyond refutation. In spite of some minor errors in its administration, now being corrected, there is no division of opinion as to its necessity and permanency, so long as we have our present social order.

EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE.

An expert American sociological friend of mine spent some time in England making a close survey of its workings. He interviewed over 90 employers, representatives of the four main branches of industry—coal, textiles, metal workers and shipping—not a single employer was opposed to it.

Such a plan would not of course help the immediate, pressing situation. The immediate task is human relief, every job that can be found, the utmost spending power on the part of those who have the power. And—still more important than unemployment insurance is employment insurance.

As a last word: While these remedial agencies in Duluth and elsewhere are working might and main to alleviate present distress, to find jobs, to restore broken manhood, to feed the hungry, let us remember that these are palliatives only.

NO MORE DEPRESSION.

Let us beware of one, great, insidious danger—and it is this: Let us not say to ourselves when these times are over, "Well, that's over, thank God, now we can go on in our old sweet way. We can resume our former, thoughtless, hit-or-miss way of running society."

To do so would be nothing short of a crime. Far from that, rather, as millions said when the last shot of the great war was fired—never again.

So of this depression through which we are bungling, muddling, never again! It need not be! It must not be! Brains and brotherhood must join hands. Sympathy, which is the cement of all society blended with justice, must plan now, with every ounce of human intelligence so that the age-long dream of America and the common man may become a glorious reality.

BAKUNIN

Bakunin: the Father of Communism: not Capitalist State dictatorship, but genuine or Free Communism: the rival of Marx; the stormy petrel of the International; cast out of that organisation because he really believed in it; cast out after a fierce struggle, because of his radical understanding, his directness of approach, and the fearful jealousy of Marx: his story is told in

Guy Aldred's Bakunin.

The only popular and thorough political appreciation of Bakunin in English. 72 pages. Price 6d. Post Free, 8d.

Bakunin: a gentleman and a scholar, a man of wide reading and cultivated tastes; educated at a Russian military Academy; graduates with high honours; receives his commission; then, in revolt, discards his uniform for a dressing gown and spends his garrison days reading and reflecting.

Bakunin leaves Russia as a student; studies at Berlin; sits with Turguenev at the feet of Schelling; translates Hegel and Fichte into Russian; listens to music; plays chess; sits up all night discussing philosophy; believes in God and authority.

Bakunin: spied on by Russian agents; recalled to Russia by the Czar's Government; declines to be ordered back; has his property confiscated; repudiates authority; denies God; praises the ragged proletariat; demands the unity of Russian and Polish workers against Czardom and tyranny. This is in 1847. Bakunin is 3c years old. Europe plunged into revolution. Bakunin plays his part, is arrested, sentenced to death twice by Court-Martials. First, by a Prussian Court-Martial. Second, by an Austrian Court-Martial. Reprieved, only to be extradited to Russia. Austrian handcuffs are removed and Russian handcuffs substituted at the frontier. Czar Nicholas declares: "He is a smart young fellow, but he is dangerous. We must keep him under lock and key."

Bakunin: After a terrible imprisonment he is exiled to Siberia. He escapes. Reappears in Europe. Renews his quarrel with Marx. Is accused of being a Russian police agent. Karl Marx and Wilhelm Liebknecht back these charges. To destroy him, Marx destroys the International. The Russian Revolution, which discovered Bakunin's "Confession," has established the baseness of this accusation with which Marx and Liebknecht played, to their eternal discredit.

Bakunin defends the Paris Commune of 1871; writes a few essays; inspires Malatesta; influences Spanish Socialism or collectivism; develops asthma; dies at Berne, July 1, 1876. Dreams of Freedom and the Social Revolution to the end.

Guy Aldred tells the story of this colossal figure of the revolutionary struggle in his

BAPTISTS AND WAR

Baptist Pacifist Fellowship

The Baptist Pacifist Fellowship is an Association of members and adherents of Baptist Churches, who covenant together to renounce war in all its works and ways; and to do all in their power to make the teaching of Jesus effective in all human relations.

In 1932 the Rev. W. H. Haden, M.A., of Burton-on-Trent endeavoured to organise a Baptist Ministers' Peace Movement. This proved unsatisfactory. Two years late he founded the Baptist Ministers' Pacifist Fellowship. It had 80 members. Five more ministers had joined by 1935, when membership was opened to members and adherents of Baptist Churches. The membership has increased steadily since then and to-day its adherents number 1,724.

In April, 1940, the B.P.F. achieved a Federal Union with the Fellowship of Reconciliation. Two important points were:—

(1) An interchange of membership, i.e., all B.P.F. members to become members of the F.O.R.; all Baptists who were members of the F.O.R. to become members of the B.P.F.

(2) The Baptist Pacifist Fellowship to administer its own affairs, appoint its own officers, committee, and delegates and determine and formulate its own policy.

General finances were merged in the F.O.R.

In 1941 the Rev. E. K. Jones, D.D., of Wrexham, became Chairman of the B.P.F. Giving his report for 1940, he said:—

"Our lives are fallen in trying times, but we do not bemoan our lot. We should rather thank God for calling us to so high an enterprise. Times of ease are apt to lull our souls into ignorance of the mighty forces of evil that are operating around us. Gethsemane and Calvary exposed these in all their hideousness. Times of persecution are also times of revelation. Sin, vile and black, becomes better known. Truth and holiness shine forth all the more when tested in the fires. To-day our B.P.F. has a great opportunity. . . . History, Science and Philosophy give no glimmer of hope. History declares nothing but an incessant repetition of wars. Science with its wonderful gifts has no way of life of its own, but is ever subject to human control. The sin-laden human element decides all, and up to the present it is ruled by the spirit of war. Philosophy may reveal the way things are done, and may even show how things may be changed, but it has no dynamic or initiative. All three are helpless while this poor world of ours is floundering from one foul pit to another, from one terrible war into other wars more terrible still. And all this goes on in the very light of God's revelation and within hearing of His call to a better way. . . . But as members of the B.P.F. we dare not compromise. We must preach the Prince of Peace. We must either obey loyally or quit. It is testing time. We have undertaken a great task—the total suppression of war. The enemy is very old, bitter and strong, but wars must cease. . . . I would ask all the members of the B.P.F. to be faithful, patient and confident. Our divine cause must succeed sooner or later. Many are preparing for a new order of politics, economics and social life after the coming Armistice. As a Fellowship our objective is the rule of love and a world without war."

During 1940 there were 32 resignations from the Fellowship. Most of them came in the months of June and July, when tension was greatest. Six members left the Baptist denomination—two for the Friends, two for the Anglican Church and two for the Cotswold Bruderhof. The last two severed their connection with the church witnessing in the world against the gospel of war and power.

The following ministers have remained loyal members of the B.P.F. during the war-period, maintaining faithfully their opposition to war as to Fascism, and to the belief in the arbitration of violence:—

Rev. F. C. Bryan, M.A. (Bristol),
Rev. Humphrey Chalmers, M.A. (Warrington),
Rev. J. Ivory Cripps, B.A. (Birmingham),
Rev. D. Myrrdin Davies, B.A., B.D. (Cardiff),
Rev. W. H. Haden, M.A. (Sutton Coldfield),
Rev. A. H. Hawkins (London),
Rev. Gwenyth Hubble, B.A., B.D. (Kirby Muxloe),
Rev. H. Ingli James, B.A., B.D., B.Litt. (Coventry),
Rev. S. H. Wing (Reading),
Rev. D. Gordon Wylie, M.A., B.D. (Leeds).

The Hon. Secretary of the B.P.F. is Rev. G. Lloyd Phelps, B.D., 21 Cambridge Drive, Denton, Manchester.

Members of the B.P.F. are also members of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland. The report of the Council of this Union to the Churches for 1940 contained the following important reference to conscientious objectors:—

"True to our Baptist tradition of maintaining liberty of conscience, the Union has protested against the penalising of conscientious objectors by businesses and public authorities which have dismissed them from their posts, and we are glad that in this we have the support of the Government. If men have satisfied tribunals of their sincerity and are competent for their tasks, it is plainly out of harmony with the will of the country, as expressed in the provision made for their honesty to be tested, for other bodies to arrogate the right to pass sentence upon them. We also expressed to the Government our deep concern when allegations were made of brutal treatment of objectors who maintained their position even though they were not given exemption from service, and we have secured the visitation in prison of some Baptist objectors whose names were brought to our notice. On the general question of the treatment of objectors we have received few complaints. The consensus of opinion is that, with few exceptions, the tribunals try to discharge their difficult and distasteful task with care and understanding. Judges, like the rest of us, are liable to error, and occasional miscarriages of justice are an inevitable part of the cost of having laws at all. The question must be faced in that wider setting, though vigilance must, and will be, exercised to ensure that cases are dealt with properly and the scales of judgment held even. It may be well to say here that, while one or two letters have been received regretting that the Union has not given more support to objectors by pursuing a pacifist policy, several objectors have themselves written thanking us for standing by them."

Under the heading "Foundations of Peace," the Council's report states:—

"The Council welcome a recent letter which has deserved and received wide attention, and do so the more readily as it crystallises opinion in the shaping of which during past years Baptists have taken an active and prominent part. It was signed by the Moderator of the Free Church Federal Council as well as by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster. . . .

"The Council accept, as the writers do, the Five Peace Points suggested by the Pope, but would add, as in their view essential, the right of all men and nations to full religious liberty.

"The Council also approve the "five standards by which economic situations and proposals may be tested" put forward by the signatories, and give a general and cordial endorsement to the letter. . . ."

We reproduce that letter on the front page of this issue.

CONCHIES HAVE COURAGE

Last month we reprinted from the columns of the Baltimore Sun an excellent letter treating of the question of conscientious objectors. We now reproduce from the same paper for January 24, 1941, another letter on the same theme, addressed to editor of our contemporary:—

Sir,—Mr. Frederic Arnold Kummer apparently is not at all familiar with the courage of conscientious objectors. He has but to read "Is Conscience a Crime, by Norman Thomas; "We Won't Murder," by Paul Comly French, who is on the Selective Service Board under Clarence Dykstra, and many other books on this subject to verify the above.

In the last war the conscientious objector was subject to brutality and suffering which far exceeded the agony experienced by some of our own boys overseas only because they were not selfish enough to kill others for fear of their own lives. I think it requires more courage to decide for yourself when the majority is being swayed by propaganda, hysteria and fear.

Mr. Kummer says he has two sons who consider it not only a duty but an honour to serve their country if called. Believing this, they would be more respected if they voluntarily joined to aid their country instead of waiting to be called. Regardless of the consequences to himself; the conscientious objector is not only aiding his own country but all of humanity by refusing to shed the blood of others and in so doing preserving our great democracy.

UNITARIANS AND THE HOLY WAR

By The Rev. Richard Lee, M.A.
(Minister, New Great Meeting House, Coventry)

The General Assembly of the Unitarian and other Liberal Christian bodies is the only religious organisation which, by a majority, has passed a resolution in favour of uncompromising pacifiism. This was, however, before this war. Since the war, it has been agreed to pass a resolution expressing no opinion on the wisdom of this war but laying down pious principles as to the kind of peace we desire and the kind of Society which is to be built after the war is over. That was to have been the procedure at Oxford this year.

But it did not quite happen according to plan.

There was a rather stormy ruffle on the surface and beneath the surface there were distinct roarings and rumblings. Though no vote was taken there was raised the issue, quite clearly, between those who support this war as an instrument of policy and those who think this war, like the last, is a vain and futile struggle to achieve noble ends by ignoble means.

Three matters of supreme moment came before the members at the public and private sessions of the assembly and instead of a chronological account of the meetings I would like to set down the conflicting views on these matters. They are:

1. The Holy Innocence of Britain.
2. The Use of Force in War to lay the foundations of the New Jerusalem.
3. The wisdom of protest against the continuance of this foul, bloody struggle.

It was understood that as we all agreed with the pious abstract aims and principles of the resolution which embodied the manifesto of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Cardinal Hinsley and other dignitaries, nothing controversial should be introduced.

The mover of the resolution in his address from the chair and the seconder acted far otherwise. One speaker spoke of the war as having its cause in a beer-cellar at Munich. The other questioned whether the Treaty of Versailles was not too lenient for the guilt of the Germans who made the last war.

As a considerable proportion of the audience resented this war-manufactured history these garbled versions were not allowed to pass without protest. One speaker of the pacifist group, among other arguments aroused a violent storm by pointing out that we were doing the same things as the Nazis in Bremen, Hamburg and Berlin and boasting about it.

We were not such Holy Innocents as the war-supporters pictured us. When another speaker got up to show how the post-war treatment of Germany had created Hitlerism, the British Nazis cried "Vote, Vote, Vote," and the closure was applied.

The Rt. Hon. H. A. L. Fisher in his History of Europe summed up the impartial judgment of history on the Versailles Treaty: "A great opportunity was missed. The statesmen made a peace which was no peace. Europe had not been made safe for democracy."

Even apart from the Versailles Treaty, the Black Troops in the Rhine, the re-arming of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia and Yugo-Slavia with the aid of France, the failure to disarm by the Allies, the scission of Upper Silesia by the clique of Nations, had far more to do with the growth of Hitlerism than what happened in the romantic beer cellar of Munich.

THE USE OF FORCE.

I was glad that this fundamental issue was raised in the Conference though it was raised in an unfair manner with no real opportunity for free discussion.

One official speaker put it plainly.

Only by force can we put down Hitlerism. The negative assertion "These things shall not be" is a sine quo non of the positive assertion,

"THESE THINGS SHALL BE."

The speaker went on to say that only by force could we dictate the kind of peace we desired. One would have liked five minutes to deal with the implications of this argument.

Mr. Liddell Hart could have dealt with the practical military and naval implications of this policy.

Events will show, as Poland, Norway and France have already shown, the easy optimism of these rose-coloured backers of war as an instrument of policy.

But leaving the concrete consequences alone, what the speaker calls force is cowardly foul murder and wanton destruction.

I do not meet one person in fifty who faces this use of force amid the mangled bodies, the ruined homes and the shattered churches of Coventry who believes for a moment that it can yield any spiritual result.

IAN MASARYK'S REPLY.

But a far more effective reply though an unconscious one, was given at the Conference by Jan Masaryk, the Czecho-Slovak Foreign Minister in his Essex Hall Lecture on "The Immortal Soul." It was not an easy lecture to follow, but its main theme was stated quite plainly :—

"The condition of Europe as a whole was due to the lack of ethical religion. Love was the supreme thing in the world and we had despised the principle of love in our economics, our politics and our religion.

"Only by a religion of love carried out in every part of life can we hope for a better world."

That the cowardly butchery and criminal destruction which the religious euphemist calls "Force" and the politician "war," and the wayfaring man "murder" will prove an instrument for the triumph of love can anyone really believe?

SHOULD PEACE MEN BE SILENT?

This was the third issue discussed at the Peace Fellowship and also in private conversation.

Everyone agreed that we should bear our witness against this war. Some, however, like Brer Rabbit would "lie low and say nuffin" in war-time except a brief statement of one's position.

Our witness should be confined to meetings of small groups and the churches should confine themselves to questions on which there is general agreement, e.g.. :—

(a) Better treatment of refugees.

(b) A just peace when the war is over.

(c) The keeping down of bitterness and hatred towards our foes, and such like.

By uniting ourselves to these matters we should keep our congregations together and avoid unhappy disastrous schisms in the Churches.

This moderating view was, I think, the view of the majority of the Peace Fellowship though there were inner searchings of heart among some as to its wisdom and its courage. The other view was stated that the continuance of this war is a menace to everything decent in civilisation and everything precious in religion. Even now it was destroying our freedom bit by bit and was carried on by methods without any shred of morality or humanity on both sides. Every other means of telling the truth about the ghastly business was closed to us, B.B.C., public meetings, press, cinema and parliament.

There should be some united attempt on the part of Pacifist ministers to bear the witness in public which in their inmost souls they felt as to the wickedness and futility of the continuance of this war.

In the final outcome, the Peace Fellowship instructed its Committee to explore ways and means of joining with other religious bodies in a little more peace activity.

In the meantime it should not be forgotten that every pulpit can be used for propagating the cry of "on to victory, victory, victory," in the name of the God of Love and for the sake of that new Jerusalem in which both pacifists and Never-Endians believe.

One thinks that war, in spite of all its horrors, will hasten the new Jerusalem. The other is convinced that war, and especially this war, will make any better world a far-off age-long dream.

I wonder whether the war-dreaming romanticists or the peace-loving realists are right.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The Duke of Bedford contributes a striking essay to the current issue of The Hibbert Journal on the 18B question, under the caption : Do We Live in a Free Country? The essay opens in a manner that the working man would consider pertinent did he read such quarterlies as The Hibbert. The Duke states :—

"A writer in a Scottish Socialist paper, in a pertinent if somewhat acid comment on the popular view that we are "fighting for freedom," enquired, Freedom for whom and to do what? There is more in the question than meets the eye. A British unemployed man living in peace time on a scanty dole may have liberty of speech and liberty of political association, but how much liberty does he really possess? How much better off is he than the German workman in regular employment with whom a friend of mine attempted to commiserate on the ground that he was not allowed to criticise his Government and had his opinions manufactured for him by the State?"

The writer proceeds to discuss the conditions of the 18B prisoners, the circumstances of their arrest, and the general menace to thought and social well-being of modern totalitarian war and the tendency towards totalitarian government. We hope to reproduce the full essay later.

In a recent issue of Forward the Duke of Bedford published a long letter criticising the capital levy. This letter will be reprinted as soon as possible. So will another very long letter on the question of peace, from the Duke's pen, contributed to the Harrogate Advertiser. In this letter, the writer analyses the case for and against war, and defends the pacifist conclusion that militarism cannot destroy dictatorship or cast out despotism. He emphasises his own opposition to all cruelty, persecution, and dictatorship. This is a very long and mild but effective letter.

UNITARIAN NOTES

BATH.—During the prolonged indisposition of the Rev. H. J. Adlard, the pulpit at Trim Street has been occupied by Free Church Ministers of the city, six of whom responded to an appeal to keep the pulpit going during Mr. Adlard's illness. In view of the definite Libertarian and Socialist character of Mr. Adlard's addresses, his outspokenness on all subjects, his belief that the pulpit must be the centre of thought, the action of these ministers was appreciated greatly by Mr. Adlard's friends and admirers.

GLOSSOP.—The Unitarian congregation at Glossop united with Whitfield Parish Church and St. Luke's Church in five Thursday evening services during April, on the theme of "Towards a new Christian Social Order." The choirs of the three churches were responsible for the music and the attendances were good and representative. Discussions were held in an adjoining room after each service on the preacher's address. The joint services argue that Trinitarianism is growing less intolerant of Unitariansm. It can hardly do this and maintain its insistence on the divinity of Jesus or the Resurrection of Jesus from the dead. If the Christian ethic is more important as a basis of unity than the Trinitarian theology, then clericalism and orthodoxy are finished.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight.—On March 19th the Rev. Gordon Cooper, M.A., preached a Unitarian sermon at one of a series of interdenominational services held in Carisbrook Church. The invitation to Mr. Cooper from the Vicar was much appreciated by the Newport Unitarian Congregation.

PLYMOUTH.—After the destruction of the Unitarian Church and Schools by enemy action, the Rev. E. H. Kersley discussed the possibility of amalgamating in the circumstances with other churches. Admitting that economies in buildings and ministries might thus be effected, he stressed the importance of keeping alive the Unitarian spirit and outlook in religious matters. The Unitarian witness, which would still be needed in Plymouth as elsewhere, could hardly continue without separateness. Amalgamation with other churches would eventually lead to disintegration. Truth would be compromised by an alliance with superstition.

Dear Sir,—May I say I have enjoyed many of your addresses at Abertillery in days gone by, and incidentally last heard you in Hyde Park prior to the War. I have enjoyed the copies of the Word that I have received.—Yours Sincerely,

T. JONES.

Penarth, May 10.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I send you my sincere thanks for publishing such a fine paper; it is a great pity that its circulation is not many times greater. I send you my very best wishes, and wish you every success in promoting Socialism.—Yours fraternally,

R. A. PICKERING.

Bryn, near Wigan.

Dear Aldred,—I think the Word is absolutely "great" in its fearless exposition of Pacifism, and the defence of Objectors to Militarism.

Would God all Christian ministers would only take the same stand with regard to the monstrous evil of war!

I was at Dyce Camp in 1916.—Best wishes, yours,

F. A. GILMORE.

Grays, Essex, May 2.

Dear Sir,—I have become acquainted with your paper, The Word, with its Socialist slogan : "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." For these three I might substitute the one word—Commonweal, for if you stop to think of the paucity of ordinary intelligence among the masses, I fear they would not know how to use this liberty, how to appreciate equality, nor how they and the more enlightened, cultured and highly evolved could possibly fraternise. We all know the causes of war. We know its devastating effects, yet the masses can still be conscripted into fighting armies more terrible than ever in our history, fighting wars by a handful of men who know what they want and go all for it. The notion Power—the power of wealth, of inherited properties in land and incomes, a handful of men owning this free England and exploiting its wealth—and with such gilded ostentation subduing and oppressing the crude and darkened minds of these same masses. Royalties with their blazoned, disgusting inherited deceitfulness. Popes and Cardinals, Bishops and Prelates with the pomp of robes and vassals—like the stage set for an act. These are the combined forces which make the laws that man blindly learns to kill and die for. Ignorance of the masses therefore is the chief medium of keeping kings on their thrones. Political chicanery as a governing state—popes and priests in the guise of spiritual leaders in their soft chairs. These are the dictators—the handful who, by their suggestion, play on the susceptibilities of the lower masses always susceptible to emotional values.

Let your paper propagate the truth, repudiate an autocracy bearing the name of a democracy. Have the moral guts to stand up to such dictators and humbugs whoever and wherever they are. Think in terms of the dignity, the unbounded strength of each man, woman and child in the making of a new order. Use this consciousness as a power linked up with the power of the hemispheres. Instil into the minds of your readers a belief in their individual importance, in the sacredness of their charge, by the power of each suggestion we might build on the stars.

But while we wallow in petty differences, in selfish lusts, in fear of losing a job, so surely will we create the Mussolini's with their warring "heilers" out to smash us up.

What has man made of London, of Manchester, of Birmingham, of any of the cities of this country. Places intolerable to live in; noise-wracked shrieking, looting. The very earth trembling under us. Eyes and nose assailed on every side with sights and smells that sicken. And the children of the poor begat in dark fetid slums of these cities of cathedrals and gross commerce to the utter destruction of the race, for such environment spells moral death to a finer evolution. With the total destruction of those who have built upon such a fabric, Hitler has shown the power of bluff in his propaganda; he knows how the minds of the masses are played upon. These masses are ready to receive other impressions. This large consciousness is unfolding. The time is propitious to the awakening of these emotional bodies. Your mission is clear.—Yours faithfully,

FLORENCE RENYARD.

[We have hoped to conclude this study in this issue. But the instalment would be too big to publish in one number. The essay will conclude in August.—Ed.]

IV.—"THE HUNS AT HOME."

In Chapter I. we reproduced Johnston's 1927 advertisement of his Tory Profiteers pamphlet. The reader will recall that this advertisement refers to his The Huns at Home pamphlet and boasted that 200,000 copies had been circulated. It claimed that this pamphlet contributed to the Labour victories at the General Election of 1922. This advertisement dates the pamphlet, which bears no year of publication on its title page.

The pamphlet consists of 16 pages. There are two pages of 10 point and 13 pages of 6 point. Roughly, it amounts to about 8,000 words. The extracts date the pamphlet, which now belongs to history rather than to propaganda. The data makes very valuable history from the Socialist standpoint.

THE HUNS AT HOME

During Three Years of the Great War

By THOMAS JOHNSTON

(Editor of "THE FORWARD")

PRICE ONE PENNY.

"The Forward" Printing and Publishing Company, Ltd., 164 Howard Street, Glasgow.

There was no preface and there were no chapters. The pamphlet opened in 10 point, and this was the introduction. The pamphlet was divided by eight cross-headings.

The introductory section indicted Capitalism in terms that can be considered to-day:—

> "Capitalism can have no notion of commonweal; it can have no patriotism, since its very nature is to suck, leech-like, for profit—irrespective of any national or social consideration, and a nation's hour of distress and extremity is Capitalism's hour of greatest opportunity. During a war in which the nation is fighting for its life, Capitalism will raise its rate of interest upon money loans; it will increase its freight charges; it will raise its land rents; it will increase its charges for coal, iron, and food; it will hold up supplies of vital commodities; it will, in short, exhibit itself even more nakedly than it does in times of peace, as the real enemy of the people."

The italics are in the original.

Johnston proceeded immediately to define the purpose of his pamphlet:—

> "The purpose of the following citations and extracts from the admissions in the Capitalist Press during the three years of the Great War is to supply in accessible form a massed, unanswerable case against the Capitalist system—an arsenal of authenticated fact and figure, to which every Socialist may turn in his daily task of sweeping the scales from the eyes of his fellows."

In view of Johnston's present position in the Cabinet no one will venture to question the authenticity of his quotations. These were presented by their compiler—for Johnston compiled rather than wrote, since he is not a great original writer or theorist—under suitable headings as follows:—

HIGH FINANCE: THE PRESS TURNS KING'S EVIDENCE.

The first War Loan in 1914 was at 3½ per cent. interest to the moneylenders. The second War Loan was at 4½ per cent., and those patriotic investors who held the first 3½ per cent. War Loan Stock were allowed to transfer into the new 4½ per cent. Loan—a clear gift of 4 millions a year in extra interest to the moneylenders. Then when, in January, 1917, the third War Loan at 5½ per cent. was issued, the 4½ per centers were raised to the profits on the new and higher level. The Glasgow Herald mildly criticised this ramp by saying it "does not help us at all to prosecute the war," and the Daily Telegraph openly declared that investment in the War Loan was no sacrifice but a golden opportunity," and "a certain gain."

At least three writers have dealt with the money position at the outbreak of war—Mr. John A. Hobson, Mr. Oswald Stoll, and Mr. Frederick Temple. Each tells us that the banks had no money to lend the Government, that they were afraid of a panic, and that the bankers interviewed Mr. Lloyd George, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and "he did everything we asked him to do." The banks were shut for four days, Mr. Lloyd George got millions of pounds' worth of Treasury notes printed (£1 notes in black and 10s. notes in red colours), and handed over this money, backed by the credit of the State, to the banks upon terms that have never been disclosed. But, curiously enough, the banks were soon lending back at interest to the State, the credits which the State had so obligingly found for the banks, and Mr. Temple, in his "War Finance and the Worker," relates how he is in possession of a circular sent out by the banks to private individuals, advising them to borrow credits from the banks at 3 per cent. and lend them to the Government at 4 per cent.

"Money," declared the Financial News, "is at last coming into its own. . . ."

In March, 1916, the Bank of England was issuing advertisements in the press as follows:—

"IF YOU CANNOT FIGHT."

"If you cannot fight, you can help your country by investing all you can in 5 per cent. Exchequer Bonds. . . . Unlike the Soldier, the Investor runs no risk."

Johnston quotes the leading article from the Glasgow Herald, for Monday, May 29, 1916, complaining that war investment was regarded "not as a patriotic duty, but as a profit-making medium;" McKenna's statement as to the power of the banks in the House of Commons, Hansard, August 15, 1916; Manchester Guardian's complaint against the bankers, September 9, 1916; Glasgow Herald, October 4, 1916, on the investing public; and the Nation, June 1917, denouncing war loans and inflation. These quotations make amazing reading.

Johnston turns to coal in these terms of analysis and indictment:—

COAL: SINGING THE NATIONAL ANTHEM, THEY RUSHED AT THE NATION'S THROAT.

According to Mr. Smillie, the coalmasters declared that their costs of production had been raised 50 per cent. between December, 1914, and February, 1915. But there was no increase in wages during that period. The 50 per cent. increase was bogus, and was merely an excuse to raise prices.

Welsh Coal Shares have risen since the outbreak of war by 60 per cent.—(Edinburgh Evening News 13/3/15.)

The Board of Trade Committee to enquire into the rise in the cost of coal reported (p. 7, Cd. 7866) that, whereas the total increase in the cost of production and distribution was at most 3s. per ton, the owners and distributors had raised prices by from 7s. to 11s. per ton.

The coalowners refused for 3½ months even to confer nationally with the miners over a demand for increase in miners' wages, and the New Statesman (April, 1915) estimated that "Every week the employers can delay the inevitable increase of wages means in the agreeable something like a quarter of a million pounds sterling in addition to their profits."

A coalowner, Sir Arthur Markham, stated in the House of Commons, that before Italy joined us in the war, British owners were selling coal to Italy at 17s. 6d. per ton. The day after war was declared, and Italy became our Ally, the price was jumped to 34s. per ton.

The Cabinet bided its time until 85 per cent. of the colliery output had been contracted for a year in advance at high prices before it announced its farcical scheme of limiting profits. The colliers had reached the limit of endurance. South Wales went on strike. Under the Government's Bill, coal for the Navy, for the Mercantile Marine, for export abroad, for the making of patent fuel, in adidtion to coal already contracted for, was exempted from price control (Clause 4, Sub-section 3). Finally the Government agreed to the men's term, and when the trouble was over the Glasgow Herald (20/7/15) commenting on the whole knavish business, declared that "The tender mercies of the coal rings are cruel."

Mr. Jonathan Samuel, M.P., estimated (Manchester Guardian, 23/7/15) that the new "Limitation of Prices Act" would increase the coalowners' plunder by £70,000,000 per annum; Sir Arthur Markham, M.P., said the new limitation would increase his profits by 1s. per ton; and Mr. Runciman, in introducing his Bill, said that "within the past year the coalowners of Great Britain had increased prices to the British people to the extent of £20,000,000." Mr. Wm. Le Queux, in his volume "The Deadly Peril," declared that "Coal delivered in London at 16s. per ton before the war is now delivered at nothing less than 40s per ton.".

But when the owners' profits were limited to an increase of 4s. per ton over pre-war rates, there were many loopholes left. An owner could start a coal-factoring business and sell to himself usually under another name; and although the coal factors were limited to a profit of 1s. 6d. per ton, they frequently sold to each other, and as the Evening Citizen hinted (31/5/16), each transaction added another 1s. 6d per ton to the price. Then the Welsh coal kings demanded an extra 2s. 6d. profit (July, 1916). The Government gave them permission to take it, and on September 23rd, 1916, the New Statesman told us why:—". . . it became necessary, for diplomatic reasons, to restrict the price charged for coal going to France and Italy; and the South Wales coalowners insisted on being allowed to charge the home consumer what they had to be prevented from charging to the French and Italian importers." Two shillings and sixpence a ton is 1½d. per cwt.; consumers who burned two cwts. a week had therefore to find an extra tribute to the coalowners of threepence a week, or 13s. per annum.

In 1916 the United Collieries Coy., Ltd., raised 156,000 tons of coal less than they had raised in 1914, yet their profits had increased by £206,000.

SHIPPING: THE PATRIOTIC SEA PIRATES.

How the shipowners have plundered the public is, since Mr. Bonar Law's admission about his own investments in shipping shares (see Press, 4/7/17), a matter of common notoriety; but the student of Capitalism knew about it long, long ago. After five months of war—in January, 1915—the Co-operative News indignantly referred to the increase in freightage from the Argentine (11s. 3d. to 50s. per ton) thus:—

The somewhat long excerpt declared that, since the British Navy had swept German shipping off the seas, British shipping companies were able to wring extortionate profits out of British consumers. Johnston proceeds to quote the Journal of Commerce, November 27, 1914, the shipowners' journal, which stated precisely: "German ships being swept off the seas, we have now no serious competitors in the carrying trade of the world." He quotes the Western Mail, as stating that new shipping companies are being formed, one with "Lord Rhonda, the Food Controller, at its head." The same journal said: "A state of war exists, and with it the chance of enormous procts."

> The Statist gave the net shipping profits for 1915 as 250 millions as against 20 millions in 1913. Even after deduction of their excess profits tax of 50 per cent. this was an increase of 543 per cent. Much ingenuity was shown in the methods by which the excess profits tax was evaded. One such method (see London Times, 27/12/15) was for shipowners to charter their ships to friends in neutral countries at very low rates, yielding the shipowner a nominal profit of, say, 6 per cent. for the year; he thus escaped the excess profits tax, and the friend, being a neutral and not subject to excess profits tax, made a fortune; at the end of the year the shipowner and the friend quietly shared the booty.
> Shortly after the outbreak of war, 247 ships were sold to freight owners. The Government admitted that two fleets of ships had been transferred to the American flag (Glasgow Herald, 28/7/16). The Japan Mail Steamship Company transferred itself to the Japanese flag, and now calls itself the Nippon-Yusen Kaisha. For the six months ending 31st March, 1917, it reaped £2,215,524 in profits.
> The Government secured 52 interned German ships from Portugal, but instead of using them to break shipping ring prices, obligingly handed them over to Messrs. Furness, Withy & Company, the shipowners, to "manage." (Hansard, 23/8/16).
> Mr. Henry MacIver, chairman of the Liverpool and North Wales Steamship Company (Liverpool Courier report, 4/11/16) told his shareholders, at their annual meeting, that shipowners could not "justify their action in taking advantage of the present position in order to benefit themselves at the country's expense. . . . Shipowners and others, for their own individual benefit, had quite unnecessarily increased and were still further increasing the cost of foodstuffs to the consumer. . . ."
> The Dundee Telegraph and Post (16/6/17) says—"Freightage rates have been increased more than tenfold, and the entire cost has fallen on the consumer."
> The Daily Express (16/11/16) described how shipowners were charging depreciation at current war prices on their ships before paying excess profits tax.
> Sir John Ellerman, whose "recreation is looking out for investments," is rapidly acquiring a monopoly of what shipping is left. Already he owns £35,000,000 worth of ships, over one-eighth of British liner tonnage of more than 1,000 tons—more than the tonnage of the entire mercantile marine of Italy.—(Daily Chronicle, 30/4/17).
> You understand now what the British Capitalist means when he refers to "The Freedom of the Seas!"

Under the caption, "Weevils in the Wheat," Johnston next dealt with the war cornering of wheat. He proceeds to indict the bakers as follows:—

> In August, 1914, the Glasgow Master Bakers' Association proposed to raise the price of the 4-lb. loaf by a penny. The United Co-operative Baking Society refused, saying there was no need for the increase. The Master Bakers' Association quietly dropped their proposal.
> In the House of Commons Mr. Runciman admitted that "4 lbs. of wheaten bread were selling in Paris for 7d, whilst in London the price was just half as much again." (New Statesman, 11/11/16.) Sir Francis Webster, at the Arbroath Chamber of Commerce, said the American Relief Committee were selling the 4-lb. loaf to the Belgians at 7½d., and making a profit of 10 per cent. on the business, while "the same loaf was being sold in London at 9½d." (Arbroath Guide, 4/11/16.)

By September, 1915, the Board of Trade Labour Gazette was announcing that the retail price of working class food had increased 40 per cent. since the beginning of the war. By July, 1916, it had increased by 65 per cent. The London Times (14/8/16) declared that "the supply of wheat on passage is fair, but the stocks are in speculative hands."

The Statist discussed the "London Wheat Corner," and asked dispassionately whether "the present withholders of imported wheat" would get "home with their 7s. or 8s. per quarter profit," or would they hold on too long and be "caught with some 200,000 quarters" on hand when the new supplies came in; and the Times (17/8/16) said that there were 120,000 quarters of wheat more in the country than there had been in the spring, yet the loaf had risen to 9d.

While British bread was being diluted owing to flour scarcity, cargoes of wheat were being sent to Sweden (Daily News, 10/5/17), and the Yorkshire Telegraph (21/5/17) reported that three large steamers with grain from England to Sweden had been torpedoed by the German submarines. Yet Sweden, they told us, was a pro-German country.

ISLE OF MAN ACT

The official text of this Act is as follows:—

Isle of Man (Detention) Act, 1941.

CHAPTER 16.

An Act to enable persons detained under powers conferred under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Acts, 1939 and 1940, or the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, to be removed to and detained in the Isle of Man. [10th April 1941].

PREAMBLE.

Removal of detained persons to Isle of Man.
4 & 5 Geo. 5. c. 12.

1. A person detained in pursuance of powers conferred under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Acts 1939 and 1940, or under the Aliens Restriction Act, 1914, may, in accordance with directions given by the Secretary of State, be removed to the Isle of Man and detained, for the whole or any part of the period for which the order or direction for his detention remains in operation, at any place in that Island, and while so detained, and while being removed from the United Kingdom to any such place, or from any such place to the United Kingdom, shall be deemed to be in lawful custody.

2. This Act may be cited as the Isle of Man (Detention) Act, 1941.

"THE NEW LETTRE DE CACHET."

The Spectator, London, under the heading, The New Lettre de Cachet, has published some correspondence on the subject of Isle of Man Detention Act, which received the royal assent on April 10.

We reproduce two letters: one from the pen of Commander Geoffrey Bowles, R.N., which appeared in our contemporary for March 28 last; and the other from the pen of Captain Arthur Rogers, O.B.E., Hon Secretary, Liberty Restoration League, which was published on April 11.

Commander Bowles writes:—

Sir,—Parliament was invented to curb the Executive in defence of Englishmen's liberties. The right of trial before prolonged imprisonment is one of our most cherished liberties. The guilt or innocence of suspected persons ought to be quickly established in open court. Exercising its true function in 1679, Parliament strengthened the Common Law by passing the most famous of the four Habeas Corpus Acts to enforce the right of personal freedom by preventing prolonged imprisonment without trial. Lord Clarendon had previously been impeached for sending persons in custody outside England, where they could not be tried. The 1679 Act forbade Englishmen to be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey or any place beyond the seas. It made the committing of any man to prison out of the realm the one praemunire unpardonable even by the king. This was expressly to prevent persons from being removed from the jurisdiction of English courts.

The present Parliament has already been called the "Suicide Parliament" from its having abolished its own privileges on December 11, 1940. The present Government is now asking Parliament to plumb still lower depths of infamy by passing a Bill, with the short title of the "Isle of Man (Detention) Bill," to reverse the Act of 1679 by giving the Executive power to send prisoners out of the jurisdiction of English courts, to the Isle of Man, where the Executive could imprison them indefinitely without trial. Although this Bill has only two sentences, they are enough to destroy our liberties. The Home Office is trying to rush this Bill through Parliament. If Parliament passes this Bill, it would enable the Government, under pretext of fighting Hitlerism, to get rid of persons inconvenient to it, without the possibility of their beng brought to trial—a practice which led to our Civil War nearly 300 years ago. If Parliament still further abdicates its function by passing the two fatal sentences of this Bill, it will have denied a natural right of man, older than Magna Carta, which did not invent the right, but only affirmed it. Is it possible for even this Parliament to sink so low?—Yours faithfully,

GEOFFREY BOWLES.

25 Catherine Place, S.W.1.

Captain Arthur Rogers wrote:—

Sir,—In your issue of March 28, Commander Geoffrey Bowles's letter, under the heading "The New Lettre de Cachet," criticised the Isle of Man (Detention) Bill, which is to reverse the vital provisions of the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679 by authorising the Executive to transport unconvicted British subjects out of the jurisdiction of the English and Scottish courts. In your last issue, under the same heading, Mr. H. P. Garwood's letter avers that "the normal processes of the courts" are insufficient protection against Fifth-columnists, &c., and defends the "locking up of all those against whom there is even the least suspicion." It does not reply to Commander Bowles's objection to the transportation of unconvicted subjects into what must amount to outlawry.

I have not heard of any argument for the retention in full of the "normal processes of the courts" where suspected traitors or enemy-agents are concerned. All are agreed that the Executive must be empowered to act promptly in apprehending such persons. The granting of special powers, however, calls for some safeguards against injustice to loyal British subjects. The issue raised by Commander Bowles is, clearly, whether the Executive, particularly the unidentifiable denizens of the Home Office, should be encouraged to break, or evade, the law.

The original Defence Regulation 18B authorised detentions of suspected persons for an unlimited period by order of the Secretary of State "if satisfied . . . that it is necessary so to do." This Regulation was repudiated by Parliament. The revised Regulation, now in force, states that "if the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile origin or associations or to have been recently concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the realm or in the preparation or instigation of such acts and that by reason thereof it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order . . . that he be detained." The Secretary of State, in the first place, must have reasonable cause to believe certain specified facts concerning the person; secondly, he must have reasonable cause to believe that those facts make detention necessary. The Advisory Committee set up by the Regulation does not merit discussion. It is in no way a judicial tribunal, and it is admitted that its advice has been arbitrarily rejected by the Home Secretary in fifty-five cases, for reasons unknown.

As the reasonableness of the Home Secretary is not infallible, it is claimed that the Regulation does not debar its being called into question in the courts by means of the habeas corpus process; but, as this claim is now sub judice, I can say no more. It is certain, however, that a detained person who lacks considerable means cannot initiate habeas corpus proceedings in London if he is detained in the Isle of Man. It is remarkable, also, that the Bill under discussion was introduced while habeas corpus and other leagal procedings were pending, and that a Government spokesman, during discussion of the Bill, said: "It is a constitutional issue about which the Attorney-General has no very clear or definite views," the Attorney-General being one of the three sponsors of the Bill.

If Mr. Garwood would re-read his letter in the light of the above comments he would see that he is, no doubt unintentionally, arguing, first, that the King's Judges are not to be trusted, and, secondly, that nameless bureaucrats should be free to break the law instead of initiating, if need be, a further revision of Defence Regulation 18B.—Your obedient servant,

ARTHUR ROGERS.

SIR WALTER STRICKLAND—

WANDERER AND SCHOLAR

AN INVETERATE WANDERER

The explanation of Walter Strickland is very simple. If he requires understanding it is because of dulled interests and vitality of the ordinary individual, living under capitalism. Strickland was an inveterate wanderer. That was because his mind was that of the wandering scholar, of the type that belonged to the Middle Ages and played such an important part in the social history of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In order to pursue this life of learning he found it was desirable to live and to travel third class and to identify his interests with those of the poor and of the politically weak and outcast rather than with the social ruling class. He felt that the rich were not too sympathetic towards real scholarship, and so gradually his ideas assumed a propagandist guise. He felt the truth was no respecter of parties, institutions, social orders, or governments. Hence his love of scholarship tended to make him a revolutionist.

EARLY WANDERINGS IN YORKSHIRE

Walter Strickland first adapted himself to this life of wandering scholarship in Yorkshire.

Although he was born in London and educated first at Harrow and spent much time in London during both his Harrow and Cambridge days, he passed a great deal of his early years studying the natural history of Yorkshire. It is easy to understand how he came to take up this pursuit.

Strickland was devoted to his mother, who died when he was a boy of thirteen. Two years later his father married again and Walter Strickland was opposed to the second marriage. From that time on he reserved himself from his family and plunged into a variety of intellectual pursuits. During his student days he returned a great deal to Yorkshire for the purpose of studying conchology, otherwise the science of shells, which has fallen rather into disrepute because modern science maintains that the entire moluse must be studied. He also took up the more important study of mycology, or in plain words the science of fungi. An article contributed to the Naturalist for June, 1889, enables us to follow his wanderings through Yorkshire; from early November, 1874, to late October, 1888, a period of fourteen years. Some part of this period must have been spent in company with Freethinkers. When I stayed with him in France in 1912, he told me a great deal about the old Freethought movement in Yorkshire.

In his Naturalist article Walter Strickland makes a list of the fungi that he presented early in 1889 to the British Museum. Before presenting them he went through his specimens carefully and compared them with those to be found in the classified collection at the South Kensington Natural History Museum. His collection was made for self- instruction, and consequently contained many extremely common and widely diffused species. It represented a fairly general scheme of mycology, but also included some rare and curious specimens, some of which he felt were peculiar to Yorkshire. At that time, mycology was viewed as a recent branch of natural history. The specimens presented by Strickland to the British Museum covered thirty-one different orders of fungi. In presenting them he listed the place where he had discovered the specimen and the date of discovery.

We find that during these fourteen years Walter Strickland returned again and again to the Pond Wood at Boynton, to the Low Wood, to the Grove, to the Saw Mill, to the North Wood, to the Third Ridge, to the Grindale Plantation, to the Meadows and to the Botanical Gardens. We discover also that he collected peculiar fungi at the cliff beyond Scawby, the Meadow between Ayton and Scarborough, the Meadows by the Esk, above Egton, the Fir Plantation between Flockton and Seamer. We see him exploring the Pine stump, above Robin

Hood's Bay and delving into the fish-ponds at Hildenley. He finds fungi in the cliffs above Carnelian Bay, and again at the cliffs at Filey. Occasionally he goes into Lincolnshire and explores the Walcot Hill Top or the Vicarage Garden at Appleby. These names are mentioned not in order to list the places explored by Sir Walter Strickland at this period, but to show the part played in developing his roaming interests in natural history during this period in Yorkshire.

His first essay was published during this period. It consists of notes and observations of the forms of sand he observed at Redcar during the years 1882-3. This essay is a most interesting study in the symmetry of nature. The author does not content himself with mere scientific observation, but plunges into a great deal of philosophy and writes of the behaviour of the wind, and the part it plays, with the force of poetry. When one considers his later folk-lore translations and then turns back to his observations on the form of sand at Redcar one realises that his early work contained the promise of his later ambitious studies in the appreciation of folk-lore.

HARROW'S ADVENTURERS

Walter Strickland was sent to school at Harrow in the same term as R. B. Cunninghame Graham, who died in 1936. During a part of his life Graham was also a poet, a socialist, rebel, traveller, etc. Generally he was a character who must have had very much in common with Strickland. At Harrow they must have influenced each other. In 1914 Cunninghame Graham became a rabid patriot and denounced in very abusive terms the socialists with whom he had been associated formerly.

Strickland also supported the war for a short period and then repented of identifying himself with its horrors. He never abused, however, those who were opposed to war for the great characteristic of his thought during the whole of his student days and right on to the end of his life was a tremendous hatred of violence and of those who engaged in violence. This is made very clear in his eulogies of Buddhism.

It is the boast of Harrow that although her traditions are conservative, the conservatism is largely superficial. This school claims to have produced very many "adventurers," intellectual as well as actual, among whom is included Byron.

The headmaster at Harrow was Dr. Butler, who later was appointed Dean of Gloucester and became Master of Trinity College at Cambridge. At Harrow Strickland lampooned the headmaster in the monthly magazine, called The Tyro. At Cambridge he came to understand Butler differently and largely sympathised with the uncomfortable situation in which the distinguished pedant found himself. Dr. Butler was not entirely orthodox in his theology, and he had to serve up orthodoxy in the Public School to retain his position. He effected a kind of satiric compromise. Strickland became his correspondent and they retained correspondence to the day of Dr. Butler's death.

During 1888, whilst studying the fungi of Yorkshire and the sea shells of Durham, Strickland found time to pour ridicule on Professor James Stewart, M.P., who was Trinity lecturer in Elementary Physics at Cambridge. For a short time Professor Steward found it impossible to pursue his work as a professor at Cambridge properly because of his firm support of Mr. Gladstone. He plunged into politics at the expense of everything else. The attack on Parnell and the sacrifice of that distinguished Irish politician to mean political interests caused Professor Steward to return to his educational work and to find solace for his shattered political illusions in the laboratories at Cambridge.

Down to 1892 Strickland was settled in London or the neighbourhood. During his Harrow and Cambridge days he was for many years a constant visitor to the smoky Metropolis. In that year he left England with the intention of settling permanently in Italy. He stayed in Italy eight years and then proceeded to Australia and New Zealand, Java, Singapore and Ceylon.

BUDDISM: THE DUKE'S STRICTURES

By A. A. MORTON

[Mr. Morton wrote his defence of Buddhism in the form of a letter, but we thought it was better to publish it as an essay.—Ed.]

I feel I cannot let the Duke of Bedford's strictures on Buddhism pass without comment.

His Grace recommends a book by a Christian priest to an enquirer as to the respective values of Christian and Buddhist approaches to Truth. Naturally, the Christian must have a bias in favour of his own form of religion, looking through the Christian spectacles of his father, his heredity, his church. The result is inevitable, and we get a repetition of the exoteric explanation of the sublime teaching of Gautama the Buddha on the one hand, and on the other the old Christian emphasis on the conception of an anthropomorphic, extra-cosmic God to whom the lazy thinker can turn when he finds the Greek philosopher's advice "KNOW THYSELF" puts too hard a task before him.

Does not much of the controversy turn on the interpretation of such words as "God" and "desire"? If a man cannot interpret to himself the thing that is his SELF, how can he begin to approach the wider conception of an impersonal Deity, of the Law and Order that rule the Universe? May I paraphrase a text from I John IV, 20 and say, "If a man say I know God and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that knoweth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he know "God", whom he hath not seen?"

Again, Buddhism puts against "desire," "aspiration," a higher power of the same energy directing the WILL to search for that Knowledge which is his birthright, "the knowledge of his own identity and destiny," an inherent power born in each individual. Such knowledge is not easy of attainment, though intuitional flashes will certainly light the path of the earnest seeker and

"Deeds in hours of insight willed
May be through days of gloom fulfilled."

It is a spiritual science of a magnitude of which we have little conception until aspiration sets our feet on the beginning of the Path in intuitional certainty.

The Buddha's verbal silence on the Ultimate is natural when, realising that something other than a process of intellection is necessary to convey any conception of the INEFFABLE, man's brain-mind stops short in the adytum of Supernal Truth and he bathes in the great Silence in supreme realisation.

But indeed Buddhism has the most satisfying message for "the struggling soul who fails in the fight." In that priceless little book, "The Voice of the Silence," containing precepts put into the hands of mystic students in the East, we read ". . . if he falls, e'en then he does not fall in vain; the enemies he slew in the last battle will not return to life in the next birth that will be his," so that truly "each failure is success." For the doctrine is based on the scientific law of cause and effect, given in the New Testament in the sentence "as ye sow so ye shall reap,"—known in the east as Karma—and the necessity for the ego to return to the place of his sowing of good or bad deeds to reap their reward or punishment, seeing in one short life it cannot reap all the effects. Thoughtful consideration of any life story will convince one of this, and the doctrine of reincarnation be found the necessary corollary to that of Karma. For "rigid justice rules the world." As one cannot stop the ripples from a stone thrown in the water, so one cannot stop the effects resulting from causes set up in any medium, natural or spiritual, and NATURE being ONE her laws obtain on all planes. So man lets the past, over which he has no control, take care of itself and seeks perpetually to avoid setting up the wrong causes, seeing injury to himself is injury to his brother, a part of the ALL and hence a part of himself.

And the goal? How put into words a magnificence beyond apprehension by the head though the true heart of man may have perfect vision. What power has a drop of water determined to maintain its spherical identity compared with the same drop united with its fellows in the crushing immensity of an ocean wave? The egotistic drop will start a long period of disintegration before it again gets a chance to augment the sum of divine-human power, for, "he who would save his life shall lose it," a truly occult saying. The immediate goal is therefore work for Brotherhood. "Live the life and ye shall know of the doctrine"—the life of personal service.

HIS LIFE AND TIMES,
By
GUY A. ALDRED.

"As the worth of a man, so the worth of his trade, or vice versa. As the worth of his trade, so the worth of the man."—Diderot.

"Who is the more honoured to-day, Socrates or the magistrate who made him drink the hemlock."—Ibid.

"In candour, in independency of judgment, in perfect moral fearlessness of character, Carlile cannot be paralleled among the public men of his time."—George Jacob Holyoake.

Richard Carlile was the greatest public man of his time. No contemporary equalled him in courage, public affection, and libertarian impulse. Posterity will rank his fame higher than that of Thomas Paine even, no less for the part he played in the emancipation of the English Press and the enlightenment of the proletariat, than for his personal firmness of character. The present record is not merely an essay of historical interest, not a dead monument, but a live propagandist study. It is full of the eternal spirit of revolt, the fire of freedom and defiance. Carlile's jail wisdom—with its caustic criticisms of "law and order" methods of revolt—and the daring of his publishing—with its essays delineating the character of a soldier—are of special import at the present time. Knowledge of his work and message are a vital necessity to every toiler who thinks that he might be free.

1912 BIOGRAPHY.

Guy Aldred first wrote and published his "life" of Carlile in 1905-6. It was published serially in the columns of the Agnostic Journal. Revised and published in the Herald of Revolt in 1911, it appeared in pamphlet form the following year. Under the title: Richard Carlile: His Battle for the Free Press, it ran into 40 pages of close print and was published at one penny. The author also edited and compiled from The Republican, etc., a collection of Richard Carlile's Jail Jottings. This was a 48-paged pamphlet, produced on good paper, and published also at one penny. These two pamphlets had a large circulation. The "life" was banned from being sold in London in the L.C.C. parks. No reason was given. Jail Jottings was not banned. These two pamphlets gave the reader an insight into the work done by this greatly neglected champion of liberty.

The Truthseeker, New York, for July 19, 1913, devoted over two columns to a review of Jail Jottings. We excerpt the following:—

"A condensed but clear account is given of the succession of mock trials by which Carlile was robbed of liberty for some of the best years of his life for no crime whatever, his convictions being based solely on the publication and sale of Paine's works and other Freethought and Republican literature. The remainder of the pamphlet is devoted to selections from Carlile's writings during his incarceration. The following extracts will suffice to show the courage and intellectual capacity of this hero of Rationalism and progress, for whom the British government could find no better use than to clap him into a dungeon for using his intellectual attainments to enlighten and uplift his fellow men."

In April-June, 1923, Guy Aldred published a new study of Carlile's "life" in the Freethinker. This study and the previous 1912 biography were combined and issued in book form during the same year. It embodied the reports of the "mock trials," as Carlile termed his prosecutions, previously prefaced to Jail Jottings. The contents of this biography were as follows:—

Dedication; Foreword; The Carlile Family; Early Years; An Epoch of Cant and Terror; Legal Biography; Earning a Judgeship; Carlile Turns Publisher; Iron Purpose and Espionage; Peterloo; Mock Justice; Judge and Prisoner; Carlile's Speech from the Dock; Verdict and Sentence; Christian Judges; Pious Polemics; Principles and Politics; Mental Evolution; Karl Sandt; Thomas Paine; The Instruction of Youth; Jail Wisdom; Struggle; Anti-Militarist Publisher; Exposing Freemasonry; With Robert Taylor; Further Trials and Imprisonment; Eliza Sharples; "The Christian Warrior"; Death and After; Epilogue; Appendices; Notes. 190 pp.

This work was not only a record of the struggle for the Free Press between 1790 and 1843. It related the economic struggle of the working class, the rise of corrupt judges and landed families, and traced the interests behind reaction. It was plainly written, and replete with valuable propaganda facts. From the reviews of the time, we make some extracts:—

The Literary Guide said—

"A valiant fighter for free speech. . . . In this well-got-up and cheap volume our readers will find a fund of ill-arranged information concerning one of the bravest fighters in the ranks of heresy. Carlile justly takes high rank among the author's heroes, and he pays him unstinted tribute. With a candour which is commendable, Mr. Aldred mentions in his Preface that the publication of the work was declined by the R.P.A.—for reasons which will be obvious to every reader."

The reasons are more obvious to-day, in view of the speeches made in the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, respectively, by the leaders of the R.P.A.

The Freethinker said:—

"Those who read Mr. Guy Aldred's articles on Richard Carlile which ran through these columns, will be pleased to know that Mr. Aldred has very much enlarged these and has just published a biographical study of the great reformer. The volume extends now to 192 pages, and is being sold at 1s. 6d. in paper covers, and 2s. 6d. in cloth. It is well that the present generation should know something of one of the most heroic figures in the history of Freethought, and in this work Mr. Aldred has judged well in his sketch of the environment in which Carlile moved and against which he reacted. The book is written clearly and without ostentation, and we wish it every success. . . . Freethinkers will appreciate the portraits of Carlile and Robert Taylor (the Devil's Chaplain) which the book contains."

George Lansbury, with all his faults, a man of instinctive kindnes towards the struggles for liberty, wrote in the Daily Herald:—

"Guy Aldred, in 'Richard Carlile' has given us the life-story of a man whose one crime appears to havo been that he loved freedom of thought and freedom of expression above everything else in the world. Again and again he suffered imprisonment, always for some offence against idiotic laws based on the belief that religion would be destroyed if any of its doctrines were challenged. We have not even yet fully emancipated ourselves from this folly. Guy Aldred himself has been in prison many times because of his championship of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. It is this fact which makes his life of Richard Carlile (a publisher and writer who lived from 1790 to 1843) so sympathetic and worth reading. He writes not only as a lover of freedom, but as one who himself has been willing to follow, at whatever the cost, in the footsteps of his teacher. All Christians should read this book and learn from the story of Carlile's life and sufferings what Christians should not do in order to defend their creed. All politicians should also read it because we also are very apt to think that all truth and learning resides with us, and that our actions and motives should be accepted without question. . . . Richard Carlile lived his life in his own way, followed the light of his own conscience to the end. Such a man we can and do respect, however much the light of our own conscience leads us to disagree with him as to what is truth . . . amongst the clever and intellectual, and amongst those who have no book learning at all, there are to be found those who are great and who are worth remembering not for what they have written or said, but for what they have done, and amongst those are these two very dissimilar men, so far as creeds are concerned—Richard Carlile and Pastor John Smith."

The Socialist, Glasgow, organ of the Socialist Labour Party, treated the work to a lengthy review. We quote the following passages:—

"Guy A. Aldred has done well in setting out the life and times of Richard Carlile. The book is very well got up. The opening passages, in which Carlile is allowed to speak for himself, are most interesting and inspiring, setting forth the outlook and the spirit of the agitator Carlile, whom Aldred looks to as his master in the struggle towards civilisation without superstition and society without misery.' The period in which Carlile lived, the cant and terror which then prevailed, is portrayed vividly in the reproduction of passages from the examinations and cross-examinations of witnesses at a prosecution of a dissenting minister. Aldred no doubt had his mind set on the similarity of the methods of the prosecution of those days and those that exist to-day, particularly in relation to his own experiences in the Dock. Just to give the reader a taste of the many interesting episodes in the book, the following is quoted from some cross-examining. . . . From the beginning to the end it is thrilling. It gives an agitator's spirit, philosophy, persecution and achievement on behalf of the common people. To read of Carlile is to read of struggle. What better book can you read to instil within you that fighting spirit that the Revolution calls from you."

The Salisbury Times, a well-known local paper, founded in 1860 and still going strong, published the following notice of the book:—

"An interesting peep into the social life of this country a hundred years ago is given in a book which has just been issued entitled 'Richard Carlile.' It deals extensively with the career of that extraordinary but little-known character, who, in defiance of the law, insisted on publishing Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason.' . . . Carlile was the son of an Ashburton cobbler but became a leading figure in the fight for freedom of thought which occurred at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The author of this biography, Mr. Guy A. Aldred, has a great admiration for the defiance of the policy of official repression which was displayed. . . . Another consequence of Carlile's courage was the abolition of the stamping of newspapers. . . . This is only a little book, but it will bring the curious into the company of a number of very outstanding characters in very tempestuous times. To their boldness and pertinacity, whatever one may think of the views expressed, the freedom of the Press of to-day is largely due."

Common Cause, Sydney, N.S.W., Australia, reviewed the book and emphasised the social aspects of the struggle, as follows:—

"Among the publications recently received in this office is G. A. Aldred's 'Richard Carlile.' This was a very remarkable man born towards the end of the eighteenth century, who endured much persecution because of his championship of opinions on political and theological matters that were not liked by the powers that were. A particularly notable thing in Aldred's biography . . . is what is said therein about the ferocity of the criminal law. The ruling class at that time had great contempt for what is called (in the words of Edmund Burke) 'the swinish multitude,' and consequently, men, women—and even children—were 'strung up' for quite petty offences. From 1805 to 1818 inclusive, seventeen persons were hanged for 'petty larceny,' which means the stealing of a sum under £40. For robbery from the person, 188 were hanged; for horse-stealing, 85; for sheep-stealing, 43; and for burglary, 199. The special consideration that was given to the money-power is, however, indicated by the fact that more persons (207) were hanged for forgery than for murder or any other felony. Out of the unfortunate 207 persons hanged, 176 were victims of bank prosecutions. These hangings were 'the direct consequence of the introduction of paper credit.' . . . From 1797 to 1818, no fewer than 313 persons were hanged for uttering or possessing forged notes on the Bank of England. This was during the suspension of cash payments, which enabled a profit of £29,280,626 to be made on the 1797 capital of £11,642,000. The British ruling class greatly increased its wealth by its control of the Bank, but its money was obtained by the callous taking of the lives of the unfortunate creatures whom it 'strung up' or 'turned off' (to quote the heartless terms that were commonly used at that time.) . . ."

1941 BIOGRAPHY.

This work is final. It embodies the 1923 biography. Some chapters are re-written. There is much new matter. A lengthy introductory essay deals with Carlile's contemporaries and their reactions to the social crisis, to prosecution by ex-officio information, and to the suspension of habeas corpus. An addendum discusses very fully the prison system in London, especially from 1790-1843 and a little beyond. Thus a complete setting is given to the "life" of Carlile. A new picture of Carlile is included, but the portrait of Robert Taylor is removed, as it is proposed to publish a separate biography of "The Devil's Chaplain" later. Many new illustrations of London between 1790 and 1843, lent by the Postmaster-General, are included, and also pictures of Newgate Prison, and of trials. The new work aims at picturing and describing faithfully an important chapter in the life of the common people of Britain, and even of the English-speaking world.

Richard Carlile's selected writings other than those included in this volume, will be published as a separate work.

The price of this work will be 1s. 6d., paper covers. Post Free, 1s. 9d. Special terms for quantities.

FIRST WOMAN CONCHIE

The Daily Express for Tuesday, May 6, carried the story of Daphne Kiek, the first woman conscientious objector, written by Hilda Marchant. We have the Glasgow and London editions of the Daily Express. The story is varied slightly. Both editions print pictures of Miss Kiek. These vary also. We asked the editor to loan us the blocks or else to supply the prints, charging the usual copyright fees. This approach was turned down, apparently on the ground that, to publish a portrait of Miss Kiek in these columns would affect the course of the war or some such nonsense.

Miss Kiek's attitude is described by our contemporary's special correspondent in the following study:—

The first woman conscientious objector is Miss Daphne Kiek, aged 21, who comes from Surrey. She is a shorthand typist, efficient at her job, and she will not register under the new call-up for work in munitions, the women's services, or on the land.

Miss Kiek is an attractive English girl. There is nothing odd about her appearance or background.

She just refuses to be part of the "war machine."

Her objections—which she has sent in a letter to Mr. Ernest Bevin—are not on the grounds of Christian faith.

She is living in the middle of a badly hit district in London, but remains a pacfist. What she has seen and what has happened around her do not shake her from the conviction that we should make a negotiated peace with Hitler. . . ."

There are no tribunals for women, but they have the right of appeal to a hardship committee which will respect objection as a reason for application.

Miss Kiek has offered herself as the first test case for a woman conscientious objector.

I asked her yesterday if she would refuse to take down letters which would direct emergency services into a blitzed town.

"Certainly," was her reply. "I would not type anything which supported an organisation which prolongs this war."

I asked if she would help the injured in a bombed building.

She said: "Yes, if I were a civilian. But I feel A.R.P. and nursing are part of the whole organisation for war.

"I would not deliberately train as a nurse or a warden. I could not take on a uniform job of any sort or any first aid."

Miss Kiek is not in the least affected by any of the raids she has been through, and when I asked her: "Would you be prepared to accept a victory by Hitler?" she answered:—

"I do not believe that a victory on either side will solve any problem at all."

When I asked her if she would go in a munition factory she was most emphatic with her "No."

She said that these were the instruments of destruction which "to my mind would cause similar horrors to that which Britain is now experiencing."

On the question of defending our homes or working to defend them she said that she could not possibly undertake any work of that nature.

"It would be active participation in the war," she said.

So Miss Kiek went on with her typing in a room that has already had its windows blown out.

She insists that she can take no part in any of the women's organisations. "Even going on the land would be subscribing to the war effort."

It reminds me of a story of the great perturbation which arose in one area over whether a certain Labour Member should be elected to the magistracy, because it was feared he would be biased in favour of the proletariat. It was decided to chance it, however, and this Labour Member, knowing that there had been this criticism, would pass a sentence of 60 days where another magistrate would have given only 30 days—in order to avoid any criticism from the ruling classes that he was biased in his attitude. This Bill is being presented by a Government of Tories and National Liberals and Labour Members—if there is any difference between them. Some of the Tories have served in the war, and here I would pay my tribute to every man, whether he is in Civil Defence or National Defence, who is fighting for the things in which he believes. But how many Labour M.P.'s have fought on the battlefield? How many trade union leaders? The first thing that was done was to get the Ministry of Labour to reduce the ages in certain reserved occupations from 30 to 25, so that every clerk in their offices should be in a reserved occupation. It was for the proletariat rank and file to die in defence of the freedom that they had decided they wanted to preserve. The average Labour Member of Parliament who is within the age is not prepared to serve, and yet is prepared to sit silent and not even defend the rights of individuals under this Bill. One would expect some generosity to come from them; but no, they are caught up in the trap completely, and they go on and penalise these other men.

Before I finish let me give an example of a man who was a conscientious objector but who succumbed and entered the Army. I had entered into correspondence with this individual. He was an absolutist. He would not serve. He asked me for advice. I said that I would give him information, but I would not give him my advice. On all occasions I have said to conscientious objectors, "You must make up your own minds; decide your course of action for yourself. I am not going to advise you one way or the other." After a time he wrote to me. He said that I should be amazed to see where the letter came from. It came from a military barracks. In it he said, "You know, McGovern, I am afraid you will think I have let you down tremendously, but I found that my whole social environment—in my home, in the district, amongst my companions—was so overwhelmingly anti-conscientious objector that I was compelled to succumb. I had not the necessary courage to be a conscientious objector, only sufficient courage to be a soldier." That was the confession of one man.

There is a large number of people in this country who take the view that conscientious objectors are cowards, simply people who are evading service. They are wrong in that. There may be some people who only try to evade service and are not against offering up other lives. I would say to this House and to Labour Members in the Government that the conduct of the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Minister of Home Security and the Hon. Member for Shipley—that they take this view that they are cowards because they wish to change the attitude of people like these. In one war they are absolutely against the war, and then in the present war, when they are over military age, they are backing the war and inviting repression of conscientious objectors. People say, "Is it not true that this conscientious objection business is only a ramp?" They are encouraged to believe it is a racket because of these people who have been active in opposing war when they were of military age and are backing war when they are over military age—and you cannot blame them for that.

I know many genuine men who are conscientious objectors. My own son is a conscientious objector. He would probably not come completely within the terms of the Act. He is a political objector: he makes no bones about it. At the tribunal every form of pressure was used against him. At the tribunal he was asked whether his father backed the Spanish Civil War or not. That is the type of mind that was on the bench. He was asked, "Is it not the case that your father backed the Spanish Civil War, and would you have backed the Spanish Civil War? Did you believe that the Spanish Government were right?"—all that sort of thing. On the Spanish position he was turned down—although the present Lord Privy Seal went out to Spain himself, and they all backed the Spanish Civil War. He was turned down because he said manfully that the Spanish Government were right in resisting Franco. It was on his paper. He did not say, and I have never stated, that I would fight for the Spanish people. All that I demanded was that the Spanish people had the right by international law to purchase arms for their own defence, if they wanted to. I opposed intervention, and his opposition was the same. (Interruption). I do not object to the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Noel-Baker) believing that this is a thoroughly proper struggle and that he ought to take a rifle and go out to defend the people of this country.

I have never objected to Labour Members joining the Army, but I have said that they shelter themselves behind the fact that they are Members of Parliament. They were prepared to declare war and encourage the young people to go out to fight in order to keep them and their Parliamentary government going. One of the great arguments against Hitler is that he has oppressed trade unionism and Parliamentary government. It might be true that if he came here, Parliamentary government would have to be defended, and no doubt I should defend it in a concentration camp. That is no reason why I should ask the ordinary men and women to go out and keep me in a privileged position in this country. If I believed that, I ought to go out and defend it myself. Let us put an end to this humbug by people who are persecuting the conscientious objectors and by some of these people who are so versatile that they can change from one position to another in a very short space of time. There is the Noble Lady who is sitting there. (Interruption). I am sorry. I made a mistake when I said "Noble Lady." I was thinking rather of what she imagines than of what she is. One would expect people like her, according to her professions of a few years ago, to defend the rights of conscientious objectors of the present time. One would have expected her to oppose the Bill, because she has professed to stand for freedom, especially when she was a member of the Communist party.

The Joint Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Home Security (Miss Wilkinson): For five years I fought against the Nazis while you people tried to excuse them. Why should I not fight against them now?

Mr. McGovern: Why are you not in the W.A.A.F.S.?

Miss Wilkinson: I am doing my job here.

Mr. McGovern: It is a damned good job. I can quite understand, when people climb into that kind of job at £30 or £40 a week, that they can ask the ordinary soldier to fight and do his job for 2s. a day. That is the kind of sacrifice we are getting.

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: The Hon. Member is getting very near to personalities.

Mr. McGovern: Yes, but I must express myself. It is very difficult for anybody in my position to keep from personalities. The Labour movement has been built up on personalities.

Mr. Noel-Baker (Derby): May I ask whether it is in order for an hon. Member to attack the personal honour and courage of Members of this House who, throughout many months, have shown immense bravery in their constituencies by helping during the air bombardment which has taken place?

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: It is never in order for an hon. Member to attack the personal courage or conduct of any individual Member by name. One can attack a group or a party. I endeavoured to restrain the hon. Member from attacking individuals.

Mr. Noel-Baker: If the hon. Member avails himself of the Ruling you have just given, is he not acting in a manner which is beneath all contempt?

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. McGovern: I can understand the hon. Member being annoyed, because truth always annoys a considerable number of people. It was all right when they were lashing across at the Tories before the war began, but not when an hon. Member, who believes in his Socialism, has a conscientious objection and states what he believes to be true. I will stand up for my opinions inside this House, if it is in order to do so, or outside this House, according to my views and beliefs. In my estimation, the Bill is the culmination of a series of acts that have been designed to penalise those who have a genuine conscientious objection and who have failed to get recognition from the tribunals. The penalties it seeks to impose are very drastic, in our opinion.

Some people may be prepared to do work of a civilian character, but the fact that they are to be ordered to do so by a court and that penalties will be held over their heads will compel a large number of those people to resist to the end. In so far as they resist, our work has always been in their defence, whether in war or in peace. We will, therefore, oppose this Measure, as coming from a Government who, in our estimation, are travelling the Totalitarian road, and are destined in the end to embrace the things which they profess to be out to end. I refuse to believe, as some people do, that the Bill is necessary in order to conduct the war. I believe it is part of the industrial dragooning that has taken place in this country against the workers and against every person with principle and independence.

Mr. Silkin (Peckham): We have just listened to a speech which was interesting, abusive, irrelevant and muddleheaded. The hon. Gentleman has taken advantage of the Privilege which this House offers of making slanderous statements which I am certain he would not dare to make outside this House.

Mr. McGovern: I will make them in any part of the country you like, and I have made them outside. I will go further than that:

Mr. Silkin: It is obvious that the hon. Member has not read the Bill and does not know what is in it.

Mr. McGovern: I have read the Bill. As a matter of fact, not only have I read the Bill, but last night I went through it very thoroughly indeed. There was scarcely a comma that I did not look at.

Mr. Silkin: If the hon. Member has read the Bill, he has not understood it.

Mr. McGovern: Oh, yes I have. You cannot get away with that cheap stuff.

Mr. Silkin: The hon. Member cannot possibly have a grievance about the Bill, which improves the position of the conscientious objector and does not take away any of his privileges. If the hon. Member has a grievance, it may be against the original National Service (Armed Forces) Act, but the Bill sets right many grievances. The hon. Member made a speech which was irrelevant, and I do not feel moved to take up any of the points which he made; but I think it worth while to say one thing.

Mr. McGovern: Yes, you have to defend your leaders.

Mr. Silkin: I would like the hon. Member to say whether he would have the House believe that he wants everybody who alleges that he has a conscientious objection to be taken as such, merely on his own word.

Mr. McGovern: The test of conscience must always be the personal evidence of the individual. The conscientious objector is compelled in many cases to supply evidence to the tribunal, and in spite of the overwhelming character of the evidence, prejudiced people refuse to accept it. I am defending these men, who are genuine conscientious objectors.

Mr. Silkin: The reply of the hon. Member is quite of the order of his speech. He did not give a categorical answer whether he would have the bare statement of the conscientious objector accepted without any question.

Mr. McGovern: Yes.

Mr. Silkin: If he would have it so—

Mr. McGovern: Just as in the case of the Minister for Home Security during the last war.

PACIFISM NOT IRRELEVANT

By The DUKE OF BEDFORD

[The following essay is a review of a small pamphlet by Mr. Alexander Miller, entitled The Irrelevance of Pure Pacifism. The editor will give his opinion of this pamphlet in a later issue. It is published by P. Wilson, 33 Townsend Drive, St. Albans, Herts.—Ed.]

Mr. Miller's criticism of the Peace Movement and discontent with what he feels to be its ineffectiveness and lack of policy—an ineffectiveness and lack of policy which he feels can only be remedied by peace-workers identifying themselves with Socialism—is somewhat in the nature of a curate's egg.

No doubt the peace movement would have accomplished more in the past and would be more effective at the present time if it were more united on a definite constructive programme. Mr. Miller, as already indicated, feels that this programme should be Socialism. I feel that it should be the reform of the monetary and foreign trade system as a preliminary to an effective survey of the position and further changes, which, when brought into being might, or might not, satisfy Mr. Miller's definition of "Socialism" but which must anyhow achieve those ideals of justice which are the goal of Socialism. Of the fundamental importance of the reform of the monetary and foreign trade system as a condition of peace and justice, Mr. Miller, like many pacifists and non-pacifists, Socialists and non-Socialists, appears to have little comprehension and, in so far as this is so, he, when attacking pacifists for their lack of a constructive programme, is a pot calling the kettle black. He also, I think, underestimates the value of the work and co-operation of those who can travel no further along the same path than in their common opposition to war. War, i.e., armed conflict, is not a mere unimportant sideline in the general conflict between good and evil, justice and injustice. It is a manifestation of evil of peculiar malignancy, power and destructiveness, as we can see all too plainly especially if we chance to live in bombed areas; and those who are united only in their opposition to war are not united on a merely negative basis, but in an active crusade to check or prevent a very definite and terrible evil.

Mr. Miller is, I think, also mistaken in assuming too readily that every pacifist, to be useful and worthy of the name, must have a definite political policy allied to his pacifism. Although I myself have such a policy and believe in having one, I realise that great respect is due to the work of those pacifists who take little interest in politics as the term is generally understood and who place their opposition to war on a purely spiritual and religious basis, regarding armed conflict as disobedience to God and an act of criminal injustice done to man.

I think that lack of a definitely constructive programme is, perhaps, more damaging to the efficiency of the peace movement in time of peace than in time of war because, when war is actually raging, the war issue itself provides more for pacifists to get their teeth into—if I may be forgiven the use of such an aggressive phrase!—and an ever-present reason for not getting slack in mind or action.

Mr. Miller's booklet is weakest in its criticism of pacifists who, he suggests, defend Hitlerism or favour a negotiated peace. In his attitude towards the Nazi régime he shows that lack of imagination and capacity for fair judgment which is so characteristic of the mentality of the British politician and the British war-monger. His emotions are so outraged by the bad features in the German system that he cannot give honour where honour is due and recognise the good. He cannot really put himself in another's place and realise how the sufferings of the post-war Germany have given birth to elements of tyranny and cruelty in a manner characteristic of nearly all countries where the same conditions are fulfilled; and most of all he cannot distinguish between sympathising with wrong behaviour, and a broad-minded understanding of human nature which, while deeply grieved by an evil, is not shocked by it, because it realises how natural it is for the frailty of man to produce such results.

Mr. Miller has evidently obtained his information of European events from the time of Munich to the outbreak of the war from newspaper sources and has little conception of what was really going on behind the scenes. He does not realise that true appeasement means something more than grudgingly and grumblingly giving way when an opponent demands, with a threat of force, what justice should long ago have granted. He does not realise how much evidence there is that Chamberlain merely went to Munich to gain time for the speeding up of the rearmament programme, giving Hitler good reason to accuse him of bad faith when he promised to settle further problems peacefully, by the method of negotiation—a blunder none the less fatal even if Hitler himself were not sincere. Mr. Miller has also obviously failed to realise how weak was the case for the Polish war and how reasonable were the terms first offered by Hitler in the previous March, terms which our alliance encouraged the Poles to continue to reject. He, I think, mis-states and misunderstands the position when he represents the Polish war as one into which the Government was forced by public opinion. Talking to ordinary people at the outbreak of the war, I remember a very general feeling that Poland was not an adequate reason. The Polish alliance, moreover, was arranged, without consulting the nation, at a small week-end meeting of Cabinet Ministers. The Polish war, again decided upon without consulting the nation, was the result of the decision of the House of Commons, and public opinion in support of the war, in so far as it existed, was manufactured by the incessant propaganda of many of the leading newspapers. To this also may be attributed the popular fear—based, incidentally, on no reasonable foundation—that a negotiated peace must be the equivalent to "having Hitler over here."

In his opposition to a negotiated peace, Mr. Miller again shows little imagination, little grasp of human nature and, one might add, little awareness of the hard and obvious facts of the present situation. A lasting peace will depend, not upon the men who sign it, nor upon the nature of the Governments in power in Germany or this country; it will depend on the justice of its terms and upon the fairness and generosity of our foreign policy after the war is over. If this policy is what it should be, whatever the personal characters of the Nazi leaders, they will, after the terrible lesson which the peoples of all countries have received in the destructive power of modern warfare, never be able to secure popular support for another war on a weak and unjust issue. For this same reason—the destructiveness and natural unpopularity of war and also because, unlike ourselves at the present moment, Hitler has an economic policy capable of gaining prosperity for his country and popularity for himself in time of peace—there is good reason to believe that he would be willing to make very considerable concessions in the way of restoration of liberty to conquered countries in return for an opportunity of abandoning war and starting on constructive work. Moreover, it should by now be apparent to any reasonable person that we have no chance of overthrowing the German Government by the method of war alone.

If we do not, or cannot, while war continues, put into successful operation an economic system obviously superior to Hitler's in the eyes of all the peoples of Europe; and if Hitler is not rash enough to reject very reasonable peace terms put forward by ourselves and left on permanent offer—with the result that he provokes revolution, the only alternative is for us to work for the elimination of the evil feature of the Nazi régime by those methods which, in peace time, are open for this purpose. If we can show the German people, and the peoples of the other European nations an example of a country whose inhabitants are happier and more prosperous and are making better use of their economic resources even than those of Germany, then, when fear of military attack and economic aggression can no longer be appealed to by the leaders of the totalitarian states, their restrictive regulations will become tedious and absurd and their power to oppress will melt and crumble like snow beneath the sun.

UNCONDITIONAL EXEMPTION!

Exeter's C.O.'s Fire-Watching Refusal

The Exeter Express and Echo, for May 8, and The Western Morning News, Plymouth, for May 9, give prominence to the case of Eric Strickland Randall, of 34 East Grove Road, Exeter, a 21-year-old window-dresser, employed by Messrs. Colsons, of Exeter. Randall was granted unconditional exemption from service under the Armed Forces Act when he applied to the local Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in March, 1940.

Summoned at Exeter Police Court, on May 8, for having failed to perform fire-watching duties at his place of work on April 24th, Randall pleaded not guilty, and held that the exemption granted by the Tribunal applied not only to combatant duties but to civil defence work, of which fire-watching was a part.

The Court disagreed with his interpretation of the law, told him that the Fire-watchers' Order did not come into force until January of this year, and that he had rendered himself liable to a very heavy penalty. Randall was informed that the penalty would be deferred for a week, and that the only grounds upon which exemption could be obtained from fire-watching were those of hardship or physical unfitness.

The Chairman of the Bench, A. G. Guest, said to Randall:—

"In the meantime I strongly warn you to seek some advice."

We hold that the Chairman is in error and the Court's decision is wrong. Fire-watching is part and parcel of military defence. If a man has received unconditional exemption, and is opposed to fire-watching, he has no right to be menaced and threatened in this way. It was the first case of its kind to come before the local Court. It is the duty of the Ministry of Labour, and of the Ministry for Home Security, to see that it is the last case of its kind to come before any Court.

The Acting Chief Constable (A. E. Rowsell) stated that, when informed of the duties required of him, defendant sent a registered letter to one of his director's, declaring that he wished to draw the firm's attention to the fact that he was granted total exemption from military, non-combatant, and civil defence duties for the duration of the war. Therefore, the letter continued, he would not be on call for fire-watching duties on April 24th or at any other time.

Randall's letter concluded:—

"Will you, therefore, erase my name from the rota on which you have put my name without my consent or consultation?"

Robert J. Barton, director of Messrs. Colson's, Ltd., said Randall flatly refused to do fire-watching because he had a conscientious objector to performing the duty.

Inspector Reeve, who interviewed Randall, said defendant replied that he did not think the Fire-Watching Order covered him, as he had total exemption. Randall also said that he had a conscientious objection to fire-watching on conscientious grounds as it was part of the war.

In answer to the Magistrates' Clerk (James Whiteside), Randall said his interpretation of the law was purely personal.

In evidence, Randall contended that fire-watching was in integral part of home defence. "You cannot break the law if you are above the law," he asserted. "The exemption granted by the C.O. Tribunal places me in that position."

The Magistrates' Clerk reminded Randall that the exemption was granted by a Tribunal set up under the Armed Forces Act and that there was a limit to the scope of its authority.

H. T. Michelmore, a member of the Bench (who is also a solicitor, and did not want the accused to forget that most important fact of status), told Randall that the only two grounds on which he could claim exemption from fire-watching were those of personal hardship and medical unfitness.

Randall: I disagree.

The Magistrates' Clerk: Your large experience as a window dresser of 21 years old hardly entitles you to disagree with the interpretation of the law given by the Magistrate concerned.

The Acting Chief Constable asked Randall what his position would be if the Court held that his interpretation of the law was wrong. What would be his reaction when next called upon for fire-watching?

Randall: I shall still refuse to perform this duty. I am prepared to put the matter before any authority and have it thrashed out one way or the other.

The Chairman (Mr. A. G. Guest) said the Bench found the case proved, but they would defer their announcement of penalty for a week. In the meantime he strongly advised Randall to obtain some advice on the subject.

We would like to know how the Magistrates' Clerk comes to play such a large part in the Court's proceedings, when he is purely an official, and not an administrator of justice. We would like to know also the grounds for Mr. Michelmore's impertinence. Since when have solicitors been entitled to assume the importance of Counsel as authorities on the interpretation of the law? Have not learned judges often been less well informed concerning the meanings of the law than window-dressers? We could list many learned decisions that rank as distatsteful nonsense that wise men wish to forget. Yet their authors received huge incomes from the State, and paraded in pomp and ceremony at the expense of unlearned victims far wiser than their judges. The bumptious country Michelmores should know that many laymen are jurists where most solicitors remain but lawyers. Strike them off the rolls, take away their state trade union licence, and they express their personalities as begging clerks or letter-writers. Solicitors usually are to law and jurisprudence what schoolmasters and pedants are to the language, and to literature: authorised and licensed obstructionists and formal enemies. There are exceptions: but they do not address the lay youth in the impertinent terms of power employed by Mr. Michelmore and his friend, the Magistrates' Clerk, in this case.

The case came before the Court again on Thursday, May 15. The Chairman (Mr. Henry T. Michelmore) was accompanied on the Bench by Messrs. A. G. Guest and J. W. Tallman.

The acting Chief Constable (Mr. A. E. Rowsell) said he had consulted with a director of Messrs. Colson's, who, on his advice, had prepared a rota showing that Randall was wanted for fire watching duty on Monday last. A letter was written to Randall acquainting him of this. Randall replied, stating that until he had obtained the legal advice he was seeking he did not feel he could undertake the duties. He (defendant) still maintained that the Fire Watching Order imposed upon him a duty which was a breach of faith, having regard to the unconditional exemption granted him from aiding the war effort.

Police Inspector Reeve, said the acting Chief Constable, went to Messrs. Colson's that night and found Randall was not on duty.

Randall said that he had written to the Chairman of the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal which granted him exemption under the Armed Forces Act.

He produced a reply from Judge E. H. C. Wethered, chairman of the tribunal, which stated that the order was made by the South-Western Tribunal on March 28, 1940, did exempt him from the obligation of serving as a fire-fighter under the Fire Prevention (Business Premises) Order.

The Magistrates' Clerk (Mr. James Whiteside), to whom the letter was handed, commented that the opening sentence appeared to be a typists's error, in view of the subsequent paragraphs, which read:—

"The order of the tribunal exempted you only from military service; that is to say, you were registered as a conscientious objector to military service, and you were not required to undertake civilian work under civil control as a condition of the exemption. The order does not exempt you from complying with other duties which you may be called upon to perform. The Fire Prevention Order does not contain any provision for exempting a conscientious objector. The only exemptions are on the grounds of personal hardship or medical unfitness."

Randall said that he did not feel compelled to do fire watching duties. He had now applied to the Hardships Committee for exemption.

After a retirement, the Bench sentenced Randall to 6 days' imprisonment. The Chairman said that the Hardships Committee would sit on Tuesday afternoon, May 27. As Randall had refused to do fire-watching pending the sitting of that Committee, he would go to prison. The Chairman added:—

"You will be set free on Tuesday in order to appear before the Committee. If their decision is in your favour, you will be free. If their decision is against you, you will be served with a further notice to do fire watching. Then, if you still refuse to do fire watching, you will be brought before the court again. What is the position between now and Tuesday? Are you going to do fire watching or go to prison?"

Randall: Go to prison.

The Chairman: Very well. You will go to prison for six days.

Randall is a Christian objector and a Communicant of the Church of England. His statement to the Bristol Tribunal, and the evidence given at the Tribunal, will be published next month. He is a member of the P.P.U.

"PONTIUS PILATE" CORRECTIONS

Dear Comrade,—In my Article, entitled "The Return of Pontius Pilate," there are two corrections (apart from printers' spelling) which are important.

In the paragraph, beginning "To induce," tenth line, the word "obeyed" should read "disobeyed."

In the next paragraph, the curious word "follicon," which is a printer's masterpiece, should be "Gallican."

Yours,

BEN GREENE'S APPEAL

We have seen no newspaper report of Ben Greene's habeas corpus appeal against his 18B detention. The Court advised that his case be re-heard by the Advisory Committee. Herbert Morrison informed the House of Commons that it would be re-heard.

A correspondent has sent a brief report of the procedings. This report contains two items of interest to lovers of democracy:—

(1) The Court ruled that it had power to bring the Home Secretary into Court and examine the grounds he claimed for ddetention.

(2) The Court ruled that it was unwilling to hear any more applicants in their own behalf in these cases.

The first ruling is correct. In theory, it affords some legal protection against the executive. In practice, it might not operate to any great extent. The danger of a time of crisis and clamour is, that, quite honourable men may turn persecutors over night and reach indefensible conclusions, often feeling that they must do so. Wrong having been done, they fear to right the wrong.

The second ruling is absolutely undemocratic. The most ardent Labour supporter of the present Government should protest against this ruling. The briefing of counsel is as unsatisfactory as it is expensive. Many of the 18B internees are poor people, very poor. Only a few are rich. The ruling is wrong in equity. It is also wrong in juridical principle. It is the unwritten law of England, as it is the unwritten law of Scotland, that the citizen shall have the right to defend himself in person against the Crown in any of the King's Courts.

This is the bold tradition of our law. It is the commonsense of all law. The chronicles of British history are rich with the names of fearless men and women, pioneers of democracy, who would not employ counsel, but defended themselves against the Executive. The present Government includes in its Cabinet and its Ministry persons who once called themselves comrades of the late John MacLean. Did he not speak in his own defence, and does Labour not circulate his famous Edinburgh speech? Could counsel have spoken for him as he spoke for himself? Ernest Thurtle, who, being a Rationalist, upholds 18B legislation, admires Richard Carlile. So does Lord Snell, Labour-Tory leader of the House of Lords. Carlile pled in person and actually inspired, in all, 900 men and women to do the same.

We urge simple democracy and uphold the canons of common law and the first principles of jurisprudence. Internees must be secured the right to be heard in person in all habeas corpus proceedings.

FASCISM AND SPAIN:

Another Unheeded 1936 Appeal.

In The Word for August, 1940, we told the story of the part played by the United Socialist Movement in the struggle against Fascism by the Spanish workers, 1936-1939. We have reproduced in these columns 5 of the 19 mimeographed leaflets that the U.S.M. issued, headed Regeneracion, Nos. 4, 6, 10, 11, and 12. Copies of The Word containing these reproductions are obtainable still. Below we reprint Regeneracion No. 7, issued on August 16, 1936. We circulated this leaflet widely at meetings and were ridiculed for our pains by the orthodox Labourites and also by the respectable upholders of Toryism. The result is that, what would have been a social war against Fascism, has been turned into an imperialist war, which has cost humanity a greater toll of life than the revolutionary destruction of Fascism and Nazism through Spanish loyalty and good faith would have demanded. Although it is too late to weep, the facts ought to be known and appreciated.

This is what the United Socialist Movement urged in August 1936:

REGENERACION!!

WORKERS! You must express your solidarity with the Workers of Spain by IMMEDIATE UNITED ACTION.

The United Socialist Movement, at its meeting in Bakunin Hall, 71 Stirling Road, on 11th August, 1936, carried the following resolution for practical working class action in Britain.

The United Socialist Movement demands:—

1. That all workers' organisations convene public meetings for the purpose of expressing complete solidarity with the Spanish Government de facto and de jure, and a strong censure of the British Government for not supplying, according to the law of nations, the Spanish Government with arms, ammunition, airplanes, etc.
2. A censure of Stanley Baldwin for supineness and covert Fascism, in not recalling Parliament and placing it in continuous session during the Spanish crisis.
3. A censure of Atlee, leader of the Opposition, and all Labour M.Ps. for not demanding the recall of Parliament under threat that the Opposition would appeal to the working class to set up Councils of Action and organise a general strike in behalf of Spain.
4. The recall and dissolution of Parliament and a direct appeal to the electors on this one issue: SUPPORT SPAIN.
5. A united front at the ballot box on this issue. All Anarchists and Anti-Parliamentarians to vote for and support all candidates standing against Fascism and for practical support of Spain. No division at the polls.
6. If the Government declines to resign and Parliament is not recalled and dissolved, general strike action be prepared by the workers through Councils of Action.
7. The immediate establishment of Councils of Action. In all workshops, political groups, trade union branches, etc., the demand to be put forward for the immediate establishment of Councils of Action, representatives of all sections of the workers' movement, to sit in permanent session until the Spanish crisis is concluded.
8. The impeachment of the Foreign Minister and the Home Secretary for permitting the airmen, Campbell Black and Cathcart Jones, to retain their passports, after acting for the insurgents against a friendly and properly constituted government and supplying the fascist rebels with airplanes.
9. The immediate withdrawal of passports from these men, their arrest, indictment, and public trial before a special court in London, for endangering the peace of Europe and treasonably making war on a friendly nation, thereby proving their public disaffection. The trial to be before three judges and a jury of twleve members. At least one of these judges shall be elected by the workers and the jury to include at least six workers.
10. Definite action of support of the Spanish Government and the workers of Spain.

We ask all comrades to bring this programme before their Socialist or Trade Union branch. We call for a complete fellowship and solidarity in action, spirit and approach between all sections of the workers' movement. We ask the people to realise what the triumph of Fascism means:—

1. If General Franco and his native troops succeed, with foreign help, in crushing the people of Spain, Fascism will overwhelm France and reach Britain.
2. If the French democracy makes a stand against Fascist invasion, European war will

Told in Press Cuttings

LABOUR AND THE WAR AGAINST FASCISM

We have recently been going through our collections of press-cuttings. The research has proven interesting. Only a small part of the result can be set before our readers in the present essay.

Lansbury and Churchill.

Speaking in the House of Commons, on Thursday, April 13, 1939, George Lansbury appealed for an international conference to discuss the world situation. He thus anticipated the week-end message that President Roosevelt addressed to Hitler and Mussolini. The press ignored Lansbury's powerful speech.

From Hansard's report of this striking contribution to social thought, we make the following extract :—

"The right hon. gentleman the Member for Epping (Mr. Churchill) spoke of the 'easy, comfortable lives' of people in this country.

"It is nothing to my credit, so please do not think that what I say is in any way self-righteous because I love to live where I am living—but I live among people who in the days immediately after the War, literally starved and many of whom to-day are in a state of semi-starvation.

"Easy comfortable lives? All my lifetime those people, or most of them , have never known such a thing, but when the War came in spite of me—and I know they will do it again—the very poorest districts sent the biggest numbers into the Army to fight.

"Boys of 17 and 18 years of age whom I had known as babies, went away to fight. A few came back maimed and bruised and battered, and we had to fight to secure proper conditions for them when they did come back. But multitudes never came back at all.

..."Now we are to face the same thing over again. . .

..." We are all full of indignation at the crushing of conscience in Germany and Italy.

..." You cannot condemn that attitude there if you establish it here on this business of compulsory military service.

..." I say that, too, because I am an old man, and whatever happens to me does not matter. I might be put in prison in safety somewhere and it would not matter one bit; but I do not feel that I have any right to go out and be part and parcel with the younger people in fighting against this business without doing what I can in this House to make that clear.

"I told Mussolini, and I told Hitler, that it is impossible now to build a new imperialism. The day has gone by. The world is too small. Science and invention have destroyed the power that men used to possess. To-day what the world needs more than anything else is that some men in position shall be found who will understand that a new technique, if you will, is required in international relationships, and that somehow or other we have got to bring to the service of mankind all there is in the world for the use of mankind, plus all the science and all the invention that God and nature have given us."

Lansbury and Bevin.

Lansbury's Pacifism cost him the leadership of the Labour Party. Ernest Bevin forced his resignation and advocated strongly the policy of collective security, which, of course, meant support of Imperialist re-armament under Capitalism. Bevin did not face the fact that re-armament meant conscription. Lansbury did.

Bevin supported re-armament from horror of Fascism and Nazism. He then realised that he was heading for war and conscription and looked at Chamberlain and the other "Ministers who have shown incompetence all along the line." He was horrified at the thought of handing the lives of lads of twenty to twenty-one over to them. Time will decide whether he has, in fact, done so.

Bevin and Downing Street.

In the monthly journal of the Transport Workers' Union, The Record, for May, 1939, Bevin penned some startling observations.

Extract No. 1 explains Bevin's reaction when, in anticiption of the present war, he first visited Downing Street :—

"Since last week, when as a member of the General Council, I went to 10 Downing Street to meet Chamberlain, I have been asking myself what is the difference between the methods of Hitler and Chambrlain. The British Press and the politicians complain that 'Hitler's word cannot be relied upon; that he came to an Agreement at Munich and then let the Prime Minister down; that he makes unilateral decisions, breaks treaties and goes back on his word to other people.' ... ...

"I have been asking myself 'What is the material difference between such action and the speech we listened to in that Cabinet room last week?"

Dealing with conscription, Bevin wrote :—

"I would utter this warning to those fathers and mothers who haven't any boys in the present conscript age group and who may therefore be somewhat indifferent. You may have younger or older children, but they will be drawn into the paw of the conscriptionist at an early date." ... ...

"Into the paw of the conscriptionist!" That is hardly a picture of the people organising themselves "to defend democracy!"

Bevin Depicts Duff Cooper.

Bevin turns to Duff Cooper and depicts him as a defender of democracy :—

"The price of liberty is eternal vigilance. I hope no one will be misled as to the intended policy of the present Government, and that our people will be ever vigilant. The Duff-Coopers have taken upon themselves with their journalistic enterprise, to lecture the Trade Unions on these issues. What good did Duff-Cooper ever do for any of us when he was in office? What can be shown in the records of any of the conscriptionists as having been carried out in the interests of the working population? But I forget—the greatest monument to them all is the Means Test, the cuts in Unemployment Benefit, and the imposition of the humiliation of poverty on our people."

How Labour Leaders Fall.

Bevin describes the approaches that reaction makes to Labour leaders in time of stress, in the following intriguing piece of pen-portraiture :

"Before the Government's announcement all kinds of people tried to get some of us in the Labour Movement to pronounce for conscription.

"On one occasion three different people called at office within a period of two days from different agencies, all with the same purpose.

"It was strikingly curious. They said, 'Is there no one in the Labour Movement who as a Leader of Labour would make a pronouncement in favour of conscription? If only someone in the Labour Movement would do so the Government could immediately take steps to accept it.'

"All these attempts were made from what we might regard as Middle Class folk.

"Naturally, I declined, but I have no doubt that others in the Labour Movement have been approached in a similar way.

"The approaches of the conscriptionists were full of flattery: 'You are the one man who could do this thing for the nation; you are the person the workers would follow if only you would say the word."

Ramsay MacDonald fell for this sort of thing more easily than Bevin did. We would say that Bevin's department has made a good stand for the conscientious objector and that he has not fallen completely, even now. He often raps out profound mistrust of his Tory supporters in the House of Commons. Yet he is playing his part, pursuing, as Member of the Cabinet, under Capitalism, a policy of Imperialist war on a dozen fronts with the same aims and based on the same strategy as the last war with the difference that the lives of the civilian population are being gambled with as well. Pursuing a policy of mere war and ignoring the revolutionary and powerful weapon of propaganda.

The Right to Resist.

In The Record article, Bevin concluded :

"Even assuming that we are in an absolute minority, and no one can judge yet, I am still satisfied it would be right to resist this effort to destroy our liberties."

Accused of being unpatriotic because of his criticism of conscription, Bevin succumbed. Yet he knew that his objection expressed democratic wisdom and he was unhappy in his surrender.

Bevin's Southport Speech.

At the Southport Labour Party Conference, 1939, the National Government was criticised but not challenged. By the block vote, the conference automatically approved the official party support for conscription. Ernest Bevin indicated that he was worried. In a striking speech, he said that "he had been gravely concerned over the views and propaganda for collective security which he supported but which were lacking in any clear idea of its natural consequence."

The natural consequence finds Bevin in the War Cabinet, still worried, and the social war against Fascism, which he ought to be conducting, turned into an Imperialist War between Capitalist Fascism and Capitalist Democracy, with the workers as robots, ordered to do this, or to do that, their right to think, to question, and to disobey sacrificed.

After denouncing Germany, Bevin declared that "the biggest contributor to the present world disaster is possibly this country and not Germany."

This shows that Bevin realises that there is a clear distinction between the social war, that must be waged by the workers of the world, against Fascism and Nazism, and the Imperialist War, that is being waged to-day. That war, after a terrible toll of human suffering, may effect the destruction of Fascism. It may sacrifice democracy to Fascism. The social war is uncompromising and must go on. It cannot conclude without the utter destruction of Fascism. Somehow, events seem to have carried Bevin into the wrong war : a more disastrous, a more spectacular struggle, but of less vital usefulness to mankind.

"I do not want this Movement to be fighting for the salvation of the Paris Bourse, the London Stock Exchange, the Amsterdam Exchange and Wall Street. I want this Movement in its peace policy to be fighting for the salvation of the common people of the world."

This is a good declaration. We believe that Bevin meant it. But can the mutual massacre of the common people of the world be considered the way of social salvation?

Labour and the Northcliffe Press.

The Southport decision, which Bevin supported, although lamenting it in his speech, was approved by the Daily Mail. In a leader, headed "Sense From Southport," our contemporary stated :—

"It is pleasant to say a good word for the Socialists. The occasions for it are all too infrequent. To-day we commend the party conference at Southport for their wisdom in throwing out a resolution proposing a boycott on conscription."

What is the Daily Mail?

We have before us, as we write, the leader from the Daily Mail for October 26, 1931. It is headed, "To Save England." After making an absurd adaptation of two lines from Homer, the scribe who writes this editorial says:—

"To-morrow you, the people of this country, go to the poll. How will you use your votes?

"Above all things, remember that the issue in this election is like the issue in no election of the immediate past. IT IS BETWEEN NATIONAL LIFE AND NATIONAL DEATH. It is whether England is to continue to exist as a Great Power or to be ruined irrevocably by a predatory Socialism."

The rest of this ridiculous and lying article speaks of "Socialist" extravagance, etc., "and careless surrender to violence."

We all know that the gesture of "careless surrender to violence" was made by the National Government to the forces of Fascism and Nazism, to Mussolini and to Hitler; and no press organisation urged, aided and abetted that surrender so thoroughly as the Daily Mail and its allied newspapers. To be commended and supported by the Daily Mail is a fact that ought to have caused Ernest Bevin much searching questioning and many sleepless nights.

The Daily Mail is issued from "Northcliffe House, London, E.C.4. Telephone: Central 6000." From that same address, and carrying the same telephone number, is issued the Sunday Dispatch.

On August 9, 1936, the Sunday Dispatch published an editorial of about 550 words, boldly headed: "Stamp Out the Plague." This denounced the Republican Government of Spain as Reds. Two passages were set out in heavy type as follows:—

"Spain, in short, has become the new cockpit of the real struggle of our age—between the Bolshevists and the anti-Bolshevists."

"One thing above all others is certain. It is that neither Herr Hitler nor Mussolini, both of whom had to kill the evil in their own lands, will permit the rise of a new Red Republic in Western Europe. . . ."

The following extract from the same article was not set out in bold type:—

"If Germany or Italy takes steps to restore order and decency, and to prevent further outrages, they wil lhave the moral support of every man and woman in Europe whose own mind has not been debauched by the immoralities of the Bolshevist philosophy."

Only five years have elapsed since the Northcliffe press was backing Hitler and Mussolini against the workers of Spain. Yet this press approved of Bevin supporting conscription in 1939. Why? Was it from love of the working-class or of the Socialist struggle against Fascism.

The National Government supported the Fascist and Nazist intervention in Spain.

On Saturday, July 16, 1938, Sir Archibald Sinclair, then leader of the Liberal Party, and to-day Secretary of State for Air, sent a message to the then Spanish Government in which he said:—

"Monday will be the second anniversary of this horrible war, and assuredly our sympathy goes out to the Spanish people in their sufferings.

"The war has long ceased to be predominantly a civil war; it is now a struggle between the ill-armed, ill-equipped and ill-fed masses of the Spanish people against the Italian and German invaders, who spread destruction on their cities from the air, and seek to terrorise them by the cruelty and ferocity of their methods of warfare."

"Let us hope and pray that, in this third year of war, their struggles will be crowned with something better than victory—a just and lasting peace which will rid their territory of foreign invaders and unite the Spanish people in working for the salvation of their country."

Hating Socialism, the Northcliffe Press—the Daily Mail and the Sunday Dispatch—upheld this foreign Fascist and Nazi invasion of Spain.

Yet, in its issue for June 8, 1941, the Sunday Dispatch, in its chief editorial, wrote:—

"Waste no time buttering the Turks, the Spaniards or any other people. They are not willing to die for the liberties of Democracy . . . The task of fighting this war falls on the people of Britain."

Workers, contrast this declaration against the quotations made from the 1936 editorial of the same paper, and think of Spain's heroic working class dead. Then pause before expressing your opinion of the Northcliffe Press.

Answer Fascism—with Socialism!

If we must fight against Fascism, shall we do so successfully under the leadership of the Capitalist enemies of Socialism, who applauded Hitler and Mussolini for entrenching Fascism in Spain? Why not insist that the struggle be waged under the leadership of a Socialist Government, pledged to inaugurate a Socialist Commonwealth, and able to combat Fascism with the weapon of propaganda and the menace of social revolution. Answer Fascism with Socialism and so emancipate Europe and the world.

CONSCIENCE, WAR AND THE STATE

Which Side is Surgeon?

The Inquirer for August 24, 1940, published some very fine words on the subject of conscience, under the sub-heading, "THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR," as follows:

"The basis of the position of the conscientious objector with regard to the State is found in the principle that the State has no right to demand what the conscience of the individual does not approve. This is the very basis of liberty, at least as understood in the final development of Christian belief; and quite apart from Christian belief this fundamental principle could be defended as the only possible basis for a free and happy community of people. The State—it could rightly be claimed—that was not founded upon this principle would very soon become rotten. The conscientious objector to war, therefore, in a free State has the right to claim not to take part in war. The basis of his objection may be incomprehensible to many people, but nevertheless the objection is made and must be respected. Like all true forms of freedom the principle justifies itself in the ultimate strength of the State in the long run.

"But conscience is a tricky thing; it can be used by the unscrupulous in more senses than one; the State consequently has every right to make sure that the claim not to take part in war is conscientious in the true sense.

"When this has been done, the objector, if he is proved to be what he claims to be, ought not to be penalised in any form. The kind of life he chooses to live afterwards is his concern and nobody elses. What that life will be in a time of unparalleled suffering in the community in which he lives, what effort he is prepared to make by example to impress others with the truth of something that must be so real to him is his concern. The State, and other corporate bodies, have no more right to act as moral arbiter in this than they have in other intimate moral concerns. The sun shines upon the just and the unjust; the solution of this problem lies elsewhere than through the censure and persecution by opinion outside the law."

The same issue published, in part, a letter from the Rev. C. Prestwich Scott, on the subject of War and Christianity. Mr. Scott replies to the famous analogy of the surgeon so often advanced by the defenders of war by demanding a rule by which, in any given war, we can distinguish which side is acting as surgeon. He adds:

"In all wars, honest people on both sides have believed that their country was the surgeon. And because of that belief, sincere young men on either side have found an outlet for their idealism in war. War giving them a school of discipline, heroism and self-devotion, an opportunity for self-sacrifice to a cause greater than themselves.

"So, in this war, many of our bravest and best young men gladly face death while fighting Germans because in so doing they believe they are helping Britain to remove the curse of Nazi persecution from the world. But, likewise, many a sincere German youth is willing to sacrifice himself while devastating English towns in the belief that thereby he is helping his Leader to rid Europe of the tyranny of unemployment due to a fundamentally evil social and economic system. Unfortunately there is no infallible test to decide which is right in the belief that his Country is the surgeon removing a deadly cancer. And in the end, both sides find that they have been deluded into following a quack remedy which, far from curing the disease, has only aggravated it."

PARLIAMENTARIANS AND FASCISM

When They Honoured Mussolini

The attitude of our Socialist Parliamentarians, like that of their colleagues, the Conservative Parliamentarians, would be laughable were the plight of the world not so tragic. These reformist misleaders of the common people have careered the world into disaster and now have no remedy but violence against violence; the violence of war which may result in the violence of pseucho-revolution and so develop into a post-war repressive reactionary violence, leading to more war. These people used to sneer, away back in 1906, at our anti-parliamentary withdrawal from the careerist movement, and declared that we believed in violence. They, dear little goody two-shoes, anticipating comfort for themselves and elevation from working-class status, were shocked at the thought of violence. Since then they have sentenced two generations to the servitude of death and have left a legacy of misery, fear, and violence for generations yet unborn. Splendid parliamentarians! Most wise reformists!

In another column we reproduce Regeneration leaflet No. 7. Everyone knows with what ineptitude the Socialist Parliamentarians responded to that appeal. Many of our most fire-eating Anti-Nazi Tory parliamentarians not only ignored that appeal, but openly supported Hitler and Mussolini in their Franco conspiracy. They had not learned, being regular attenders at the established Churches, that as a man sows, so must he reap. They sowed violence and invasion. They are reaping the menace of their sowing. Whoso sows the Fascist storm must reap the Nazi whirlwind.

Our opposition to Fascism did not begin with the 1936 invasion of Spain and the Franco conspiracy. Because we protest against 18B detentions, and the treatment of uncharged political suspects as though they were convicted felons, it does not follow that we have any sympathy with Fascism. On the contrary we hold to democratic principles, and disbelieve in tyranny and the exaggerated power of the Executive. We have held to this idea and ideal throughout our public career, during years in which the present enemies of Fascism were flirting with that evil and its Arch-Apostles.

From our former paper, The Commune, Vol. I., No. 2, June, 1923, we extract the following paragraph that we wrote and published at the time:—

"DENIKIN AND MUSSOLINI!

"On May 6th last King George V conferred the Grand Cross of the Most Honoourable Order of the Bath on Signor Benito Mussolini. A number of his lieutenants were made Knights Commander of the Royal Victorian Order. Sir Benito is the first foreigner to receive this distinction since General Deniken, now living in Brussels, but then warring on the Soviet Workers' Republic. We note, without comment, this honour conferred by the British Sovereign on the Grand Commander of the Black-Shirts and congratulate our colleague, Sir Walter Strickland, on repudiating the use of his inherited title."

Denikin and Mussolini!

This paragraph speaks for itself. It explains our attitude. It explains the ruling-lass attitude in Britain towards Mussolini. Readers should investigate the present political status in the councils of the State of the statesmen who honoured Mussolini with a British knighthood. How far are they war-mongering and sending youth to death, because of their own yesterday's reactionary building-up of Fascism?

We want to be quite fair. Exactly two years after our attack on Mussolini quoted above, the Times, as Britain's leading journal, criticised Mussolini's conduct in its editorials. Mussolini took exception to the criticism and sent a short letter of protest which our contemporary published.

Mussolini claimed that the Times was wrong in declaring that the legislative measures then voted in the Italian chamber were "against the most elementary liberties" of mankind. He added the explanation that the "Opposition is carried on by a small dispossessed group" of politicians. He concluded:—

"Even the Italian Opposition now recognises the great historical importance of the Fascist experiment, which has to be firmly continued in order not to fail in its task of morally and materially elevating the Italian people, and also in the interest of European civilisation."

The Times made some effective points in its editorial reply. It declared that Mussolini confines himself to general assertions and general denials." All dictators do. Our contemporary continued:

"If the discontented are but 'a small group,' why is it necessary to gag the Press, to forbid free speech, to forbid public meetings, and to arm the Executive with arbitrary and practically irresponsible powers?"

It referred "to the common-sense of the public," his contention:

"... that the Bills just passed by the Chamber, including the Press Bill, the Civil Service Bill, and the Bill investing the Government decrees with the force of law, are not against the most elementary of liberties."

By this, the Times meant a democratic public, a genuine public believing in the first principles of human liberty.

The Times complained of a leading Italian newspaper, of very moderate liberal views, being suppressed for reporting Mussolini's speech and then commenting upon the sittings. It drew the moral that material elevation of the Italian people "and in the interest of European civilisation" were unlikely to benefit "from Fascism."

This was bold writing; but the semi-official organ of Printing-House Square could not forget that Mussolini had been honoured by the British Government. It softened its criticism to the following somewhat contradictory tribute:

"The character and the extent of the services which the 'Duce' has rendered to Italy have been fully recognised in many articles upon the movement. It has been acknowledged again and again that he saved her from a social peril which was imminent and great, and that he reformed many scandalous and inveterate abuses."

Which was and is absolute nonsense. We do not need to prove the nonsense now. But the writer of this nonsense has contributed to the present condition of Europe and the world. Do our readers understand that?

Even this concession to reaction did not avail the Times. All manner of political reactionaries and die-hard Anti-Socialists were horrified at even such mild criticism of the renegade "Socialist" leader. Socialist Parliamentarians also hastened to pay their tribute to Italy's Public Enemy No. 1. Why did these people not exhibit more political understanding. Statesmen have no more right to traffic in shoddy politics than a shoemaker has in shoddy boots.

We ask the reader to consider the facts as related by us in The Commune, Vol. I., No. 13, p. 122, for July, 1924. The article is reproduced in full to speak for itself:—

Fascism and MacDonald.

"The noble actions of the Fascisti."
—Lord Curzon.

"The wise leadership of a powerful statesman."
—King George V on Mussolini.

"Justice is no more in Italy a high priestess, but a prostitute."— —Ezio Bertalini, editor of "La Paca," on Mussolini.

The Mussolini gang murdered Matteoti because he had prepared an indictment of the graft practised by the Fascismo leaders, the "incorruptibles," who were to cleanse Italy. He collected evidence of Fascisti robbery and proposed to broadcast it. He intended to prove that Mussolini suppressed democracy by violence and political perversion. He had prepared an exposure of the Banca Commerciale in regard to the Polish loan for citation as an instance of the unbridled avarice of the Fascisti rulers. Then there were the concessions in Emilia and Sicily to the Sinclair Oil Company and evidence of widespread blackmail by the Fascisti newspapers. Also the case of the Fascist Banco Italiano Disconto. The Fascisti collapsed this on coming into power, then reorganised it. This bank now owns the largest building in Rome and controls the Italian financial market. Matteoti had intended to expose the robbery and scandal of this financial octupus which, with the Fiat Motor Company, is the strongest supporter of Fascism. Hnece the Fascisti determined to silence him.

Matteoti was a very tame Socialist. And he was a millionaire. By community of interests he belonged to the bourgeoisie. Mussolini, renegade Socialist, made the mistake of not realising this fact. The Fascisti had murdered hundreds of workers and received the applause of bourgeois governments. Now they murdered a millionaire—and found they had gone too far.

The Fascisti do not restrict their campaign of murder and blackmail to Italy. Mario Castagna has just been sentenced in Paris to seven years' imprisonment and ten years' banishment for shooting in self defence, when menaced outside a cafe by a band of Fascisti, a year ago, the Fascist leader, Gino Yeri. Castagna is only 21. He belongs to a family of active Trade Unionists and Co-operators, and crossed the French frontier without a passport in 1923, after his two brothers had been left for dead by the Fascisti. His widowed mother was expelled from her cottage by a Fascist proprietor. She died on learning of her son's arrest in Paris.

In America, also, Fascism menaces Labour with violence. There the white-sheeted Ku Klux Klan are seconded by the black-shirted Fascios, newly organised under the title, "Minute Men of the Constitution," by the banker, Dawes. This individual is the author of the Dawes plan for the receivership of Central Europe, which MacDonald has pledged himself to impose on Germany. Banker Dawes is the future Republican Vice-President of the United States and the personal friend of Mussolini. He was the henchman of the capitalist crook, Mark Hanna, and is a notorious strike-breaker, war-grafter, and profiteer, sometime general purchasing agent for the American Expeditionary forces. His active fascism is condemned even by the American Federation of Labour. His trip to Europe, resulting in the Dawes plan of reparation, was undertaken in the interest of capitalist exploitation. His plan is a Fascist insurance policy against the development of Socialism in Europe. MacDonald upholds and applauds it.

Dawes is the power behind the president. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, speaking recently to the Amalgamated Food Workers of America, showed how this power operated. She detailed the strange case of Carlo Tresca, the well-known editor of "Il Martello," an American-Italian Syndicalist organ. He was arrested in August, 1923, for anti-Fascisti articles published earlier in the year. He was convicted in October for a birth-control advertisement that appeared in his paper in September—that is, a month after his arrest! Tresca had to be suppressed for exposing the Fascisti machinations, but the Minute Men of the Constitution, and Dawes, their leader, had to be screened somehow.

MacDonald is at one with Fascisti Dawes in his reparations enslavement of Germany, which is a plan for the next war. How firmly he stands for Fascist Imperialism in opposition to proletarian Internationalism, is obvious from his speech to the Empire Press Union, reported in the "Times" for May 9 last:—

"Alacrity of mind, vigilance of intellect, and hatred of revolution—that is the genius that is going to enable the British Empire to continue vital."

That is the genius of Fascism. We have before us, as we write, two versions of the British Fascisti No. 1 leaflet. This informs us that the President is Lord Garvagh. The leaflet defines the several departments of Fascist organisation. We select the following items:—

Section A—Units—"Consisting of seven members (or less) under a chosen leader to take active measures against the revolutionary elements in their own districts." For mobilisation purposes, "3 units form a troop under a troop officer; 3 troops a company under a company officer; and 3 companies form a division under a division officer."

Section B—Transport—"To maintain communication in event of revolution."

Section D—Intelligence Department—"This department will call the attention of Units to existing Bolshevik activities in their districts which may have escaped notice. The Units will be informed, and the combative measures left entirely in their hands."

Section E—Special Section—"Volunteers for practical work, so that an effective force may be raised to combat the ever-increasing menace of Socialism and Bolshevism."

This leaflet is signed "R. L. Liutorn-Orman," as organising secretary. The same gentleman signs "Leaflet No. 4" which displays in big type the following question:

THE UNION JACK or THE RED FLAG.
Which will YOU serve?

This leaflet speaks of a Workers' Republic being a "welter of anarchy, chaos, and ruin," and refers to "the heroic determination" of the Italian Fascist.

The character and purpose of the organisation is revealed in the following extracts:—

"It is not enough to ENCOURAGE Patriotism, we must FORCE it on our people ... Patriotism is not an optional sentiment, but a DUTY, the first duty of every British man, woman, and child."

"Bolshevism cannot be suppressed by words alone; you must be prepared to back up your words by something more effective when necessary, i.e., Force."

"Bolshevism is an evil scourge, an expression of the lowest instincts of men who are less than the brute beasts. And you cannot fight brute beasts with the weapons of a mere debating society."

"The British Fascisti believe that the various Patriotic Organisations ... do not go far enough, and are not, individually or collectively, sufficiently virile to smash Bolshevism as it MUST be smashed. We believe that the only way really to accomplish this very necessary end is by the wide-spread inculcating of the spirit and principles of Fascism, which alone saved Italy ... We, the British Fascisti are inspired by the same spirit which animated the Fascisti of Italy ... in addition to the counter-Revolutionary propaganda which we are spreading—and intend to spread—throughout the country, we are also organising our active members into a strong, disciplined, really loyal Force, on a Military Basis. This militant force is organised in the Provinces under County Commands, and in London and other large cities under District Commands."

In all these quotations, the capitals are in the original and used by the Fascisti to emphasise their faith in violence.

MacDonald identifies himself with Dawes, the American Fascisti leader and organiser, and King George V identifies himself with Mussolini. In May 1923 the British sovereign conferred a knighthood on Mussolini, a British Order of Chivalry! On the eleventh of that month, speaking in Rome, in reply to a welcome from the municipality, the British Monarch said of Fascism and its chief:

"Knowing, as I do, the traditional qualities of the Italian race, their loyalty, their valour, and their determination: recollecting, as I do, the crisis from which they have recently emerged under the wise leadership of a powerful statesman, I look forward with confidence not only to the future association of our two peoples in the cause of peace and progress, but to the continued triumph of the high intellectual and spiritual ideals which they jointly represent."

What are "the high intellectual and spiritual ideals" of capitalist militarism and reaction?

Curzon backed the King by expressing his admiration for the "noble actions" of the Fascisti, and Signor Tutoni replied:

Lord Curzon's noble message has caused among us the most favourable impression."

And now we know the worth of the wisdom and nobility in action. Murder will out.

We know what Curzon's foreign policy is, and that, in all essential details, MacDonald has continued it as his own.

Fascist banker Dawes dictates MacDonald's reparations policy. What then is the difference between Mussolini and MacDonald? If Fascism must go, can MacDonald remain? There is but one answer the workers must make: No! MacDonaldism is Fascism and must be destroyed that the workers may establish socialist society.

Thus concluded our 1924 protest against flirtation with Fascism. When Curzon died, MacDonald and Thomas eulogised him in the name of Labour, and we had to protest again. But how many men owe their position as M.P.'s to-day to the fact that they acquiesced in MacDonald's eulogy of reaction? How many others owe their status to the fact that they upheld the 1924 honouring of Mussolini and concurred in the political falsehood that was spoken then by the political rulers of Britain in the interest of economic reaction? Ought we not to recall such criminal reaction when these same men shout for war, war, war as the only way to combat Fascism? But for our ruling class in 1923 and 1924, there would be no need to combat Fascism to-day by wallowing through the mire of blood and tears.

This instalment continues the analysis and summary of Thomas Johnston's "Huns at Home."—Editor.

GENERAL PROFITEERING: MODERN ALI BABAS.

The Glasgow Evening Citizen (commercial paper) frankly and unblushingly admitted (15/1/15) that—

"In business patriotism does not enter. Insistently the pocket comes first."

The Globe (Dec., 1915) declared there was not the "least justification" for the rise in corn and coal, "but war is an excellent excuse, and our friends the contractors are taking the utmost advantage of it."

And Lord Devonport, of Kearley & Tonge, Ltd., and the International Tea Stores, who later became Food Controller, was excitedly calling for financial retrenchment in the House of Lords (11/11/15)—

"£20,000,000 to £30,000,000 could be saved by cutting down the allowance to soldiers and dependents."

It was January, 1915, before the increase in food prices had so severely hit the average working-class household, that there was a general outcry against and exposure of the profiteers. The Capitalist press did its utmost to suppress and ridicule the agitation, the Scotsman (23/1/15) declaring it was a "foolish and largely baseless agitation." When the Labour Party in the Glasgow Town Council moved a petition to the Government to take over food and coal supplies and prohibit any rise in house rents during war-time, they were beaten by 69 to 31.

Reynolds Newspaper (13/3/15) proved that from the outbreak of war our tea kings had exported to Holland ten times the quantity of tea they exported for a similar period in peace time, and that Holland was busily engaged in re-selling the tea to Germany. The scarcity of tea thus caused in the British market enabled the tea owners here to raise the market price of the common leaf tea from 7½d. to 10d. per lb.

The Government bought 60 million pounds' weight of tea in Calcvutta at 8¾d. per lb.; it cost 1d per lb. freight to bring it here, yet the Government issued an order to buyers "that they must not give less than 1s. 4d. per lb. in London for tea."—(Hansard, 2/7/17.)

The Weekly Dispatch (20/8/16) said that after a great quantity of bacon had been kept in storage till it went wrong, the resultant market scarcity enabled retailers to increase prices by 6d. per lb.

In the Food Control debate in the House of Commons (15/11/16) Mr. Runciman admitted that milk had been poured down drains, and that a "most important" Agricultural Association had advised its members to feed pigs on milk rather than sell the milk at present prices."

The Glasgow Herald (1/5/17) described how the cornerers of onions held up large quantities to produce a market scarcity with prices at 5d. per lb.; then when the warm weather began and the onions showed signs of sprouting they were hastily unloaded on the market, and prices fell to 2d. per lb. Burmah peas and beans had soared to 1s. per lb.; the Government intervened and took over the stocks; prices at once fell to 6d. per lb. (Morning Post, 2/5/17). Haricot beans before the potato shortage were 4d per lb.; when they became a substitute for potatoes they were rushed up to 1s. per lb. (Glasgow Evening Times, 2/5/17). The Government's Food Control Department obligingly fixed the price of Swede turnips at 1½d. per lb.; the pre-war price was 6d. to 8d. per hundredweight (Smallholder, 14/4/17). . . . The Duke of Atholl complained in the press (17/5/17) that while the cost of a boll of meal was 45s., its selling price had been fixed at 64s. 2d.: "profiteering to an unreasonable extent," declared his lordship. While Britain starved for lack of potatoes, potato exporters were allowed to sell to America and reap the benefit of the high prices ruling there (Chicago Journal, 22/1/17).

The Daily Mail (25/6/17) declared there was no shortage of meat, but "what we have is being gambled in by men who are ready enough to talk and preach patriotism, while with both hands they are practising profiteering . . . the long-suffering public is being plundered right and left. . . ."

The Weekly Dispatch (3/6/17) said that meat speculators "have forced up the price of chilled beef from 3s. 8d. per stone to 9ss. 4d. per stone." The profits of the British Argentine Meat Company rose from £67,000 in the year 1914 to £411,000 in the year 1916, after paying excess profit duty.

This profiteering riot could not well continue without an explosion, and that explosion was about reached when as a result of questions by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., in the House of Commons, it was admitted that the firm of Kearley & Tonge, Ltd., the firm of wholesale grocers founded by Lord Devonport, the Food Controller, had stopped the import of Danish butter until the British butter market was "more brisk." After Lord Devonport had resigned his office as Food Controller, his firm—Kearley & Tonge, Ltd.—applied to the Courts for £20,000 compensation for commandeered cheese. The Government offered compensation "on the basis of the new Government scheme for the regulation of prices" but Kearley & Tonge, Ltd., held out for compensation on the "market price."—(Daily Chronicle, 30/6/17.)

OUR NOBLE FAMILIES DO THEIR BIT.

The Highland News, in March, 1915, announced that the Duke of Sutherland had applied to the Land Court for power to evict smallholders of 144 acres in the parish of Clyne to enable the Golf Club of Brora to be extended. He also endeavoured to evict an old man of 83—MacKay, of Cnocan—who had three sons with the colours, in order to extend a grouse moor (Highland News, 2/10/15). MacKay was sent to prison for 20 days for refusing to be evicted (Northern Ensign, 28/3/16). . . .

In November, 1915, we had the Macintosh of Macintosh, Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Inverness and Lieut.-Colonel Commanding the 3rd Camerons, prosecuting a poor carter at Inverness Sheriff Court for the hideous crime of catching a wild rabbit in one of the Macintosh's woods. The carter had taken the rabbit home as a delicacy for a sick child; he had already had a son killed in the war "defending his country," and he had other two sons at the front. The Macintosh had millions of wild rabbits. The carter was fined £1, and the Macintosh got £1 1s. of expenses (Highland News, 13/11/15). Whenever the case was raised in the House of Commons by a Labour Member of Parliament, the Secretary for Scotland promptly remitted the penalty.

In February, 1916, Mr. Wm. Young, M.P. for East Perthshire, proved in the press that the Sidlaw Hills was being planted with trees for game production; that the hills of Altalloch on the Coyles of Minch were being turned into a deer forest (it had been a sheep grazing for generations).

The Glasgow Herald (19/9/16) reported that 10,000 sheep were being cleared off Auchallander (Breadalbane estate) to make room for deer. . . .

In November, 1915, we find landowners screwing a royalty of 8s. per ton on ironstone taken from their land by the Government; and one landowner generously offered the State a compromise; he would only take £150,000 per annum in royalties, no matter what amount of ironstone was mined from under his soil. His terms were agreed to.—(Hansard, 9/11/15.)

ARMAMENT: CAPITALISM HAS NO FATHERLAND.

In May, 1915, Sir John French was appealing for more guns, and the press was accusing the working class of being drunkards and slackers. . . . The Woolwich Pioneer (26/3/15, and successive issues) had, however, shown that the Government Arsenal plant at Woolwich was being deliberately kept idle, so that the work should go to the private armament firms. "The 3" guns (anti-aircraft) have been made in the Royal Gun Factory until recently. The whole of the order has now been taken from the Royal Gun Factory and placed with a firm that has no experience in the manufacture of armaments" (2/4/15). "The trouble is not with State Control but with the machinations of State Control in the interest of private profit" (30/4/15). These and other charges were pressed in the House of Commons by Mr. Crooks, M.P., and Mr. Snowden, M.P. . . .

Speaking in the House of Commons (20/12/15), Mr. Lloyd George told how the Ministry of Munitions, by threatening to examine the books of one of its contracting firms, compelled it to reduce its charges to the Government by 33⅓ per cent. After the National Shell Factories were erected:—

"The cost of the ammunition for 18-pounders, which is a considerable item, running into tens and scores of millions, has been reduced by 40 per cent. The cost of the ammunition for 4.5 howitzers has been reduced by 30 per cent. . . . all the new contracts are based on these prices."

He told how the metal merchants were taking "unwarranted" prices from the Government, and how the Ministry of Munitions formed a metal department to control all metals, and how the result was a saving to the country of £15,000,000.

The Ministry of Munitions during the year 1916 managed to limit the armaments profits by means of what is called "the costing system"—i.e., examination of the books and only allowing a moderate profit upon actual costs. "The total saving in the cost of ammunition in 1917, calculated on the cost of the preceding year as affected by reduction in prices, is estimated at £43,000,000, and that, notwithstanding the rise in wages."—(Glasgow Herald, 14/8/17.)

We got Wm. Jacks & Coy. (Mr. Bonar Law's old firm) convicted of selling pig-iron to Krupps; and, by the way, among the list of patents granted by the British Government for the week ending 29th September, 1915, is one for "Ordnance, etc.," to Messrs. Krupps. In the House of Commons (Hansard, 28/4/15, and 4/5/15) it was admitted, in answers given to Lord Charles Beresford, M.P., that Krupps had got a royalty of 1s. 3d. on British shells manufactured before 16th July, 1914.

Sir George Riddell, managing director of the News of the World, and a close friend of Mr. Lloyd George, boasted in a speech at the Rotary Club (March, 1916) that at the end of the war there would be about £200,000,000 worth of automatic machinery paid for by the nation, in the hands of the armament manufacturers.

Sir Ralph W. Anstruther, chairman of Nobel's Explosives Co., Ltd., declared at the annual meeting of his Company that an original investment of £100 in 1872 in Nobel's now represented a capital interest of £3,000 in ordinary shares, and, besides, on that original £100 no less than £8,500 had bee paid in dividends. (Glasgow Evening Citizen, 31/5/16). Thorneycroft's profits, said the Weekly Dispatch (1½/6/16) are increased by 3,800 per cent. The Jute Kings had so robbed the nation that the Government was compelled to take over the entire control of the jute trade. By doing so, they saved on sand bags alone a sum of £3,000,000.—(Public Accounts' Committee Report. Daily Press, 19/8/16.)

The first million ammunition boxes were bought by the Government at 13s. 6d. each; when the second order was placed the contractor was screwed down to 3s. each; and Mr. Ashley, a Tory M.P., declared that their real price was only 1s. 2d. each (Hansard, 30/5/16). The same gentleman declared that the Government was buying one-third of its tapioca from an ironmonger (25/7/16). Dr. Haslip, at the British Medical Association Sunday Chronicle, 30/7/16) declared that some doctors in London had made a corner in Salvarsan.

In the House of Commons (10/11/15) Mr. Leif Jones, M.P., told the story of the contractor and the wheelbarrows. The War Office wanted wheelbarrows. It arranged with a contractor to get them, on the footing that the contractor was to get 10 per cent. on the purchase price for his trouble; so the bigger the price the bigger the percentage to the contractor. First the contractor went to a man and got a price. It was not high enough, so he went to a second man. The price was not yet high enough, so he went to a third man "and got a higher figure still." From this third man he bought the wheelbarrows. But the third man had no wheelbarrows to sell, so he, the third man, went to the second man, and the second man sold to the third man. But the second man had no wheelbarrows, so he bought from the first man, "who was the only man who could supply the wheelbarrows." Result—the second and third men had each a profit, and the contractor has his increased percentage. Business as usual!

The Daily News (7/10/16) published a statement showing that the Army clothing contractors were making £500,000 profit upon every million soldiers' outfits.

In the House of Commons on 21st February, 1916, Colonel the Earl of Kerry asked questions designed to prove that a firm of Army contractors—Dickeson & Co.—were allowed 17½ per cent. upon all vegetables purchased locally before selling them to the troops. He alleged, also, that the firm in question was selling swede turnips to the troops at Brentwood at 140s. per ton, whereas the local price was only 30s. a ton; that he had the evidence in his possession "on both sides" to prove it; and that a partner in the firm was actually a member of the Board of Control appointed to adjudicate upon disputes between the contractors and the soldiers. The Duke of Bedford, in the Times (13/3/16) supported the Earl of Kerry's assertion that Army contractors were being allowed a clear 17½ per cent. profit upon Army goods purchased locally—milk, vegetables, etc. "Of the sum of 5½d. a day allowed by a grateful country to its defenders for food, the Army contractor therefore annexes one penny over and above the market price."

"SUPPORT HOME INDUSTRIES."

"Dyes were one of the first commodities in which we experienced a famine after the war began. A Manchester firm seized the opportunity of making a year's profit of £80,00 on a capital of £90,000. . . . One colour, bought at 7d. per lb., was sold at 35s. per lb."—(Weekly Dispatch, 24/12/16.)

The Evening Times (26/8/16) told us that the wholesale jam manufacturers were to be given a monopoly of sugar for jam, and that this would give them command of the market. They could get their own price for jam.

In 1917 the Government fixed the price of gooseberries for jam at £20 a ton. The average price for the previous five years was £12 10s. a ton. . . . The Government bought plums worth £4 to £8 a ton for £14 a ton (Weekly Dispatch, 19/8/17). Lord Middleton, in the House of Lords (11/11/15), related how two exploiters were making £30,000 a year out of Government horse purchases. . . . In 1916, the Coats Thread Trust announced profits of over three and a third millions after allowing for excess profits tax. Lord Northcliffe, the great patriot, issued a translation of the French Yellow Book (Documents relating to the war) at 2s.; bought up all the French copies which were being sold by the French Government at 5d.; endeavoured to induce the New York Times to sell its edition in America at 2s. instead of the 2½d., at which it was being sold; and sought in every possible way to create a "corner" and make a scoop. He was finally frustrated by Sir Edward Grey, who issued the documents at the price of 1d. Thereafter Sir Edward Grey was marked down for political assassination. He became one of the "Old Gang"!

Members of Parliament (Patriots to a man!) with public salaries of £400 per annum, earned an extra £400 in their spare time by carrying despatches to and from the back of the front. (See House of Commons' Reports, Nov., 1915.)

The more money they scooped in the louder did they beat their breasts and advertise their patriotism.

(To be concluded.)

"THE EXTINCTION OF MANKIND"

Visioned by Walter Strickland, Enemy of War

ANTI-MILITARIST BARONET'S ENDEAVOUR TO ARREST "THE MARCH OF HOMICIDE"

I. "THE EXTINCTION OF MANKIND."

The fact that Sir Walter Strickland went pro-war for a short period in 1914 detracts from the uncompromising consistency of his Anti-Militarist attitude. As pointed out in the essay dealing with this lapse [Word, January, 1941, Vol. II., No. 6, p. 71] he hastily regretted this decision and returned to his old position of absolute opposition to war. His essays against war are powerful writings and covered a long period of time.

Apart from earlier essays dealing with the social struggle within nations, in which he showed a lively understanding of the class struggle, his sympathies being always with the oppressed, Walter Strickland wrote and published, in 1906, a striking essay against war, entitled On Modern Patriotism. This answers Scott's theory of the patriot being thrilled at the thought of returning to his native land. Five years later he wrote another essay, suggesting that the gorilla was a higher type of animal to the Aryan, denouncing all theories of racial supremacy as leading to war and annihilation. These two essays were published as a penny pamphlet by the Bakunin Press, in 1912, as No. 3 of The Revolt Library, under the title of Apes and Patriotism. The pamphlet had a wide circulation in Britain and the U.S.A. The same year, the Bakunin Press published Strickland's striking essay, The Extinction of Mankind.

The Extinction pamphlet was written in prophetic mood at Munich, on November 2, 1911. Several thousand copies were circulated, and in 1920 a second edition was published by the Bakunin Press, in The Spur Series, No. 7.

Extinction was liked by Socialists. They regarded it as an intriguing pamphlet, vigorous in style, blasphemous in parts and definitely anti-Militarist in tone. Its title was considered outrageous but amusing, like the author.

The essay was replete with sarcasm and irony, and the author turned from the one moral to the other as his pen travelled along, easily and venomously against the enemies of social peace. His ironic theme was that mankind must give way to avian personalities, that power had left the earth for the skies. And he posed a question culled from Tennyson's Maud: "He now is first—is he the last?—is he not too base?"

The title shows with what vision Strickland gazed into the future.

In 1928, he reissued this pamphlet, with a new preface, through his New York publishers, B. Westermann, Inc. It was published again by this firm two years later.

Dated November 14, 1928, this preface says, with continued prophecy, employing the almost obscene language that Strickland considered became both the theme and the facts:—

"Shadows of the coming pig fight—I beg pardon: the homicidal vanity of the higher races will have nothing falser than 'the great war'—were already looming large and THE EXTINCTION OF MANKIND was written as a last appeal from Philip Drunk to Philip Sober, for I was then quixotic enough to believe that an appeal to reason and decency might not be completely thrown away upon what subsequent years have demonstrated to be little better than hordes of raving maniacs. I have learnt wisdom and indifference since.

"About the beginning of 1913, the vision of the coming outburst of insanity became a practical certainty, but even then my inherent scepticism prevented me from leaving Europe. Even in April and May when there was no doubt whatever, hesitation supervened. An ounce of faith and my subsequent life would have been a much happier one.

"The pig fight then came off in all its glory and nastiness. There was one poor consolation. The Christian monsters tore one another to pieces instead of somebody else. That helped to open somebody else's eyes. Literary vanity would like to believe that the brochure exercised an infinitesimal effect in opening the eyes of the inferior races. This would be another reason for its republication and diffusion now that it has been proved to demonstration that the higher races whose whole being consists of fear, greed, and above all vanity and murder have not, and for that matter cannot change by one iota from a nature which is imposed upon them by thousands if not millions of years of savagery.

"Do I then affirm that all the wonderful achievements in science, morals, et cetera of the higher races are all pure moonshine? I sadly and unhesitatingly reply, yes. The benefits of progress are something like the word itself. Drop the "pr" and you get "ogress." Nearly all the beneficial achievements of science are abused by the higher wisdom to create more woe and misery than good. Some are distinctly detrimental. . . . From medieval bows and arrows to Napoleonic wars down to the seventies and 1914, both the hecatomb and the brutalities have increased almost in a geometrical progression.

"War and cuisine, as elementary etymology demonstrates, are both forms of cannibalism. Cooking and conquest, victuals and victory are all the same. Cruelty like syphilis is incurable. Once a certain stage is reached it is impossible to revert to the past. . . . In the next approaching pig fight, it is estimated—let us be frank and say, hoped—that the carnage and mutilation will be at least three times greater than during their last performances. As these insane superior races are quite incurable, is it altogether very fantastical to opine that the extinction of mankind would be the best solution for our planetary kitchen-midden?"

We find this style of writing as displeasing as the most sensitive and most pious reader. Our vigour would be less direct. There is also error in some of the description. Yet the picture has truth and compels thought, which is what matters.

Strickland never learned indifference. His last letter, written from Buitengorg, dated December 14, 1937, is evidence of this fact. This letter has commanded a wide circulation. It was published in the Malton Messenger, and in The Word, in full; and, with only a small deletion, in the Cambridge University paper, The Varsity. It now circulates in pamphlet form, under the title, This March of Homicide. The text of this letter argues anxious anxiety as to the fate of humanity. Strickland was not indifferent. He was most anxious to see the end of war and exploitation, to contribute to the inauguration of a new world order of peace and commonwealth. This fact is demonstrated by reference to an article that appeared in the Evening Times, in September, 1935. We feel that, as part of the collection of data by, or relating to the career and associations of the late Sir Walter Strickland that article ought to be republished. It is unfortunate that its duplicate statements have already been published in these columns.

II. 1935 WAR FEAR AND PEACE PLAN.

The Evening Times, late City Edition, September 30, 1935, published the following news article:—

£90,000 FOR ANYONE WITH A PEACE PLAN.

YORKSHIRE BARONET'S OFFER THROUGH GLASGOW MAN.

THE CURIOUS STORY OF SIR WALTER STRICKLAND.

A sum of £90,000 is available to anyone who can evolve a workable scheme for stimulating peace-consciousness and outlawing war among the peoples of the world.

This fortune is offered by an 84-year-old Yorkshire baronet, Sir Walter Strickland, without restriction, provided that the money is devoted in some way to propaganda which will turn national feeling throughout the world away from force as a means of settling disputes.

Sir Walter makes no other stipulations. Pacifists with ideas will be invited to make known their proposals, but presentation of the money to the League of Nations is barred. The donor feels that the League is rather an aid to violence, and he maintains that it conceals, while serving, the interests of rival Powers.

Through Glasgow Friend

He has made his offer public through Mr. Guy Aldred, a Glasgow friend and confidant for almost a quarter of a century.

Writing before the Geneva Conferences, Sir Walter, who has assumed Czechoslovakian nationality and is at present resident in the Dutch East Indies, anticipates a new world war which would menace the future of the white races as well as civilisation itself. He describes war as "the blasphemous reality of Christendom," and asks if it is not possible for an effort to be made by all people to stop the "madness."

"I want to be identified with no partisan propaganda," he declares, "but with some definite movement of the people to outlaw violence.

"I look to women and to the common folk, not to statesmen and politicians. I am an old man, and have little use for money. If a real movement is set on foot I shall gladly support it, but it must be real and with elements of success."

Sir Walter Strickland

Who is this man who comes forward as a world peacemaker?

He has never taken part in public life, and he is probably not known to more than a dozen people in Britain, but nevertheless he is one of the most striking figures of this generation.

Holder of an ancient baronetcy, graduate of Trinity College, Cambridge, linguist, author and world traveller, Sir Walter William Strickland is an anti-Imperialist with an anarchical trend as far as politics are concerned, and a Freethinker inclined to Buddhism in religion.

Since early youth he has led a nomad life. He has lived in practically every country studying the habits of the people, assessing with shrewd insight their aspirations and political feeling, translating books on folklore, and writing violent pamphlets against all established systems.

Property to the Continent

In 1909, when he succeeded to the title, Sir Walter spent three weeks in Yorkshire to attend the eighth baronet's funeral. After that visit he decided to remove every scrap of property he could to the Continent and, for the future, to have as little as possible to do with Britain and Britons.

In the course of his wanderings he gave substantial help in the cause of Czechoslovakian independence, which led him to become a naturalised citizen of that country, and he also played an important role in Chinese politics, donating £10,000 to the war-chest of Sun Yat Sen's party when victory seemed far away and Sun Yat Sen was in exile.

Some years ago Sir Walter intimated through his solicitors that he wished to give up his title and be known simply as Walter William Strickland.

Developing his opposition to all forms of Imperialism and turning more and more to Eastern philosophy, especially Buddhism, he wrote many bitter articles against British rule in India. One essay was suppressed in 1912. China and the Chinese are the objects of Sir Walter's especial admiration.

A Curious Story

Since the start of the Hitler regime in Germany Strickland has been unable to get his works out of Berlin, where he had his translations and original productions printed some years ago. Seven valises of MSS. and diaries deposited with a Berlin bank cannot be recovered.

The circumstances in which these are detained make a curious story.

While resident in India several years ago Sir Walter adopted two Tamil boys, educated them and set them up in life on condition that they devoted themselves to the cause of a free India. One of the boys, who became a doctor, disappeared from a ship, while the other died in Berlin last year, shortly after depositing the seven valises in the bank.

Under German law Sir Walter cannot recover his property without the consent of the relatives of the adopted son who deposited the bags—and most of the relatives, who live in India, do not speak English and know nothing about the matter.

Diaries of Travels

The contents of the bags are diaries of Sir Walter's travels. They contain a thorough study of Italian politics made many years ago when Sir Walter first travelled in Italy, and of the Socialist movement to which Mussolini's father belonged. The diaries include later studies of Fascism and the first steps towards the Italian conquest of Africa. All this mass of information is stored in the Berlin bank and, apparently, will never be recovered.

The family of Strickland is an old one. The first members are said to have settled in Westmoreland before the Conquest; and the first baronet was one of "Oliver's Lords," a member of the House of Peers created during the Great Rebellion.

It was the first baronet's association with Oliver Cromwell which was responsible for Sir Walter Strickland's interest in Guy Aldred. In Carlyle's record of Cromwell's life and writings there is an account of Oliver riding into London with Sir Walter Strickland on one side of his carriage and Colonel Aldred on the other side.

In Ripened Form

This led Sir Walter, who was resident in Paris, to write to Mr. Aldred in London, in 1909.

Sir Walter thought the names of Strickland and Aldred should be united. He considered his love of freedom or anarchist philosophy to be the republicanism of his seventeenth century ancestor in ripened form and his association with Aldred a remarkable repetition of History.

Though Sir Walter is resident in the Dutch East Indies at present because he considers the Dutch have the best-governed colonies, he is considering resuming his British citizenship in the event of war so as to be better able to express his opinions.

The Sunday Pictorial had published the story, more briefly—but giving an important detail the Glasgow Evening Times omitted—in its issue for Sunday, September 29, 1935, as follows, under a streamer heading:—

BARONET OFFERS £90,000 TO ANYONE WHO CAN AVERT WAR!

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

While the nations are wrestling with the problems of war an eighty-four-year-old baronet has asked his secretary in Glasgow to search for a man who can lead the world to peace—and has offered to back the peace-maker to the extent of £90,000!

Yesterday, in a little one-roomed office I read the letter written in green ink and in the handwriting of Sir Walter Strickland. The baronet's ideas are vague, but his offer is definite.

He offers to realise certain securities to the value of £90,000 if he can find a means of placing it at the disposal of a responsible person—or persons—who has discovered and will pursue a policy to ensure peace among the nations.

In his scrawling handwriting he states his opinion that Europe, by its policy, is heading for a war that will obliterate civilisation, and he looks to the East as a source of peace. Sir Walter, by the way, was a friend of Mussolini before he rose to power.

Strickland died in August, 1938. He never saw the outbreak of the war he dreaded. Before his estate could be realised the Germans had entered Czecho-Slovakia and Paris. At the Credit Lyonnais, Paris, his strong-box and securities were seized. Previously, bonds deposited in Prague had been lost owing to the German occupation. What was intended to aid the cause of world-peace, was lost in the devastation and advance of world-war. Thus was justified Strickland's anxious fear of the coming war.

Strickland's ideas and ideals were not vague. That was a pretence of the press. He had devoted years of his life to a study of the question, how war could be overcome. When we met him in France in 1912, and travelled with him from Dieppe to Paris, wandering round Paris with him discussing, and visited some Anarchists he knew in Rouen, he outlined his proposals clearly. His ideas were worthless only so long as they remained the isolated opinions of one man. Open democratic consideration could have fashioned his tentative proposals into use values. Entrenched economic interests, war industry and a war investing public, humanity's moral and mental laziness which found refuge in complacent conservatisms, would not consider his anti-militarist suggestions. The easy way was to dismiss Strickland as an eccentric.

Strickland was an offence to a world that toiled and leisured along the course that led with ever increasing speed to disaster and death. This world had no time for Strickland's great natural abilities: his scholarship; his command of so many languages; his intimacy with their dialects; his consequent wide reading; his world observations and experiences; his lack of careerist interest in life; and his sense of world citizenship. Such a man had no place in the world of hunger, power, and glory, devoted to its diseases, and impatient at any idea of remedy. What could it do with a person who visioned The Extintion of Mankind and protested against this vision two years before the first world war; who ironically pilloried Aryan pretensions in a study of Apes and Patriotism; and, almost with his dying hand, and on the eve of the Second World War, sadly protested against The March of Homicide. For the last forty years of his life Strickland asked the world to consider his plea for anti-militarism. He asked in vain.

To-day, in the midst of a second world war, another man, also English, also an aristocrat, of a long and distinguished lineage, less vehement, but no less a scholar, asks to be heard in protest against the arbitrament of war and violence. He also is outlawed, abused, and misrepresented. Charges are made against him which could not have been made against Sir Walter Strickland. The offence is the same: opposition to the criminal folly of war. The Duke of Bedford might enjoy popular public life, with the enthusiastic support of certain Labour democrats, if only he would cheer for war. He falls short of what is expected of Dukes in times of war. He would prefer that wars should end and a new world order be established. So he finds himself in the position once occupied by Sir Walter Strickland: a social outcast because he harbours the illusion that twentieth-century Christianity ought to outlaw violence and the appeal to the sword, or the greater destruction that the sword symbolises.

"THE BRITISH DRAFT ACT"

Beneath this caption, Argonaut, San Francisco, Cal., U.S.A., for March 7, 1941, says:

"The British Draft Act in this present war is remarkable for the liberality of its provisions for conscientious objectors to war, since it provides a separate register for conscientious objectors and complete exemption for all who profess themselves to be conscientious objectors to all war and conscription. Those who contend that there is no difference between the ideals of England and the ideals of Hitler's Germany would do well to consider how great a difference there is here manifested between the drafts in the two countries.

"If an Englishman is so opposed to war that he will not even fight for the defence of his country, he is not compelled to fight. But no German is allowed to stand out against Hitler's will. Every German is Hitler's slave. He must think as Hitler thinks; he must feel as Hitler feels; he must speak as Hitler speaks; he must do what Hitler tells him to do. He has not an atom of liberty. He must not believe anything that various types of thinkers including Jews, have written. He must take his philosophy, his science and even his aesthetics from the ignoramus who now rules him. If Hitler should maintain that the moon is made out of green cheese, he will be compelled to maintain the same. Science and learning were free in the Germany of the Kaiser; they are free no longer.

"We are told that, after this war is over, England will be a totalitarian state as much as Germany, Italy and Russia are. This is possible, to be sure; but it should be clearly apparent that English statesmen are doing all in their power at present to prevent such a contingency. Englishmen are not willing to be slaves; they are determined to be free. They are fighting to preserve liberty and democracy, even the liberty of those who object to fighting.

"The British Draft Act is far more liberal than the American Draft Act. Our country has already sent men to jail for their failure to register. The Englishman is allowed to register himself as a conscientious objector to war, and that is all that is required of him. Even in the last war, England did not punish conscientious objectors very severely. They were sent to jail for a few months, and that was all. But here we sent Emma Goldman to jail for two years, while Eugene Debs and other men were sentenced to serve twenty years, and even after the war was over, President Wilson refused to pardon Debs, though virtually everybody else, including his own attorney general, recommended his pardon. But, then, we had joined forces with the Tsar of all the Russias to make the world safe for democracy."

This is a bold and useful comment on the United States attitude towards war resisters. But it is incorrect in some details. Conscientious objectors in Britain were sentenced repeatedly by Court Martial and many suffered three years' continuous imprisonment. We experienced four Court Martials. Emrys Hughes was sentenced five times by Court Martial and endured nearly three years imprisonment. Creech Jones told his record in the speech reproduced in the May Word.

We correct these details because such errors spoil the effectiveness of our contemporary's clear and simple argument.

REMEMBER SPAIN!

OPEN LETTER TO LORD HALIFAX

My Lord,—How are the tables turned! A few short years ago you were approached by the lawfully-elected Government of Spain for the right, under international law, to purchase arms for the defence of the nation. To that appeal you turned a deaf ear and now in 1941 you are yourself a suppliant for American help to wage a war against the very forces which you callously watched destroying Spanish liberty.

I wonder if your thoughts ever go back to that 13th day of May, 1938, when Senor del Vayo appealed to you for elementary justice and requested, as he had a perfect right to do, that the embargo on arms to Spain be lifted.

Do you ever think of that, my lord? Do you sometimes spare a moment from the deep religious meditations in which you are reported to indulge to ponder on the Spanish women and children murdered by the Nazi-Fascist forces which you now profess to recognise as the embodiment of evil, because the lawful Government of Spain was unable to compete in armaments with the armies, well equipped by Germany and Italy, which General France had at his command? From a distance of 3,000 miles across the ocean you speak of freedom and the need for fighting to the death to crush this "evil thing" that menaces democracy to-day. Do you ever meditate upon the fight for freedom of a Workers' Army that, knowing little of the science of arms and sustained only by the conviction that their cause was just, held off for many weary months the trained and disciplined soldiers of the Fascist pioneers who won their initial victories against Democracy in Spain, while powerful Democratic nations, ruled by blind and bigoted Statesmen, watched the uneven struggle without a qualm?

In a speech delivered at Chicago recently, after boasting of our determination to "stick it out" whatever happens (but without specifying the battlefront on which you yourself proposed to serve), you refer to the needs of the "new world" which will arise out of a war which you and your associates in the Conservative Party have, by your betrayal of collective security, done so much to render inevitable. "The first," you say, "is a system of security which will ensure international stability, the second a system of economic collaboration between the free people, and the third a system of ordered change in the relationship between States, which will restore confidence in the integrity of the word of nations." My Lord, your self-righteous lament over the lack of integrity in the word of nations would be laughable if the subject were not so serious. Few Governments have shown such contempt for integrity in their dealings with foreign powers as that of which you were a member for so many weary years and which was brought to a long overdue close as a result of our defeat in Norway. You wish to restore "confidence in the integrity of the word of nations!" Ask the martyred people of China how much confidence they will ever have in the word of Britain until her Government is purged of those unworthy Statesmen who watched her being butchered by the imperialists of Japan in spite of the hypocritical lipe service they had paid to the League of Nations and the principle of Collective Security. Ask the people of Abyssinia, Czechoslovakia, or Spain who trusted in the word of honourable Christian gentlemen and found themselves enslaved by Fascist tyrants with whom these honourable Christian gentlemen did not hesitate to dine in public, and whose friendship they assiduously cultivated while the murderers' hands were red with human blood!

Speaking at a press conference the other day in Minneapolis you referred to the activities of Col. Lindbergh. "I have no doubt," you said, "that he holds his opinion as sincerely as I do my own, but when he touches on the field of world affairs and matters that affect the future of all free people I think some of his arguments are dangerously mistaken." Possibly, my Lord, they are, but who are you to criticise them? Col. Lindbergh is an Isolationist who professes a desire to keep his country out of war—and that was the very policy which you and your Conservative colleagues pursued in the most critical years of the Fascist menace to our liberties in Europe. To every plea for action you were deaf. To all appeals for a united front against the Fascist menace you retorted with the cry of "war-monger." To those who, overborne in the struggle, asked for help you gave no assistance whatsoever—now you ask for aid yourself. Try to imagine how you would feel if America refused to listen to our plea to-day and you will begin to understand how others, now rotting in the grave, or languishing in Fascist dungeons, must have felt when you and your associates refused to listen to their even more legitimate requests for help!

H. W. HENDERSON.

SINCE THURTLE FORGETS

In the House of Commons, by sneering questions and interruptions, and also in the columns of the Literary Guide, Ernest Thurtle M.P., Rationalist writer and speaker, has made, since the beginning of the second world war, bitter attacks on conscientious objectors. This man forgets his past. It is time that we recalled it to him.

Ernest Thurtle was born in New York State, 1884, of British parents. Came to England when two years of age. Became steel worker in Monmouthshire. Joined the Labour Movement at the age of 19. Settled in London in 1908. Joined the National Union of Clerks. Married Dorothy Lansbury, daughter of George Lansbury. Served in the Army during the Great War and obtained a Commission. On leaving the Army, he became an aggressive anti-militarist. Was the unsuccessful Anti-Militarist candidate of the ex-Service men at S.W. Bethnal Green in 1918.

In the Daily Herald, 3rd November, 1920, Thurtle wrote an article on the organisation of ex-Service men, in which he criticised "The Comrades of the Great War," and suggested that they were in the pockets of the Government.

Writing on the "Pageantry of the Cenotaph" in the Daily Herald, 21st October, 1921, he condemned military ceremonial on Armistice Day, and said: "Men did not die in Flanders in order that the spirit of Potsdam might be brought to Whitehall."

In a letter to the Daily Herald, 2nd March, 1923, on a Bill by a Conservative member to make it a punishable offence to teach sedition to young people under 16 by means of Bolshevist Sunday Schools, Thurtle wrote:—

"Perhaps the Labour Party will take steps to introduce a Bill forbidding the teaching of bigotry and reaction to young people under 16. This deplorable teaching is very prevalent in Sunday schools of the conventional type, and it has a most harmful effect on the young mind."

On the abolition of the Death Penalty in the Army, he wrote, in the Daily Herald, 17th April, 1923, that in the discussion on this matter in the House of Commons it had been admitted that the death penalty was necessary

"in order to compel soldiers to endure the hell of modern warfare. . . . By implication it was also admitted that what keeps soldiers fighting in the trenches and drives them over the top is not patriotism, nor hatred of the enemy, nor respect for officers, nor any of the other fictions invented by newspaper correspondents, but the fear of being shot in cold blood by their fellow-countrymen, in accordance with the provisions of Military Law of Christian England.

"This hardly-extracted piece of truth should be broadcasted by anti-militarists until it becomes a commonplace, and until the flag-waggers and war-mongers—most of whom take care never to fight themselves—are shamed into holding their peace for evermore. The abolition of the death penalty would not only be a belated act of justice to the soldier, it would also be a blow which would go a long way towards paralysing the arm of the militarists."

In the General Election of 1923 Mr. Thurtle was elected as the Parliamentary representative for Shoreditch, and was appointed Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Pensions (Mr. F. O. Roberts) in the first "Labour" Government.

In 1924 he published a pamphlet under the title of "Shootings at Dawn," in which he gave what purported to be the details of 264 soldiers who were, in the words of the Daily Herald, 14th May, 1924, review, written by George Lansbury—i.e., Thurtle's father-in-law—"shot by their comrades during the late war (and) were sent to their doom solely because they were part of a soulless machine which in war-time takes no account of men's nerves or feelings."

In a reply to Purcell (Daily Herald, 10th September, 1924) Thurtle said: "I, as one who believes that Britain has no right to continue to hold India in subjection by force under any pretext whatever, cannot agree with him (Purcell)"

Thurtle voted against the five cruisers in the Socialist Government's programme, and was also one of the thirteen M.P.'s who voted against the Army Estimates in 1924. This 1924 record and contributions to debate are detailed in our At Grips with War, 1929 Edition, pages 67-70, and 75.

Chapter VIII. of this brochure is headed: "Socialism—Checking War!" It is a direct and detailed attack on the Socialist Party in the United States and on the Labour Party in Great Britain for ineptitude in face of war. The debate on March 17, 1924, during a Committee Stage on Army Estimates is summarised. Walter Ayles, then Pacifist and Labour member for North Bristol, moved to reduce the standing army to 11,600 men—this motion meaning the abolition of the standing army. We summarise and comment on Walter Ayles' speech and continue, pages 70-71:

"Ernest Thurtle, Labour M.P. for Shoreditch, seconded the amendment. Actual fighting experience had convinced him that no human being should be asked to endure the experience of modern war, AND HE WOULD NOT TAKE PART IN FUTURE WAR. Ninety per cent. of the British voluntary army was recruited from the unemployed. The chief recruiting offices in London considered that the extension of the London tube and the building of the Empire Exhibition had lessened the number of recruits. In the House of Commons the previous Secretary of State for War had been asked if it were not possible to take the dole away from men under 25—in order to stimulate recruiting! The late Lord Roberts had described recruiting as 'the conscription of hunger.' Inexperienced youths were inveigled into the army, that their lives and limbs might be used as a shield for those who fought by proxy. It was cheap and spurious patriotism, the easiest and most despicable thing in the world, to fight to the last drop of someone else's blood.

"This was an excellent speech that showed well the economical conscription of the army. But it never touched the real question, the economic cleavage that means there are two nations within every nation, the rich and the poor. Thurtle made the mistake of speaking and thinking of one united nation despite the economic circumstances that make this idea a political and social myth."

On page 75, we again mention Thurtle. J. J. Lawson, member for Chester-le-Street, Durham, who became Secretary to the Ministry of Labour in MacDonald's 1929 Government, and was Financial Secretary to the War Office in the 1924 administration, declared, in this debate, that the policy of Universal disarmament by mutual agreement had been laid down at the Labour Party Conference in 1923. At this same Conference, by a majority of over two million votes, the Labour Party had decided to vote for the Navy, Army, and Air Force Estimates.

We quote the reference to Thurtle that followed our summary of Lawson's speech.

"Thurtle interrupted here to point out that the motion against all Service votes was supported by Major C. R. Attlee, member for Stepney, the 1924 Under-Secretary of State for War."

We present this quotation to Attlee as well as to Thurtle to-day. It speaks volumes on the subject of political consistency, integrity, and progress towards Socialism, through the medium of parliamentary careerism.

Addressing a women's meeting at Whitechapel (Daily Herald, 24th November, 1924), Thurtle remarked in reference to the good name of the Labour Party:—

"We haven't to protest, for example, that we are just as good imperialists as some of the others. . . . There was also far too much talk about the folly of the class struggle. To him the existence of the Party was evidence of the existence of that struggle. They ought not to talk about not being a menace to the other side in the struggle. We are a menace to them. We ought to publish and proclaim the fact."

Speaking on the expulsion of the Communists from the Labour Party he said that

"he personally did not think local Labour Parties would be wise to carry out the decision to expel Communists, and he did not think it likely that it would be followed in Shoreditch." (See "Workers' Weekly," November 28 and December 12, 1924).

In the Daily Herald, 10th January, 1925, he protested against the sugar beet subsidy on the ground that subsidies to industries were inconsistent with Socialist principles. Industries that required subsidies in order to carry on should be taken over by the State.

Writing in Lansbury's Labour Weekly, 11th April, 1925, Thurtle declared that "the parents who would hate to see their children trained for human slaughter ought never to assist the recruitment of the children of others for this purpose. . . . Out attitude must be: 'Not a man, not a gun, not a bomb.'"

Replying in the Daily News, 20th June, 1925, to an article in that paper by Mr. Philip Snowden on "The Labour View of Emigration," Thurtle expressed his disagreement with the opinions of Mr. Snowden, and denied that they represented the Labour view.

"We still believe that the British Empire in the main 'is the product of capitalist aggression, and has been built up by force, rapine and plunder.'"

Speaking at the I.L.P. Summer School, Easton Lodge, Essex, Daily Herald, 25th August, 1925, he said:—

"An Empire which had to be held together by means of armed forces was not one in which Socialists could be consistently interested. . . . If I were a Russian I would disband the Red Army."

Addressing the Brotherhood Church, Southgate, he remarked in reference to the suggested visit of Mussolini to this country:—

"If there is any real spirit in the Labour and Socialist movement in this country it will stir up such tremendous feelings against Mussolini that he will not dare to put his feet on the shores of this country." ("Daily Herald," November 23, 1925).

During 1927 Thurtle addressed a number of meetings of protest against the Government's policy in China, and against the Government's Trades Union Bill. Speaking at Norwich on the Trades Union Bill, he stated that "The Trades Union Bill was the most insulting challenge which had been made to the Labour Movement since the movement came into existence, and the Labour Party throughout the country was going to take up this challenge as soon as opportunity occurred, and was going to make Mr. Baldwin pay the very heaviest price imaginable for this outrage on the liberty of the workers." ("Eastern Daily Press," April 11, 1927).

In an article in the Brisbane (Queensland) Daily Standard, 12th November, 1927, he attacked the British Government's representatives at the Geneva Disarmament Conference, describing them as hypocrites. But he was glad the Conference failed.

"Because I think it would have been very much worse for the world if the hypocrites had come to an agreement."

He added:—

"Just as we build warships on the assumption that we may one day fight America (avowing at the same time that the idea of fighting America is unthinkable!), so we are building a great fighting aeroplane force on the assumption that we may one day fight France, while the Locarno parchment, sealed with the seals of Britain and France, declares that such fighting will never be. And Locarno notwithstanding, the Government will not even permit the construction of a Channel tunnel between our shores and France."

At this time it was revealed through a case in the City of London Court that Mr. Thurtle's wife was an employee of Arcos, being accountant to the Russian Bristle Export Co., a trading concern of Arcos, at a salary of £36 per month, income-tax paid. (See the Financial Times, 28th October, 1927. Also a letter in The Patriot, 10th November, 1927).

Writing in the Daily Herald, 13th December, 1927, on the Prayer Book controversy, Thurtle declared:—

"As a means of forcing the separation of the Church from the State and eliminating the Bishops from Parliament—an end to be desired by all Socialists—I hope all my fellow Labour M.P.s will vote against the Prayer Book."

Mr. and Mrs. Thurtle went to India with the Simon Commission in a non-official capacity. The Bombay Daily Mail, 22nd February, 1928, reported that

"at a meeting of the Calcutta Parliament to-morrow Mr. Thurtle, M.P., will move that, in the opinion of the House, the British Labour Movement will whole-heartedly stand by Indian self-gavernment."

In an interview with Forward (Calcutta), quoted by the Bombay Daily Mail of the same date, he expressed regret that the Labour Party was represented on the Commission.

"They could best serve India by getting control of the British Government. What was more important to India than the Simon Commission and its work was the complexion of the next British Parliament. He and Mrs. Thurtle were present at the Shraddhanand Park Boycott Demonstration, and he was convinced that the policy of boycotting the Commission really had the support of the Indian masses. . . . He thought it would have done Sir John Simon good to have been present at that meeting."

In an address at Calcutta to a demonstration of workers he said that he brought the fraternal greetings of the poorest quarter of London, and they had asked him "to convey to the people of India the hope that at the earliest possible moment the people might be a free nation. . . ." He hoped that they, with all their heart, would carry on their campaign for freedom, and that they would present one united front to the people, and that the time would come before long when they would be able to be got rid of their bondage. (New Empire (Calcutta), 27th February, 1928).

In moving his motion in the Calcutta Parliament, he said that there were a few members of the British Labour Party who said things that smacked of Imperialism.

"But it would be unfair to judge a great movement by the stray speeches of a few individuals. The working men and women of Britain were not imperialists but internationalists, especially after the experience of the last war."

He went on to suggest that the Indian leaders should agree on a constitution and speak in the name of a United India.

"If the Labour Movement failed them when they had produced such a constitution, it would be legitimate for them to condemn it as having betrayed India's interests." ("Calcutta Statesman," March 1, 1928).

Under the title "More Thurtleisms," the Allahabad Pioneer, 5th March, 1928, reported an interview with Thurtle, in the course of which he stated that he was convinced that the opposition to the Simon Commission was very deep and widespread and represented the view of the great mass of the Indian people.

"When I return to England I shall do my best to convince my colleagues of the Labour Party that Nationalist India has firmly made up its mind to have nothing to do with the Simon Commission. I feel that the Labour Party must face the fact that the Commission is thoroughly unpopular, and that no appeals to Indian Nationalists to co-operate with it will be of any avail."

After hinting that a Labour Government would be returned at the General Election, and stating that it would be in sympathy with the Nationalists, Thurtle continued:

"Unlike Lord Birkenhead and other British Imperialists, ordinary British men and women dislike the idea of their country keeping other people in subjection, and they will be very glad to see India take its place amongst the free self-respecting countries of the world. . . . The idea that India is unfit for self-government is a bogey deliberately created. I am sure, however, it is rapidly losing its power to do this."

During his stay in India Thurtle had an interview with Mr. Gandhi. (See Bombay Daily Mail, 8th March). In an interview with the Madras Hindu, 12th March, he alleged that

"Sir Alexander Muddiman had treated him with downright rudeness, which was an illuminating exhibition of official boorishness."

In a letter to the New Leader, 4th May, 1928, Thurtle wrote:—

"We are not so much anti-Imperialists as internationalists. . . . We think justice should be done to oppressed peoples in India, China, Egypt, or elsewhere, even if the British Empire is thereby weakened. If there is something inherently beneficial to humanity in the British Empire, that organisation will probably survive in some form. But, if a choice has to be made between the two, we believe much more in International Justice than in the British Empire."

OUR APPEAL

In May, the deficit on the appeal we issued in November for £1,971 11s. 3d. stood reduced to £1,849 4s. 10d. We shall not list any acknowledgments until the full sum has been raised. When this has been done, although there is a deficit on every issue, we shall discontinue a special appeal. The sum asked for must be raised. Some comrades wish us to increase the price of the paper to 3d. This we have refused to do. Also, as long as possible, we wish to retain our size. So please respond. If every reader would help—if you would help—now, we could end this begging: the only mean space in the paper. Last month's response was poor. It was only £12 10s. 10d. This reduces our need to £1,836 14s. Do please help immediately you have read this appeal. We consider this paper a brave and useful paper. If you agree, do not let it die.

LIVERPOOL COURT-MARTIAL

By The Rev. SIDNEY SPENCER, B.A.
(Minister, Hope St. Unitarian Church, Liverpool).

[The name of the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., was mentioned several times during the proceedings of the Court-Martial on a Military Officer and 5 N.C.O.'s, held at Liverpool in April. The proceedings did not impress us, so we did not publish the very full report we have in hand. Mr. Spencer issued a statement as to what happened and the part he played to his church membership. This we reprint.—Ed.]

Last September I was surprised and shocked to learn that a number of "Conscientious Objectors" who had been drafted against their wish into the Non-Combatant Corps had suffered ill-usage. Having been drafted into the N.C.C., they were anxious to follow the procedure laid down by the Military Training Act, whereby a man who refuses to obey an order on "conscientious" grounds, if sentenced by a Court-Martial to not less than 93 days' imprisonment, obtains the right to a further appearance before the Appellate Tribunal. It appears that they were informed in Liverpool that they would not be given this opportunity, but would be compelled to accept army service. A number of them were sentenced by the Commanding Officer to 14 days' detention, were put on bread and water and kept in darkened cells. Some of them were brutally struck by an N.C.O. The treatment had in fact been so severe that the men concerned felt compelled for the time being to obey orders.

Hearing what had taken place, I determined along with other members of the local Advisory Committee for Pacifists, to do anything possible to see that such irregularities were put an end to. Representations were made to the War Office, and other steps were taken to draw attention to the matter. Three weeks later eleven of the men again decided to disobey, hoping that this time they would be court-martialled. Instead of that, they were kicked and struck by N.C.O.'s, to such an extent that they agreed to accept orders. I was in touch with some of the men, who were stationed at the College, and so I was immediately informed of what had happened. I wired forthwith to the War Office and M.P.'s. Meantime the men had been sent away, along with others, to South Wales. Eventually a Court of Inquiry was held by the War Office in Liverpool, at which each of the men received full opportunity of stating the facts. As a result, the War Office decided that a military officer and five N.C.O.'s should be court-martialled on a number of different charges.

That is the background of the court-martial. All that they desired was that the facts should be brought to light, and that instructions should be issued by the War Office to prevent further ill-usage. Some of the men appeared before the Court-martial only because they received subpoenas, and one, who was still under military control, in the N.C.C., refused even so to give evidence—knowing that he would be punished for his refusal.

I have written elsewhere (in "Peace News" for May 2nd) of my impressions of the trial. I can only here record my belief that the Court, which consisted of seven miltary officers, did its best to deal impartially with the evidence, but that in the circumstances that was extraordinarily difficult. The policy of the defence was to deny completely the allegations of bruitality, and to suggest that the story was a "lying invention" devised for political purposes. I was apparently one of the people who were supposed to have assisted in the invention—perhaps even to have instigated it! In the upshot, of the five N.C.O.'s two were found guilty on three charges between them, and the officer was found guilty on two out of five charges—of having permitted men to be assaulted, and having failed to report such assaults to his superior officer. The case of the "Conscientious Objectors" was thus substantially etablished. I feel, at least that in view of the publicity given to the case it is most unlikely that similar treatment will again be attempted.

NAZI-BOLSHEVIK PEACE PACT ENDS

Let the Struggle Towards Peace Begin

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE WINSTON CHURCHILL, M.P.

(His Majesty's Principal Secretary for State)

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

On Sunday, June 22, the Soviet-German Pact, signed on August 23, 1939, ended. Hitler, without warning, made war on his "good neighbour," Stalin. It is only fair to add that, from the time that the pact was signed, to the date that Germany invaded the U.S.S.R., the Government of the Soviet Union paid strict observance to its pact with Germany.

On August 25, 1940, Molotov declared that the Soviet-German pact corresponded to the fundamental State interests of the U.S.S.R. and Germany. Moscow described the pact as "historic"—it was, like all waste-paper—and defended it as being a protection against the dangerous aims of "the British and French Imperialists."

This statement by the Kremlin was alike hypocritical and premature. The authors knew that their so-called peace-pact was but the prelude to the second world war. For the rest, as a contract it has not attained a second birthday. Hitler has returned to his Anti-Bolshevik propaganda. The so-called "Communists" have resumed their denunciation of Hitler. He is once more super-robber, bandit, invader, and murderer. And you, sir, have denounced him as "a bloodthirsty guttersnipe," in charming forgetfulness of some eulogies you passed upon him in other days.

Your present description of Hitler savours of the soap-box rather than the forum. It may be true but it is not statesmanlike. I do not complain of its want of dignity. I do complain of your lateness of expression and your failure to recall the circumstances that moulded Hitler into a figure of pomp and power and then imposed him upon Europe. I deplore the frank opportunism of the British political reaction to the conclusion of the Nazi-Bolshevik Peace Pact.

The British Government does right to make the most of the war in the East. But it is not right to view the extension of the conflict into the Soviet Union as a mere military opportunity. The British Government must view the conflict as a contribution to world peace. The world needs peace, not war; peace, not victory; peace, a lasting social peace, leading to social reconstruction, and not the sorry jobbery of a mere armistice. Now is the time to make sure that 1918 is not repeated.

Britain is to send military and economic missions to the Soviet Union. Sir Stafford Cripps will return in triumph to Moscow. Willie Gallacher, as you told him in the House of Commons, will receive his marching orders and right-about turn. Nazi pressure in the West has been relieved, almost miraculously, by Nazi hostilities in the East. Britain is supposed, from extreme Right to extreme Left, to have made common cause in the struggle of war without pause until victory is secured. Victory, as you must know, means another dictated peace, another 1918, with all its horrors of exhaustion, reconstructed militarismtarism, dictatorship, concentration camps, and more war.

Militarist politicians and pressmen, as distinct from statesmen, soldiers, and thinkers, advise you that Britain's great need, during this lull in the West, is to consolidate the war effort. It is nowhere said that the great need is to consolidate the peace effort. Unless we do consolidate that peace effort, humanity is doomed to untold tragedy. Unquestioning service to the cause of war is dubious patriotism and most queustionable service to the cause of peace. Many seek refuge from facing this urgent truth by dubbing whoever would discuss peace as a traitor. It is an easy label with which to adorn others in times of crisis and emotionalism. But the label does not remain affixed. Crime does not pay, not even the crime of war. And now is your opportunity to consider this fact.

In 1939, against all rhyme and reason and all previous declarations, Hitler and Stalin decided to become friends. That affirmation of friendship, cynically signed, sealed, and delivered, became the death warrant of thousands of innocent men, women and children throughout Europe. The signatures have been erased, the seals removed. But the blood-letting goes on. The criminal responsibility of the pact remains. Had there been no pact, there would have been no war.

As Principal Secretary of State for Great Britain you have pledged yourself to defend the Soviet Union against invasion. You speak clearly, directly, on this issue. From the standpoint of war, your pledge is sound. It is wise strategy, correct tactics, good fighting. But you make no contribution to the ending of war, no enunciation of definite principles of peace. To do so would be to prove yourself the statesman of your age.

The idea of victory is the illusion of violence. It is ignorance, unbroken by mercy and unrestricted by remorse. The idea of victory, complete and smashing, is unforgivable in the people and unthinkable in the statesmen. The slogan of victory pays no regard to the lessons of history and to the sufferings of the people.

Diehards are entitled to make the most of the argument presented to them with such ruthless irresponsibility by the Nazi leaders. Thinkers should trace 1941 back to 1918 and reflect on the folly of the law of violence. You, sir, have been not only contemporary with the events I propose to trace, but have been an active participator in most of them. Those events point to a programme and policy of peace, to a clear definition of the first principles of peace, and of the way in which war could be halted even under capitalism, and the cause of peace and reconstruction advanced. I believe that there can be no real security of peace unless and until we establish a Socialist society. But I do not believe that the question of war is a small side-issue, of no consequence in itself. On the contrary I consider that, even without the establishing of Socialist society, the arresting of violence is an important achievement. I am assured that the propaganda of death has been the grand error of the human race.

1941 is the conclusion of 1918. In that year was laid down, in clear, concise terms, the conditions of peace, in our English tongue, by one of its clearest spokesmen. His statement was treated with callous levity. Whatever his faults as a politician, he defined the conditions of peace in the terms of statesmanship. Those terms stand. They remain a clear statement of the conditions of world peace. It is the business of the English-speaking world to accept those terms to-day, without qualification or hesitation, and to implement them. From a war of bombs the war should become a war of propaganda; and the peace that was not achieved in 1918 should be advanced to reality in 1941. To your Ministry of War you should add a Ministry of Peace and a Ministry of Propaganda. Let the enduring principles of 1918 be reproclaimed not as a treachery leading to an armistice but as a declaration of intending lasting peace, fraught with happiness to mankind. Let the war between nations end and the struggle of ideas begin.

On January 8, 1918, President Wilson laid down his fourteen points or conditions of peace in a message to the United States' Congress. John Buchan, the distinguished novelist, biographer and historian, who died as Lord Tweedsmuir, Governor General of Canada, described these points in Nelson's History of the War, as destined to hold the ground as the Allied Charter. The points guaranteed three items essential to human well being:—

(1) A Peace of Agreement.

(2) Self-determination.

(3) No crushing of Germany.

Points (6) to (13) inclusive need not be instanced here as they but summarise the application of the basic principles defined in the other points. These were:—

1. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at after which there shall be no private international understanding of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.
2. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.
3. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for it maintenance.
4. Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.
5. A free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.
14. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike.

The emendation of these principles were made by President Wilson in his statement of the Four Principles in February, 1918. These were:—

1. That each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case, and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent.
2. That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from one sovereignty to another sovereignty as if they were chattels or pawns in a game, even the great game, now for ever discredited, of the balance of power; but that
3. Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned and not as a part of any mere adjustment of compromise of claims amongst rival States.
4. That all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently the world.

In September, 1918, President Wilson further defined the fourteen points in what is known as the Five Particulars:—

1. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just, and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favourites and knows no standards, but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.
2. No special or separate interest of any single nation or group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.
3. There can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the League of Nations.
4. And more especially there can be no special selfish economic combinations within the League.
5. All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world. Special alliances and economic rivalries and hostilities have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that produce war. It would be an insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms.

Addressing Congress, on February 11, 1918, President Wilson said in words most unjustly forgotten:—

"All parties to this war must join in the settlement of every issue involved in it, because what we are seeking is a peace that we can all unite to guarantee and maintain, and every item of it must be submitted to the common judgment, whether it be right and fair and an act of justice."

The German Government, under Prince Max of Baden, accepted President Wilson's terms of peace in September 1918. On November 6, the Allies accepted the Fourteen Points with qualification as to the Freedom of the Seas. Two days later, Germany sent representatives to Marshal Foch to ask for the terms of Armistice. Those terms included total German disarmament. The new Germany was rendered helpless and relied entirely upon the honourable execution of President Wilson's programme of peace. Her military strength destroyed, for seven months after the Armistice she was starved by the Allied blockade to accept the dictated peace. I ask you to turn to the history of this disgraceful period, in order that you might undo it. On March 4, 1919, you declared in the House of Commons that the Allies were "enforcing the blockade with vigour." You declared that Germany was "very near starvation," and remarked on "the great privations which the German people are suffering," and "the great danger of a collapse of the entire structure of German social and national life under the pressure of hunger and malnutrition."

The German delegation at Versailles were not allowed to speak. It yielded to overwhelming force and accepted the infamous war-guilt clause. As late as 1932, six months before Hitler came to power, France refused to withdraw that clause.

After the dictated peace, came the miserable story of reparations and indemnities. The Italian Premier at the time of the peace has told the story well in his book, Peaceless Europe, published in 1922. In his work on The Decadence of Europe, Nitti also showed how Europe had entered on a new era of violence, cynicism, and international spoilation. Professor Keynes in The Economic Consequences of The Peace, protested against the dishonour of what happened. Lord Buckmaster declared that the Treaty of Versailles was "an act of dishonour which can never be effaced." Mr. J. L. Garvin, in The Observer, for May 11, 1919, subjected the treaty to a remarkable analysis in which he prophesied much that has happened and more that may come. The Labour Party almost had the same vision at its 1920 Scarborough Conference. It is clear that democratic Germany was strangled at birth and Nazism was born at Versailles. Germany was humiliated by the cynicism of her enemies from anti-militarist democracy into a militarist concentration camp of violence and menace. The unthinking House of Commons speeches of 1918 and 1919 sentenced Europe to death and to a second World War.

I canvass this matter no further. The facts, so briefly resumed, can be detailed if required. The full details no longer matter. We must repair the past. We must rebuild the future. To this end, sir, I turn from your past as politician. I do not ask you to unsay the bellicose words you have the tendency to utter. You must recognise the unwisdom of their declamation in 1919 when Germany was crushed. I only ask that you prove yourself to be a stateman by proclaiming your adherence to the Wilson Points and broadcasting them as the conditions and principles of world peace, from which you will not depart.

I have the honour to be,
Your fellow citizen and also a citizen of the world,
GUY A. ALDRED.

GORDON STOTT.

Gordon Stott's case came before the Edinburgh Local Tribunal on January 22. It was reported fully in the February Word. Stott refused to register. He made no application to the Tribunal. The case was referred to the Tribunal by the Ministry of Labour. The hearing occupied 5 minutes. The decision was unanimous. Walter Nellies, M.B.E., J.P., was the Labour Representative on the Tribunal. The order of the Tribunal was that Stott's name be removed from the Register of Conscientious Objectors without qualification. The Tribunal found that Stott's objection was based on politics.

Stott's appeal against this decision was heard by the Appeal Tribunal at Parliament House, Edinburgh, on June 13. Appellant said that war was the greatest evil that men could suffer. He was registered conditionally as a conscientious objector, the condition being that he undertook work in agriculture, forestry, and drainage, or full-time A.R.P. service.

Stott's views are known throughout Scotland. His consistency and tenacity entitled him to be registered unconditionally as a conscientious objector.

WAR, PEACE and FAIR HEARING

Duke of Bedford Interview

Because of his well-known uncompromising Pacifism, the Duke of Bedford has been accused of being a Fascist. He replies to this charge in clear, precise terms, in an exclusive interview that he has granted to the editor. The Duke discussed the problems of war, peace, and fair hearing; the rights of man; and the future of civilisation. This interview (illustrated) will appear in the August Word. Order now.

First club man: "No, old boy, I haven't the gambler's itch; I never take chances."

Second club man: "Sound. But a fellow has to make money, hasn't he, and times aren't what they were, are they? I mean to say, don't you find it jolly hard to play safe all the time?"

1st c.m.: "Not a bit of it, old son! There may be a shortage of everything else, but there's never a shortage of mugs. In fact I'm just starting the soundest show of my life."

2nd c.m.: "Umph . . . ?"

1st c.m.: "A new political party, my lad."

2nd c.m.: "Oh! . . . and what, may I ask, are your politics?"

1st c.m. (puzzled): "Eh?"

2nd c.m.: "Sorry! Must be feeling a bit morning-after and all that, don't you know. I mean what's your slogan? How are you going to sell it?"

1st c.m.: "Ah, you'd be surprised, old boy! This is where my real genius for a sound proposition comes to the fore. The public is getting too damned knowing; can't put 'em off any longer with vague phrases, what? Believe me, I'm coming right out into the open; going to offer them straight out what they really want. You listen to my slogan—Poverty, Suffering, Famine and Death. How's that for punch, sir?"

2nd c.m. (showing the first signs of animation): "By Jove, that's rock-bottom! When I think how the beggars lapped up that war of the forties. . . . Couldn't get 'em to stop, eh? I say, can I come in? As a favour, old man? I must say I've always had a pretty picking or two from politics, but this is terrific. I mean to say . . . what?"

NEW ZEALAND C. O.'s

Down to Saturday, February 1, 1941, No. 4 Armed Forces Appeal Board, sitting at Wellington, heard 50 appeals on the ground of conscientious objection. Only one complete exemption was allowed—the appellant was a Quaker. Nine others were granted conditional exemption. The remainder were dismissed, only 4 being allowed non-combatant service.

Twenty objectors based their total objection to warfare on political, Socialistic, or pacifist grounds without relation to religion. Thirty were religious objectors, as follows:—Open Brethren, Seventh Day Adventists, Methodists, Quakers, two Apostolic Church, and one each of the following: Jehovah Witness, Christian Scientist, Exclusive Brother, and Assemblies of God.

The Wellington Board comprised: W. F. Sitwell, Stipendiary Magistrate; P. Coyle, and A. Parlane, with D. Roundhill, Secretary. The Crown Representative, who almost assumed the role of prosecutor was Mr. C. O. Bell.

An unusual appeal by a man who had applied for a position as a rigger in the Air Force came before the Wellington Armed Forces Appeal Board on January 31, 1941.

Rangi Norman Jackson, motor-body builder, said he had applied for a position as a rigger in the Royal New Zealand Air Force; he now appealed on the ground of conscientious objection.

Replying to Mr. C. O. Bell, Jackson said that he was prepared to fight if New Zealand was invaded. This would be self-defence. But he was not prepared to kill, or to assist in killing, if asked to go overseas. He would not go overseas. That would be offence and invasion. His conscience would not permit him to kill under such circumstances.

The appeal was dismissed.

Dismissed also was the appeal of Ronald Parks, labourer. His case was heard just after Jackson's. He refused to defend New Zealand if it was invaded, but was anxious to undertake service on an overseas merchant ship. He would not undertake overseas service as a member of the Armed Forces on the ground of conscientious objection to war. When his appeal was dismissed, Parks said to the Board:—

"You will have to take the responsibility of turning a law-abiding citizen into a lawbreaker."

In his statement, Parks said that he had no sympathy with the present Government, many of whose leaders were devoid of political honour or consistency. He also stated:—

"I do not value my life or property, or the lives or property of any man that I would take human life to maintain same. In this respect I acknowledge my Creator."

"I ask that I be acknowledged as a free man in order that I may take my place in the British mercantile marine as cook or deckhand in any Home boat quitting New Zealand shores."

Replying to Mr. C. O. Bell, Parks said that he was born in New Zealand. He had never been to sea. He had a conscientious objection to serving in any branch of the armed forces.

Mr. Bell: If you served on a ship going overseas it would be armed, and carrying produce to assist the war effort. Have you any objection to that?—No.

If New Zealand was attacked would your assist to defend it?—No.

Why?—On conscientious grounds. I acknowledge my life to be the landmark of God, and the same applies to other men. To take another's life would be breaking the law of God.

Mr. Bell: What law?—"Thou shalt not kill."

Appellant said he had held this belief since he was 18 or 19. He belonged to no religion, but was christened in the Church of England. He had not publicly expressed pacifist views, but to his friends. He did not believe in force in any circumstances.

Mr. Bell: What is your political opinion or belief?—My conviction is that a country stands or falls by its Government, and this one has at its head men without honour.

What is your ground for such a statement?—

I have no sympathy with a Government some of the heads of which denied the British flag in the last war and now one of them, as Minister of National Service, tries to dictate to me what I should do.

Mr. Bell: Is not the fact that you are against organised society the reason for your beliefs?—Yes.

William Moffat Law, baker's labourer, cited hardship to his mother and members of his family as the result of the death of his father in the Great War. He was opposed to war, because he was a member of the New Zealand Socialist Party, which had always been opposed to war. He had been born in Scotland while his father was on active service in 1917, and his father had been killed shortly afterward. His mother had been left to support three small children, and overwork and financial worries had hastened her death. He had come to New Zealand with his two brothers.

Law concluded his statement with the declaration:—

"I will not bear arms against my fellow-workers in any country, nor will I assist in any capacity in any army which is engaged in the slaughter of my fellow-men."

Mr. Bell: You are not a conscientious objector on religious grounds?—No.

If a person attacked you, would you defend yourself?—I would call a policeman.

And if there was none available?—I would do my best to defend myself.

You want to put yourself in the position of being the judge when force is necessary?—Every person is entitled to do that.

We require a police force to keep law and order.—Under the present system.

You had an unfortunate experience through the last war?—I might describe it as a typical one.

Your opinion is political?—It is based on conscience and experience.

A letter was produced from the New Zealand Socialist Party certifying that appellant had been four years associated with it.

Appellant handed in some Socialist Party literature.

The chairman quoted a heading from one pamphlet: "Let capitalists fight their own wars." He asked appellant if he subscribed to that.

Appellant: Yes.

Then the only allegiance you bear to New Zealand in its difficulties is the opportunity of earning a livelihood.

The appeal was dismissed.

Appellant: Is there any right of appeal.

The chairman: No.

On Tuesday, February 4, the Board had three interesting cases before it. Two of them were dismissed: Coffey and Saint.

Albert William Coffey, electrical engineer, stated that he belonged to no organised or recognised religious body. He based his appeal on observation and commonsense. His statement explained:—

"To suggest that I should deliberately go and train, or prepare in any way to kill or maim my fellow-man, even assuming he is at fault, is abhorrent and impossible.

"No war or other violence has ever settled any question. This very appeal board is an admission of the futility of blind force. In the last war objectors were taken forcibly and maltreated to such an extent in some cases that they were physically broken, but even this exercise of force did not defeat their convictions. The whole of our domestic living is arranged to prevent strife and I can see no moral grounds for murder of which, to me, war is no more or less than an organised form when peoples have ceased to reason."

Mr. C. O. Bell: Would you do work on electrical apparatus destined for war purposes?

Appellant: Definitely no.

Appellant said that he was one of two engineers in New Zealand for a British Electrical Company. He knew his employers were one of the biggest contractors in England to the British Government, but he was unaware of any military contracts in New Zealand.

After Coffey had stated that he did not believe in military resistance, and did believe that social progress and freedom could be secured with resource to arms or to violence, the following dialogue occurred:

Bell: You do not object to Nazi rule?

Coffey: I would rather be under British rule; I do not agree with the Nazis.

Kinley H. Black, engineer, said Coffey and he and another man had lived together from March, 1939. They held differing views. Coffey had always held any sort of peace preferable to war, and, though he did not agree with him, he felt him quite sincere. There were three young men in the house and their chief pastime was arguing on political, economic and other subjects.

The chairman, W. F. Stilwell: Most arguments between young men in boarding-houses are academic.

William A. Bloodworth, engineer, Public Works Department, said that the discussions were far from academic. He did not agree with Coffey but could confirm that he held the views expressed to the board.

Herbert Henry Saint, carpenter, said that his widowed mother in England received no pension and was dependent entirely on him. She was a semi-invalid. He came to New Zealand to obtain settled work, so as to help her. Those who were dropping bombs near where his mother lived were misled, like those who set out from near where his mother lived to drop bombs near someone else's widowed mother. The people of all countries engaged in war were simple folk, capable of similar kindnesses to each other individually, but all collectively misled. While war was glorified in history books he could not see much change coming. But he must contribute his personal faith and stand to the change that would come. Mankind would discard war. His appeal was—

"based on the indisputable fact that all wars are man-made and fighting in this one will never stop more mass murder.

"It is only the poor people who really suffer so I am quite right in conscientiously objecting to helping in more destruction of life. The last world war was called the 'war to end war.' Since then there have been 40 more wars. The men then in power promised a better world order which, I am sorry to say, we are still waiting for. This is not a statement of fear but one I would stand by in any country."

The appeal of a Christian pacifist, Trevor George Purves, clerk, Petone, was allowed, subject to appellant doing alternative service, under clause 8 of the regulations, at the direction of the Minister of National Service. Under this clause the Ministry may direct members of the reserve to perform services, other than in the armed services, which they are capable of doing.

Purves said that as a Christian pacifist he objected to war. It would be a denial of Jesus Christ to be part of a machine which, to achieve its purpose, must involve misery, suffering and death to thousands.

For 12 years he had belonged to the Methodist Bible class movement and to the Methodist Church of New Zealand, which had publicly stated that war was contrary to the spirit and purpose of Christ. He was prepared to do alternative service not under military control.

The Rev. H. C. Dixon, Methodist minister, Waiwhetu, said that he knew Purves to be a pacifist and sincere in his views. The witness was not minister of the Petone church which appellant attended. He had met appellant in a group at Petone of which appellant was Bible class leader. Methodists as a body were not actually pacifists. The Church did not declare itself either way, but it had declared itself opposed to war and would support any person conscientiously opposed to war. A great many Methodist ministers, but unfortunately not the majority, were pacifists and there was a strong pacifist sentiment in the Church. Witness had been a pacifist for many years.

On Thursday, February 6, the Wellington Board rejected the Appeal of Arthur Edward Smuts Kennedy, because it suspected him of being a member of the Communist Party. Kennedy said that the verdicts of both ethical science and religion were identical in that neither could find the slightest moral justification for the terrible loss of life, maiming, misery and mental degradation caused by war.

Appellant produced a 1934 card of membership of the New Zealand Movement Against War and Fascism.

Mr. C. O. Bell said that this was a Communist Party organisation. It was not genuine because it was allied to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union believed in war and violence. It persecuted conscientious objectors and murdered political objectors. One of the aims set out on the card was "to assist in the international defence of the Soviet Union and support its policy." That is, war, invasion, and political murder. Was the appellant once a member of the Communist Party.

Appellant: Never.

Mr. C. O. Bell: Is it not a rule for members of the Communist Party, under certain circumstances, to deny their membership?

Appellant: No.

Mr. Bell stated that there was strong evidence to the contrary. The Movement against War and Fascism was organised in Great Britain and throughout the Empire and the United States. It was organised from the Kremlin. It was part of a world movement organised by the people who had invaded Finland, murdered their political critics and minorities, and signed the German pact which plunged the world into war. The movement was not a genuine movement either against War or Fascism.

Asked what he was prepared to do so serve his fellows, Kennedy said:—

"I am prepared to offer my body to the hospital authorities for living experiment in any problem of disease."

WORLD ANTI-WAR CONGRESS

GENEVA, JULY 28th, 1932

Office of British Delegation: 53 GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.1

Provisional Secretary: R. BRIDGEMAN

Provisional Treasurer: JOHN STRACHEY

We learn from Paris that, acting upon the initiative of Romain Rolland and Henri Barbusse, an international committee is being formed to organise and unite all those men and women, groups and organisations, ready to resist the danger of a new war.

Amongst the members of the committee are: Maxim Gorki, Henri Barbusse, Upton Sinclair, Mrs. Sun Yat Sen, Romain Rolland, Theodore Dreiser, Professor Albert Einstein, Professor Paul Langevin, Heinrich Mann and John Dos Passos.

The committee intends to organise a Congress in Geneva on the 28th July, 1932. From the appeal which the Provisional Committee has issued, we quote the following:—

"The money spent on armaments is gradually reaching a fantastic height in all States; the production of armaments is to-day surpassing all previous records.

The undersigned men and women are determined to do everything to hinder the crime of war and, deeply convinced that no right-thinking man or woman can remain passive in face of this new danger of a gigantic world war, desire to take their place with those who have started to organise and lead the struggle against a new war.

We call upon all men and women without distinction and without regard to their religious or political opinions, and especially all organisations, to unite against war at this critical moment. We ask all men and women of goodwill to support this Congress on the 28th July, 1932, and to join in the demonstration against those criminals who wish to provoke a new war.

Do not let us hear the reproach later that we did not understand in time the danger before us.

Let us organise resistance."

We in Britain desire to associate ourselves with the proposed International Congress in order to rouse the determined resistance of the peoples against war, and we invite all men and women of goodwill in Britain to support the International Congress and to organise resistance to war.

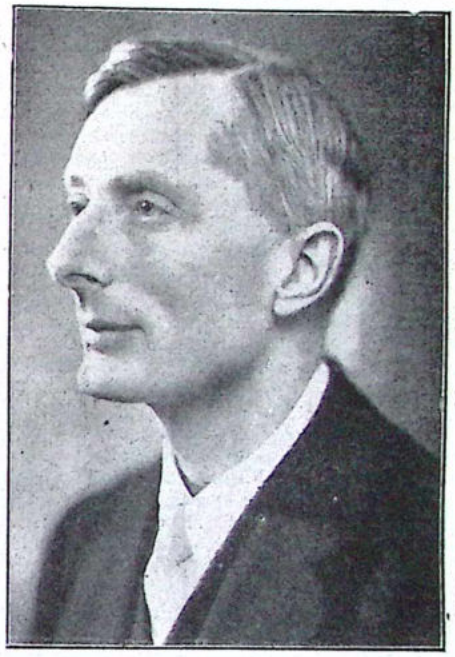
1932 ANTI-WAR MANIFESTO

Above we reproduce a photographic copy, same size, of an Anti-war Manifesto issued in 1932. The reader will see that the Duke of Bedford, then Marquess of Tavistock, name marked by us, is one of the signatories. It will be observed that the other signatories are men and women well-known in the Socialist and Pacifist movements or in the realm of radical literature. None are Fascist. Some have recanted their opposition to war. The Duke of Bedford maintains the position he upheld in 1932, on the ground that war must be opposed not less in war-time than in peace-time.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD



Exclusive Interview

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD DEFINES HIS POSITION.

Consistently, Uncompromisingly, and Unhesitatingly Opposed to All Hate Campaigns.

SUPPORTS PACIFISM: NOT FASCISM.

Demands Responsible and Drastic Amendments to 18B

UPHOLDS CIVIL LIBERTY IN WAR-TIME.

Has a Low Notion of All Parliamentary Placemen, Irrespective of Label.

When Invited by the Working-Class Movement in Britain, is Prepared to Speak for a United Pacifist-Socialist Opposition to War, in the Country, and in the House of Lords.

"What Will Be—Will Be." This somewhat fatalistic slogan is the motto of several sections of the Russell family, as recorded in the peerage. It is the motto of Betrand, Earl Russell, who is no longer a Pacifist. He has resigned himself to the motto and so accepts the fact of war. During the first Great War, Betrand Russell made a stand for conscience and free Speech. He did not believe in letting "what will be" reflections paralyse his power of protest. The first Earl Russell, born in 1792, was the third son of the then Duke of Bedford. His rebuke to Sir Francis Burdett, quoted in Why Jesus Wept, shows that "Finality Jack," as he was nick-named, was not moved by too great a respect for resignation to the fates.

"What Will Be—Will Be," is the motto of Lord Russell of Killowen; of Viscount Ampthill; of Baron de Clifford; and of Sir Alec Charles Russell, Bt. It is the motto of the 12th Duke of Bedford.

Hastings, Duke of Bedford, is B.A. of Balliol College, Oxford. At one time he was a Lieutenant of the Duke of Cambridge's Own (Middlesex Regiment). For over twenty years he has been an ardent Pacifist, because he became convinced that a Christian ought to be a Pacifist. He is not prepared to resign the world to war without a protest, and so does not accept, without challenge or question, the family motto: "What Will Be, Will Be." He thinks that a great deal of what will be, if war continues, ought not to be. He considers the wholesale slaughter that belongs to war is immoral, an offence against God and man.

The Duke of Bedford has been denounced as a Fascist because he opposes war. He deems the charge mildly humorous, because a Fascist is a militarist, and he is a definite Anti-Militarist. As a Pacifist he not only cannot be a Fascist but he is an enemy of Fascism. He is a Pacifist and an enemy of all hate campaigns, no matter in what name they are inaugurated, no matter against whom they are directed. In order that we might make this issue clear, he granted us the exclusive interview which is summarised in this article.

The title, Duke of Bedford, was created in 1694. William, fifth Earl of Bedford, was then made Marquess of Tavistock and Duke of Bedford. The story of his son's execution was related in The Word for November, 1940. In that issue we told the story of how the fourth Duke of Bedford, supported by the famous Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, opposed the French war. On that occasion Dr. Watson added to the speech made by the Duke of Bedford, an excellent one on his own account. We recalled it when considering the views placed before us by the present Duke of Bedford.

Ever ready to turn to good account the opportunities which were offered him, Watson remarked that he was not a republican, and only welcomed the writings of Voltaire, Rosseau, Helvetius, and Diderot, because, by attacking and destroying the lamentable corruptions of Christianity, they were preparing the way for the founding of an higher and truer form of the religion itself. On the other hand, he was amused by those who asserted that our war with Infidel France was both just and necessary, since it showed how great was the presumption of certain miserable mortals, who imagined that the Almighty Creator and Conservator of the Universe needed the arm of flesh to secure the reality of his existence and the honour of his law.

Watson proceeded to warn those who were unwilling to give a seasonable attention to popular requisition, by a relaxation of the reins of despotism, that opinions were not subdued, but confirmed, by persecution; that, if they imagined that war could impede the progress of democratic principles, they were mistaken, since an unsuccessful war only accelerated them, and a successful one did not stop them.

This is very much the attitude adopted by the Duke of Bedford at the present time. Our interview with him was severely practical and the Duke made it clear that he would have preferred to have issued a widespread curt statement of his views, headed "A Personal Statement." We explained that this would not have permitted so many points to be covered as could be done in an interview. It is true that the interviewer makes only a digest of the conversation, but the digest, if properly arranged, can bring home vitally to the reader a clear and snappy understanding of the views held by the interviewed.

"THE 'PRO-FASCIST' DUKE."

The Duke explained his attitude towards hate-campaigns and repudiated the accusation that he is a "pro-Fascist."

"Since the outbreak of war," he declared, "persistent efforts have been made in political circles and in the press, apart from subtly behind the scenes, to represent me as 'pro-Fascist,' or even as a man whose extreme pacifism has betrayed him into being 'pro-Fascist'—rather a curious result, one would have thought, for extreme pacifism to produce. for Fascism is essentially a militarist philosophy. I am definitely an Anti-Militarist and am therefore opposed to Fascism.

"Many of my friends and colleagues have been subjected to interference and even persecution on account of their association with the 'pro-Fascist' Duke! A plain statement of my position may be desirable in order to clear the air. Such a statement will make no impression upon those who are so enthused with war that they are not concerned with the justice of the 'pro-Fascist' label. They use it as a slogan of abuse, without regard for sense or truth, as a means of creating prejudice against me for my criticism of, and opposition to, war. As time goes on, the foolish and disastrous consequences of the appeal to arms to settle the disputes of civilisation will become apparent not only to the thinking, but also to the most unthinking of human beings. Not only as a Christian, but also as a man, as a being who ought to be rational, I feel I must stand opposed to the horror and disaster of war. I cannot pay tribute to Mars.

"Apart from the wilful slanderer, there are many who feel that certain principles of liberty and democracy are menaced, and so honestly are puzzled or misled in regard to my opinions. Even after they have read your report of your interview with me, they may find it impossible to endorse my stand for pacifism. But they may, at last, and at least, realise where I stand. That is all I ask.

"I have not accepted, without question, all the denunciations of Fascism published in the newspapers, in Government publications, and in the careerist speeches of interested politicians. I have not done so because I do not believe always publications and because I do not believe always politicians. Long experience in the battle for monetary reform has taught me, I am sorry to say, that the Press is completely unscrupulous and unreliable, and that the great majority of politicians are lacking in intelligence and sometimes, and oftentimes, also in honesty. I am opposed to press and platform campaigns of hate because they are usually at once 'fashionable' and insincere. I am no more in favour of Fascism to-day than I was in favour of Bolshevism, when the entire press was attacking the leaders of Soviet Russia, and I defended the Soviets. I would like this fact to be made known, because it is a complete answer to the accusation that I am a 'pro-Fascist.'"

DEFENDED SOVIET RUSSIA.

The Duke handed over the article that we publish on another page in defence of Soviet Russia. In doing so, he said:—

> "I see from The Word that you are rather interested in articles written many years ago. You might perhaps care to have this one of mine which I wrote in 1924, I believe. At that time, the Press and politicians were engaged in running a hate campaign against Soviet Russia, just as they now do it against Fascist Germany. You will notice that the arguments which I then used for sanity and fair play were very like those I have used in my later essays on 'Can we Trust Hitler,' and 'This Concentration Camp' Business."

THE EVILS OF FASCISM.

Returning to the question of Fascism, the Duke said:

> "The objectionable features of Fascism may be summarised as espionage and acts of brutality by police agents; the imposition of vindictive and excessive penalties on those who have incurred the displeasure of the State; imprisonment without fair trial; absence of facilities for the democratic election of a free Parliament and of democratic control of the Government after it has been appointed; and a propensity to militarism. To all these evils of Fascism I am completely opposed."

The Duke pointed out that his Anti-Militarism was definite and well-known and accepted by the Labour and Progressive movement. In support of this statement he produced the leaflet, which we reproduce exactly, by photographic method, in another column. The Duke asked us to consider the signatories to that manifesto. So far as he knew there was not one Fascist signature to it. There were the names of Trades Union leaders, some now very much pro-war; Harry Pollitt, who had withdrawn so many pamphlets and recanted so many statements of policy and fact and called his activity "Marxist realism;" Saklatvala, at one time "Communist" and Labour M.P.; David Kirkwood, Chalmers Mitchell, the distinguished scientist and Anti-Fascist; Chapman Cohen, the Freethinker and Anti-Fascist; and so on. Not one "pro-Fascist" signatory. The Duke at that time was the Marquis of Tavistock and his signature was there. Why, had it been requested? Because he was known to be a pacifist and an Anti-Militarist. This leaflet totally disproved the charge made against him of being "pro-Fascist," which, used as a term of abuse, meant that he was Anti-Labour, Anti-Progressive, and, above all, an enemy of civic liberty and an upholder of militarism.

WORLD ANTI-WAR CONGRESS.

Actually, we had reminded the Duke of the Anti-War Congress. Commenting generally on the Congress, he said:—

> "I had forgotten about the World Anti-War Congress. Looking back, the supporters seem a very mixed collection. A few of those who signed are really fine people, others have since abandoned the pacifist position."

It is interesting to note that the obverse side of this 1932 Congress Manifesto carried the following warning:—

FACTS TO REMEMBER!

World War, 1914-1918.

Killed	9,743,914
Wounded	20,927,914
Missing	3,000,000
Expenditure	£70,000,000,000

In 1931 the World was Spending £800,000,000 a Year (£2,000,000 a Day) on Armaments.

The leaflet proceeded to show that out of £1 of the British revenue, 12s. 11d. was spent on war, and only 7s. 1d. on peace, that is, health, education, unemployment, and old age. The leaflet quoted also from Hansard, May 30, 1932, Vol. 26b, No. 100, to show what exports permits had been issued by the British Government between February and May, for war material intended for Japan, to assist in the campaign of invasion against China.

The Duke defined his attitude towards the denunciations of Hitler; the failure to consider the evils of Versailles, reparations, and indemnities; the post-Armistice starvation blockade which caused such terrible suffering to Austrian women and children; the army of occupation; conditions of ruthlessness out of which Hitler and Nazism arose. He was prepared to consider all this as an explanation of Nazism before committing himself to a further campaign of hate that would but add violence to violence and so aggravate the evil.

The Duke of Bedford has dealt very thoroughly with this matter elsewhere and his plea for sane approach need not be dwelt on at great length in the present report. There is so much ground to cover; for the Duke's statement was exhaustive. One very clear point he made. The evils of Fascism, to which many politicians had paid no attention until to do so sowed the hatred propaganda which belongs to war, are domestic and have no necessary relation to the evils of war, which are the same whether those who fight are Fascists or Democrats, Capitalists or Socialists. War is a positive evil in itself, however generated. Bombed cities belong to war, not to Fascism exclusively. Concentration camps and the destruction of civil liberties belong to Fascism.

"Let us grant Fascism the full reserve of these evils, and do not let us introduce them here," commented the Duke. "Yet this is exactly what has been done. War has reduced Democracy almost to the barbarism of Fascism." The Duke added that he took his stand unashamedly and definitely by the right of full civil and religious liberty, which included the right of conscience, and the right of political liberty, even in war-time.

"Hitler's persecution of religious leaders I understand, but I unreservedly condemn it," said the Duke. "The mistaken idea that religion should have nothing to do with politics, except to uphold the State, exists throughout the world. It is extremely common in Britain. I condemn it as thoroughly wrong. Religion ought to have a great deal to do with politics, and that by way of protest and example. Conscience is not the slave of the State but the great definer of individual right in society; and conscience cannot respect nor mark time at nominal Christianity."

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

This caused the Duke to discuss the question of conscientious objectors. He said:—

"We had a party of C.O.'s over to tea, who are working with a local Forestry unit; quite nice young fellows. Some of them came from Glasgow and knew about you or had seen you. One was a keen member of the I.L.P. and a great admirer of Maxton."

CREECH JONES.

We mentioned Creech Jones, and instanced the splendid stand he took as an absolutist during the last war. We commented on his desire to serve C.O.'s to-day and on his excellent and critical speeches on Colonial questions. But we added that Creech Jones felt that the war was one for justice and that he must support it.

The Duke replied to this statement by saying: "I quite appreciate your defence of Creech Jones since you feel that he was a splendid objector and a loyal comrade during the last war. I quite understand you commending his loyalties to-day and his memory of his past. But if he supports war, and becomes identified with the injustice of war, and cannot recover his stand against the barbarism of war, he must face the censure that one day will fall on all who participate in war. Politicians who urge war are really non-combatants who sacrifice the common people. He cannot escape that censure if he supports unreservedly the war measures entailed by the present conflict."

ALLEGED ASSOCIATION WITH FASCISM.

The Duke denied that he had associated with Fascism in Britain or had sympathies with its propaganda. He said: "If I have ever seemed to my critics to have 'associated' with any form of Fascism in Britain, I can assure them that it was not because I am a Fascist or have approved of the defects of Fascism, but because I desired to inform myself about it. When examined, what has been termed my 'association with Fascism' has been association with people who, after temporary membership of the British Union of Fascists, had left it. To regard this as 'association with Fascism' is just plain silly nonsense, for persons who have left a movement usually have less sympathy with it than those who have never belonged to it; because they know about it, and although they know about it, they have found it wanting."

18B PRISONERS.

This brought the Duke to discuss the case of 18B prisoners. Some of his friends and many ex-members of the British Union had been imprisoned under 18B Regulations. Although so much fuss was made about these regulations in the House of Commons, and although they were withdrawn and altered, the alterations, in practice, made no difference.

"I have always strongly maintained that justice should be done to political prisoners. In the past, Anarchists have been prosecuted in all countries in the world, including the United States. There is the famous case of the Chicago Martyrs. At other times Socialists and Communists have been persecuted. I am opposed to such persecutions. And I am opposed also, even when the victims are ex-members of the British Union, or even members. I hold that neither members of the Left, nor yet members of the Right, ought to be persecuted.

"There can be no good reason, not even in war-time, why persons arrested should not receive a fair trial, at which those who have informed against them have to appear for cross-examination."

The Duke complained that argument against trial, and for Government by decree and prescription, was plausible, but dangerous. He gave the example of the development of the proscription during the struggle and the wars of French Revolution. This proscription, as historians have related, rose naturally out of war conditions. The important and interesting references to this historic analogy will be illustrated and detailed fully in our next issue.

JUSTICE FOR ALL.

Turning to actual Fascists or members of the British Union who are interned under 18B, the Duke said: "In so far as they are victims of injustice, I am out to demand that they receive fair treatment. I would make the same demand for Socialists, Communists, and Anarchists, if they were in a like position. I would even demand it for our ordinary Liberals and Conservatives. Of what value is a sense of justice if it is displayed only towards friends, and only in peace, and not also in war?

SIR OSWALD MOSLEY.

"Sir Oswald Mosley is a militarist and an Imperialist who puts the interests of the British Empire first and those of the rest of the world second. I am a pacifist and I put the interests of the world first and those of the British Empire second because I believe that national selfishness is as fatal to the general welfare of humanity as individual selfishness. His policy is different, therefore, from my own on exceedingly important isues. To my mind that, however, is no reason why he and his followers should not be allowed a fair trial on defined charges, nor why they or any other people should be imprisoned as suspects on vague or false charges. In his speeches and writings, Sir Oswald Mosley has directed his followers to defend their country loyally against a foreign invasion. Naturally, if he wished to co-operate with Hitler in promoting an invasion, he would not announce this fact publicly. Neither would he advocate repeatedly armed resistance. Fairness and commonsense compel me to add that it is monstrous that, without proof, a man should be interned as a traitorous suspect, merely because some Minister of State pleases to think that way. I have no use for militarism, whether the militarism of Sir Oswald Mosley, or that of the Government, but I have a deep and genuine respect for justice, and the principles of civil and religious liberty. I do not see how Government can continue unless it respects those principles."

We pointed out to the Duke that the Fascist Movement had opposed the working-class and had organised strike-breaking. He said he was prepared to consider this indictment from the standpoint of the workers and that, in any case, he did not agree with the tone of Fascist propaganda. Strike-breaking was not confined to the Fascists and some members of the present Government, and certainly many members of the present House of Commons had been in favour of Emergency Powers and strike-breaking in 1926. The Duke made a later reference to this subject.

At this stage, the Duke handed to me letters he had received from relatives and friends of victims of 18B all over the country since he became Duke of Bedford. We deal with these letters and complaints in a separate article. The Duke explained why he had done nothing in the way of taking his seat in the House of Lords.

AGAINST "THE UPPER TEN."

"Since I began to reflect on the problem of poverty, I have grown more and more apart from the so-called 'Upper Ten.' I have found more happiness since I broke with them than I knew before. My faith is in democracy and the common people. I did not see how I could reach the common people or make their will known by speeches at the present time in the House of Lords. If ever I can serve peace and justice, conscience in society, and the cause of civil and religious liberty, by taking my seat in the House of Lords, I will do so.

The Duke emphasised his opposition to "high society."

"For the last 25 years," he repeated, "I have been happier not in the company of the 'upper ten.'"

LOW NOTION OF PARLIAMENTARY PLACE-MEN

"I have developed a really low notion of parliamentary place-men. I see ex-conscientious objectors speaking of public security and upholding the imprisonment, without trial, of ex-Servicemen, men who are yet suffering from the wounds received in the last war, when they were told they were heroes, and conscientious objectors were threatened with political disfranchisement. What has become of the interested, worked-up political rage against objectors of that time? I was against that rage and hatred. I am even more against the cant that dictated it and then withdrew it and now assaults ex-Servicemen to whom that rage pandered. I believe in the need for honesty and sincerity in public life. I do not believe that the conditions of war are the best conditions for developing that integrity in public men so essential to true social progress and human happiness."

McGOVERN AND OTHERS.

The Duke referred to the Socialists, and to one or two Conservative and Liberal members, who had raised the 18B question in the House of Commons. He commented on the excellent stand made by John McGovern, James Maxton, and Campbell Stephen. He commended the speeches of Rhys Davies. But he complained that they received little notice in the ordinary press. Without press reports, parliamentary speeches were futile, for they never reached the common people. Press censorship and boycott made Parliament useless as a sounding-board. It ought not to be so but it was. Nevertheless, if those who stood for Socialism and Pacifism in the House of Commons, and the section of the working-class movement they represented, desired it, he would take his stand as their spokesman in the House of Lords.

The Duke was somewhat diffident in this matter. He did not wish to impose himself on the people as a leader, but he was willing to lead, if no one else would do so, and if a considered working-class and pacifist opinion, felt that he ought to be the voice of that opinion in the House of Lords. If he could serve the cause of public usefulness, in that capacity, he would do so. He was willing, in fact, to stand completely alone for pacifism, if it would help the cause of peace and liberty, but he did not feel that he could do so usefully at the moment. He would prefer to be part of the great movement of democracy. In the end that movement must turn against both militarism and Fascism and outlaw the terrible appeal to war. He had faith that pacifism could conquer Fascism. He also believed that there must be established, in the interest of every section of the people, even of the soldiers and the war-workers themslves, a united Socialist and Pacifist Opposition to a "War unto Victory" Government in both Houses of Parliament. Either such an opposition must find expression in Parliament or else it would find expression in the country only. The Duke felt that the Government must decide this point soon. In time the people would. The extension of the suffrage, the right of working men and women to sit in Parliament, the payment of members, all this progress of parliamentary democracy had done nothing to rid the country of the parliamentary place-men. It was as though democratic parliamentarianism had broadened the basis of militarism and corruption.

THE LABOUR PRESS.

The Duke thought that much could be done if the Labour and Socialist press took a vital stand. If it was felt that the stand for pacifism was worth while, and that a United Opposition of critical analysis and peace ought to function in both Lords and Commons, the few papers that expressed that view could say so, and so organise the movement in the country. The Peace News, the New Leader, and maybe Emrys Hughes in the Forward—his stand against war and for peace and his Court-Martials for war resistance in the War of 1914-1918 were well known—could make known his views and desire for coalition in this great struggle for the peace and citizenship of the world. The fact that the Duke had given this interview to The Word ought not to militate against a common alliance and approach.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Duke said that he was a Christian, or, at least, endeavoured to be one. He felt that the fact that he had granted the interview to one who called himself an Atheist ought not to prove an obstacle to genuine Christian support. The ordinary press did not represent true journalism and evinced no desire to report a man who declined to denounce a strike of the workers, or in time of war, denounced campaigns of hate.

The Duke felt that the religious press could and ought to do something for the cause of permanent world peace. Apart from the Society of Friends, whose record was known to all, there were the Baptists and the Congregationalists. Both had records of steadfast standings for conscience and the rights of civil and religious liberty. If this press would grant some expression to his views, if the Churches would take their stand, at least principles of peace and social justice could be defined. War was not an inspiration in itself. The ideal of civil and religious and social justice was.

We promised to assist the Duke by seeing that this interview reached the leaders of the Pacifist and Socialist movements. We undertook that it should be placed in the hands of the Council Members of the Churches, especially the Baptist and the Congregationalists.

A CHURCHILL OPPOSITION.

The Duke was emphatic that there could be no useful public life until there developed a Churchill opposition.

"I am surprised," exclaimed the Duke, "at the working-class leaders rallying round Mr. Churchill. Like Hitler, he is one of the types that war brings to the front. Churchill was made by the Boer War. He attained eminence during the war of 1914-1918. He retired to obscurity, relieved only by a brief limelight performance to return our currency to the gold standard. Above all, he played his part in the 1926 attack upon the British workers. And now, another war has earned him forgiveness for 1926 and all its sufferings, and he is the idol of the Conservative and Labour Parties. Democracy requires a Churchill Opposition, an Opposition to the 'Victory only' slogan Government. I am prepared to oppose this Government with a demand for justice for Labour and the world, an enduring social peace of principle for Europe and for all mankind."

The Duke discussed the dangers of an unbalanced, unopposed Government. Considered opposition was essential to all sane progress and well-being. It was more imperative in war-time than in peace-time, and that in a thousand and one ways, connected even with the conditions of the war effort, apart from the imperative issues of peace and social development during and after the war. He added: "I am quite prepared to lead opposition to another Versailles; but to be a leader one must have followers."

TOTAL DISARMAMENT.

After discussing the results of Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, the Duke replied: "Hitler's attack does not alter the fact that the German people are no different from any other people in that most of them are opposed to war and wish to live peaceably with their neighbours. It is very important that the working people of Britain should not allow their Imperialists and non-combatant politicians to stampede them into the idea that all Germans are a peculiarly evil race, differing from all other races or large sections of humanity, needing special treatment, and unresponsive to all suggestions of peace and social justice. The common people everywhere are the same. They are opposed to war, but trapped. The Germans, like all other people, by this time have learned the bitter lessons taught by the destructive power of modern warfare. Whatever its result, the slaughter on the Eastern Front is bound to be so great, that it will leave both the Russian and German peoples heartily sick of war. It will only need an enlightened leader to arise somewhere in the world to suggest total disarmament as one of the conditions of an all-round peace settlement. I think, therefore, that people's minds should be directed to the opportunity for securing support for total disarmament throughout the world which this extension of the war should provide."

. . . . . .

In concluding this statement of the Duke of Bedford's position, it may be fitting that we should define our own position. We believe that the Socialist and Pacifist movement should conclude an alliance to end war and should invite the Duke of Bedford to be the national voice of such an alliance. We would have him the leader of the opposition to the present Government, and so the next Prime Minister.

The Duke is unspoiled by the education he has received, and so endeavours always to get at the truth of things without quibbling. Unlike so many of our public men, he is no hypocrite. His words, and his manner of expression, define a belief in character as distinct from its counterfeit, reputation. He is an indefatigable propagandist and possesses a patient singleness of purpose. This enables him to dispense with his ancestors as with the applause of his contemporaries, and so to address himself straight to the reason or logic of the question without distraction of fear or interest. He has dignity without solemnity. He is a democrat and is handicapped by his own democracy of approach, for he has a sense of retirement, and a modesty that does not belong to the mad world of politics. He believes in Truth and he knows that Truth is unancestried, unprivileged, and alas, as yet, practically unknown.

We would prefer that the Duke of Bedford had been born in the gutter, but we do not hold it against him that he was born in another place. Some have ascended from the gutter to the Lords. He would return to the common people. A law of opposites that distinguishes a revolutionary era from a parliamentary careerist one.

We do not ask too much of any one. We accept the Duke of Bedford as a man, a comrade, and a colleague, so long as his strength permits him to travel the road of anti-militarist heresy in time of war and social crisis. He is prepared not merely to address himself to the common people in the market place if required, but to court martyrdom, if by so doing he can ease the agony now being endured by the workers of the world in this terrible conflict of capitalism. No one can do more than bear such witness.

In his stand against war, militarism, and social confusion, we pledge the Duke of Bedford our loyal support. We believe the end will mean a complete liquidation of his aristocratic rank in the movement of the common people of the world towards a new order of Socialism and peace; a true order of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity.

BLAKER, M.P.!

A STUDY IN TORY MENTALITY!

Sir Reginald Blaker, Bt., M.P., is the Tory member for the Spelthorne division of Middlesex. He is a Barrister-at-Law, so cannot plead illiteracy as an excuse for ignorance.

Sir Reginald was born in 1900 and succeeded to the baronetcy in 1926, the year of the so-called General Strike. We wonder what his attitude was towards the working-class at that time. His father was Mayor of Brighton and received the O.B.E. He was made a baronet in 1919, possibly a war honour. We must enquire.

Blaker's speech to the Annual Meeting of the local Conservative Association was reported in The Surrey Comet for June 21. Here is an extract:—

"I am not one of those who believe that when this war terminates it would be our duty to forgive and forget. For me no Versailles. I believe that our war is not against Adolf, that grotesque figure, but against the whole German people, even women and children, and I believe that we shall never have peace in Europe until we have ground them down with a severity which will be 100 per cent. more brutal than the severity they have meted out to the nations they have conquered. If you don't like that you can turn me out. For me no truck, no forgiveness, but a bitter hatred against the whole German people."

"These words," added the Comet, "were greeted with enthusiastic applause from the audience."

Neither Blaker nor his admirers seem to have heard of the great Tory lawyer, the late Lord Parmoor; or the "Fight The Famine Council," of which Parmoor became chairman. Obviously, they know nothing about the Versailles Treaty and still less about the principles of humanity to which every person in the world is answerable finally.

RICHARD CARLILE

The following comment on the 1923 edition appeared in the "Workers' Monthly," Guildford, the local organ of the Labour Party, for September-October, 1927:—

"A man is not honest who is not bold enough to be honest, and active enough not to neglect that which he ought to do. Everything in human action may be resolved into right or wrong, and even to neglect to do right is to do wrong."

These are words written by Richard Carlile, who during the 19th century played his part in the struggle for the freedom of the individual. Those who are prepared to have their complacency shaken, who admire those who, regardless of cost, are prepared to strive for that which is to them right, will find "Richard Carlile—Agitator," by Guy Aldred, a stimulating book.

They may not agree with all that Carlile wrote or with Aldred's comments thereon, but they cannot fail to benefit by reading the thought-challenging statements and actions of Carlile. The sentences quoted above deserve to be written in letters of gold in every public meeting place and private abode, though we cannot imagine any harder precept to the really thoughtful person.

Chapman Cohen's friendly comments on the 3rd edition, published in The Freethinker, will be reproduced later.

EDITOR TO READER

Last month our deficit stood at £1,836 14s. This means that since November, 1940, comrades have contributed less than £150 towards the special appeal we issued then for £1,971 11s. 3d. Every month this paper faces a loss and we are engaged also in pamphlet propaganda. This journal is not subsidised and personally we are now without funds. During July we have received only £11 3s. 3d. towards the deficit. This leaves the amount required: £1,825 10s. 9d. If every reader makes a real effort this deficit can be overcome within a month. If the effort is not made we must stop publishing. This is too great a disaster to contemplate at the present stage of the struggle for social freedom. The workers have to conquer bread, peace and freedom. The Word is the voice of their struggle.

THE SCOTTISH SECRETARIAT

At the trial for swindling of the founder of the Anti-German League in London (13/5/16), it transpired that Mr. Horatio Bottomley, the editor of John Bull, had received 50 guineas for a patriotic anti-German speech. The vice-chairman of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Pension Committee (Mr. Cyril Jackson) walked off smiling with an annual salary of £1,750.—(Glasgow News, 1/3/16.)

In their spare time they added insult to injury; they preached economy and thrift to the working classes. Mr. Mason, Tory M.P., in the House of Commons (27/6/16) declared that the working classes "are probably eating far more than is good for them." The Lambeth Poor Law Guardians cut off the Christmas egg hitherto supplied to poorhouse children, in order to give them "an opportunity of appreciating the position of national affairs." The Lord Mayor of London initiated a great Food Economy campaign with a banquet (November, 1915) where the cost for food and drink was £850—the champagne cost 12s. per bottle, and the turtle soup 2s. 6d. per plate. In February, 1916, Sir George Paish and Mr. C. J. Stewart did not hesitate to take a special train from Edinburgh to Dundee, to attend an "economy" meeting.

Thus has Capitalism, naked, undisguised, and unashamed, ruled and ravaged us during three years of the great war. May the humiliating experience bring a million recruits to the Socialist Army.

Thus ended the pamphlet. At the end, set out boldly, followed by the imprint, was an advertisement of Forward. This read as follows:—

Most of the facts given in this Pamphlet have been already published in "The Forward."

No Democrat in Scotland can afford to be without "THE FORWARD."

The facts collected by Johnston were valuable. His pamphlet was a grave indictment of The Huns at Home. The facts stand. When he wrote it, he did not expect to be, twenty years later, a member of a War Cabinet.

V.—"ENLIGHTENING THE HOODWINKED."

In Forward for September 26, 1914, the main article, on the front page, taking precedence over Thomas Johnston's famous war points that had occupied the front page formerly, was headed as follows:

THE UNDERWORLD OF EUROPEAN DIPLOMACY.

THE REVELATIONS OF DR. GRAVES, THE GERMAN SPY.

By The Editor.

"The Editor" means Thomas Johnston. It was explained that this was a review of a book by Dr. Armgaard Graves, published by McBride, Nash & Co., of New York, at$1.50. The book was entitled The Secrets of the German War Office.

Johnstone commences his review:

"Everyone in Scotland will remember the sensation caused by the arrest in the year 1912, at the Central Station Hotel, Glasgow, of a man called Dr. Armgaard Graves."

This man was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. His later mysterious release was the subject of a question in the House of Commons by Joseph King, M.P., who made himself famous by his questioning during the first Great War. McKinnon Wood, who was then Secretary of State for Scotland, and never imagined that Johnston would be one of his successors, compelled King to silence by taking refuge behind the Royal Prerogative (11/6/13).

Johnston states that this book was in the hands of the American publishers on June 1, 1914, and "forecasts the war." Johnston continues:

"and gives us some of the missing links in our chain of indictments against Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Winston Churchill as large shareholders in the cause of the current massacres of the working folk of Europe."

One must confess that Johnston cannot be said to have earned promotion by his flair for elegant writing. Perhaps he owes his success to his capacity for political forgetfulness.

Johnston is writing at a time when the alleged violation of Belgium was the pivot of British war propaganda. Johnston extracts from Grave's book evidence that France, Britain, and Russia were preparing war against Germany years before the war actually took place. It does not matter whether Johnston's allegation was correct. It does matter that, to this propaganda he owed his later status in the Labour movement in Scotland, and therefore, his present position in the War Cabinet. Aware of these machinations the Germans convened a secret conference in Germany. This was attended by Churchill and Haldane. It was proposed that Belgium and Holland should become part of a German Federation, and that Britain should control French North Africa and the Dutch East Indies.

Johnston concluded his article as follows:

"I for one, to begin with, hereby declare that I know of no mark in the bodies of Sir Edward Grey, W. C. Goschen, De Bunsen, or any of their understudies or satellites, which entitled them to gamble with the liberties and lives of me or mine."

We do not like this style of writing. It is melodramatic and insincere, the writing of a pretender. But it reads definitely. The declaration still applies for every man and woman who reads it, even though Thomas Johnston dare not make it any more, since he has become one of the satellites.

This article proved so popular among the stupid parliamentary Socialists of the nicknamed "Red Clyde," that it was issued in leaflet form at 1s. 5d. for 100 copies. It was advertised in the columns of Forward from October 10, 1914, to February, 1915, under the heading "Enlighten the Hoodwinked"

On March 20, 1915, this advertisement gives way to one of his pamphlets, Secret Diplomacy, Capitalism, and War. This was announced as ready at the week-end. Obviously, this pamphlet was inspired by the success of Johnston's "Hoodwinking" leaflet.

VI.—"SECRET DIPLOMACY, CAPITALISM, AND WAR."

"Secret Diplomacy, Capitalism, and War" by Thomas Johnston, Editor of Forward, was published at One Penny by the "Forward Printing and Publishing Coy., Ltd.," 164 Howard Street, Glasgow, in 1915. The pamphlet does not carry the date. It was an excellent propaganda pamphlet, consisting of between 5,000 and 6,000 words. It abounds in quotations. Unfortunately it served to advance the fortunes of its author rather than the emancipation of the working class.

Johnston prefixes five quotations to his pamphlet, one from a speech made by John Bright, at Glasgow, December 1858; another from a speech made by Lord Rosebery, at Glasgow, January 13, 1913; another from The Times, November 23, 1912; another from Morley's Life of Cobden; and the last from the Report to the Balkan Commission of Enquiry, by Baron D'Estournelles de Constant, Senator of France.

John Bright described how our "armies were perishing in every clime, and the precious blood of our country's children" was "squandered as though it had no price" for "some miserable intrigue" to be found hidden "in the innermost recesses of" the Foreign Office, while we "are recommended not to enquire" into Foreign Policy, because we are too common to understand it.

Lord Rosebery denounced the "vast and unknown liabilities" of Foreign Affairs, upon which "armaments must depend."

The Times wrote well. We reproduce the full quotation:

"Who, then, makes war? The answer is to be found in the Chancelleries of Europe, among the men who have too long played with human lives as pawns in a game of chess, who have become so enmeshed in formulas and the jargon of Diplomacy, that they have ceased to be conscious of the poignant realities with which they trifle. And thus war will continue to be made until the great masses, who are the sport of professional schemers and dreamers, say the word which shall bring, not eternal peace, for that is impossible, but a determination that wars shall be fought only in a just, and righteous, and vital cause."

Morley's Life of Cobden makes "a frank exposure of the Anti-Democratic and Cabalistic nature of the way in which British Foreign Affairs are conducted," comments Johnston. He quotes Lord Palmerston's words to Cobden:

"You and your friends complain of a Secret Diplomacy, and that wars are entered into without consulting the people. Now, it is in the Cabinet alone that questions of Foreign policy are settled. We never consult Parliament until after they are settled."

Baron D'Estournelles declares that, according to the War Trade, "the main duty of Diplomacy"

"is the struggle as to who shall carry off from a great rival nation, such and such a contract for guns, cannon, or ironclads, and who shall subordinate political interventions, or loans of money to army contracts."

Johnston then opens his pamphlet. He writes boldly and no one would imagine that the writer was destined twenty-six years later to be a Secretary for State in a War Ministry. He says:

There are those who believe that Secret Diplomacy is one among the prime causes of the present European carnage. . . . There are people who believe that had the foreign affairs of all European countries been conducted openly, and had they been guided and controlled by public opinion, peace would still have reigned in Europe. I believe this to be true. Had the people of Germany and Britain and France and Russia known all—all, mark you!—that was going on in the Chancelleries: had they known that their lives, their liberties, their social aspirations were being gambled with: had they known that treaties with secret clauses were being signed: that rival groups of financiers and concessionaires were quarrelling continually over the spoil of undeveloped lands, and that time and time again the powder magazines were almost exploded and Hell let loose, Europe to-day would not have rocked as with an earthquake, nor would the lurid flames of a million burning homesteads have licked upwards to the heavens, nor death and disease and sorrow have come so unexpectedly and so unbidden into the lives of common men.

Look at Europe to-day! Torn with shell and explosive mine, men, women, aye, and children, dying of wounds and starvation, ships and sailormen blown to atoms without a moment's warning, workshops and machinery wantonly destroyed, stored art treasures burned, Gothic piles become rubbish heaps, human liberty crushed back in some respects to pre-Magna Charta times, frenzied priests spitting upon the teachings of the founder of their Church, the Press (in shackles) vomiting little but hate and mendacity, and the picked strong men whom the working class mothers bore in travail, go off in the prime of life to die!

And how, pray, have these evils and these terrors come? Had some supernatural power, some great dynamic force brought this red ruin to Europe, as those who declare the war to have been "inevitable" would have us believe?

Look over Europe! Twenty nations, half-a-dozen big Powers armed on a colossal scale—armies, navies, armament factories in full blast, borrowing and lending of money for gain, merchants ever on the prowl for trade, financiers looking for cent. per cent.! Profits, profits upon profits, invested abroad wherever there be profusion in minerals or cheap raw material in cotton or labour; the agents of one set of investors running into conflict with the agents of another set of investors; and then "delicate situations," "diplomatic pressure," threats, bluff, movements of gunboats, and, occasionally, war. I do not say that all wars have been or are directly due to the clash of rival financial interests. There have been wars in the past, theological wars and dynastic wars, over Dogmas and Kings, but the day is long gone when nations of men will murder one another for the Love of God or for Bonnie Prince Charlie; nowadays they will organise murder for nothing less than fair interest upon investment and more opportunities for extending that investment, and even so the preliminary stages in the quarrel and its rather squalid and sordid aims must be carefully disguised; we must first be taught that the enemy is a scoundrel bent upon doing us an ill-turn, and that our rulers have exhausted themselves in efforts to avoid strife. Then the flag is waved: the Bible is produced: the band plays. We are off to the war!

SECRET DIPLOMACY IN THE PAST.

Secret Diplomacy, of course, is Secret Diplomacy. The tricks of the trade are hidden from the Uninitiated, but occasionally in historical literature we get a fleeting glimpse of real diplomats at work. Let us take, for example, the description given by Lord Macaulay, the historian, of the Congress of Ryswick, held in 1697, to settle the war between France, on the one side, and Holland, Britain, Germany, Spain, and the remaining members of the League, known as the Grand Alliance, on the other. The war in question had begun in 1688.

Johnston retells the story of "week after week of pompous foolery," quoted and summarised from Macauley. The reader can consult the historian direct or obtain Johnston's pamphlet for himself. Johnston turns to "Modern Diplomats," and says under that sub-heading:

But the real Kings are the great Financiers and Capitalists, and the gentlemen who conduct the delicate financial and concessionary operations for our great Banks or Brokers at foreign headquarters receive salaries which range to £11,500 per annum. We pay the salaries: but we do not select the Ambassadors or the Consuls. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs nominates them; Parliament knows nothing of them or their qualifications. It is public knowledge, of course, that they are always selected from the ruling caste in society, and the recent report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service (Cd. 7748, 1914) recommends no alteration in that respect, the "Glasgow Herald's" thankful comment being that the Diplomatic Service will rightly remain "the domain of the sons of families of position."

It is only fair to state that Eden has announced in the House of Commons that, henceforth, the posts of Ambassadors and Consuls shall be open to all. We do not believe that this concession alters materially Johnston's main argument. He explains how the modern diplomat engineers war:

"If you will turn to Morley's "Life of Gladstone" (Vol. II. pp. 330-335), you will find the story of how the Franco-Prussian War was diplomatically engineered. Bismarck gets a telegram from the Emperor of Germany—the famous Ems telegram—replying in a pacific manner to certain representations from France. He (Bismarck), is dining at the time with Generals Moltke and Roon, and their dejection is great when they hear read the contents of the telegram. But Bismarck "doctors" the telegram, striking out the pacifist sections: he communicates the abortion to the Press and to the German Embassies: it is to be 'a red rag upon the Gallic bull;' and then, says Bismarck, Roon and Moltke 'recovered their pleasure in eating and drinking, and spoke in a more cheerful vein. Roon said: 'Our God of old lives still, and will not let us perish in disgrace.'

"In Paris, on the other hand, declares Lord Morley: 'A vital document was suppressed, and its purport misrepresented. Thus in point of scruple, the two parties to the transaction were not ill-matched."

But, as a result of their joint endeavours, thousands upon thousands of peaceful working men were imposed upon, and marched off beneath patriotic flags and to martial music, to disease, mutilation, and death!

THE CASE OF EGYPT.

"Turn with me to Egypt in the early seventies of last century. Mr. Brailsford in his "War of Steel and Gold," tells us how the European irrigation contractors overcharged the Khedive's Treasury anything from 80 to 400 per cent. For floating loans to meet his expenses, the Khedive had to pay as much as 25 per cent. in interest. Of the National Debt of 68 millions, Egypt only received 44 millions, and while the nominal interest was 7 per cent., it in reality was 12 or 13 per cent. Of a loan of 32 millions raised in 1873, only 20 millions reached the Exchequer. Finally, the Rothschilds, who were behind the bandholders, foreclosed, a proceeding that Diplomacy obligingly described as Protectorate for the good of Egypt. In 1877, a year of famine, taxes were actually collected in advance from the peasants, to pay the interest on the Rothschild bonds. Sir Lucas Malet, British Ambassador, set out to organise, or at any rate to hasten, "some complication of an acute nature" that would rivet our "protection" more firmly upon the poor Egyptians, and Gladstone's Government proceeded to crush the Nationalist patriot Arabi, who is now known to have been an "honest, popular and tolerant" man, but who was then diplomatically painted as a cross between a mad Dervish and a negro cannibal; our Fleet bombarded Alexandria; we "temporarily" occupied Egypt, and Cecil Rhodes offered to subscribe funds to the Liberal Party on condition that there should be no further nonsense about evacuation. Lord Rosebery, a Liberal Premier, married a Rothschild, and we are—or rather our financiers are—bleeding Egypt still, French Finance, with all its Marchand-Fashoda complications, being bought off the field as a result of the Entente Cordiale."

In a footnote to this reference, Johnston writes:

"How delicately Diplomacy can gloss this Rothschild-Rosebery-Rhodes decision to settle permanently for spoil in Egypt, may be seen in the recently issued historical narrative by Lord Cromer (himself a Financial Diplomatist), entitled Abbas II. Thus:—

"Lord Rosebery had deserved well of his country and of Egypt. . . . He had scattered to the winds the idea that a speedy evacuation, regardless of the consequences was contemplated. He had let all concerned know that a great nation cannot lightly throw off responsibilities which it has solemnly assumed in the face of the world."

The main narrative continues:

This Entente Cordiale, of which our Capitalist Press is so proud, has a little history of its own. It dates from April, 1904, when the Anglo-French Agreement regarding Morocco was signed and published to the world. France was to recognise British predominancy in Egypt and Britain was to recognise French predominancy in Morocco. Germany growled through her Diplomacy because she had not been consulted, and because a German firm, the Mannesmann Brothers, had obtained an exclusive concession to work all the mines in Morocco from a Sultan, to whom it had lent money to suppress a rebellion. But on the face of the Treaty, there was nothing very objectionable to Germany, since all trading rights were to be respected by the French, and the Mannesmann ores would still go from Morocco to the Krupps' works at Essen. Yet, seven years later (see London "Daily News," 27th November, 1911), it was suddenly disclosed by a Parisian Journal, "Le Temps," that there were secret and hitherto unpublished causes in the Anglo-French Agreement. In articles 1, 2, and 3 of the secret Treaty, France and Britain bound themselves, if "force of circumstances" compelled either Government to change its policy with regard to its new protectorate, to support one another; i.e., to get its working class to fight if necessary, and Morocco was definitely partitioned between France and Spain. (See Dr. Holland Rose's "The Origins of the War,' pp. 70, 71, and Mr. Fenner Brockway's Pamphlet "Was Britain Blameless?") This dirty piece of manoeuvring, of course, excited German Capital. . . .

The Germans are Huns to-day. But they were brave and chivalrous Allies only a few years ago, when the Allied German and British fleets were conducting a naval demonstration against President Castro's Government in Venezuela, because bondholders in Britain and Germany were not receiving their dividends regularly. . . .

In the Far East we have Tibetan missions, opium wars, seizures of Wei-Hai-Wei and Kaio Chao seized from China by Germany on the pretext that two German missionaries had been murdered, but in reality because one Skertchley, a mining prospector, had discovered that the district was rich in minerals; and Wei-Hai-Wei, seized by Britain because Germany had seized Kiao-Chao, though, of course, Diplomacy did not state the case so bluntly. ...We saw thousands of poor Japs and Russians murdered, not for any cause of liberty or honour, but in a struggle for the ownership of the valuable Yalu timber forests, between a Japanese Company and a Russian Syndicate in which the Tsar was a large shareholder. We saw Britain "supporting" the "bully wee Japs" because she was weakening Russia at no expense to us in the Far East, and because our financiers had floated a Japanese loan at 9 per cent. interest. Incidentally, we knocked something out of Russia in the process, because "we" sold 300,000 tons of coal at high prices to Rogdestvensky's fleet.

And then, finally, to cap the whole business, we have it on the authority of Mr. Isaac N. Seligmann, the great New York Banker, that:—

"The Russo-Japanese conflict of 1904-05 was halted in a large measure because the bankers refused to float further loans at anything like ordinary terms, after probably 1,500,000,000 dollars had been wasted in the contest.

You will note that Mr. Seligmann says nothing of the lives wasted.

CHINA TO BE PLUNDERED.

See what is happening even now in the Far East. Germany has been smashed at Kaio-Chou, and immediately and secretly Japanese Capitalism tabled its demands, not upon Germany, but upon China. For a month and more Diplomacy keeps the demands secret; not a whisper about them appears in the British Press until 12th February, when the "Times" discloses the fact that there is great commotion in China over the claims made by Japanese Diplomacy on behalf of Japanese Capitalism.

Johnston sets out the demands "made by our Ally Japan upon a people who have offended them in in no conceivable way" and continues:

When Germany, last August, took forcible right-of-way through Belgium, our Diplomatists and Capitalist pressmen set up a shrill crescendo of denunciation; we heard daily about Scraps of Paper, International Honour, Viclation of Treaties, Brute Force, the Denial of a Moral Law, and all the rest of it, so that many simple-minded men were deceived into believing that the only lying and unscrupulous Diplomat was he who was born beyond the Rhine, and the only vicious, brute-force Capitalist knave was he who floated his Syndicate in Berlin. But what, pray, are our "Remember Belgium" Press Directors and Diplomats saying about this shameless Japanese piracy?

The London "Times" frankly declares that:

"In view of our relations with Japan, it would be ungracious for Britain to put obstacles in the way of Japan's reasonable enough ambitions."

The London "Daily News," after asserting that British, French, Russian and American Diplomacy knew of these Japanese demands a month ago, goes on to say that "There is no suggestion of provocation on the part of China. . . . The war is Japan's opportunity, and denied expansion in the Pacific, she turns upon China. This is hardly the time for enlarging upon the ethics of such enterprises." The "Scotsman" thinks it is "important" to draw attention to the fact that M. Sazonoff, in the Russian Duma, has announced that the Japanese claims "contained nothing contrary to Russian interests," and "Le Temps" of Paris obligingly vouches for the fact that French interests are not affected and that "the Japanese Government will have need of both the London and Paris Markets in order to profit by the advantages which it will obtain. Bases of agreement wil ltherefore not be lacking. . . . It is only a matter of economic competition."

Johnston tells the story of the Kaiser as a pilgrim:

In 1898, the German Kaiser visited the Holy Land. It was diplomatically given out that he was a Christian Pilgrim. He said so himself. "Not splendour," he declared, "not power, not glory, not honour, no earthly blessing is it that we seek here: we pine, we pray, we strive alone after the sole, the highest blessing, the salvation of our souls." But our Diplomats had been at the same game themselves and they promptly smelled out the fact that this German pilgrim had secured from the Sultan, a verbal promise that German Capitalists would be allowed to build the Baghdad Railway. Then Britain and Russia concluded an agreement to "protect" Persia—Russia collaring control of the northern and Britain of the southern portion of that country.

Look where you will over the surface of the earth, and similar struggles on similar lines will be seen, however skilfully Secret Diplomacy has obscured the issues and suppressed the salient facts. Germans acquire Dynamite and Spirit monopolies for cash bribes in the Transvaal. British Capital organise a Jamieson Raid. It fails. Then comes the Johannesburg plot of May, 1899.

Johnston proceeds to quote Lord Lansdowne's letter to General Wolseley, dated August 27, 1899. He describes the robbing and plundering of Turkey; the reorganisation of Turkish Naval Dockyards by the Armstrong-Vickers group, mentioned in the London Times, December 3, 1913; the German loan to Bulgaria and its meaning to the peasants; the conspiracies between Krupps, the armament kings of Germany, and Schneider, the armament kings of France; the false statements made by Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Asquith in the House of Commons, "time and again"; and finally the resignation of Messrs. Morley, Burns, and Trevelyvan "as a protest against Secret Diplomacy and open deception of the British public.

Johnston is not likely to follow the excellent example set by Morley, Burns, and Trevelyvan, who became, for five minutes, honest men. Even that is too drastic a sacrifice for our modern Labour placemen to make.

Johnston adds:

Nor can we even place implicit trust in the White Papers which profess to give us the diplomatic pre-war correspondence.

Johnston proceeds to expose certain falsehoods which he alleges are to be found in the British White Paper explaining the outbreak of the first World War.

Johnston concludes his pamphlet with these words of denunciation:

Money kings ever on the prowl—according to Mr. Joseph Burgess, in his "Homeland or Empire," £3,000,000,000 of British owned money invested overseas, raking in an annual tribute of £200,000,000; armament trusts seeking whom they may exploit; money talking loudest in every Parliament; aristocratic bureaucrats operating in secret, pledging your lives and mine as stakes in the game. Whichever party is in power, the doctrine of continuity in Foreign Policy—the doctrine first announced by Lord Rosebery, who married a Rothschild, and whose son is now Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs—is taken for granted. Everywhere, docile and ignorant masses, drilling, toiling, taxed—pawns on the board!

There is no hope, no way out; no remedy possible until Democracy bestirs itself and demands democratic control of every department of social activity. Mere protests against the unscrupulous international operations of the financial sharks are as old as Cobden, who clearly saw the flagrant folly of a nation allowing its financiers to lend Foreign Powers money for armaments—armaments which in turn impose the creation of "counter preparations to meet them,"—the dastardly and often murderous operations of the Colonial expansionist traders, and the knavish and lying system of secret diplomacy which disguise the deceptions and the robberies from the common people. Mere protests are useless; they are but a beating of the air. What must be if civilisation is to be saved, is complete and open Democratic control of Foreign and Home Affairs, and that complete Democratic control means Socialism.

Will Johnston explain how Socialism is served by his present position in the Churchill Cabinet?

[We have considerable data concerning Johnston's career; but we will publish this, from time to time, in separate essays.—Ed.]

BURNBANK OBJECTORS

ANTI-PARLIAMENTARIANS BEFORE GLASGOW No. 2 TRIBUNAL

Two of our Burnbank Comrades, Leigh Fisher and Robert Lyle, have been rejected as conscientious objectors by the Glasgow, South-West Scotland No. 2 Tribunal. Fisher's appeal to the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal was rejected, and the decision of the Glasgow Local Tribunal affirmed.

Fisher's case was heard on December 6, 1940, by the Glasgow Tribunal. The Chairman of this Tribunal is Sheriff J. M. Hunter, K.C., and the members are: W. Boyd, M.A., B.Sc., D.Phil.; J. Dougherty; E. Greenhill; and R. C. Reid.

Fisher stated that he objected to all forms of Military Service as well as work of National Importance. His objections were based on ethical grounds. They were also practical and political. He had held the views since 1928, when he first associated with Guy Aldred. He had belonged to the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation and, later, passed on to the United Socialist Movement.

The Tribunal recorded their decision in writing, after questioning Comrade Fisher at some length:—

"The Tribunal found that the applicant would be willing to fight if this country had a Social System and Government of which he approved, and a Capitalist nation attempted to subvert it by force of arms. The Tribunal accordingly found that he had no conscientious objections to military service as such but only to fighting for a Government and a cause of which he disapproved."

The Appeal was heard at Edinburgh on May 22, before the Lord Elphinstone, K.T., LL.D. (Chairman); Alexander Maitland, K.C., and Thomas Barrow, J.P., Hon. A.R.I.B.A. The Appellate Tribunal upheld the local decision.

Robert Lyle is a miner and ought not to be appearing before a Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal. He appeared before the Glasgow No. 2 Tribunal on May 30, 1941. The Tribunal summarised his evidence in writing as follows:—

"Objects to all forms of Military Service as well as work in Agriculture, Forestry, or Land Reclamation. Objects because it is in the interests of Capitalism, THAT IS HIS OBJECTION, and also that it is murder. Objections based on Socialist grounds. Views held for 12 years. Views formed by Socialist propaganda. Member of the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation. Would protect himself against attack. Would be justifiable to kill in self-defence, if that were the alternative. Would be prepared to defend by force of arms a social system of which he approved, if that system were attacked. A Socialist for 12 years, has held meetings and has been actively engaged in Anti-War propaganda. Would have fought in war against Franco had be been a Spaniard."

As we go to press, Lyle is waiting on his Appeal Tribunal.

Fisher and Lyle both put forward splendid fighting cases. They are entitled to the fellowship and solidarity of the working class movement.

Comrades who wish to join the United Socialist Movement should send penny stamp to Ethel MacDonald, Secretary, U.S.M., 106 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

SOVIET RUSSIA: A SANE OUTLOOK

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The following article was written by the Duke of Bedford in 1924, when he was Marquis of Tavistock. It was a plea for sanity and answers fully those who consider that the Duke of Bedford is "pro-Fascist" because he pleads for a sane understanding of the German question to-day. The Duke is a pacifist and an enemy of all hate campaigns. When he wrote this essay, a hate campaign was being directed against the Soviet Union. The essay was published in 2 papers at the time. It was entitled: "A Sane Outlook on the Russian Problem." The essay is reproduced from the original MS.—Ed.

The fact that I have never been to Russia and cannot even speak the Russian language might, under ordinary circumstances, cause me to hesitate to write this article. I do so, however, without the slightest hesitation because the voice of those who are in a position to speak with authority about Russia is never being heard in this country; whereas countless people whose ignorance is as great as my own are laying down the law in the most dogmatic fashion and are aspiring to guide public opinion along very dangerous paths.

We are told by people who should be well-informed that one of the two greatest war-dangers in the world at the present time is the widespread belief in Russia and the Near East that England is preparing an attack on the Soviet Republic. From such dark fears, however ill-founded, the spirit of conflict is bred. There are fools enough in both countries to light the fuse if only the powder be dry and, by the hoary lie of national honour at stake and need for self defence, fling the people of the British Empire who desire aggressive war as little as they desire the moon, against another nation whose rank and file, more perhaps than those of any other country in the world, dislike fighting beyond their own boundaries.

Let us examine the sources from which we get the information upon which our opinions are based. More than ninety per cent. of what appears in the Press is not worth the paper it is written on: it is the purest (or impurest) propaganda, often consisting of those half-truths which are the most pernicious form of lying. The only views about Russia that are worth sixpence are those expressed by level-headed people who are recent visitors to the country and have gone there in a friendly spirit and yet with noses free from the incubus of rose-coloured spectacles; people, for choice, who can speak the language and who knew Russia before the Revolution. A man whose experience of Russia is confined to one brief and recent visit is likely to make the mistake of comparing conditions in present-day Russia only with those of present-day England and of failing to understand and rightly interpret much in the character and conduct of the people. The few properly qualified witnesses to whose reports I have had access all agree that the leaders of the Revolution are for the most part sincere men, and the use of the power of office for personal gain is regarded by them as disgraceful. Many in the past have suffered persecution for the sake of their principles, including the terrors of Siberian exile.

While there may be little hope of a return to foreign owners of money or property confiscated during the actual Revolution, the Soviet Government and firms trading under its aegis are in their commercial dealings singularly honest, and bad debts are almost unknown.

Although greatly handicapped by lack of money owing to the war, to internal upheaval and to disastrous seasons in the agricultural districts brought about by abnormal weather, the Soviet Government is attempting to do, and has already done, much for education, for agriculture, and for industry. The virtual transfer of the land to the peasants has been warmly welcomed and has rendered them on the whole willing to submit to a good deal of restraint and control.

Of political and personal liberty, as we understand it, there is very little, and religious bodies are regarded with disfavour and are subject to many restrictions. Finally, the occurrence of serious cruelty during the Revolution is not to be disputed.

Assuming that this summary of the position in Russia is substantially correct, what conclusions should we draw and what should be our line of conduct?

We are told that the Russian leaders are possessed of sincerity and freedom from selfish ambition. Whatever faults may accompany them, these are two great virtues, not over common among the politicians and statesmen of Western Europe. We are also told that the Soviet leaders have in the past suffered for their principles; they are therefore likely to have been rendered harsh, bitter and obstinate, more especially as they have grown up in an environment where liberty was wanting, education was largely unknown, and social injustice was rampant.

The present rulers of Russia are denounced in this country because they were cruel: because they refuse to recognise financial obligations entered into under the Czar's régime, because they have substituted one tyranny for another and failed to secure prosperity for their nation; because they are anti-religious; and because they send foolish and inflammatory propaganda into foreign countries.

These objections might be answered in one brief and homely sentence, "Why the dickens should you expect anything else?" It is the height of unreasonable folly to judge and condemn the Soviet leaders as though they had been brought up with all the advantages of English education and English political liberty. Of course the Soviet leaders were cruel: men brought up as they were brought up, men who have suffered as they have suffered, always are cruel and violent and extreme when at last the tables are turned upon their oppressors. It may be very sad and shocking, but unfortunately it happens that way and always has happened. It is simply cause and effect and human nature.

To expect them to recognise financial obligations entered into under a system they detested and despised is to expect too much. How could one hope for such consideration from ill-educated men sore and angry, embittered by the armed expedition sent against them, and flushed with new power and their heads filled with wild schemes for the social reorganisation of an impoverished country?

That they failed to establish political freedom is again only natural: men who have never known freedom, except in theory, always, when power comes to them, yield to the very strong temptation to assume the role of benevolent autocrats, protecting the rank and file of their fellow-countrymen, so they believe, from subtle hostile influences and from the effects of their own ignorance of what is good for them.

To expect the Soviet Government to create prosperity in Russia in so short a period is to ask more than is reasonable. The reports of distress are often exaggerated or unfair in so far as they represent as universal, troubles which are really local. No allowance is made for the effects of the war; for the phenomenally bad seasons already alluded to; for the rather low intelligence and conservative habits of the Russian peasants; nor for the fact that even under the Czar's rule the standard of living was extremely low and, in spite of the great export trade in grain, the wolf was often at the door.

That the Soviet Government is bitterly anti-religious is again the most natural thing in the world, as some of our worthy clerics might more easily realise if they cultivated a bit more of their Master's generous spirit and balanced outlook. The Orthodox Church in Russia, before the Revolution, was appallingly corrupt. Religion there was in plenty, Christianity it was hard to find. Mighty churches, richly decorated, towered above the hovels where the people dwelt. The leaders of the Church were on good terms with the ruling class; never a word of protest against Siberia, nor any clear direction that privilege carries with it a duty of service. The Soviet leaders saw in the religion around them a great organised hypocrisy, and it is not unlikely that Christ's judgment may have tallied remarkably with their own. Jesus Himself they regarded as a poor figure; an unpractical visionary, dangerous if He were taken seriously: that, too, was natural: only those who have had close personal experience of really Christian individuals can be expected to understand the truth and power that lie behind the startling paradoxes on which our religion is largely based. I have known many a Communist and Socialist in my own country whose heart is perhaps better than his head; who, coming across, in his rather limited experience, much false religion and hardly any true, has thrown the baby away with the bath water and pronounced all religion "the opium of the people."

Lastly there is the propaganda grevance. Well are not we continually issuing propaganda ourselves when we send Christian missionaries to foreign lands? Do not the Anglo-Israelites and the Mormons and various other earnest but more or less misguided people issue propaganda? Granted that Bolshevist propaganda is often partly mistaken in aim; almost wholly futile in suggested methods; and supremely fatuous in expression, we must remember that it is the religion and honoured gospel of those who send it forth and that there is abundant excuse for their errors of belief.

The Soviet leaders may talk wildly, as it is customary for men in their position to talk, but their bark is likely to prove worse than their bite. Their hands are more than full with the administration of a great but none too wealthy country, whose people are constitutionally averse to war outside their own dominions. The hard discipline of experience in the handling of men has very much to teach them, and we can well afford to wait quietly while their lessons are being learned. When you are dealing with courageous and embittered men the acme of stupidity is to answer threat with threat, or to try and send them to Coventry. The policy of the late Government has been disastrous in its effects and the mischief done will take many years to undo. They acted like a man who, when some powerful and highly strung animal has to be tamed, loses his nerve, hits the creature and bolts out of the cage leaving it ten times more suspicious than before and ten times harder to handle.

When a great country is going through a difficult crisis the last thing to do is to try and make her feel an outcast. It will delay the time when her leaders begin to act more sanely. Without being foolishly confiding you should take every opportunity of establishing contact, partly that there may be an infusion of wiser ideas, partly that it may pay the Government less and less to be on bad terms with England.

The religious situation in Russia is also nothing to get excited over. While we may sympathise with suffering fellow-Christians and pray that, if it be compatible with the advancement of God's Kingdom, their time of trial may speedily be ended, it is well to remember that few things are so good for the quality of a Church as persecution. It was persecution that made the early Church a living power during the first three centuries of its existence, and it has been lack of persecution that in the ensuing 1600 years have done so much to spoil it.

The moon is not disturbed by the dogs that howl at her; indeed, did she possess an aesthetic sense, she might even be grateful to them for removing some of the floating carrion that mars the purity of her reflection in wayside pools. In the same way, God is not likely to be inconvenienced by atheist propaganda, and if a few simple minds are temporarily led astray, they will be brought back when fuller truth is revealed in the Hereafter. Even the prohibition of the teaching of religion to children in classes is far from being an unmixed evil. I have sometimes thought that we might have more true Christianity in England if a similar rule were enforced here. Young people would come to the faith far more freely if their minds had not been poisoned by the lamentable activities of bad teachers utterly unqualified in mind and character.

Reform your casual wards and your treatment of the unemployed: remove your slums and do not be unfair to native races, and propaganda will then only appeal to the selfish and the crafty, who can be ignored, because they do not possess the qualities necessary to secure a following of men sufficiently numerous to constitute a danger to the State. By trying to exclude propaganda you not only encourage the Russian Communist Party to believe that there is something very formidable and very wise about its ideas, but you also produce among discontented minds in your own country that thirst which exists for every kind of literature that is banned, either on moral or on political grounds. If you wish to take the heart out of a propaganda campaign in the shortest possible time there are two sure ways of doing it: the first is ridicule and the second is indifference.

UNITED STATES CITIZENSHIP

The question whether allegiance to conscience, when that conscience dictates war resistance or anti-militarism, is secondary to allegiance to the State, was considered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at the end of June, 1930, in connection with two applications for naturalisation.

The Court reversed the decisions of the Connecticut and New York District Courts and ordered that the two persons concerned should be admitted to American citizenship. They were:—

Miss Mari Deverill Bland, of Canadian birth who nursed American soldiers in France during the war. Her father, the Rev. E. M. Bland, was, at the time of application, the Rector of Kirkby Underwood, Bourne, Lincolnshire.

Dr. Clyde Macintosh, a Canadian Professor of Theology at the Yale School of Religion.

The lower courts rejected their applications for naturalisation because of their pacifist views, which prevented them from taking the oath to bear arms against an enemy of the United States.

Dr. MacIntosh, during the Great War was a chaplain with the Canadian troops. He maintained that he could not promise to bear arms unless he felt the cause was just.

Miss Bland said that her conscience as a Christian would not permit her to swear to bear arms. She was willing to go to the front to nurse the wounded.

The Court of Appeals pointed out that Dr. MacIntosh apparently was willing to give the United States all the allegiance he ever gave or could give to any country; but "he could not put his allegiance for the government of any country before his allegiance to the Will of God.'

The Court emphasised that there was a distinction between morally justified and unjustifiable war as recognised by international law.

Its decision, which was to its credit as a juridical body, meant the right of the individual to decide the matter for himself, even in war-time.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I am interested to see that in the June number of "The Word" you have given so much space to some of our Baptist doings.

I am glad you put in the bit about our addition to the five points in our Report, when we insisted on full religious freedom. We felt at our Assembly that it was worth emphasising that, and I was authorised to strengthen that paragraph, which in the final form now reads:—

"The Council accept, as the writers do, the Five Peace Points suggested by the Pope, but would add as in their view essential the right of all men and nations to full religious liberty. The reference to 'the real needs and just demands of nations and populations and racial minorities,' while it may be taken to imply religious freedom and respect for the rights of religious minorities, is not in our opinion sufficiently explicit and we desire to emphasise the need of such liberty as essential for any real and lasting peace."

In view of your own strong line on the subject of civil and religious liberty, I thought that you might like to know of this amendment.

You are certainly making up for any lack of understanding in that first reference to us to which I made a mild demurrer and it is generous of you to do so.

With my good wishes,
Yours very sincerely,
M. E. AUBREY
(General Secretary, The Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland).

June 19, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—I have just finished reading "Richard Carlile;" and I felt I must write and express my appreciation of this stimulating and vigorously written work; to which I have looked forward for some months. It fully comes up to my expectations, and I must congratulate you on the detailed and factual treatment of the subject.

The chapter "Jail Wisdom," is a veritable treasurehouse of virile and thought-provoking statements. So is the chapter summarising Carlile's speech from the dock. The illustrations, though not always germane to the subject, help to create a period atmosphere.

I was very interested to learn that Carlile and Eliza spent some seven years at Enfield; if possible, should like to make a pilgrimage to the spot; as it is quite near I wonder if you have any further information as to the exact locality as to whether the "fine spreading yew" still survives: as to whether there is any memorial, etc.

One more point, I am well acquainted with the works of Paine, but have not yet come across Palmer's "Principles of Nature." Can you tell me where this is obtainable?

One minor mistake: First Forword, penultimate line. Is it not, "Rationalist Press Association?"

Thanking your once more,
Yours fraternally,
C. C. SIMMONS.

GLASGOW ANARCHIST OBJECTOR

Refused A.R.P. Battle Dress.

Because he refused to put on the battle-dress issued to the A.R.P., a Glasgow conscientious objector, Lewis Gordon, 7 Dryburgh Gardens, Glasgow, N., was suspended from A.R.P. duties as a driver.

The local Tribunal removed his name from the roll of conscientious objectors. On July 17, the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal upheld this decision.

Gordon told the Appellate Tribunal that he was an Anarchist and totally against war, but had joined the A.R.P. to help people hurt in raids. When he was issued with battledress, he refused to wear it. Battledress was a symbol of compulsion and not service.

To our mind the decision against Gordon cannot be defended, and ought to be recalled.

18B. PRISONERS

JOHN BECKETT, Ex-M.P.

Sketch made by a fellow-detainee at Huyton. Beckett is now detained in the Isle of Man.

The question whether, even in time of war, citizens should be imprisoned without charge or trial, is one of supreme constitutional importance. Its urgency is obscured by the fear that is manufactured by war. The fear is a dangerous anti-democratic weapon in the hands of the Executive. It is amazing that persons claiming to be Socialists—even political placemen and parliamentary careerists, who use the term merely as a cover behind which to advance their personal mean and sordid ambitions—should acquiesce tamely in such a state of affairs. For Socialism means justice. Socialism really stands for Liberty, Equality, Fraternity. Socialism does: not the penny-a-line professional journalists and parliamentary self-seekers.

The constitutional question interests us as a Socialist, and concerns us as a citizen. It intrigues us as a student of law and jurisprudence, and as one who loves the study of political struggle. From every angle—law, scholarship, and the moral feeling of the rights of man—we hold such detentions to be wrong and indefensible. As wrong as the persecution of Socialists, Communists, Anarchists. We are opposed as much to the persecution of real or alleged reactionaries as we are to the persecution and oppression of open or avowed revolutionaries. Our study of history, and our years of imprisonment, have taught us that all persecution of man by man is wrong. Some day it must cease.

Within this persecution, called protective custody, is another issue: that of treatment. Our information is not too clear on this matter. Many complaints have reached us concerning the conditions under which the 18B Prisoners are detained. Some of the letters received give appalling and intolerable details. Making every allowance for exaggeration—and we know how to think as a prisoner, how to allow for the exaggeration of the prisoners' approach to conditions—we say that the complaints ought to be examined.

The detainees are not even political prisoners, in the sense of being convicted persons. They are merely suspects, against whom the Home Secretary seems to feel he could not maintain a charge. Their detention means the acceptance by the Executive, in the name of democracy, of the principle of preventive arrest and custody. This is an odious idea. Since it is in operation, the question of how the prisoners are treated arises.

In 1872, an International Prison Conference was held in the Hall of the Middle Temple, London. At that Conference, the representative of the Italian Government, Count A. de Foresta, proposed that persons guilty of political offences not implying great moral perversity, should be kept in simple detention, apart from common criminals. It was stated that Germany had already recognised this principal of Custodia Honesta. The resolution was carried unanimously.

It should be added that this principle was maintained by the Kaiser and honoured by the German Republic. Hitler and his colleagues benefitted under this principle, and then abolished it the moment they came to power. Their conduct, in this respect, prepared the way for the inconsiderate detention of 18B prisoners in Britain.

In a letter to Professor George Sigerson, M.D., Member of the Royal Commission of Prisons, 1887, and referred to by Professor Sigerson, Mr. James Bryce, Professor of Civil Law at Oxford, then Ambassador at Washington, says:

"We all feel the difference between the ordinary criminal and those whose treatment you describe . . . ordinary prison discipline is incomparably more severe and painful to the persons sentenced for offences of this nature than it is to the ordinary thief or forger."

Speaking in the House of Commons on March 1st, 1889, Mr. Gladstone said:

"I know very well you cannot attempt to frame a legislative definition of political offences; but what you can do and what always has been done is this: You can say that in certain classes of the imprisoned, a person ought not to be treated as if he has been guilty of base and degrading crime . . . Though sensitiveness to indignities of this kind may be a matter on which men will differ according to their temperament and their ideas, yet such sensitiveness is rather to be encouraged than to be repressed, for it appertains to that lofty sentiment, that spirit which was described by Burke in animated language when he said: 'The spirit which feels a stain like a wound.'"

We now pass to

PRISON REGULATIONS NUMBER 243A.

"In the case of any offender of the Second or Third Division, whose previous character is good, and who has been convicted of, or committed to prison for, an offence not involving dishonesty, cruelty, indecency, or serious violence, the Prison Commissioners may allow such amelioration of the conditions prescribed in the foregoing rules as the Secretary of State may approve in respect of the wearing of prison clothing, bathing, hair-cutting, cleaning of cells, employment, exercise, books, and otherwise. Provided that no such amelioration shall be greater than that granted under the rules for offenders of the First Division."

The effect of this clause was explained by Mr. Churchill, the present Prime Minister, in the House of Commons, on July 20, 1910. As Home Secretary, he informed the House:—

"That rule enables the Home Secretary, in virtue of the various Acts which he has to administer, to relieve certain prisoners not guilty of any acts involving moral turpitude. I propose to relieve them of the necessity of wearing prison clothing, of being specially searched, and of being compelled to take the regulation prison bath. I also propose to enable the offenders in the Second Division to be permitted, under certain circumstances, to obtain food from outside, to exercise freely, both in the morning and in the afternoon, to converse with other prisoners when taking exercise, and to have at their own expense, such books, not dealing with current events, and such literature as are in accordance with the public interests."

Replying to a supplementary question, he added:—

"By moral tuptitude, I mean offences involving dishonesty, indecency, gross violations of morality, or cruelty."

The Prison Act, 1877, Section 40, provided that a person convicted of seditions, libel or sedition may not be treated as a misdemeanant of the First Division. This was amended by the Prison Act of 1898, 61 & 62 Vict. C.41, S.6(5). In Scotland the political offender of this category became a Civil Prisoner, and in England he became a prisoner of the 1st Division. Later Acts varied this, in event of the prosecution being made under Emergency Powers Acts.

If considered treatment, and honourable imprisonment, applies to the convicted political prisoner, surely it ought to be secured, by right, to the unconvicted political prisoner.

When the Duke of Bedford succeeded to his title it was expected that he would proceed immediately to take his seat in the House of Lords. At that time, he did not see what useful purpose he could serve by so doing. But the friends of a number of 18B detainees wrote to him and asked him to raise the question of their detention in the House of Lords. He communicated details of most of the cases to various members of the House of Commons, and some questions were asked, with little useful result. At the interview reported in another column, the Duke passed the correspondence over to us and requested that we make the facts known to our readers. As a disciple of Richard Carlile, and a believer in Freedom of Speech and of the Press, we cannot see what else there is to do.

None of the Duke's correspondents, that is, the closest friends of the persons interned, or persons who had been interned, or released, denied the need for 18B legislation. This fact impressed us, because we do not believe in the necessity for such legislation. The Duke of Bedford seems to think that, even if persons were arrested without charge, the detention ought not to be indefinite, and some charges ought to be made at a later date.

The complaint of his correspondents may be set out as follows:—

1. Questionable mode of application.
2. Questionable Police methods, in some instances.
3. Punitive Treatment in Detention or Prison.
4. Delay in Formulating Charges.
5. Inequality of Treatment.

A number of the correspondents stated that the application of 18B Powers was left to the discretion of local Police Authorities for selection in too many instances, regardless of their qualification to judge political subjects. It was felt that this was contrary to the history, the traditions, and the experience of the first principles of law and justice.

The correspondence showed that there were many instances of courteous and considerate treatment by the police. But there were also numerous cases of lack of consideration.

The complaints may be summarised as follows:—

1. Arrested men and women given no opportunity to collect clothes or to inform relatives. Several days elapsed after arrest before most were able to inform their relatives of their whereabouts. Wives, children and other dependents were left destitute.

2. Handcuffed on arrest or when moved from one place to another.

3. Finger prints and photographs taken as in the case of convicted prisoners. Confined in Police Cells with only one blanket for several nights.

The complaints about the police methods was illustrated in the treatment of Lieutenant Evans and Captain Budd. Lack of consideration is alleged:—

(1) Lieut. Evans, taken from his regiment, put in local police cell in uniform; from thence transferred to prison in handcuffs.

(2) Bentinck-Budd. Captain and Adjutant, arrested at his military station. A private of the same unit was also arrested at the same time, and these two in uniform were taken to prison handcuffed to each other.

We do not follow entirely these complaints. The handcuffs could have been omitted. Whether the uniforms ought to have been exchanged for civvies we cannot say. This complaint depends on the angle of approach and we do not think it matters. We have worn handcuffs on railway stations and been part of a chain-gang and so write from experience. This complaint does not move us unduly.

It is stated that in two cases, that of Foden of Manchester, and Rose of Norwich, faked evidence was produced. These charges call for investigation.

The conditions of correspondence mean that the detainees are treated worse than political prisoners of the First Division. Two letters per week, of one page, limited to 24 lines, with instructions to write large, under penalty of losing letter without notification, constitute an outrageous condition of uncharged detention. Visits are limited strictly to one per week. All this, added to the vague nature of the charges, means prevention of opportunity to obtain evidence in support of one's defence against charges.

Whether these conditions still obtain we cannot say. One correspondent described the daily routine of the detainee at Liverpool Prison and asked if it were not punitive.

6.0 a.m.—Bell rings to waken men.

7.0—Doors opened. Slop out basins, etc., at lavatory. (N.B.—one lavatory to each floor 36 cells.)

7.30—Breakfast. Tea and 2 slices of bread and margarine and a little porridge. Cells locked.

9.0—Walking exercise in prison yard. In pairs.

10.0—Sewing mail bags. Talking permitted but not too loudly.

Noon—Locked in cells.

12.30—Lunch. 1 dish of skilly or something similar, one slice of dry bread and water. Cells locked.

2.0—Walking exercise again.

3.0—Sewing bags again.

4.0—Back in cells and locked in.

5.0—Supper. Tea, bread and cubic inch of cheese.

From now till 6.30 a.m. locked up in cells alone.

Cells remained locked during air-raids.

Many of the complaints about prison conditions do not impress us. We have experienced prison conditions and understood this phase of the complaint. Actually, the complaints on this score were directed against the fact of imprisonment itself. Hardships belong to prison life that ought not to be tolerated in a decent society. Yet many of the folk imprisoned would have consented to their continuance without demur, had they not experienced them. Once released, what protest will they severally and collectively make against prison life? As we read this correspondence, we felt that many of the internees ought to have attacked imprisonment and the prison system in happier days, when the notion of suffering imprisonment personally was foreign to their thoughts.

This reflection does not apply to the letter that informed the Duke that no consideration was given to the ill-health of detainees. An aged man of 74 years, it is said, died in Liverpool Prison after 12 days of detention. One other over 70 was released because he was dying. Cases of claustrophobia contracted through shell-shock in the last war were refused the relief of having a cell door unlocked in spite of constant appeals even during air raids.

One detainee gave a "remand" prisoner a a cigarette. Punishment awarded was: 1 day bread and water and 7 days "loss of privileges," which amounts to solitary confinement.

Nevertheless, this correspondent insisted that the conditions at Liverpool were a considerable improvement over those that obtained at Wandsworth Prison. The conditions here were more punitive than those accorded to sentenced prisoners.

Another detainee talked to his fellows, while sewing mail-bags; and a third, while looking out of a cell window, saw his mother in the prison yard. He called out to her and waved. Punishment in each case was 2 days' bread and water, and 14 days' loss of privileges, which amounts to 14 days' solitary confinement. Sitting behind the Treasury Benches in the House of Commons are a number of men who complained about such conditions in 1916-1918. If they like, we are prepared to name every such member and to challenge each on his prison-punishment record. Inhumanity remains inhumanity, no matter what may be the religion or the politics of the victim.

As to the cruelty of excessive solitary confinement, that was exposed in the Labour-Co-operative paper, Reynold's Illustrated News, on Sunday, January 1, 1933. We draw attention to the Reynold's article because, when these conditions are mentioned in Court, the judges sometimes dismiss them with a shrug and a sarcastic comment. From this valuable exposure published by our contemporary, we make these excerpts:—

"Startling disclosures of a serious state of unrest in many local prisons, particularly in the London district, have come to light as the result of a special

"Not only is ugly bad temper spreading among the inmates—at some gaols it is stated to be at breaking point—but discontent is said to be sapping the morale of the prison officers themselves, whose duties under the best of conditions are often extremely trying and an acute strain. . . .

"Reports of hunger-striking are frequent. Three men are said to be following this extreme line of protest at Wandsworth Gaol, one of them having been forcibly fed during the last three weeks. . . .

"Conditions vary in different prisons, but in some districts the wretched men are spending, on the average, nearly 19 hours out of the 24 in the torture and misery of solitary confinement.

"Prison reformers, such as members of the Howard League, and the Commissioners themselves, are thoroughly disheartened at the turn of affairs. After years of steady progress from the cold inhumanity of Victorian days, the clock has been put right back. . . .

"In some prisons locking-up time is from 4.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m., 14 hours at a stretch, with another two hours in the cell from 6.30 a.m. to 8.30 a.m. for cleaning-up and breakfast. Dinner means a further hour.

"Then there are the dreary week-ends. The warders must get their half-days off, and so, therefore, must the prisoners, which to them means more weary hours pacing up and down the narrow and bare little room.

"And, of course, our being a Christian community, Sunday is a day of "rest!"

Apart from the brief spells for exercise and for the service, the prisoners have the whole of their time to meditate on the thrilling events of the week—pacing up and down! . . . Suffering is being inflicted on those who have broken the law, to a degree which a civilised State has no right to exert."

It is obvious that, since the 18B prisoners are only political suspects, the same suffering is being inflicted on those who are not accused of breaking the law, but are suspected of maybe inclining to do so under certain futuristic conditions that may never operate. Such prisoners, if such prisoners must be, are entitled to honourable political detention.

The Isle of Man Internment may remove some of the grievances on the score of health and close confinement. Much depends on the conditions. The best conditions are no reply to the sense of injustice.

Mr. Claude Hawks, M.Inst.R.A., Registered Architect, served as Sapper, Royal Engineer, 82036, France and Belgium, 1915-1919. His daughter, Mrs. Burdett, otherwise known as Olive Hawks, was arrested on May 23, 1940. She was accused of having spoken strongly in favour of a negotiated peace. When her father wrote the Duke of Bedford on December 27, 1940, she was interned still.

It is impossible to list all the cases. There is also the difficulty that some of the complainers may be released. One of the released is a man named Raymond Merriman. He was released in March, 1941, after seven months' incarceration, without explanation.

Frederick Bowman, of Liverpool, lived with his mother. She died whilst he was in prison. During her last illness he was refused permission to attend her, either on parole or with escort, and he was denied permission to attend her funeral. This consideration has been shown to convicted prisoners.

J. Thompson, of London, was not allowed to attend the funeral of his wife and child, who were killed in an air-raid.

Among the persons now interned in the Isle of Man is Albert Eugene Turner. He was arrested on June 17, 1940. He was kept at Bow Street Police Station, London, for 8 days. He was then removed to Brixton Prison. His wife was allowed to see him there for ten minutes after she had waited one-and-three-quarters' hours for the interview. That same week he was taken to Liverpool Prison. His wife was without word for fourteen days. Later he was removed to Ascot and then to Huyton Camp, near Liverpool.

In August, 1940, Turner appeared before a Tribunal in London. He was accused, according to his wife's statement, of being involved in an incident at the State Cinema, Croydon, when he is supposed to have said he was a Fascist. He denied this and offered to produce evidence to establish, beyond question, the fact that he had not entered that cinema since war began. He knew it was hard to prove a negative, but he offered to do so.

In a letter to the Duke of Bedford, Mrs. Martha Turner writes:

"There is no more loyal Englishman than my husband. He was a soldier in the 1914-1918 war. If he were an enemy of the country, would he have allowed our daughter to join the army? She has been in the A.T.S. since the day war commenced."

John Beckett is well known as the I.L.P. member who ran away with the mace. On another occasion, he shocked the House of Commons during an unemployment debate, by throwing down an ex-serviceman's medals. Labour M.P.'s complain that he is unstable politically. This hardly justifies internment. Some men have attained Cabinet rank through instability. At one time Beckett was a member of the Hackney Borough Council with Herbert Morrison. Both figure in Who's Who.

Beckett is interned now at the Isle of Man. Previously he was at Huyton, Liverpool. Here another internee sketched him. We reproduce the picture.

At Stafford Prison, Beckett made a strenuous fight for the application of 18B regulations. For this offence he was given three days bread and water and solitary confinement. He protested against this, and was sentenced to a further seven days' punishment. This punishment was inflicted, although he was sick.

During this period, his wife had travelled from London to see him, with a special permit. She was refused admission and had to return to London without seeing him.

CONSCIENCE AT THE BAR

NEWCASTLE SOCIALIST CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR FAMILY

FATHER AND TWO SONS-ATHEIST-SOCIALIST-ABSOLUTE RESISTERS

John Morley, his wife, and their Son, Robert. The dog is named "Ginger."

Our Comrade, John Morley, was arrested on Tuesday, July 1, 1941. He is at present in Durham Jail serving the sentence of 3 months' imprisonment imposed upon him on May 30 last.

In his statement, published below, Comrade Morley described the farcical attempt made to distrain on his home in June. A second attempt was made, prior to his arrest. The last word sent by him to his family is that he was able "to take it."

In the February "Word" we mentioned the case of Robert Morley, John Morley's son, who was arrested in December, 1940, for refusing to register, and also for refusing to attend Medical examination. Like his father, Robert Morley is an Atheist and a Socialist. So also is Robert's brother, Alan, who has been called up for medical examination. He also refused to register and is waiting arrest. Meantime, Robert has served his sentence and is now home, waiting further developments.

John Morley published a short letter in the January, 1931 issue describing the strong anti-war attitude of himself and his family. They are Socialists and Atheists, and they hold that Socialism and Atheism should mean humanism, pacifism, resistance to war, and social revolution, not through war, but through the destruction of war.

Following is the statement of the absolute and uncompromising stand John Morley wishes to have made known to readers of this journal.

OPPOSING WAR ABSOLUTELY

BY JOHN MORLEY

I have no paper cuttings of my experiences as a C.O. during the last war because I made no public appearances, apart from the formal Police Court proceedings, when after arrest by the police, I was charged and remanded to await a Military escort.

I adopted the same attitude myself, as I have since argued is the only logical attitude a C.O. can take in regard to any Conscription Acts, that is, to ignore them entirely.

War is the greatest immorality that man has ever perpetrated on the world, and Conscription being the necessary means for procuring sufficient support of man-power possible it follows that a moral person must refuse to assist in any way in perpetuating this immorality.

War is immoral, not only from a strictly religious point of view, because it violates some sacred doctrine of religion, or even because it violates the sanctity of human life and robs man of his liberty and personality.

War is immoral because it violates the purely commonsense and realist view of morality as that which is good for society as a whole.

Modern war cannot possibly be good for society because it destroys all that should make for the benefit of humanity, both morally and materially, and it is utterly incapable of achieving any of the good that some of its supporters may desire to achieve. It follows, therefore, that a person with any real sense of morality must oppose war and all its instruments, such as Conscription, A.R.P., A.F.S., fire-watching, etc.

Neither can one logically avail onself of any privilege allowed under the National Service Acts, because of one's favourable environment or heritage, enabling one not only to acquire a conscientious objection to war (this must be inherent in most conscript soldiers, otherwise Conscription would not be needed), but also a faculty of self-expression capable of persuading a Tribunal that one is entitled under the Act to absolute exemption.

I therefore refused to appeal to a Tribunal for exemption, in spite of the fact that all the rest of Newcastle Branch of the N.C.F. agreed to do so.

(A) Because the Military Service Act was to my mind, immoral.

(B) Because it is immoral to ask for permission to be free when one is already free, and to ask for permission of any Tribunal to preserve that freedom is to surrender freedom itself in favour of a licensed liberty.

(C) Because to ask for a privilege for oneself which is denied to one's fellows is also immoral. (All men who are compelled by Conscription to join the Forces are ipso facto Conscientious Objectors, because they do not think it right that they should join the Army.)

(D) Because all Conscription Acts must be abolished before any liberty and freedom can be established, therefore, we must resist them for ourselves and attempt to make the Act unworkable for others.

Acting thus on the dictates of morality I found, as many others have found before and since, that the highest morality is also, in the long run, the greatest expediency.

I was not arrested until January, 1918, after most of my comrades had done long prison sentences already.

I refused to be medically examined and my papers were marked, "Refuses examination. Fit for General Service." Was taken to Barracks, refused all orders, was ultimately Court-Martialled, sentenced to 112 days' imprisonment, and sent to Wormwood Scrubbs. After a few days there I decided that the prison system was almost as immoral as the army and found that prisoners (C.O.'s in the majority) were carrying on the system themselves, so refused to participate even in prison tasks and spent remainder of sentence in solitary confinemnt for 14 day at a time with one day interval between. Unfortunately I received no support from my fellow C.O.s. After being escorted back to Newcastle on completion of sentence and taken back to Barracks, as there was no one attempting to prevent me I walked out and went to visit my wife and son (Robert). After a few days' liberty I was recognised by my Sergeant escort from London within a few yards of Depot from which I had walked away. He invited (?) me to accompany him back to depot. This invitation being refused, another Sergeant was called upon to add his weight to the invitation. Even then it was refused. So a dozen "liberty" men were called up to fall in behind me and the Sergeants. Then on the invitation being further pressed I fell in with their suggestion and marched under escort of Press Gang to Barracks and left my wife to push my infant son home up the hill.

Again at Barracks I refused to obey orders, was Court-Martialled again, and sent to N.C. Prison for 12 months' imprisonment.

Here, while still refusing to carry out any regulation I decided not to inform the Governor of this determination and found great support among my comrades in Newcastle Prison for such an attitude and suffered only rare periods of punishment during the following 12 months.

At the expiration of this sentence, February, 1919, I was again returned to Newcastle Barracks and left in charge of a sergeant, and was escorted to dining-hall for dinner (?). Sitting at the far end of the table from the server, I found there was nothing left for my dinner, so while they were busy eating theirs I came away and found some dinner elsewhere. After that I continued to find my necessary nourishment without applying further to Army authorities. They never invited me back again.

When my first son, Robert, was born, I was away from home in a Convalescent Home. The telegram announcing his birth was delivered by the matron when I was at dinner in the dining-hall. She interrupted a discussion on the war to present me with the telegram, and being a woman, prompted the tactful question of "No bad news, I hope?" To which I replied, "That is a matter of opinion, a son is born to me." "A son, good," she replied, "another little soldier." To which I replied, "Matron, if I thought my son had no future but to grow up to be a soldier, much as we are both delighted at his arrival, I think I would go home and strangle him with my own two hands." Thank God neither of these desperate alternatives have been adopted, either with him or my second son, who will take practically the same stand as his brother shortly.

I was summoned to the City Police Court on the 30th of May, 1941, for that I "unlawfully did fail to comply with the Fire Prevention (Business Premises) Order, 1941, made under Regulation 27A and 38 of the Defence (General) Regulations 1939."

I duly presented myself at Court and when my case was called, Mr. Barry Jones prosecuting said I was charged with not notifying the authorities of fire-watching duties and for not making arrangements for fire-watching. He also went out of his way to attempt to prejudice the case by remarking that "here was a man who was living in this country and enjoying all the advantages won by the war, but was not willing to lift a finger to help in anyway, leaving it to others to protect his premises while he sleeps idly by."

"Oh no," said the Chairman of the Bench, "He would be safe at home, sleeping in his bed."

When the prosecutor finished, I asked if I could question him, but this was refused.

Police evidence was that I said, "I will have nothing to do with the war and its prosecution, and I will not employ a fire-watcher."

I was allowed to make a statement and expressed regret that I was not allowed to ask the prosecutor a question.

"What question did you wish to ask?" said the Magistrate's clerk.

"Just this," said I, "Can he tell me one advantage that I or anyone enjoys as a result of the war?"

"He cannot answer that," said the clerk.

"I know he cannot," said I, "neither can you."

I first explained that strange though it might seem my appearance there was due to my strong regard for law and order. "This regulation" said I, "was a war measure, and therefore must be resisted by one having any regard for law and order. For war, by its resort to the arbitrament of brute force, was the negation of law, and by spreading disorder over the whole world could not be said to support order."

"Hitler's law and order," interjected the chairman.

I was then told that I could not proceed on that line as my statement had nothing to do with the law. I claimed that if the prosecutor could make attacks on my personal character, I had an equal right to answer these charges, and if the chairman was at liberty to sneer at my selfishness, I claimed the same liberty to reply.

"I did not sneer," said the chairman.

"If your remark about me sleeping safely at home in my bed was not a sneer, it sounded very much like one to me," said I.

I then proceeded to point out amid unseemly interruption from the clerk and police that I had two supreme loyalties, Sanity and Humanity, and as these war regulations violated both I had no intention of assisting them in any way.

The Bench then asked the formal question of the Police: "Any record."

The Police replied: "There is no record, nothing is known of him."

I then made a statement that I had a record. "A record of which I am proud. During the last war I served two long years of imprisonment rather than assist in that war, and I am prepared to serve as many as you gentlemen may consider necessary, rather than assist in this war."

The Bench then announced that I would be fined £50 and £5 5s. costs.

To this I made no reply, and turned to go out when the Police asked, "Are you going to pay it now?" "No," said I. "Do you want time to pay?" "No," I replied. "Then what are you going to do," said he. "I do not intend to pay it at all," I said.

This information was passed on to the Bench, who had already heard my statement.

"Then," said the chairman, after a brief consultation, "You will go to prison for three months." "Very good," I replied, "if that is your pleasure." "It is not our pleasure," said the clerk, "it is the law." "But you seem to enjoy it," said I.

I was then escorted down the Court and as I passed my friends and family in the public gallery I called out: "Good-bye, lads, keep the red flag flying."

I was then hustled into the "dock" and as I passed through I looked over the top and waving, said, "Good-bye, gentlemen, I hope you will sleep as sweetly as I do." I was then pushed down below, searched, and locked up in the cells.

After about two hours they came and told me I was to go home as they were going to issue a distress warrant to collect the fine. I protested against this as being illegal, but did not object to go home.

I have since written the Magistrate's Clerk to the effect that while the alternative to the fine is at the discretion of the magistrates, yet having publicly declared in Court for the alternative of imprisonment and put it into operation by arresting me, they could not at a later time vary this. Therefore, if they attempt to execute a distress warrant, I should treat it as an illegal distraint.

I have had one visit already from an officer of the police, who said he had come to distrain on the building.

I read a copy of my letter to him and said that I could only act on that declaration.

He then said: "May I ask you two questions?" "As many as you please," I said. "I only reserve the right to answer them as seems most suitable to me."

"First," said he, "does the building belong to you?" "In view of my letter," said I, "there is no answer to that one." "Second, "Are all these cars yours or your customers?" "The same applies to that," said I. At which protesting that he was wasting his time, he departed. And there the matter rests at the moment. I shall do my utmost to prevent the collection of the fine and imagine they will ultimately issue a warrant to collect me. In which case, I suppose, I will have to submit to brute force.

They sent an A.F.S. man yesterday to interview my employees and get their names and ages for fire-watching, but I said that as they were holding me responsible I could not see why the men should be troubled and refused permission for him to interview them and also to tell him how many there are.

They are also after my second son, Alan, who is also a War-Resister, and he refuses to give any information to the authorities in spite of their repeated requests, so I suppose they will soon be hauling him before the Bench.

I am not a much photographed man, but I send a photograph for The Word, since the editor asks for one. In it I was "taken" building my rock garden in 1940. With me is my son, Robert, and my wife.

This year the rocks are more beautiful, for I thought if I have to be "on the rocks," they will be pleasanter with a few flowers. So I shall always look for the flowers among the "rocks" of life, and will mostly be able to find some.

JOHN MORLEY PROTEST.

"John Morley, whom we know as a remarkable chairman and as a fearless speaker of truth, regardless of consequences, is in Durham Gaol," writes Douglas G. Maitland, acting Secretary of the Newcastle War Resisters Group of the P.P.U.

On behalf of this Group, Comrade Maitland addressed a letter to Herbert Morrison on July 10 last, in which he expresses the hope that the Home Secretary, as "a man who has some respect for individual conscience, will see to it that this injustice is ended."

Describing the circumstances of Comrade Morley's arrest and imprisonment, this letter asks Morrison to face the logic of his position:—

"I write you on a matter which seems to us, and may, on reflection, seem to you a serious one. . . . Can you, as a former conscientious objector, and as a present-day minister responsible for the carrying out of the penalties under this order, lend your support to the persecution of a man who, for conscientious reasons, cannot take part in war activities? John Morley's sincerity of objection is well proved by the fact of his having served two prison sentences during the last war and by his untiring activities in the pacifist movement as a public speaker."

Comrades who wish to swell the protest against John Morley's imprisonment should write to D. G. MAITLAND, 15 Beech Grove, Longbenton, Northumberland.

FROM WAR TO PEACE—HOW?

DUKE OF BEDFORD CORRESPONDENCE

Last month we published, in the form of an interview, a full statement of the Duke of Bedford's position on Pacifism, Civil Liberty, Conscientious Objectors, Total Disarmament, and the need for a United Pacifist-Socialist Movement of Opposition to the Churchill Government.

The Duke explained that he would take his seat in the House of Lords only with the support of the working class and the avowed pacifist elements in society, as an enemy of war and poverty.

The interview, and the Duke's article, Soviet Russia: A Sane View, caused great interest. The issue had a very big circulation, and despite several reprintings, is out of print. Many orders could not be executed. Readers have inundated us with letters. These have come from all classes and types. We have deemed it our duty to publish some of these letters, even though the fact of so doing compels us to hold over interesting and important essays. The fate of civilisation is in the balance and the opinion of every citizen who thinks at this time of crisis is precious and ought to be known. Your opinion and your counsel are invited. From war to peace—and to real Social Peace throughout the world—how? To each reader we say: Comrade, think, speak, act! Let your voice be heard! What must be done? Say.

Dear Aldred,—This is splendid, the August, 1941, Word.

The Duke and you are starting out strongly and clearly on your Great Campaign. I would like definitely to join you and am drawing up a proposal to send to you shortly for consideration.

In our Great and Desperately Immediate Cause of Socialism and Peace.

Yours Sincerely,

W. M. TEAPE.

Bournemouth, August 7.

[The Rev. W. M. Teape's career was outlined in June "Word." Scholarship and the study of "The Secret Lore of India" brought him to Socialism and Anti-Militarism.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—I have great sympathy with most of the views expressed by both the Duke and yourself in the interview which you publish in the August issue of The Word. Particularly important, as it seems to me, is the advocacy of a United Opposition of critical analysis and peace, comprising all the truly Socialist and the pacifist movements; but such an Opposition would ideally be international in scope, and it is in this regard that the Duke's reading of the situation arising from the fighting in Russia becomes especially significant. I have always held that man is not so inhuman that, if sufficiently stirred, his humanitarian feelings will not come uppermost; and we should be foolish

THE ARMISTICE PEACE, 1919

IS THE COMING PEACE TO BE THE SAME

Reproduced from The Spur, June 1919.

The above prophetic cartoon was not appreciated when it appeared in "The Spur" in June 1919. It was drawn by our then C.O. comrade, Henry Bernard, and has proven to be a correct prophetic comment on the Versailles Treaty. Many persons were horrified at our suggestion that that Peace was no peace. Time has vindicated the cartoonist and condemned his complacent Imperialist critics. We reproduce it to-day as a challenge and a question. Is the 1919 Peace to be repeated? Are we to be thrilled by more mockery? Or are we to end war and violence for all time? The question is one calling for the wise and determined decision of every good citizen of the world. YOU must decide as well as YOUR neighbour, who is your mere enemy of the moment, but your neighbour for all time.

indeed not to take the opportunity offered by the prospect of a more general disillusionment among the peoples to drive home the lesson that V may stand for Vanity rather than true Victory, which is not the offspring of physical violence at all, but rather of a right sense of moral values resulting in the victory of man's higher over his lower self and a willingness to subordinate selfish interests to the common good round a conference table.

Yours sincerely,
C. GASKELL.

Littleborough, August 13.

P.S.—I enclose a donation towards the cost of producing and publishing The Word in recognition of its value to the cause of peace.

[We are grateful to the Rev. C. Gaskell for his consistent support and words of cheer in the struggle to end the crime of militarism and violence. He has been a subscriber to "The Word" almost from the beginning, and he has waved aside theological differences, to concentrate on the critical need of loyalty to pacifism and humanity. He identifies Christianity with tolerance as a human need and right, and the redemption of humanity from the reign of violence and destruction.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thanks so much for the letter and for the literature you so kindly sent. The Duke of Bedford is a personal friend of mine. We who want to save humanity before it is too late must be held together in comradeship.

Yours fraternally,
W. ROWLAND JONES.

St. Hilda's Vicarage,
Denton, August 18.

[The Rev. W. Rowland Jones has written a challenging work, "Let's Try Reality." This is published by Allen and Unwin. A review will be published of it in an early issue.—Ed.]

Thanks for paper. I have had correspondence at times with the Duke of Bedford. He must be urged to leadership. I am writing him myself and hope others will also.

I am recommending your paper as I think you recognise that Church could do a good work if it were not subservient to the State and vested interests. Some of us are trying to help from within and at any rate refuse to be identified with the present negation of Christianity—principle without practice.

A. K. SHREWSBURY.

Bury St. Edmunds, August 20, 1941.

The Rev. A. K. Shrewsbury is rector of Chevington. We endorse his comments. The Church ought NOT to be subservient to vested interests. In the past teachers of Christianity were opposed to usury, war, and exploitation. Christianity had a definite message of emancipation and social justice for all mankind and did not believe in national frontiers. The Church has sold its birthright. This cannot be tolerated. The pulpit should become the centre of culture and brotherhood, of integrity and democratic social service. Its canons must denounce cannons.—Ed.

Sir,—I was greatly interested in the interview with the Duke of Bedford which you published in the August issue of The Word. I would like to say as a Christian minister how immensely I appreciate the stand which the Duke has taken so consistently on behalf of Christian principle. I am aware that many sincere Christians differ from me, but personally I cannot see how it is possible to combine a devotion to the spirit and teaching of the Nazarene with a pursuit of the way of war. The incompatibility becomes increasingly evident as the war becomes more bitter and more ruthless. The Prime Minister's speech of July 14th with its quite open and flagrant appeal to the spirit of vindictiveness, should cause all sincere Christians who have supported the war to re-consider their position. I am quite sure that the Duke is right when he says that "as time goes on, the disastrous consequences of the appeal to arms will become apparent . . . to the most unthinking of human beings."

I believe the Duke's attitude to the question of Fascism is perfectly clear and consistent. What is happening to-day is that under the stress of war the Fascist spirit and Fascist methods are becoming more and more acclimatised in this country. I have no great belief in the possibilities of political action until there is a radical change in the common attitude, and I believe that what is wanted essentially is a living Christianity. At the same time a man like the Duke of Bedford can, I am sure, play an effective part in giving a lead to public opinion. Pacifist opinion in Parliament seems an entirely negligible force at the moment: I can only hope that the Duke will increase its strength by taking his stand as a spokesman on its behalf in the House of Lords.

Yours faithfully,
SIDNEY SPENCER
(Minister, Hope Street (Unitarian) Church, Liverpool).

Liverpool, August 24.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Ignoring all the accusations made by irresponsible persons against the Duke of Bedford, I would like to comment upon your interesting and revealing interview with him. In these times it is not easy even for the professional philosopher fully to define his political and intellectual position. Obviously, the Duke of Bedford has thought out a policy based upon reason, and has, through stress and strife, consistently striven to maintain it. The fact that he was one of the signatories to an anti-war manifesto as far back as 1932 proves this.

It is probably true to say that the Duke's Pacifism is no more than an outgrowth of his Christianity; it is a necessary, but subsidiary thing. The main object of the Duke's intellectual quest has been to discover how, in society, he can implement his spiritual findings. The Duke is a progressive Christian, a reformer rather than a moralist. He believes (and no modern thinker worthy of the name could conclude otherwise) that ethics, religion, cannot be separated from the political and social life of Man. This fact is an integral one. People who have in the past failed to apprehend where in fact the Duke of Bedford does stand, should reflect upon his statement concerning the relation of religion to society. The Duke, quite logically, has attempted to bring his religion into the social-economic sphere to purify and re-invigorate that sphere. Probably, like many Socialists, he cannot envisage any other positive urge which will effectively resist the Fascist challenge. Christianity as seen by such progressives must cease to be the blind instrument of privilege and become creative of Goodness, Truth and Beauty. Here is the core of this man's faith, and let him who will condemn it.

In respect of the suggested opposition to the Churchill group it is necessary to exercise care in defining what shape that opposition shall take. Personally I cannot actively and directly oppose Churchill now, although I am not in agreement with his policy. The Duke of Bedford treads as warily as I do myself. He would lead opposition to another Versailles. Most philosophers and intellectuals would be ready to join in such a crusade. I would place what literary and intellectual ability I may possess, at the disposal of such a cause working for the redemption of man.

Yours ever,
E. W. MARTIN.

Beaworthy, Devon, August 21.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—After reading The Word's interview with the Duke of Bedford, I would like to remark that those who accuse the Duke of being pro-Fascist have found a very good way of playing Hitler's game. Let them read any brand of paper to discover what Hitler thinks of gentlemen in public positions who hold pacifist views. It won't take them long to discover—if they don't know it already—that the attempt to discredit such a man as the Duke of Bedford is an attempt to rid Hitler of one more opponent. And anyway, my dear Blimp, is not the persecution of those who disagree with us mere Hitlerism?

Good Heavens! there is no possible excuse for confusing pacifism with fascism. There is literature enough. The fact that Hitlerism includes some of the essential changes—matters of social justice—is very unpleasant for the conservative; but this does not mean that others who believe in the essential changes have any affinity with those who use bad means to achieve only a small portion of the good ends.

Yes, unless we are to regard words as just emotional noise, to call a distinguished gentleman who is a pacifist (in the true and full meaning of that word) a pro-Fascist is a fine contribution to the campaign for bigger and better truncheons.

To my mind the Duke answers all critics by proving whole-hearted pacifism with his generous offer to be the voice of a minority in the House of Lords. Even the Blimps should be grateful to the Duke for this reminder that an Englishman can undertake the responsibilities of his belief and position without thought or hope of personal aggrandisement.

Sincerely,
OSWALD BLAKESTON.

Ashburton, August 22.

Dear Sir,—In the statement of your interview with the Duke of Bedford on the subject of the present War and the need for its speedy termination, and for a bold drive for a better understanding among the Nations of the Earth, reference is made to the Duke being a Christian, and it is suggested that he should therefore receive the support of Christian Bodies, especially that of the Religious press. But we all know how in these days of war the Religious press has surrendered the first principles of true Christianity, and that largely our Churches of all denominations have allied themselves with the war-mongers. Of course, there are exceptions, but these exceptions are too few to wield any substantial influence with the masses of Religionists in the country.

The minds of the People to-day are far removed from things Religious except when the hand of death comes near. The War is the first concern of our fellow-citizens, be they Religionists or Secularists. I think, therefore, that the Duke could reach the People more effectively and with speed were he first of all to take his Seat in the House of Lords. I feel sure that the press would give him due publicity. This first step would, to my mind, reveal to the People that here was one man courageous and firm enough to voice the mind of hundreds of thousands of others. One does not knew how long this War is to last. None but the most foolish will say that Germany will collapse as she collapsed at the last War. And as there is absolutely no comparison between the last War and this War, only a bold stroke by a man of position and standing can possibly save the situation and lead to the avoidance of a prolonged War with its futile run of disaster and death.

You suggest that the Socialist and Pacifist Movement should conclude an alliance to end the War. But where are the Socialists? You must know that true and honest Socialists to-day are as scarce as eggs. The Socialists, so-called, who control the body of workers in the country, are now in the pay of the war-mongers, and it is in their interests that the Duke of Bedford be kept down. Hence I feel that the Duke will require to act on his own, knowing that he has the moral and all other kind of support which thousands of the meantime silent citizens can give him.

The urgency of the matter demands that Action take place at once. With the Duke of Bedford before the public eye and ear, and with The Word and such organs driving ahead the Cause for which the Duke speaks, the People are bound in time to make hearty response. For the present Administration at Westminster, especially now that it has proved its incompetence and impotence by the publication of the Churchill-Roosevelt "Scrap of Paper," seems to be on the point of committing suicide. The only way to avoid this is for it to die a natural death. The Duke can effect this in the Lords.

Yours fraternally,
ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE.

Bearsden, August 19, 1941.

[Mr. A. Ratcliffe is the well-known editor of the Protestant "Vanguard. Since the outbreak of war he has been consistently anti-war and anti-militarist. He holds that a Christian ought not to uphold war and all its horrors and crimes.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I simply had to write and tell you how enjoyed I am to find the Duke of Bedford's interview with you, in The Word, and his splendid suggestion that he should lead a genuine peace movement. I can think of no more suitable man to do so. He seems to possess every qualification needed. The great thing will be to gather together all the true peace-seekers to support him through thick and thin.

The present apology for freedom of speech and thought hampers one considerably, but I do hope the Duke will really get started soon. I only wish that I may be able to do something tangible to help.

I thoroughly appreciate your paper and work. I feel it is so remarkable that, holding your own religious views as you do, you are broad-minded enough to appreciate the Christian point of view so fully.

With all good wishes, your sincerely,

OLGA PIKE.

Llandudno, August 13, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—What can we say but "thanks and thanks"! A very active Wallasey worker for various social causes said last night that she had been puzzling and puzzling who could be got. Others must have been thinking strenuously too as you will of course know. It seemed to me that at last you had got the driver at the wheel, tooted the horn and gently moved the bus on a bit to waken the would be passengers or make them would be passengers. One can work on that. I was very much perturbed to read that the paper may have to be discontinued for want of funds. We owe so much to The Word and yet somehow do not come to its aid when it is required. The enclosed is a mere nothing, but perhaps every nothing helps!

With regard to an Opposition, I wonder why so many speak of things being impossible, when all one needs to know beforehand is if the thing is right and needed. It seems impossible to come across one person who has courage and faith to say, "It is needed, and therefore, we shall undoubtedly find the ways and means to get it."

With congratulations and best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

AGNES W. MACKAY.

Liverpool, August 14.

Dear Friend,—The August Word was magnificent. I felt happy for the first time for many months. I hope the Labour and Socialist movements will respond to the Duke's splendid declaration of his willingness to lead us. May that day soon dawn.

It is wonderful to hear the circulation of The Word is rising, but I wish you had a big up-to-date machine and stacks of paper. But your work will prosper, all the same. I will just thank you again for your humane and enlightened work.

Yours fraternally,

DOROTHY HOLMS,

(Widow of Captain John F. Holms, M.C., of the Regular Army).

Bath, August 19.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Please find enclosed my annual subscription to The Word.

We in our home are very interested regarding the interview given by the Duke of Bedford for this month's issue. It would indeed be a splendid thing if he took his stand in the House of Lords as the spokesman of the Socialist Pacifists, whose greatest desire is to see a better order of things in this and every land. Having known many kinds of sorrow myself, I can reach out to all my fellow-creatures with an understanding mind and heart, for whatever country we belong we are all the same. I do hope you will have many more subscribers to you journal, it is so refreshing to read.

When my husband and I were travelling in a railway-carriage one day last week, we were glad to hear remarks regarding the national press, such as: "Does the Press think that 'the man in the street' is an idiot, taking in the change of front regarding Russia?" "The whiteness of all we do and the blackness of the enemy," etc., etc.

As for the Prime Minister's speech last Sunday evening, I wept in agony that the Christian Faith should be brought into this orgy of slaughter which is sweeping the world.

Yours faithfully,

(Mrs.) ALICE GOODRICK.

Manchester, August 28, 1941.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Many thanks for The Word for August. I do congratulate you upon the fine magazine (or periodical?) you turn out, both as regards the matter, and the satisfying quantity of it as compared with the rather scrappy sheets so common at present—also the good print and general form.

I also have no interest in theology, sectarianism or orthodox religion, which is so largely a sham and convention, with little true belief. I don't believe in an anthropomorphic God.

I sincerely hope that pacifist, socialist, and other likely bodies or movements will continue and request the Duke of Bedford to become leader of a movement towards Peace and sanity. It seems time that some definite move and useful action was put into operation to offset the demoniac character of official activities and motives, especially as the "war" situation may soon develop into a deadlock. Please record my agreement with that cause, if that is any help.

Yours sincerely,

J. C. PAGE.

Winchcombe, August 19.

Dear Comrade,—I would like to express, as a reader of The Word, and a member of the P.P.U. and the I.L.P., my approval of your proposal that the Duke of Bedford should be the National Voice of an allied Socialist and Pacifist Movement, and would give all the support I could.

Yours fraternally,

CUTHBERT LEIGH.

Keswick, August 15.

Dear Sir,—We have been told by the M.O.I. that we are fighting to bring into the world a new policy of social justice. We are told also that such a policy must come from the people as part of this war effort. Because of these statements I welcome the interview you publish with the Duke of Bedford.

Those who lead nations in wars and the campaigns of hate that belong to war are not suited to prepare the way for peace. We have no Minister of Peace existing in War Cabinets side by side with the Ministers for War. That is because it is considered impossible to explore the paths of peace whilst pursuing the course of war. Hence those who are prominent in war are, with rare exception, not the best type to promote peace. War blunts their understanding for the tasks of peace establishment. There is a need for someone opposed to war, and outstanding as a champion for peace, to arise, and to take the lead. We need such a representative exponent to define his position now.

Such a man must be outside of all existing parties or groupings. He must possess the spirit of statesmanship so as to be able to effect unity of working between the groups. He must be able to challenge the suggestion of sordid careerism. He must be above the suspicion of political interest.

Your interview with the Duke of Bedford makes me ask: Is he the man? He has certainly opposed his own class for many years and championed the cause of social justice. When the pre-war champions of peace became silent in the dangerous days of War, he asserted his faith in peace and the need to establish peace by negotiation and round-table discussion.

The interview may cause many people to write to the editor stating that they are prepared to support the Duke of Bedford if he gives practical expression of his belief in uniting all the Pacifist and Socialist elements in a common peace cause. They must say what they are prepared to do. They must stand to the position they define. Otherwise they will but condemn anotherman to martyrdom in the struggle against war and social wrong.

Yours faithfully,

R. J. SCRUTTON.

Kensington, London, W.8, August 25.

Dear Sir,—Please send me some more copies of the August issue of The Word. Some of my friends are interested and would like to know more of the Duke of Bedford's views, and had not seen The Word before.

DOROTHY F. MARTIN.

Weybridge, 13/8/41.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I want to suggest that you have a magnificent gathering ground for the forces of pacifism and sanity in The Word. You might insert a statement of what we are after, and say, that the response to the current issue of The Word makes you believe that those who stand for peace and those who stand for Socialism, in opposition to war and militarism, could agree probably on common action against the criminal futility of all this bloodshed; that world peace and reason wants the biggest army in the world to witness for it, an army of thought, vision, and understanding; an army moving towards the establishment of peace and justice; and that all who realise this need should send their names to The Word, and so make, and keep in, contact.

More and More, I feel it is needed to get all these different movements of peace and Socialism together at this time of crisis. I believe that is where the Duke of Bedford could play an important part. He could be a reconciler of the forces that must make a coalition for peace, just as other forces have made a coalition for war. I am very keen to gather all the separate movements of peace that would save the world but for their divisions and watertight compartments, into one powerful movement. So May It Grow.

Yours Sincerely,

A. RUTH FRY.

Thorpeness, August 13.

[Miss Fry has sent us her important work, "Everyman's Affair, A Plea for a Sane Peace," published at 1s. 0d., by Andrew Dakers, Ltd., London. We propose to review this work at length in next issue. Meantime comrades can order it direct, 1s. 3d., post free, from the publishers, or through this office.—Ed.]

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I attach great importance to your interview with the Duke of Bedford, and heartily endorse all you say of him. There can be absolutely no doubt about the necessity of a Churchill opposition, and if the Duke is prepared to be the voice of this opposition in the House of Lords then we should rally all the support for him that is possible.

The Duke, unfettered by party platform, free from the bureaucracy of parliamentary party executives and possessed of a mind unimpaired by the cancerous growth of careerism, is well worthy of the support of all those who love Democracy, and who believe in the ultimate triumph of Truth and Freedom.

Perhaps it will be possible to arrange for a meeting, at which the Duke would speak?

With best wishes, yours fraternally,

KEN BRYAN.

Caldecote, 15/8/41.

Dear Comrades,—The August issue of The Word is the most inspiring issue of any Socialist paper that I have come across in war-time. I want to support the Duke of Bedford's plea for a combination of Socialists and Pacifists in a Churchill Opposition and Peace campaign.

I was until recently Secretary of the Brighton I.L.P. I have now become an Anarchist and have left the Party (which, however, I still regard with great admiration, but feel that party and parliamentary politics are out of date). As a C.O. given N.C.C. by the Appelate Tribunal, I have refused to attend medical, and await arrest. These personal details are included as bona fides of my sympathies.

We need something new, and any new movement must be ambitious. In no way must it be narrow. (I mean that emphatically: I find so many so-called revolutionaries—C.P.'ers in particular—who are utterly narrow, conventional and reactionary in their outlook on life). Its propaganda methods must be original, within the limits of its funds. Unlike the C.P. it would not be financed by Russian roubles disguised as American dollars. Guy Aldred already does a good job of work through his postal mission, a very good job of educational work. But we must not stop at the press, unless we can capture public imagination and sympathy to such a degree as to compel the support of some great national daily or weekly. We must not employ falsehood or exaggeration, after the manner of the Communist Party, but we must have initiative and life, which is lacking in the Labour Party, Trade Unions and Co-operative movement. In selling out to the cause of death, these movements, built up by the workers, as expressions of workers' progress, have destroyed themselves. Radio is a news medium that cannot be captured until we have secured a powerful minority-influence. Our message must strike home, until then, from every other possible angle. It must be on everyone's tongue, from breakfast time until nightfall, and after. It must be honest, clear, fearless, optimistic. No tricks! No C.P. tactics this time. We do not want another People's Convention farce, another shadow organisation for a political party.

A mere Churchill opposition is not enough. Churchill might be opposed yet not merely by a pacifist and a Socialist movement seeking the peace of the world, but by a new patriotic nationalist movement, ostensibly Socialist, almost aggressively reformist, that will reveal itself later as a British form of Fascism. We must not oppose Churchill only unwittingly to help the rival leaders of some such movement to power. I do not mean that the British Union of Fascists will recover from being outlawed. I think that autocracy may be ushered in by some purblind, careerist trade union leaders. Unless we preserve fiercely civil rights, as the Duke of Bedford says, serious dangers confront us and the whole of the world's workers. Because of these dangers, I find Guy Aldred's interview with the Duke of Bedford, and his comments, of vital importance. Now is the time to act. Each of us must be willing to play his part, to accomplish teamwork for the salvation of mankind from utter misery and desolation.

There are many people in this country who could come together for such a purpose—Lord Ponsonby, James Maxton, John McGovern, Fenner Brockway, Rhys Davies, Middleton Murray, Stuart Morris, Sir Hugh Roberton, Hugh McDiarmid, Emrys Hughes, Dr. Salter, Ethel Mannin, etc.

As a final suggestion, I would like to ask the editor to reserve one or more pages as a forum for the urgent discussion of the important issues raised by the Duke of Bedford. I would ask him to reprint from other journals of progress, pacifism, and socialism, comments and contributions. Let us bring together, rapidly and usefully, with a view to definite conclusion, all the ideas and proposals that we can collect. Let us build a volunteer army of thought, struggle, and emancipation. Let us have light and understanding.

I would close with a tribute to John Morley and his family. We need more like you and your sons, John.

Fraternally in The Struggle,
F. W. JEFKINS.

MmilitarismandWoodland

[On August 20, 1918, we completed the third sentence of imprisonment imposed upon us by District Court Martial, for resisting military service, and were returned, under escort, from Wandsworth Prison to the Detention Room at Deepcut Camp. Here, on August 29, 1918, we received our fourth Court Martial, and were returned to Wandsworth Prison, sentenced to two years' hard labour. Between the dates mentioned—August 20 and August 29—we wrote a number of essays on our experiences. The one bearing the title, "Militarism and Woodland," was published in "The Spur," (Vol. V., No. 5, page 103) for October 1918. No apology is required for its reproduction to-day—Ed.]

Since my release from prison I have been mentally and morally barren. The emptiness of life has weighed heavily upon me in this Deepcut detention room, and if I can succeed only in conveying to my readers some understanding of the soul crushing monotony which now oppresses me, I shall be rendering a service not only to my fellow C.O.'s, but also to the soldiers, who, in one way or another, and to only a little less extent, travail through the same slough of despond.

I have normally small taste for the countryside. Still I know, somewhat, the joy of roaming through the woodlands. From the detention room window I can vision the despoilation which has been made of the country by militarism. Woodland has been turned not into useful residential district but into dreary gravelled sanded stony waste: the trees have given place to dull and ugly huts: and the vision which woodland might have rendered poetical and have matured, the barrenness of soulless hut life has destroyed. Where birds should sing, only guns boom. Where men should love, males only lust. Where the mystery of sex should be wonderfully understood, only the sensualism is apprehended. Men understand the fact of sex in a brutal animal way. But the delicacy of sex, all the subtle tenderness which belongs to it, its tender charm, and the growing innocence which comes with deeper knowledge: all this wondrous realm of real comradeship is beyond the ken of those who dwell in a desert which was once happy woodland. From this window I watch the soldiers and the girls go by. Sex attraction parades its vitality with impudence rather than with dignity. And though with some cases, there may be real tender feeling between the parties, in many, if not most, a conscious vulgarity obtrudes itself. Militarism destroys the woodland and degrades the mystery of life. It vulgarises and prostitutes all that it touches.

Thus in the guard room, men on guard idle round the hours of the clock. In the huts, the men, off parade, are appalled by the barrenness of life. All comfort has vanished from it: and with that loss of comfort departs the sense of delicacy, that loving touch of home, which makes angels out of outcasts, and saints out of loafers. Reduced to its barest need life becomes abnormally brutal: and so the soldier, with his simple life, so far as comfort is concerned, and his regulated burden of duty and obligation, so far as military necessity demands, becomes something less than a man for all normal purposes. The craving of sex is fostered by his barrack-enforced asceticism. The comradeship of human difference is lost sight of, because the vision of it never penetrates the gloom of dull despair and hopeless discipline the war has developed. So the soldier expresses the barrenness of life.

Yet the sons of men, degraded and depressed by "Christian" institutions and capitalist newspapers, are not bad fellows. I have heard the stories of expeditionary men, received their hand clasps, acknowledged their comradeship, and realised the wonderful drawing together which is taking place between us socialist C.O.'s and the soldiers who have fought in Flanders. Stay-at-home civilians and some Red Caps may hate us, but the genuine soldier who has fought and suffered knows no such hatred. He is one of us, and we are all the boys.

But militarism has destroyed the woodland, the woodland which hallows life, which evidences its mystery, which makes us feel so marvellously at one with all nature. It has seized on our poor human nature, which has been dwarfed by the slum and arrested by gold, and denied us the right to know and to grow. Militarism has discovered woman in slavery and added to her chains. It has found her ignorant and outraged her in addition. It has seized her son and conscripted her womb. Herself, intended by nature to be the channel of progressive revolution throughout the ages, she is but deemed the gutter pipe of venereal disease.

So the war goes on. So woman is deemed a hanger-on of man, an instrument to satisfy his lusts, and perpetuate his ambitions. Good Christian divines, labour leaders, newspaper men, exfeminists, all encourage this loathsome conception of woman's function in life.

Yes, I honour woman. I reverence mother, sister, and sweetheart, because I realise how much we have in common as human beings, how small is the difference between us as sexes, and yet how uniting and vitally harmonious are the consequences, of these subtle differences. Understanding this, I oppose the militarism which is corrupting youth of both sexes. As I look out upon the desert which has supplanted woodland in this district, I vision how militarism thrives in the desert; the desert of barren love, of barren knowledge, of barren comradeship. I turn from the window and hear the sounds that come from the guard room. I hear the cry of human nature going up against this barren life of militarism. Fellowship, knowledge, true holy love are demanding to have their place in life: and so, once again there is the writing on the wall to be read and understood by all who will read and understand. Militarism is doomed. One day the woodland will take us children of the earth into her haunts and glades, and recall us to the romance of love and peace. She will demand that we shall eat of the fruit of reverence and peace, the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

UNITARIAN CHURCH

Grey Street, Eastern Hill, Melbourne.
Minister—Rev. W. BOTTOMLEY.
Sunday Services—11 a.m. and 6-30 p.m.

Grey Street Church stands for Free Religious Worship unfettered by dogmas or tradition, for a religion that makes man alive, stirs the grey matter in his brain; a religion which not only makes him passionately devoted to an ideal, but which enlightened him as to the way in which the ideal may become a religion that not only makes him one with God, but one with his fellowman, by opposing war and stopping the rising tide of injustice.

Situated in Grey Street—West, East Melbourne (opposite St. Patrick's Cathedral), the Unitarian Church is reached by all trams to and from Collins Street. It is within one minute's walk from Parliament House. The Rev. W. Bottomley preaches regularly on Sunday evenings at the services, beginning at 7. Readers of The Word resident in Melbourne are invited to attend. Rationalists, Pacifists, Socialists, as well as Unitarians, welcomed.

During the greater part of the year, the Melbourne Forum meets in the Church on Sunday afternoon at 3-30, when addressed are delivered by well-known men and women on matters of public interest. These are followed by questions and discussion.

The Crisis of Modern Civilisation, a sermon delivered by the Rev. W. Bottomley against war, is now issued in Britain by The Strickland Press, Price 2d. Delivered in April, 1939, and broadcast at the time, it represents views still maintained by its author.

HERBERT MORRISON

In The Word for April, 1941, our colleague, C. H. Norman, reproduced extracts from a war-resisters' speech made by Herbert Morrison at the Albert Hall, London, on December 5, 1926. To that speech Herbert Morrison owes part of that public status which now permits him to function as Home Secretary and Minister for Home Security in a War administration.

At the Tribunals, conscientious objectors are asked to pledge themselves that, at no time and under no circumstances will they support war. If they hesitate to do this, because they feel that they cannot pledge the future, which is correct ethics, they are turned down as not being genuine. On this reasoning, Herbert Morrison and Sir Patrick Dollan could never have been genuine, for they were yesterday anti-war and are, to-day, very much pro-war, urging others to fight and to face the perils of war. Our view is that men who change their views under such circumstances, such changes tending to their political and social advancement, ought to retire from public life. This is the only ethical view to take.

The Manchester Guardian for Thursday, June 13, 1940, published a two-column report, headed:

"MR. MORRISON CALLS FOR STILL GREATER EFFORT"

The opening sentences of the report read:—

"Mr. Herbert Morrison, Minister of Supply, speaking for the National Defence Public Interest Committee at a luncheon in London yesterday, referred to the increase in the war effort already achieved and to the need for making it greater still."

In the speech that followed, Morrison referred to Britain, France, and the United States, as though there were no divisions of classes in these countries, and as though each country was represented by a single unit of thought and interest. He concluded with a tribute to Mr. Churchill as "our Prime Minister."

We would take no exception to this but for the fact that Morrison owes his position in public life to the fact that he had pretended that class divisions existed in society and that he represented the working class, in opposition to Churchill and his class. He has climbed to the position of being a war-time Cabinet Minister by his past affectation of anti-militarism and Socialist exposition. To our minds, let apologists of various kinds say what they will, such proceedings must rank as expressions of undiluted hypocrisy. Our readers must feel the same when they consider what Morrison wrote in 1914.

KING AND COUNTRY NEED YOU!

By Herbert Morrison.

Your King and Country Need You!

Ah! Men of the Country, you are remembered. Neither the King, nor the Country, nor the picture papers had really forgotten you. When your master tried to cut your wages down, did you think he knew nothing of your beautiful brave heart? When you were unemployed, did you think your Country had forgotten you? When the military were used against you in the strikes, did you wonder if your King was quite in love with you? Ah! foolish one.

Your King and Country Need You!

Need hundreds and thousands of you to go to hell and to do the work of hell. The Commandment says: "Thou shalt not kill." Pooh! What does it matter? Commandments, like treaties, were made to be broken. Ask your parson, he will explain.

Your King and Country Need You!

Go forth, little soldier! Though you know not what you fight for, go forth. Though you have no grievance against your German brother—go forth and kill him! Though you may know he has a wife and family dependent upon him—go forth and slay him, he is only a German dog. Will he not kill you if he gets a chance? Of course he will.

He is being told the same story!

His King and Country Needs Him!

How can the man who penned this extreme Socialist anti-war and anti-militarist declaration be allowed to remain in public office, in a War Cabinet, as Minister of Home Security?

LABOUR MILITARISTS—NOW!

HOW DO THEY MANAGE TO BE SO?

A Letter of Enquiry from The Duke of Bedford.

Dear Aldred,—When I was a very little boy, there was a rhyme that my father used sometimes to repeat to me.

"Poor old Robinson Crusoe,
He made him a coat
Of an old nanny-goat,
How the deuce did he manage to do so?"

When I read the startling records that appear from time to time in The Word of the past sayings of ex-pacifist members of the Labour Party who are now members of the War Government or ardent supporters of the war, I ask myself again and again, in respect of their present policy and actions, "How the deuce do they manage to do so?" If they had always been fools on the war issue, or even if their attitude towards war had been a negative one, their conduct would be understandable. But the extraordinary thing is that, in the past, they seem to have been really well-informed and enlightened men. They said many shrewd and even courageous things. They used weighty arguments which I myself have been glad to borrow. They even, by investigation, gained a thorough knowledge of the welter of selfish and disgraceful intrigue which lies behind all great European wars and spreads the guilt of responsibility so widely. If they had ever been led to change their attitude one would have thought that it could only have been if a war situation had arisen in which responsibility rested to a quite abnormal extent on the enemies of Britain. Nevertheless, they have been bowled over and induced to abandon their principles over quite the most obviously foolish and unnecessary war which it is possible to imagine. No British interest was at stake, if we decide not to consider the financial commitments in Poland of a great insurance Company a "British interest." No enlightened democracy was being attacked, for the Polish Government was most undemocratic and it, or its predecessors, had a bad record for tyranny or even aggression. It was not even the case that Germany attacked Poland without any excuse; even Mr. Lloyd George has in the past declared in the strongest language that the arrangements made in Poland by the Treaty of Versailles would prove intolerable to the Germans and the democratic German statesman, Herr Streseman, said the same thing. The proposals made by Hitler for remedying these grievances which our alliance encouraged the Poles to reject, were, moreover, most reasonable, and the objection that he is untrustworthy is irrelevant for wise men agree to the reasonable demands of untrustworthy people with especial readiness, since thereby they strengthen enormously their position if later they should have to oppose them over demands which are not just.

The volte-face of the Labour pacifists really strikes me as rather terrifying. It reminds me of certain events which happened when I was a member of the Prisoners' Aid Committee at Portsmouth. At the time which I have in mind, a neighbouring prison, by reason of the excellent and enlightened policy of its governor, was famed for its prisoners' aid work and for the high percentage of men who were brought back permanently to the paths of virtue. In another prison, there was a prison visitor, respected for his experience and general helpfulness; while in London we had got in touch with a retired Army Officer who proved most valuable to us in the important and difficult work of securing employment for the discharged men.

Alas, however, there came a dreadful day when we heard that the Governor of the modern prison had himself got into trouble through misappropriating the funds of the Prisoners' Aid Society! Within a few days one of the members of our P.A.S., on going to Brighton, discovered that the respected member of the Brighton P.A.S. was also enjoying His Majesty's hospitality. Close upon the heels of this came the final blow when the police told us not to have anything more to do with our officer friend, who was about to be arrested for an exceedingly unpleasant crime. Poor old human nature! How were the mighty fallen! In another twenty years (I shall be just the right age for a War Minister then!) I, too, may be demanding the slaughter of some aggressor, or rather of some aggressor's people. So perhaps, when I feel moved to indignation and even a little contempt for the ex-pacifist Labour men, I ought rather to say, "There, but for the grace of God, goes Bedford!"

Yours very truly,

BEDFORD.

Newton Stewart, August 8.

18B. PRISONERS

DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PROTEST.

We have received a large number of papers, local, national, or devoted to some special interest, containing letters "to the Editor" from the Duke of Bedford on the subject of war, conscience, and civic rights.

In this issue we reproduce one, from the columns of the Catholic Herald, London, for August 8 last. This reads as follows:—

Sir,—I have read with interest your comments on the arrest of Mr. Cahir Healy and on the working of Regulation 18B.

The worst and most dangerous feature of this Regulation as an attack on the liberty of the subject, unnecessary even under the abnormal conditions of war, is the failure to secure proper examination by a competent authority of the informants who have made charges against the persons detained. It is fairly obvious that real justice cannot be secured unless these informants are forced to submit to the procedure of a Court of Law.

In the recent Debate on the Regulation the Home Secretary maintained that there were difficulties in the way of allowing proper legal investigation, partly by reason of the length of time which would be involved and partly because Courts of Law are accustomed to deal with questions of fact and not to adjudicate on matters where action is taken on mere suspicion. Even, however, if we accept this view, it remains the duty of the Home Office to see that all informants are personally examined by the Advisory Committee which hears the appeals of detained persons under conditions where the prisoners themselves are available to the Committee and in those all too numerous cases where the Home Secretary decides to disregard a recommendation for the prisoner's release made by the Advisory Committee which he has appointed, he should himself undertake the task of making a proper enquiry, in the manner already specified.

Anyone who has had practical experience in getting to the bottom of a matter where some person, or persons, make a charge against an individual, must be aware that it is impossible for the wisest man alive to reach a just and final judgment merely on the evidence of written statements. This is particularly true where the persons concerned are strangers to him and where, in addition, there is likely to be an abnormal amount of prejudice and even downright falsehood.

Information against detained persons often comes from those whose capacity for forming accurate opinions has been seriously affected by war emotionalism. It may also come from persons animated by jealousy or ill-will; and it may come from official agents. With regard to these latter, it is not at all uncommon for them to seek to prove something against the person whose actions and outlook they have been directed to investigate. Seeing that they will be more likely to gain the approval of their superiors in their department if their enquiries seem to have had positive results, it is only human nature that this should be so: reports of the innocence of the suspected persons, if frequent, are not so likely to win approval and enhance the chances of an increase in salary. For this reason, if justice is to be secured, agents, in place of being regarded as persons of unusual reliability, should be subjected to very strict examination.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS

IN THE DOCK

In The Word for September, 1940 (Vol. II., No. 2, pages 13-16), we commenced a record of our various trials. In that issue was published both the legal and ordinary press reports of the 1909 London Trial for Indian Sedition. Mr. Justice Coleridge's definition of sedition in his summing up became an important legal ruling. It was quoted considerably in "the trial of the twelve," which opened at the No. 1 Court, in the Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey, on Monday, November 16, 1925. Harry Pollitt, J. R. Campbell, and William Gallacher defended themselves. Sir Henry Slesser, since elevated to the Bench, and the late W. R. Pringle, M.P., defended the other defendants between them. Slesser founded the legal case for the defence on the rulings in cases of John Burns, Guy Aldred, and Sullivan. Sir Douglas Hogg, as Attorney-General, prosecuted, and the late Mr. Justice Rigby Swift presided.

The Workers' Weekly, the C. P. organ, for November 27, 1925, carried very full reports of the trials. "Court Impressions" were contributed by T. A. Jackson, who wrote:—

"The counsel work in relays. Sometimes the Attorney-General is replaced by Sir Travers Humphreys, and he in turn by Mr. Percival Clarke. Sometimes Sir Henry Slesser is deputised for by Mr. Arthur Henderson, junior. Pollitt, Campbell and Gallacher each in turn takes a hand. Slowly the work goes on. . . .

"Law cases are cited, whole libraries grow on the shelf behind counsel and on the judge's table. Famous cases bringing in a savour of stirring historical episodes—Tom Paine's case, with its memory of the French Revolution and the 'Rights of Man'; Sir Francis Burdett's case, a memory of Radical excitements with the Life Guards clearing Piccadilly with their pistols; Thomas Cooper's case, an echo of the Chartist days and the 'Sacred Month'; T. D. Sullivan's case from the Fenian days; John Burns' case from the early days of the S.D.F. and the unemployed riots; Aldred's case and Indian Nationalism; Bowman's case and Syndicalist anti-militarism. Echoes of the past waft from the pages of the soberly-bound volumes, quoted in almost casual tones by the bewigged and begowned men of the law.

Do the jury know the history drama indicated in the legal title 'Rex v. Paine' or 'Rex v. Sullivan'?

From The Workers' Weekly summary of Douglas Hogg's speech, we make this excerpt:—

"The test cases which Sir Henry Slesser had referred to were those of Burns, Aldred and Sullivan. He would take a test from the judgment in each case and use them to show that these were as he had claimed. . . .

"From the judgment in Aldred's case the Attorney-General quoted the test 'was the language used calculated to advocate the use of violence and its justification.' He claimed that passages which he read showed that the ends of the Communists could be attained only by armed revolt and the forcible overthrow of bourgeois society."

If this argument meant anything at all, it implied that all Communist propaganda was outlawed.

We pass to our second trial for sedition. This took place in Glasgow in 1921. So far as we know, no legal report exists of this trial. It was reported well in the local press; in the Daily Herald, by the present Lord Provost, who approved and applauded our defence; discussed in The Worker by William Gallacher, now M.P., and John S. Clarke, who wrote well on the matter of prosecution; and in The Socialist, the organ of the Socialist Labour Party, by Harry McShane, at that time associated with John MacLean, but later a member of the Communist Party and National Unemployed Workers' Movement. The bringing together of these various reports is a service to the history of the movement.

After these reports have been published, we shall collect our following trials: Court-Martials, for resisting military service in time of war; irregular marriage; birth-control propaganda, with which we were casually and accidentally and not actively associated, for we object to birth-control propaganda being conducted as a money-making racket; and Free Speech Trials, which we won on law, only for the Glasgow Labour Town Council to fail to implement the law. This censure applies to the I.L.P. as well as to the Labour Party members. In due course we will deal with this matter thoroughly.

Below are the reports of the 1921 Glasgow Sedition Trial.

I. THE BRITISH WHITE TERROR

BY W. GALLACHER, M.P.

[Gallacher (not then M.P.) wrote a very human and very feeling account in "The Worker," Glasgow, July 30, 1921, under the title, "The British White Terror." He gave a lengthy and powerful description of how Scotland Yard runs the country, rather than the Cabinet. Then followed an exposition of the class struggle. He proceeded to detail the trial. —Ed.]

Imprisonment of Communists is now a matter of daily occurrence, and is generally being accepted as such.

The workers look dully on while Freedom is being slowly strangled in the interests of a decaying capitalism, as though it was something of no importance to them. But dull and apathetic as they may be, there surely is not one of them who makes any claim to manhood or womanhood, but must feel the spirit of protest arise within him or her at the unspeakable savage treatment that has been meted out to our comrade, Guy Aldred. Think of it! Kept in prison in solitary confinement for over three months while his enemies were plotting and planning to get up a case against him. . . .

Three months to prepare their case, and Aldred a prisoner all that time, and then—what a wretched show they made.

Aldred was accused of advocating violence, yet it was not he but his accusers who had the court and its environs packed with police and plain clothes men, all of them armed and ready to use their weapons in the most violent manner at the slightest provocation.

See the Lord Advocate's deputy standing there mouthing empty platitudes about peace and religion, the while he is surrounded by hired gunmen whose principal duty is to retain for capitalism the wealth that has been stolen from the worker. See in the dock, supported only by his loyal comrades, McLeish and Jenny Patrick, our comrade Aldred fighting the age-long battle of the slave class against those who would keep them in subjection. No one could sit in the court without recognising the debasing meanness of the accusers and the intellectual superiority of the accused.

In the midst of all this humbug and sham that pervaded the court, Aldred stood out clear and distinct, a man among mannikins.

No one can have more cause to hate the thought of prison than the present writer, yet in spite of all the suffering that it entails I'd rather a thousand times be Aldred with his twelve months imprisonment than the Lord Advocate's deputy with the price of his hire.

In attacking Aldred or any other advocate of working-class emancipation, they are attacking not only the individual but the Class the individual represents. The response to the Capitalist "White Terror" is organisation that will put Capitalism out of business.

Aldred and the others are in gaol, because the class they represent is weak. We are weak because we lack organisation. . . .

Our spokesmen are in gaol, and we are in chains.

We must break the chains and open the prison doors.

II. GUY ALDRED'S TRIAL

By H. McSHANE

[Reprinted from the "Socialist," June 30, 1921. The heading is the one used by McShane.—Ed.]

The trial of Guy Aldred, Miss Patrick, D. McLeish, and A. Fleming took place at the High Court, held in Glasgow on the 20th June. The charge was one of sedition.

The local members of the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Party, on the advice of Guy Aldred, had issued a paper of their own entitled the Red Commune. Only one number of the paper appeared. The articles were mostly taken from other papers. Extracts here and there formed the indictment.

The judge was Lord Skerrington. Out of a jury of fifteen, eight were women.

Mr. Morton appeared for A. Fleming. Fleming is the printer, and has no connection with the Party.

At the outset, Mr. Morton raised the question of relevancy, but his objections were overruled by the judge.

Among the articles complained of was one entitled "Our Word to You." Another was an article, "Boycott Parliament," by Col. Malone, M.P.

Guy Aldred also raised objection to the proceedings. He quoted Lord Justice Coleridge, who stated that a man is entitled to express his opinion on any subject, and that courts and juries were not judges in such matters. He pointed out that a revolution by a majority was constitutional. He said further that sedition changed its meaning from age to age. What was considered sedition at one period becomes part of the constitution at another period. He said that despite these things, the law still remained the same.

The judge overruled all the objections.

Detective-Lieutenant McGimpsey was the first witness. He started off by relating the history of the Glasgow Communist Group. After he had spoken for some time, Guy Aldred wanted to know what all this had to do with the charge. McGimpsey also gave evidence regarding a visit paid to Miss Patrick's house.

He was followed by Superintendent Keith and a few other police witnesses.

Evidence was given about a visit to Burnbank Gardens.

Further evidence was given regarding the arrest of Aldred.

Accounts were produced in court to show that there were transactions between the G.C.G. and Fleming.

Aldred questioned the witnesses frequently and effectively.

One of the police witnesses was questioned closely regarding Aldred's arrest. Aldred asked at what time the warrant was issued for his arrest. The reply was, four o'clock on the afternoon of March the 2nd. The witness did not know that Aldred was in London. A visit was paid the same night, at eight o'clock, to Bakunin House in Glasgow.

Aldred then wanted to know how it was that he was arrested in London the same day at four o'clock. Aldred said that according to law before a man can be arrested in London the warrant must be endorsed by a London Magistrate. The witness said that his warrant was endorsed by a London Magistrate, but Aldred said that was on the 5th March, but he had been in prison from the 2nd.

All the witnesses for the prosecution were police except one young lady who had been a former minute secretary of the Group. She was called and questioned regarding whether or not Aldred was present on the night on which the Group had decided to issue the paper. She could not say.

Witnesses were then called to testify to the character of A. Fleming. Among the witnesses there appeared a schoolmaster, a clergyman, a doctor, and a Quaker. They all stated that Fleming had done good work among children, and that so far as they knew he would not in any way help in the spreading of sedition! The Advocate Depute questioned them pretty closely regarding the cartoon in the Red Commune.

In the cartoon a worker is portrayed as stamping out crowns, eagles, and several other things representing militarism, and various forms of authority. Among these things is a Bible. The Advocate Depute made the most of that, but Aldred put another interpretation on it which entirely altered the complexion of things.

No witnesses were called for Aldred, McLeish or Miss Patrick.

The Advocate Depute spoke for the prosecution. He went over all the sections of the indictment, making the most of every point.

He was followed by counsel for Fleming, who contended that Fleming was not responsible. He held that there was no sedition in the paper. He quoted some parts which he said he could not understand, and which could only be described as "a mouthful of words." If there was sedition then Fleming could not be blamed as he was very busy at the time the paper was printed.

He was followed by Guy Aldred.

Aldred at the outset stated that he was defending McLeish and Miss Patrick. The judge said that since he was not a member of the Faculty he could not do so, but, he said, that his statement had no meaning because the other accused could adopt Aldred's defence as their own. Aldred was allowed to leave the dock and face the jury.

He was easily the smartest man in the court. He stood upright and his voice was clear. Nothing short of a verbatim report would do justice to his speech. He charged the other side with conspiracy and sedition. He quoted legal authorities freely. He pointed out that sedition was not an ordinary offence like murder or theft. It all depended on what interpretation one put on your statements, and it changed with circumstances. He mentioned the fact that some time ago the Liberals raised the cry of "Abolish the House of Lords," and that was not sedition. "If the Lords why not the Commons." He characterised the prosecution as dishonest, and said that honesty was often on the side of defence. He didn't think it criminal to express his opinion, but it would be criminal to surrender his right to do so. His method was to start a campaign to convert the people by reason. He mentioned that some of the articles in connection with which he was charged had been published previously by the Forward and the Worker. He asked if the authorities had been sleeping when these articles first appeared. He spoke about the fact that the indictment was composed of extracts from the articles. He said, "When you read a paper, one or two words don't come out and hit you on the eye." Much fuss had been made of the statement in the paper, about making war on the Parliamentary Communists. On this matter Aldred quoted the fact that Bunyan always spoke in military terms. He also quoted the hymn, "Onward Christian Soldiers." It simply meant "'fight the good fight with all your might,' that's what I'm doing at the present time." At one stage he described the prosecution as "futile, stupid and imbecile." His speech finished nicely. He had stated openly where he stood, and left it to the jury to decide. He didn't ask for "not proven" but "not guilty."

The judge summed up in the usual way. He said that a cartoon is never sedition. He also said that to demand a change of Government by "Act of Parliament" ws all right, but any other method was sedition. He ended by telling the jury that they had first to decide whether or not the articles complained of were seditious and if so were the accused responsible. After an absence of a few minutes the jury returned a verdict of "guilty." The jury were unanimous with one exception.

Mr. Morton asked for leniency for Fleming.

Aldred took full responsibility, and suggested that he should get the heavier sentence.

Miss Patrick said that she was prepared to take her share of the responsibility, and did not desire Guy Aldred to take her share of the punishment.

D. McLeish said that he took his share of the responsibility, and had no desire to shelter behind "Comrade Aldred."

Lord Skerrington then passed sentence on all accused. Guy Aldred, one year; D. McLeish, 3 months; Miss Patrick, 3 months; A. Fleming, 3 months, and £50 fine, failing payment of which another three months' imprisonment.

(To be concluded.)

RICHARD LEE'S ANTI-WAR HERESY

UNITARIAN WAR DISCOURTESY CONSIDERED

We are somewhat surprised at our Unitarian contemporary, The Inquirer.

In its issue for June 14, 1941 (page 200, No. 5163) it published the following editorial attack on The Word, and on the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., of Coventry, for writing in our columns:

"UNITARIANS AND THE HOLY WAR"

The Inquirer receives—as probably a number of Unitarian ministers receive—a contemporary, which, although unconnected with any particular movement, prints in the current number what it calls Unitarian notes. It also contains an article by the Rev. Richard Lee, of Coventry, entitled "Unitarians and the Holy War." The article purports to be an account of certain phases of the last annual meeting of the General Assembly. Mr. Lee writes of the resolution on Peace Aims, moved from the chair by Mr. P. M. Oliver, and seconded by the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, as follows.—

"The mover of the resolution in his address from the chair and the seconder acted far otherwise. One speaker spoke of the war as having its cause in a beer-cellar at Munich. The other questioned whether the Treaty of Versailles was not too lenient for the guilt of the Germans who made the last war.

"As a considerable proportion of the audience resented this war manufactured history these garbled versions were not allowed to pass without protest. One speaker of the pacifist group, among other arguments aroused a violent storm by pointing out that we were doing the same things as the Nazis in Bremen., Hamburg and Berlin and boasting about it.

"We were not such Holy Innocents as the war-supporters pictured us. When another speaker got up to show how the post-war treament of Germany had created Hitlerism, the British Nazis cried "Vote, Vote, Vote," and the closure was applied."

Mr. Lee's special interpretation of the first two speeches was made by him also, soon after the meeting, in the correspondence columns of "The Inquirer." Since it was ignored there it can be ignored here. As to the implications of the second paragraph only those present at the meeting can judge, and Mr. Lee can be left with his own particular dramatisation of what took place. But the third paragraph does not need comment. Perhaps it was not possible for Mr. Lee to indicate that the speaker referred to was himself, neither may it have been possible for him to say that the billed end of the meeting had arrived when he got up to speak, neither, perhaps, was it possible for him to appreciate that the discussion into which he desired to intervene had little to do with the resolution, and the extraneous matters with which the discussion dealt had been most ably put from different sides; but common courtesy might have suggested to him that at that late hour, most delegates wanted the meeting to end. Instead he chooses to assume an air of pugnacious persecution and to call his fellow Unitarians "British Nazis."

Mr. Lee chooses his own violence of language, and makes his own dramatisation of events—and in spite of that will be understood by many who disagree with him. But to traduce a meeting conducted with scrupulous fairness (the closure was put to the meeting and carried by a large majority), in an outside paper that is willing to take his account, is hardly a promising introduction into the peaceful world brotherhood in which, apparently, he believes.

The tone of this article shows how thoroughly the spirit of war has conquered the spirit of love and understanding which is supposed to be the inspiration of all Christians. Such understanding is alleged to find full expression in the lives and conduct of Unitarians because of the persecution they have experienced for their heresies. Yet our friend, the editor of The Inquirer, casts aside all pretence of charity and even ordinary secular courtesy. He states that The Word—which he does not name but mentioned in a roundabout way as a certain type of contemporary—is unconnected with any particular movement. The writer of this nonsense has followed our career as well as any man in the kingdom and knows that we have been connected with the Socialist, Anarchist, and Freethought movements for over thirty-five years. This sneer is untrue in substance and in form. It only means that at the beginning of our rebel thinking days we stepped outside the popular carerist alleged expressions of the Labour movements. We have stood for the spirit of progress and not relied on the machinery of power and corruption. Is this an offence in the eyes of our Unitarian editor? With what particular movement was Jesus connected? If we remember our reading rightly, no particular movement sorrowed for him at his execution. Did the Unitarians, either in England or the United States in their best days, form an actual organised movement. We gathered that they existed rather in spirit, yet very definitely, than in organisational form.

Failure to name The Word is cowardice. If he wanted to attack The Word, the editor of The Inquirer ought to have attacked honourably and openly.

What connection has the reference to "any particular movement" to the fact that we printed "Unitarian Notes." They were Unitarian Notes. We have published in our columns articles by, and appreciations of, the Rev. H. J. Adlard, of Bath, with records of his great United States activity, for which our contemporary had no room. Was that wrong? Or does our contemporary wish excellent work to be buried in oblivion unless its editor pleases to take official notice? So would the Pharisees have silenced Jesus, and the Trinitarian Churches have rendered futile the work of the Unitarian pioneers.

Our contemporary sneers at the thought that a number of Unitarian ministers receive The Word. Is it afraid? Of course we conduct a postal mission, as means permit. Of course we sometimes send copies to the Unitarian ministers. We pay them the undeserved compliment of believing that they are free spirits and willing participators in any feast of Truth and of reason to which they may be invited. We did not realise that they were so busy over secular affairs and careerism that Truth meant nothing to them. We believed them guilty of so much promising spirituality. Unfortunately, it was promising only, but not vital. Too many Unitarian speakers are incapable of maturity.

Our contemporary passes to the real complaint. The Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., well-known in the Labour movement of Great Britain, a personal friend and a doughty opponent of the present writer, a fearless Anti-Militarist speaker and a pioneer enemy of Fascism, wrote an article in our columns attacking Unitarians for being pro-war! What unforgiveable heresy!

The Inquirer complains that Richard Lee wrote for "an outside paper that is willing to take his account." This slurs not only Richard Lee, but also ourself. It implies that, knowing the account to be false, we were willing to publish such an account. This is libellous.

We are not willing to publish false accounts. We are anxious to publish the truth. We were willing to publish Richard Lee's account because we know him to be a fearless propagandist of the Truth as he sees it. He was victimised in Glasgow for serving the Truth and he has sacrificed careerism in the Labour movement for the sake of Truth. Further, our contemporary does not deny the truth of his writings. It only seeks to explain the circumstances. He who excuses himself, accuses himself.

There was indignation and not violence in Richard Lee's writing.

Richard Lee is sneered at for not mentioning that the speaker who did not receive a fair hearing was himself. Was that necessary? Is it not enough that, at the Unitarian Assembly, the Anti-War speaker, in war time, was greeted with cries of "Vote," "Vote?" Does the fact need specious explanation? Is the name of the speaker relevant?

Richard Lee refers to himself in an anonymous third person from modesty. The Inquirer resents such anonymity and demands that he name himself in an article which attacks, under anonymous description, The Word.

Had we attacked The Inquirer by innuendo it would have been from cowardice allied to discourtesy. We conclude that editorial rules are the same, no matter who the editor may be, or what the alleged status of the paper.

The Inquirer, for July 26, published the following reply by Richard Lee to its unworthy editorial:—

Sir,—Your article of June 14 has only reached me to-day. Though my comment is belated I hope you may be able to publish it. Your anonymous contributor asserts that my proposed contribution at the Assembly and the discussion were irrelevant and had nothing to do with the resolution.

Our attitude to our own past and to our own wrongdoing in 1919 has everything to do with the possibility of that happy future pictured in the resolution. It is entirely relevant to the resurrection of the better German mind without which Europe will be a desolation of the ages.

"Our deeds still travel with us from afar
And what we have been makes us what we are."

As to the other point raised. The Nazi spirit is to suppress all opinions except the one official view which is divinely right.

I do not blame the chairman or those responsible for keeping to time but the noisy minority who interrupted Mr. Spencer and were unwilling to stay five minutes to hear the other side did manifest that intolerance which is very contagious in war-times.—Yours,

RICHARD LEE.

Coventry.

The Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., of Liverpool, and the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., of Coventry, adopted the correct Christian and Unitarian position. They are uncompromising Anti-Militarists, but with charity of mind towards the rank-and-file victims of militarism. The official Unitarian position is neither Christian nor Unitarian. It is simply a chaos of statist war theology, paganism labelled Christian; a diabolical riot of murderous mock respectability, utterly unforgiveable when engaged in by alleged heretics and the children of heretics. Statism knows nothing about heresy. The spirit of war is the spirit of thoughtless violence and orthodoxy. No genuine Unitarian can uphold it, express it, or compromise with it.

WAR AND CHRISTIANITY

IS THERE A FUNDAMENTAL CONTRADICTION?

REV. SIDNEY SPENCER'S POSITION

The discussion between Richard Lee and the editor of The Inquirer, considered in another column, directs attention to the anti-war position adopted by the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., of Liverpool. Sidney Spencer is a vigorous and consistent anti-militarist and we are tempted to recall a sermon he delivered over a year ago to the congregation of Hope Street Church, Liverpool.

Preaching on the evening of Sunday, July 14, 1940, Mr. Spencer asked if the recent outer change in events called for a corresponding revision of their inner attitude. Since the outbreak of war, the proportion of men taking the stand for conscience sake had fallen very considerably. Well-known people like Mr. C. E. M. Joad, Bertrand Russell, and Miss Maud Royden, felt, under the circumstances, they could no longer maintain a rooted opposition to all war. Were they right?

We spoke sometimes of "the Christian conscience," but the conscience of Christian people was not something fixed and final. A Christian leader like Martin Luther declared that war was an essential element in God's scheme for the world. But Erasmus taught that war was completely wrong, and the early Unitarians—the "Socinians"—and the Anabaptists followed the same rule.

Luther and Erasmus both sincerely tried to do what was right. One believed in war; the other rejected it. Could we decide between them?

Erasmus was not entirely alone, and behind him there was a certain tradition. To-day it was widely recognised that there was a common standard, a Christian spirit. By that test Erasmus, not Luther, was the true exponent of the law of Christ.

Even those who considered war was necessary were prepared to admit that war was anti-Christ! He had never been able to understand how it was possible to hold that position, and still to believe in Christianity. To him it seemed to involve a fundamental contradiction. The churches had advanced to the recognition of the fact of the essentially un-Christian character of war, and yet they could pray for the divine blessing and help on a method that in principle they condemned! The position was utterly lacking in moral consistency. If the Christian witness against war had any reality in it at all, it surely involved a renunciation of war.

The Christian position of opposition to war was not easy to maintain in war-time. It was so eminently contrary to the traditional national outlook and practice. But Christianity was essentially revolutionary. The only position that could be harmonised with the life and spirit of Christ was that which took its stand on the law of love, and rejected the way of war.

IS THE WAR A CHRISTIAN CRUSADE?

By The Rev. RICHARD LEE, M.A.

(Minister, New Street Meeting House, Coventry)

I have been handed a leaflet published by F. C. B., St. Stephen's Church, London, E.C.2. It states boldly and unashamedly what many Christian folk believe in a furtive, shamefaced sort of way that the war is being fought for the holy cause of Christianity. The leaflet ends thus:—

IN THE NAME OF CHRIST
We can win this war,
We must win this war, and
We WILL win this war.

The clergyman who writes the leaflet holds among others things,

That killing others in war is taking up the Cross of Jesus.

That war is the only way to subdue evil.

That Pacifists are disloyal not only to the State but to Christ.

That Jesus counselled his disciples to buy swords and use them.

These are the easy assumptions of F.C.B., and of millions of others, which I want to examine.

There is one thing in the leaflet with which one may be in agreement—"Nazism is an evil thing and must be destroyed." There are, however, some glaring errors as to the causes of Nazism, the methods of its destruction and the attitude of Christ to modern war.

Let us begin with the practical situation. This leaflet is blind to the facts as to what Nazism is and its causes.

(1) Nazism is a disease. It is an aggravated form of Nationalism and Imperialism. It is caused by other Imperialisms, including our own. The deeper causes of the war will not be touched by killing millions of Germans.

(2) We helped to create Nazism by joining with France to make the League of Nations a farce and a hypocrisy. We refused to fulfil our pledge to secure all-round disarmament and revise the Treaties. Had we done this there would have been no Hitler and no war.

(3) The only people who can destroy Hitlerism are the German people themselves. A minority would be against him now if they thought Britain would make a just peace. But they were tricked before, and have no reason to think that they will be any better treated this time.

(4) A moral and spiritual disease can only be destroyed by moral and spiritual remedies. It is nonsense, wicked nonsense, to think that cowardly bombing, poison gas, food destruction, brothels and all the other beastly methods of modern war can overcome evil.

(5) To quote the example of Christ in favour of modern war is the most blasphemous part of the leaflet. The Spirit of Christ is utterly opposed to casting out evil by means of doing evil. Paul summed up the whole attitude of Christ's life and death in the words—"Be not overcome of evil but overcome evil with good." The Sermon on the Mount is a dead letter if we are permitted to destroy our enemies by mangling little children and defenceless old men and women.

(6) The two passages used to support modern war have nothing to do with it directly, but indirectly may support the peace position.

Jesus did not drive out the money-changers by violence; He used his moral power to compel them to leave the temple. The money changers with their friends could have beaten down Jesus in a few moments by force.

When Jesus advised his disciples to buy a sword and they brought two swords, he replied: "It is enough" (Luke 22, v. 36). It is quite clear all that Jesus meant was that his disciples would have to withstand evil forces. The sword was symbolical, as when it was said that a sword would pierce the heart of Mary. The reply, "It is enough," showed how Jesus was grieved at the dense minds of his disciples.

(7) The leaflet ignores the example of Paul and the Christian Church in the first three centuries. Paul was a fighter and had to meet with physical violence, but he never used violence. He believed supremely in the power of the Spirit and not in carnal weapons. For three centuries Christians took no part in war, they condemned it both in word and deed. They followed their Master's example.

(8) The alternative policy is to confess our own wrong and be willing to turn away from it into the way of mutual aid and brotherhood.

The longer the war the worse the peace. Even while the war is waging the terms of peace should be discussed and the peoples should know how they could end the war.

What Lloyd George said before the war is true now even, if only some leader had the courage to act on it and guide this people out of darkness, the cruelty and the cowardly falsehood of war into the light, the love and the truth of a real peace.

"The only chance of a world peace is an assembly of nations to discuss without reference to past experiments or present ideologies the best means of a just and desirable world peace." Where is the statesman who will take this project in hand and will press it through? His name will endure forever as one of the greatest benefactors of mankind.

"Victory" is a mirage unworthy of the minds of sensible folk.

"Victory" can never bring peace.

To get peace we must seek it earnestly and seek it now.

EDITOR'S APOLOGY

Our circulation last month was very big. We reprinted several times, yet the August issue is completely out of print, and many orders could not be executed. We have done our best but we could not overcome the paper difficulty. Last month we far exceeded our February printing when we also went right out of print, after a very big circulation. A similar fate befel our June issue.

In November, 1940, we issued a special appeal for £1,971 11s. 3d. Last month that deficit stood at £1,825 10s. 9d. The August response has been the best response so far. The matter is urgent and we do not want to stop printing. We also want to list the donations received and end this appeal. Unless the sum requested is received our work must stop. At present we are staggering along. A Birmingham working man comrade sent £3, almost anonymously, and very simply. Lady Clare Annesley sent £10, because she felt how urgent is the struggle towards pacifism and reason. Other comrades sent donations with splendid letters. A few visited the George Street shop. Many who could give little, and some who could give nothing, either wrote or came in person to thank us for our work. The total return last month was £45 16s. 4d. This leaves the deficit at £1,780 14s. 5d. As stated last month, this is to make up the loss as it stood in November, 1940. Since then there has been a steady monthly loss. If we can obtain the sum mentioned we can carry on for a long time without making further appeals. We hate to beg but comrades we must. The work is urgent. Without your immediate response we must close down. We apologise, but—!

ON THE ROCKS AND WHY

By C. H. NORMAN

[This essay was written for publication in the June 1941 issue. The Soviet situation changed as we went to press and we held the essay over. The author wishes to be judged by the fundamental principle he expounds and is unwilling to change his writing to suit altered circumstances. Comrade Norman writes with some authority on diplomacy and international relations, and his approach merits thoughtful study. We publish it as a contribution to the understanding of the present sorry political situation.—Ed.]

The writer of this article is a survivor of the small minority of English people who were opposed to the Lansdowne-King Edward VII-Sir Edward Grey policy of the Anglo-French Entente not because of any hostility to France, but because, on a long view, that policy was certain to produce the calamities which have befallen Europe since its initiation. It is also worth remembering that the latent hostility between France and Germany (which was deliberately kept alive by French gangsters like Clemenceau, Poincare and Co., and fostered by Englishmen like Winston Churchill, Leo Maxse, and others in the period from 1908 till 1914), was not the only element contributing to the inflaming of European political society in that period. The Imperialism which has brought the British Empire to its present grave state of peril began its acute development with the bombardment of Alexandria, the suppression of Arabi Pasha, the bleeding of Egypt at the instance of the European and British bondholders, ending with the catastrophe of the piratical war, conducted by "methods of barbarism," as Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman described it, against the Transvaal and Orange Free State Republics. As the United States is proclaiming its humanitarian interest in the second European War it may be worth noting that Dollar Diplomacy, as instanced by the use made of the sinking of "The Maine" in Havana Harbour in justifying the predatory war against Spain by the United States in 1898, and the seizure of the Panama Province of the Colombian Republic in 1904, was a main principle of the Anglo-American Imperialism which has so largely led to the existing catastrophic position*.

It is fashionable for writers like Sir Robert Vansittart, by distorting some matters and ignoring others, to throw the whole blame on the German race; but the above brief recital of undoubted historical facts, well within the memory of millions of people living, will demonstrate how unfounded and ridiculous such a view is.

Passing to more recent events, the terrible error committed by the Allies in 1919-1920 was in ignoring the advice given by the Duke of Wellington at the conclusion of the Napoleonic Wars that not a foot of French territory was to be taken from France. The partitions of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, which were imposed on the defeated in 1919, had no moral, economic or political justification. Accompanied as they were by the partition of Russian territories and a campaign, engineered and carried on without the consent of the House of Commons by Mr. Winston Churchill against the Bolshevik Revolution, they were the height of insanity, for it was certain as anything could be that, unless those partitions were revoked by agreement, the enemy of 1914, Germany, and the friend of 1914, Russia, would unite against Britain and France to shatter those partitions and repudiate the documents which were their sanction. Germany and Russia waited from 1919 till 1933, but neither England, France, nor the League of Nations attempted to put into force the clauses in the Treaties providing for their revision, should a demand for revision be made. The partitioned countries (a fact carefully concealed from the English people), began asking for revision in 1923.

It is complained against the Vichy Government that their acts have been in betrayal of the "Cause of democracy," whatever that phrase may mean, as the three protagonists of democracy were the caste-ridden society of England, the corrupt plutocracy of the United States, and the rogue-banker bureaucracy of France. But the collapse of France was inevitable in 1940 with Russia abstaining from participation in the war. What happened in France in 1940 would have happened in France in 1914-1915 had it not been for the enormous pressure put upon Germany and Austria by the Russian Armies until the Battle of the Marshes. All the thanks that Russia received was to see her territories partitioned and her revolution blockaded and sabotaged by her allies, France and England, in 1918-1920. It was natural for Stalin to decline to pull the chestnuts out of the fire which was lit in Europe by the mad act of guaranteeing the Polish frontiers as defined in 1919, a guarantee which was valueless without Russian military support. Those who prate about the voice of the people controlling English policy might tell us when the British people authorised Mr. Chamberlain to enter upon such a suicidal pact as the one with Poland. The House of Commons may have sanctioned or confirmed his act when it could do nothing else: but the House of Commons was certainly never elected on such an issue. The House of Commons has far exceeded any mandate granted by the people, and most of its proceedings since 1938 have been proceedings against the interests and welfare of those who in good faith elected it on quite other issues. Moreover, those who had travelled in France in 1937, possessed of any kind of insight and feeling for atmosphere, knew well that the clique of politicians, financiers and Left Wing Jingoes who were clamouring for war against the Nazi system were totally un-representative of French opinion; just as are General de Gaulle and his farcical "Free French" movement to-day. The French women were wholly against any adventure of the kind. France in 1914-1918 had lost 1,900,000 dead out of an effective male military age population of about 10,000,000. No country could be expected to face such a bloodletting a second time in 20 years. Not the least of the many dis-services Mr. Winston Churchill, in a somewhat maleficent career, has committed against his country, was the way he misled Mr. Chamberlain and the Cabinet of that day on the true attitude of France on the German question.

Another example of the incapacity of the present Prime Minister and his colleagues was shown during the Russo-Finnish conflict. At that period Great Britain was being pushed by these men into war in aid of Finland. But for the impossibility of rendering effective aid to Finland except with the assistance of the Swedish State, Great Britain and France would long ago have been involved by their respective governments in war with Russia over Finland. One has only to examine the existing military position to reflect how much graver it would have been had the Germans been backed since 1940 by the active strength of Russia. It is not going too far to assume that the British Empire by now would have been close on destruction. Had Russia chosen to regard the actions of Britain and France in the Finnish War as a casus belli, no one could have been surprised at that result of the misplaced belligerency shown by the British and French Parliaments during that time.

A further disastrous error of judgment may be seen in the policy of the blockade adopted by Churchill & Co. In the nineties an American naval captain, Captain Mahan, obtained some reputation by the production of several pseudo-historical works beloved by a certain type of American mind, the most renowned of which was called "The Influence of Sea Power upon History." The book is filled with the most absurd fallacies in reasoning and has been heavily criticised on the technical side by some Japanese naval writers; but it must be confessed the book has kept its hold in U.S.A. and British naval circles, with the melancholy results which are before the watching world. The book strengthened its reputation by the apparent justification of its argument in the effectiveness of the blockade of Germany in 1914-1918. But the deductions drawn from the Napoleonic War are quite unsound so far as the blockade of England is concerned, as at that time the blockade was only a trade blockade, because England was self-supporting then in the matter of food, only having a population of about eleven millions. The contentions of Captain Mahan are only sound if the blockading power has overwhelming naval strength at its command, and if the blockaded power is exceptionally dependent on other states for various articles of necessity in war time. The position in the War of 1939—is quite different in that respect to the position in the War of 1914-1918 when the blockade was utilised to enforce the Peace Terms on Germany, Austria, and other states. Then the blockade was conducted by the joint efforts of the British, French, Italian, Russian, Japanese, United States and other fleets, which were able to operate with much more elasticity than is possible to-day. Also those fleets were not subject to air attack to anything like the extent that the fleets of to-day are. What is the comparative situation now? The British Fleet has had the partial assistance of the French and the United States Fleets for a short period. The Italian, French, and Japanese Fleets are to-day not available at all but contain within them the possibilities of use against Britain should the United States become a full belligerent. The British Fleet also has been helped by the Dutch Fleet and several smaller naval units. Germany started the war in 1939 at a relative naval disadvantage as compared with her strength in 1914, as, owing to loyal adherence to the Anglo-German Naval Treaty of 1935, the German Fleet had not maintained its proportionate power in effective naval units. Against that, however, there is the curious fact that every merchant ship over 3000 tons sailing the seas in peace time is carrying as part of its cargo goods destined directly or indirectly for England. In the war of 1914-1918, the small maritime nations, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Holland and Greece were neutral. Four of these countries have been involved in the present war, with the result that there has been a tremendous lay-up of merchant shipping which did not occur in the last war. Then there has been the policy of scuttling ships which is a new factor in reducing available tonnage, combined with the circumstance that the British naval authorities have embarked on the destruction of hostile shipping by submarine and other methods not adopted in the last war. So the wastage of merchant shipping tonnage, for many reasons, has been so far proportionately on a greater scale in this war than in 1914-1918. Should Russia and Japan, both of which have powerful submarine fleets, enter the war on the German side, all the theories of Captain Mahan, which are the governing factor in the naval strategy of Mr. Churchill and his advisers, will collapse completely in their application, as they have shown every sign of doing since the withdrawal of the French Navy from active operations.

Incidentally, one may observe that Professor Beesly, in his essay on the growth and use of British Sea Power, in the series of essays on International Politics, issued by the Positivist Society in the eighties, is very cutting and sarcastic about the English attitude on the alleged beneficial results of the English mastery of the sea. A powerful naval ship capturing a merchant vessel on its noble avocation of transporting merchandise and food from one part of the world to another is doing nothing more than acting as the armed highwayman who held up the citizen on Hounslow Heath and robbed him of all he possessed. The merchant ship is helpless under the guns of the battleship or cruiser which may be its captor and has no option but to follow the directions of the naval commander. It is a little strong for a country which has specialised in that kind of warfare to pride itself, as England always does, upon its meritorious conduct in international policy; in fact it is humbug from beginning to end. In that particular essay, Professor Beesly quoted the words under the portrait of Pitt hanging in the Guildhall: "Presented by the merchants of the City of London in recognition of Mr. Pitt's policy in advancing the trade and commerce of London by war." Perhaps there is a certain Nemesis in what has befallen the Guildhall and that portrait in recent times.

Though to the casual looker-on, the events of the day would suggest that the power of the State over the individual has increased to such an extent that the English and European peoples have practically reverted to a state of slavery, the development of air warfare is really evidence of the breakdown of the State in its primary justification of protecting the individual citizen in time of war. Notwithstanding the sacrifice of half his income, notwithstanding military and industrial conscription, notwithstanding the destruction of every kind of guarantee from the Great Charter, the Petition of Right and Habeas Corpus, the individual citizen must look after himself, his family and his property in air warfare. All the power of the State has not prevented the Temple and many parts of the City of London being reduced to ruins, while the casualties among the civil population have reached a figure never touched in modern warfare. Mr. Churchill and Sir Archibald Sinclair may tell us, with glib assurance, that "the R.A.F. has command of the air," just as the same gentlemen and others tell us that "the British Navy has command of the seas," but one can only wonder at the surprising results to the British people of these boasts and vauntings. Mr. Churchill told the people when he was First Lord of the Admiralty in the autumn of 1939 that the U-boat menace was under control; but in 1941 the losses by U-boat activity remain as great as ever. It may be unkind to recall these statements to memory, but the fact that they can be made, so recklessly and wantonly, is the best evidence of the defective judgment of those in command of high matters at the present time. It was Mr. Churchill's Government which instituted the campaign of night-bombing against Germany after the Dunkirk evacuation. Then the people were told that the German Air Force could not engage in night bombing with any efficiency, as they had not been trained in that regard. It was an insane policy to begin, considering how inferior in numbers the British Air Force was to the German Air Force. The fact that the German Air Force, with its overwhelming superiority in numbers, was practically inactive in air attacks on England (except on naval and military stations) from September 1939 to September 1940 was evidence that the German Government had no desire to engage upon unrestricted air warfare till challenged by the English campaign of night bombing. It is absurd to excuse the English night bombing on the principle that the English bombs are only directed against military objectives. Night bombing on either side is subject to the handicap that the objective cannot be seen with any accuracy whether the objective be on German or British soil, as the shades of darkness are as neutral as the moonlight in both countries.

It is, apparently, admitted by Mr. Churchill in recent speeches that the British people have been led by him and his colleagues into such a sad plight that the only hope of survival or success is through the active intervention of the United States, which is still a little coy at being invited into the slaughter-house. It must be pointed out that this calculation is as defective as the rest of Mr. Churchill's estimates have been. It is true that the intervention of the United States in the war of 1914-1918 was as decisive as the blockade in defeating the Germans then. But there was no possibility in 1917 of any countermove by Germany to American intervention. That is not the position on this occasion. The victory of Pitt and the Holy Alliance against Napoleon and the principles of the French Revolution established reaction in Europe for over half-a-century. That will not be allowed to happen in 1941 or 1942 or 1952, or whenever the decision may take place in a collapsed Europe and America, as it is plain that Russia, Japan, Spain, France, Italy and Germany, plus a number of lesser States, are determined on seeing that the Anglo-American-Dutch plutocracy will not retain the hold which it has exercised over the world for the past seventy years. That is why the state of affairs is so serious. Europe may not like the Nazi system but they are not prepared to face again a domination such as occurred after 1918 of Europe by the Anglo-American plutocracy, which reduced the Central European peasantry to a lower standard of life than that obtaining in the Middle Ages. The control of agriculture by industry, the control of trade by gold, the control of the seas by the blockade are the three things which the British Empire, the United States and Holland (through the Dutch Indies) stand for in the eyes of Europe and all those three things are anathema to the citizens of Europe, who believe they represent reaction and degradation.

It is well therefore that the British people should understand clearly what a catastrophe may be lying ahead of them should this war continue on the present lines of policy, which is based upon some fantastic idea of imposing upon Europe some system of government which is wholly discredited in the countries of origin judging by the refusal of over 50 per cent. of the population to exercise the franchise. All attempts in the past to impose systems of government on powerful States by means of war have failed completely and there is certainly no sign that the present crusade against what is called National Socialism is likely to have any greater success.

The madness of warfare as a method of achieving any result when powerful combinations are engaged on both sides cannot better be demonstrated than by the following quotation of the lines put on the graveside of Rupert Brooke, the young English poet, who died in the Greek island of Scyros while on service with the Navy during the last war, 1914-1918. This is a translation of the Greek inscription written by the Greek interpreter with the British forces and placed on the cross of the grave:—

"Here lies the servant of God, Sub-Lieutenant in the British Navy, who died for the deliverance of Constantinople from the Turks."

Constantinople is still in the hands of the Turks who are much-courted as a possible ally by the British Combination in the present war!

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—Will you please be good enough to send me the August Word and the Duke of Bedford's Parliament and Peace. Seeing the name, Guy A. Aldred, seems like old times when I used to listen to him in Brockwell Park, London.

Yours for a bit of sanity.

W. A. GREATWOOD.

Stonehouse, Glos., August 7.

Dear Aldred,—Please forward to an old comrade a copy of The Word. You may not remember my name but we were faithful comrades in resisting militarism during the 1914-18 war.

Your comrade in the struggle.

F. W. CARTER.

Hillingdon, August 7.

Dear Comrade,—I want to say that I appreciate your work for pacifism and socialism, and regret that my measure of assistance is so little. With the most fraternal of good wishes,

Yours fraternally,

GEORGE WILLIAMS.

Manchester, August 5.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—As you are undoubtedly aware, the New Leader "once again" has been making some "amazing predictions." The Prince Paul Government of Jugoslavia contained Dr. Matcheck as Vice-Premier. When this Government was overthrown by Limovitch, Dr. Matcheck remained Vice-Premier. This was heralded by the New Leader as the beginning of workers' revolts across Europe. You know, the little groups here and there stunts.

A week before Russia was invaded, the editorial column of the New Leader prophesied this as most unlikely and declared that it was capitalist wishful thinking.

All this irrelevance may be added to Brockway's prediction, made in 1932, that within four years, there would be a bloodless revolution in Britain. This was reproduced in The Word for September, 1940.

Yours fraternally,

GEORGE PLUME.

Edmonton, N.9, July 26.

Rash prophecy is an unfortunate tendency of I.L.P. leaders. James Maxton has spoken boldly against the war, and on behalf of conscientious objectors and IBB prisoners in the House of Commons. We record these facts gladly. Nevertheless, he also had the tendency to play the foolish rôle of prophet.

On August 21, 1931, James Maxton made a speech in which he forecast the collapse of capitalism not later than February, 1931. He said:—

I am perfectly satisfied that the great capitalist system . . . is now at the stage of final collapse . . . They may postpone the collapse for a month, two months, three months, six months, but collapse is sure and certain.

(Daily Record, Glasgow, Aug. 22nd, 1931.)

Six months later, namely, February, 1932, the I.L.P. was planning to bring out the New Leader in a new and improved form!

This is very much like the prophet Baxter, who used to run The Christian Herald. Everyone knows how he made investments that contradicted his prophecies as to the end of the world, and from time to time, advanced the date of his prophecies, when their fulfilment failed. Speaking in the House of Commons, on April 8, 1932, Maxton made another try. He said:—

I believe it will crash within measurable time, because I do not think that anything that we are doing now will do more than postpone the inevitable act.

(Hansard, April 8, Col. 476.)

The "two, three or six months" of August, 1931, gave place to the wise vagueness of "within measurable time" of April, 1932.

This is not an attack on Maxton. It is an interesting, illuminating and quaintly amusing record of fact. And it has a factual moral.—Ed.

Dear Sir,—I was sent two copies of the June issue of your admirable paper, The Word, some little time back. I had not heard of The Word till then. Thank you for it. I suppose your open letter to Winston Churchill is not printed as a leaflet.

Yours faithfully,

DOROTHY HOLMS.

Bath, August 6.

Dear Comrade Editor,—A.B.C. I have read many alphabets, political, religious, militarist, anti-militarist. But I think we might have a "Communist" one. A.B.C.—A Burlesque Communist. Just now we are enjoying the tragedy of the burlesque.

I listened to a "Communist" meeting recently. I was amused at the cross-examination of the C.P. speaker by a poorly-clad passer-by. He put three series of questions:—

(1) How could the victory of Russia and Britain secure a lasting peace, if Russia really stood for Socialism, and Britain remained capitalistic. Was not Communism diametrically opposed to Capitalism? Had the speaker forgotten about Archangel, Koltchak, etc.?

(2) Why had the Moscow broadcasts dropped playing the Internationale? Why did these broadcasts no longer mention the need for the triumph of "Communism" throughout the world?

(3) The Daily Worker was suspended for criticising the Government. The C.P. no longer wishes to criticise the war or the pursuit of war. It is now in with the Government and is prepared to dubb all genuine critics of the Government and the war, Fift-Columnists. Is it necessary, in the interests of truth, to withdraw the suspension?

I do not believe in any paper being suppressed and I am not defending the suppression of the Daily Worker in repeating those questions. Nor does the C.P. suffer much from the suppression, for it has other publications which circulate quite widely and serve as a substitute for the Worker. I repeat the questions because they raise points of interest.

Yours in Socialist Unity,

G. CALDWELL.

Glasgow, August 11.

Dear Guy,—Funny, but I don't seem to be disturbed at the thought of being shut up for a year, to cure me of conscience! I know that it is for the cause of pacifism. I am innocent of any crime against the moral and natural law. If refusal to be medically examined for purpose either of becoming cannon fodder, or reducing another man to such, merits imprisonment, then democracy does not exist for me. I could weep at times when I think of the Church upholding militarism, and of our apathetic churchmen who pay lip service to the name of Jesus.

Temptations against religion are, thank God, rare with me; but one thought bothers me a great deal. That is, why be attached to an organised body that promotes mass murder, or does not oppose it, but, ironically, shudders at abortion!

In the struggle, sincerely yours, a Catholic comrade,

PATRICK SCANLAN.

Dumfries, August 14.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Please accept this small gift of 10/- as a token of goodwill towards your movement and paper, The Word.

We think the title of the paper is very apt and choice, as it cuts out all the superficial, therefore seeking to give to the people The Word, the "TRUTH."

Your Comrades, of the Ashton Pacifist Group,

WILLIAM JOHNSON (Secretary).

JUDGE BURGIS

On Wednesday, July 1, Frank Metcalfe, poultry farmer, Bradshaw Street, Nelson, a member of the I.L.P., and an Atheist, was registered by the Preston Tribunal as a conscientious objector, on condition that he did whole-time land or civil defence work. Metcalfe said that he opposed war and military service on rational, humanitarian, and social grounds.

The chairman, Judge Burgis, said that Metcalfe had a depraved type of conscience.

On Thursday, June 9, the Manchester Tribunal registered for combatant military service, Philip Shelmerdine, of Wilmslow. Shelmerdine was converted to Catholicism in 1934 and is also a member of the British Union of Fascists. Shelmerdine opposed war until the collapse of France. He then became willing to soldier to defend the country. But he was interned under 18B. Recently he was released. He was unwilling to soldier now because of the invasion of Russia. He said that, as a Catholic, according to the latest Papal encyclical, a Catholic could not collaborate with Communists or Communism in any way, which makes nonsense to our mind. Shemerdine was bitter about his 18B internment. Here is the discussion between appellant and chairman on this point:—

Shelmerdine: Do you not think that in a democratic country a man should have the opportunity to answer the charges brought against him?

Judge Burgis: Not if it is against the safety of the State.

We think Judge Burgis's remarks in Metcalfe's case argues a bias against Atheism, though he granted exemption. We do not think Shelmerdine is a real conscientious objector, but we consider that Judge Burgis made an injudicial and illegal reply to his question. Shelmerdine was right and Burgis was wrong, utterly and unforgiveably wrong. His was the reply of inquisitors, tyrants, and persecutors down the ages. A man with the mind of Burgis ought not to seek a place in such ranks; for he has recorded remarkably just and painstaking decisions. His reply disgraced his better, juridical self.

The same day as the Shelmerdine lapse, Burgis made comment on the case of Arnold Baker, clerk, of Rosamond Street, Bolton, who was granted exemption by the tribunal on December 20, 1939. In January, 1941, when the Battle of the Atlantic was at its height, Arnold voluntarily joined the Liverpool steamer, Eurglochus, as a writer. Fourteen days later, on its first trip out, the ship was shelled off the Azores by a German surface raider. Of the 80 men in the steamer, more than 50 died. Young Arnold was on the bridge when the attack was made, voluntarily keeping look-out with the chief officer, Mr. John MacGregor.

When Chairman Burgis obtained news of the event he sought information from the chief officer, and received a long reply, which he read at the public sitting of the Manchester Tribunal on July 9. We quote part of Mr. John MacGregor's letter:—

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter in which you ask me to tell you of Arnold Baker's closing part in life. This I am honoured to do, although he bore such a wonderful Christian character that my words will never express the feeling I have in my heart for the youth who showed such wonderful courage and bravery in face of death without a single thought for himself. I knew that this young man was given unconditional exemption. . . .

When our ship was attacked with unbelievable brutality, Baker, who soon after leaving home had expressed his willingness to keep a look-out, was on the bridge with me but on the opposite side. Salvoes and guns of heavy calibre were firing from very close range. The bridge was struck and Baker noticed that the wheel had been left unattended. He immediately informed me of the fact and said, "I shall take it if you show me what to do." I went into the wheelhouse and explained to him and he stayed at the wheel until our steering-gear was wrecked. He then asked if there was anything else he could do. So I told him to make for his boat as the bridge was being shelled. At this point I was wounded, and I learned on inquiry that Baker was killed soon after he left the bridge. He certainly fulfilled his promise to pull his weight and died a wonderful example of courage and bravery.

Judge Burgis commented:—

"No words of mine are adequate to describe the grandeur of this young man's courage or the magnificence of his devotion to duty. One can only contemplate his conduct with silent reverence. His life and his death are the clearest justification of the privilege which Parliament has granted to conscience."

In this case, Judge Burgis, by insisting on full publicity of the facts, and the terms and tones of his comment, did justice to himself and to his office.

C.O. MICE, 1941

Section 13 of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, contains a provision designed to prevent any repetition of the "cat-and-mouse" treatment of conscientious objectors which disgraced the administration of the British Military Service Acts during 1916-1919. This provision gives to any man who through failure to establish his objection before a tribunal finds himself in the position of a disobedient soldier, and is sentenced by court-martial to three months' or more imprisonment, the right to have his case reheard by the Appellate Tribunal with a view to his discharge from the Army if he succeeds in establishing his case.

The War Office has sent round to all commands for the information of presidents of courts martial several documents which make this position clear. Several courts martial ignore these instructions, and make a practice of giving either long sentences of detention or sentences of imprisonment less than three months, the latter even for second and third offences. Either deprives the C.O. of the right of appeal, since "detention," even two years in duration, does not in law count as imprisonment.

In justification of a short sentence it is argued that the award is such as would have been given to any soldier committing a similar offence. The argument is unconvincing, because in 1916, when no right of appeal depended on the length of sentence awarded, conscientious objectors were regularly charged not with simple disobedience but with "disobedience in such a manner as to show wilful defiance of authority." Courts martial experienced, at that time, no compunction in awarding up to two years' imprisonment in such cases.

Fenner Brockway has directed the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the cases of more than seventy men who have failed to obtain a qualifying sentence at their first court martial, of whom fifteen failed similarly at their second court martial. As Principal G. H. Sutherland, of Dalton Hall, Manchester, remarks, either presidents of courts martial do not read the War Office documents sent to them for their information or they deliberately ignore them.

ROBERT TAYLOR

This is an appeal to Freethought readers. We wish to issue our "life" of Robert Taylor, better known as "The Devil's Chaplain," as No. 4 of The Word Library, Second Series. But our MS. is incomplete.

In The Freethinker for July 8, 1923, we commenced the biography of Robert Taylor that we wish to publish now in pamphlet form. Of the July 8 instalment, we have the first page (426), but we want the following page, 427.

The biography was continued in the columns of The Freethinker for July 29, August 26, and September 2, 1933. We have copies of these issues but would like duplicates. But the biography concluded in some later issue—maybe September 9, 1923, but we are not sure. Anyway, we have not got the issue containing the conclusion. Could any comrade lend it to us? It will be returned. Please write if able to assist.

We would like also to obtain copies of the Agnostic Journal, containing our serial "life" of Carlile, as it contained many references to Robert Taylor omitted from the book version. We have lost our copies.

UNITARIANISM AND WAR

"CHRISTIANITY AND COMPROMISE."

"We share to-day the life of a world at war. Our personal life is so bound up with the life of society as a whole that there is nothing that we can do to isolate ourselves from it. . . . We are all of us involved in the guilt and the responsibility which rest upon the world for the evil and devastation from which men are suffering. . . .

"What, then, can we do? People say sometimes that because we are involved to a greater or less extent in the war-effort (if only through our contribution to the revenue), therefore we should not attempt in any measure to stand aside. . . . Is that so? Are we of necessity involved, not merely in the partial compromise which is forced upon us by our membership of a community at war, but in an inner compromise of idea and principle, and in the active support of war which that entails?

"It does not follow in the slightest degree. The first necessity which arises from the acceptance of common guilt is the necessity of repentance. If we feel in our very souls 'the measureless shame and humiliation of our race' involved in the wrong and inhumanity of war, we must first of all repent of that wrong and inhumanity. 'We must save the world's honour (Bernard Shaw once said, speaking of social wrong), if we are to save our own.' How can we 'save the world's honour' to-day? Not, surely, by giving our free and willing consent to the desolation which defiles it. To save the world's honour, we must erect the standard of a higher conscience. We must erect the standard of the Law of Christ, which bids us overcome evil with good."

—Rev. Sidney Spencer at Hope Street Church, Liverpool, Sunday evening, June 15th.

"V" FOR VICTORY.

A great deal of childish nonsense is being talked, and written, just now, about a "V" sign. The underlying idea is ancient, ancient as the race. It belongs to the darkest of the dark ages, when ignorance bred fear, and fear evolved superstition, and superstition evolved the mascot for protection—as inevitably as a tight shoe will induce the callosity on the foot familiarly known as a corn! There are plenty of empty-headed people to-day who fill the vacuum abhorred by nature with a stock of preposterous notions, such as touching wood to avoid ill luck, throwing spilt salt over the shoulder to neutralise misfortune, and inducing another person to pick up some article one has dropped, so that one's good luck may not fail! There is some danger alleged in regard to looking at the new moon through glass, faithfully observed by a short-sighted friend of my own, till one night, after removing his glasses to view the crescent-orb according to the ritual, he was disastrously immobilised by a lamppost! So with the "V" sign. The horror of the times is such that our statesmen know the people must enjoy some kind of light diversion, and catering for the superstitious appetite involves no inconvenience of rationing. The crop is rank and rife, and, particularly in war time, there is no question of "control." I wonder what our soldiers, sailors, and airmen think of this perfectly safe, and perfectly silly, proposal to help on the day of victory. "Mr. Punch," who has just attained his hundredth year, produced a stinging commentary on this type of thing when he pictured two soldiers, during the Crimean war, in rags, thanks to the efficiency of the contemporary commissariat. One soldier, with a newspaper in his hand, informs his comrade that they are to have medals for their services. "Aye," said the comrade, "and perhaps we'll get coats to put them on!" The soldier is ever a realist, and if his commentary on the "V" sign were uttered in soldier-like language, I do not think it would be printable in the "Calendar!"

But after all there is reason for gratitude. The mascoteers are welcome to their "V" sign. They might have annexed the Sign of the Cross.

CHURCHILL'S 1925 QUESTION

"SHALL WE ALL COMMIT SUICIDE?"

Mr. Winston Churchill, the present Prime Minister, wrote an article under this heading, "Shall We All Commit Suicide?" in 1925. It is published in his volume entitled Thoughts and Adventures.

In his essay, Mr. Churchill tells us what he thinks would have happened if the war had continued for another year. This is the forecast:

"The campaign of the year 1919 would have witnessed an immense accession to the power of destruction.

"Had the Germans retained the morale to make good their retreat to the Rhine, they would have been assaulted in the summer of 1919 with forces and by methods incomparably more prodigious than any yet employed.

"Thousands of aeroplanes would have shattered their cities. Scores of thousands of cannon would have blasted their front.

"Poison gases of incredible malignity, against which only a secret mask (which the Germans could not obtain in time) was proof, would have stifled all resistance and paralysed all life on the hostile front subjected to attack. No doubt the Germans, too, had their plans. But the hour of wrath had passed. The signal of relief was given, and the horrors of 1919 remained buried in the archives of the great antagonists."

Churchill felt that a second European war must come out of the Versailles peace. He says:

"The causes of war have been in no way removed; indeed they are in some aspects aggravated by the so-called Peace Treaties and the reactions following thereupon.

"Two mighty branches of the European family will never rest content with their existing situation.

"Russia, stripped of her Baltic power, will, as the years pass by, brood incessantly upon the wars of Peter the Great.

"From one end of Germany to the other an intense hatred of France unites the whole population. The enormous contingents of German youth growing to military manhood year by year are inspired by the fiercest sentiments and the soul of Germany smoulders with dreams of a war of liberation or revenge."

"These ideas are restrained at the present moment only by physical impotence.

"France is armed to the teeth.

"Germany has been to a great extent disarmed and her military system broken up.

"The French hope to preserve this situation by their technical, military apparatus, by their shield of fortresses, by their black troops and by a system of alliances with the smaller States of Europe; and for the present at any rate overwhelming force is on their side.

"But physical force alone, unsustained by world opinion, affords no durable foundation for security.

"Germany is a far stronger entity than France and cannot be kept in permanent subjugation."

Churchill addressed these clear thoughts to all those, who—"wish to spare their children torments and disasters compared with which those we have suffered will be a pale preliminary."

NEW ZEALAND CONCHIES

The New Zealand Congregational Union discussed, in Committee, on Thursday, March 13, the question of conscientious objectors. It adopted the following statement, which was accepted by the Assembly, as the official pronouncement of the Congregational Church in New Zealand on the subject of conscience:—

"The assembly affirms the right of the sincere objector to combatant or other military service to sympathetic hearing by an appeal board, upon which should sit at least one person competent to understand the religious or other scruples of the objectors.

"Further, the assembly urges that ministers and other leaders of its churches, should do all in their power to assist sincere conscientious objectors among their people when called upon both by advice and testimony at the hearing before the board. In the event of an appeal being dismissed after due hearing, further dealings with such objector shall be in the hands of the civil and not military authorities.

"The assembly supports the right of the Government to demand alternative service at a rate of pay not higher than that of men in the forces from men whose religious scruples are regarded as valid by an appeal board."

THE PEACE CHARTER

The Duke of Bedford's Views

To the Editor.

Sir,—Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt have made a statement of their peace aims in very general terms, but if their words are not accompanied by deeds, the value of the statement will, I fear, be small.

Who will trust the sincerity of our claim to "respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live" as long as thousands of Indian Nationalist leaders are kept in prison?

Who will have confidence in President Roosevelt's power to increase the economic properity of Europe unless he has first shown himself willing and able to offend Wall Street by instituting those reforms of the monetary system which can remove poverty from the U.S.A.—that country of vast potential wealth?

What is the use of saying that we will endeavour "with due respect to our existing obligations to further the enjoyment of all states of access on equal terms to the trade and raw materials of the world"? Our "existing obligations" must presumably include the Ottawa agreements which render impossible for countries outside the Empire fair trade and fair economic opportunity.

Was it sensible and was it good tactics to suggest that negotiation could not take place until the Nazi Government had been overthrown by war and also to threaten one-sided disarmament of enemy nations, as in 1918?

Apart from wishful thinking and a very unexpected change in the Eastern war in favour of Russia, is there now any reasonable chance of overthrowing the Nazi Government by direct military defeat? If there is not, what sense is there in irritating the German people and consolidating them behind Hitler by assuming such a defeat?

If we desire to promote revolution in Germany, is not the only way to try and trap the Nazi leaders into some grave blunder of which the rejection of reasonable peace terms would be by far the most fatal?

Is it not worse than foolish to try and dictate to the undefeated Germans the kind of Government they shall have, when conditions make our attempts at dictation no better than mere bluff. The German people remember, moreover, that they had to submit to a one-sided disarmament after the last war as part of a victor's peace and it did not result in justice, nor in a satisfactory European settlement. Is it not rather silly, therefore, to suggest anything but disarmament by all belligerents on fair and equal terms.

Yours truly,

BEDFORD

F. W. JOWETT'S OPINION

F. W. Jowett is a veteran of the Parliamentary Socialist Movement and a man of outstanding integrity. He lost his seat for East Bradford in 1931, at the time of bankers' ramp election, when Ramsay MacDonald became the leader of the Tory Party. He had won the seat in 1929, after losing it at the "Zinoviev Letter" election of 1924. Prior to that he had sat for West Bradford from 1906-1918, but lost the seat at the famous Lloyd George Khaki-coupon election. It will be seen that Jowett entered Parliament in 1906, the very year we had left the S.D.F., and renounced parliamentarism as careerism and Anti-Socialism. Jowett was First Commissioner of Works in the First Labour Government of 1924, but possessed too many inhibitions to adapt himself to mere parliamentarism. He is now seventy-seven years of age and still struggling to serve the cause of Socialism to which he dedicated himself in his early years.

In the Bradford I.L.P. News, Jowett discusses the Churchill-Roosevelt statement as follows:—

"The Eight Point Charter of Churchill and Roosevelt is so much less promising for the German people than were President Wilson's Fourteen Points that it is inconceivable that it will have any influence on the German people, even if it were possible to think of them trusting such promises a second time.

"It is the eighth Point which is vital—and fatal. It kills stone dead all hope of mobilising German public opinion for active opposition to Hitler and his Nazi militarist aggression.

"There can be no doubt that with their bitter memories of the starvation and suffering of the German people during the Allied blockade (continued long after the war ended, with the object of enforcing an unjust peace on a disarmed nation), Goebbels' challenge will be approved by practically the whole German people.

"If we had gone through a similar experience, and were threatened with disarmament to enforce dictated peace on us, our answer would be no less emphatic.

"Therefore, I say without hesitation, that the much belauded Charter will carry no weight as a declaration of peace aims."

RED ARMY STATUTES

Last October, the Red Army, which was forged by Trotsky during the Russian Revolution, was placed under disciplinary Statutes harsher than those operating in any army, except that of the Nazis.

The Statutes introduced on October 12, 1940, gave the commander unlimited powers:—

"In case of insubordination, the commander has the right to apply all measures of coercion up to and including the application of force and firearms."

"The commander bears no responsibility for the consequence in case he finds it necessary to apply force and firearms in order to compel an insubordinate to fulfil a command and to restore discipline and order. . . . The commander who does not in such instances evince firmness, resoluteness, and who does not apply all necessary measures to fulfil an order is remitted to trial before the court martial." (Red Star, No. 242, October 15, 1940.)

This means that, without being responsible to any civilian control, a superior officer has the right in peace time to shoot down a Red Army soldier for not fulfilling a command—not for mutiny, not for an insurrection, but for insubordination!

Article 7 of the Statutes which were in force from 1925 to October, 1940, reads:

"The nachalniki (men in charge) have the right to apply armed compulsion only in a military situation and only in the execution of battle orders."

V. Ulrich, presiding judge of the Moscow Frame-up Trials, in an article in the Red Star, special organ of the Red Army, for October 22, 1940, gives the following accurate descriptions of the effect of the new Army Statutes:—

"The disciplinary statutes considerably extend the right of commanders as regards the use of force and firearms."

"Comradely relations between soldiers and officers are no more.

"The hail-fellow-well-met spirit in the relationships between a commander and a subordinate can have no place in the Red Army. Discussion of any kind is absolutely prohibited among the subordinates."

Lt.-General V. Kurdyumov clarified the Statutes in his article in Pravda for October 6, 1940:

"Grievances may be introduced only personally and individually. Submission of group grievances or grievances for others is prohibited. No more group declarations, no more joint discussions—whether concerning an order, or bad food, or any other topic—all this comes under the heading of 'insubordination' and for it a soldier may be shot on the spot without so much as a court-martial, hearing or investigation, if a superior officer solely and personally so decides.

This is how Stalin has militarised the Red Army. We do not see any difference between Red militarism and any other kind of militarism.

TOWARDS PEACE: WHAT CAN BE DONE?

A Letter Answering Many Readers from The Duke of Bedford

Dear Aldred,—

I should like to make a reply to the many loyal friends, some of whose letters have appeared in The Word, who feel that I have a contribution to make towards the establishment of a better world. Conscious as I am of my own shortcomings and limitations, I think perhaps I may have some such contribution to make, even if it be only on the principle that among the blind the one-eyed man is king. I certainly have a confidence which does not, I think, spring from mere conceit, that if I had the political power to do so, I could give this country the two things it so greatly needs —lasting peace and prosperity; the latter, not by reason of discoveries for which I myself can claim credit, but because (unlike the majority of M.P.s) I have, by the mercy of God, at least sufficient sense to know a good thing when I see one! If to the blessings of peace and prosperity, those who look to me for guidance desire to add the crown of the fullest happiness that this life can give, I can assure them, if they have not already made the discovery for themselves, that it may be found in a Christian faith based on a living fellowship with God and on a rational and wholehearted obedience to His commands.

There is one thing that I should like to make plain at the start, even at the risk of causing some disappointment or giving some offence. While I shall always welcome the suggestions, the advice, and the constructive criticisms of my friends, I cannot, as some leaders of political movements do, go against my convictions or alter my policy to avoid alienating possible supporters. If, after careful reflection, I feel that a certain course of action is useless, mistaken, or morally wrong, I cannot undertake it merely out of deference to those who are of a different opinion.

I want, now, to share with you my views as to the task which lies before us and the methods by which it can be accomplished. Our ultimate task is the establishment of prosperity and social righteousness, and the first step to prosperity is the setting-up of a system which removes all barriers to trade and adopts a financial technique which enables the members of the nation, not forgetting any who are unemployed, to consume and avail themselves of all the goods and services which industry and commerce, working to full capacity, can produce and import. The political leaders of all Parties have in the past failed to give the country the economic prosperity which they promised in their election addresses because, from corruption, mental laziness or over-pre-occupation with other ideas and theories, they have ignored the one thing that really matters most from the point of view of removing the needless evil of financial poverty. I pledge myself, as soon as I have political power to

TO ALL MANKIND

Edith Louisa Cavell was born, December 6, 1865, at Swardeston, Norfolk. She settled as a nurse in Brussels in 1907, and was executed there by the German military authorities, on October 12, 1915. Her heroic story shall be told in our next issue. As early as 1888, she endowed a Free Hospital in Bavaria. When war came to Belgium, she tended friend and foe alike. Whatever its technical justification in military law, the execution of Edith Cavell for helping 200 French and British fugitives to escape, was a grave error in judgment; for it served to perpetuate hatred and so further war. True moral understanding would not have permitted the execution. Such understanding would have been of tremendous healing value to the wounds of mankind. In her last interview with the British Chaplain, Edith Cavell uttered the immortal words that F. W. Jowett, in 1924, had placed on her statute. They redound to her glory. To Jowett belongs the credit of remembering and engraving them on stone in the heart of London in such a way that the stone record transcribes itself on the living hearts of humanity. To-day, Edith Cavell's words are a vital call to all mankind. We must honour her memory with loving attention that peace may arise throughout the world and war be abolished for ever.

enable me to carry out the necessary reforms, to make it my concern as a first instalment of good things to come, to raise well above the line of crippling and degrading poverty all who have suffered so long and so needlessly. I make this promise with the utmost confidence because, unlike many others who have made it, I understand the measures which must be taken in order to give it practical effect. One thing, and one thing alone, could seriously hinder and delay me, and that is the continuation of the present war until, by the destruction of our working population and industrial plant; the sinking of our merchant shipping; and the loss of our foreign trade to other countries, the very sources of real wealth are crippled and destroyed. If that point were reached, then, while financial reform would still be necessary, it could give, for a time at anyrate, but a meagre return, for the reason that the whole country would be poor in the real, as distinct from the financial, sense, money being of no value when the power to produce goods has been destroyed.

This, therefore, brings me to our immediate task—the ending of the war before our resources have been further wasted by senseless destruction in an effort to attain right ends by wrong means.

There was a time—and such a time will doubtless return and may even return shortly—when a policy could most usefully be promoted by speeches in Parliament; by public meeting; and by conferences.

Under the abnormal conditions which exist at the present moment, however, all these methods are, in my opinion, of small utility Let us first take speeches in Parliament, a matter to which I wish to give very thorough attention, partly because Parliament and the Government are undoubtedly the crux of the whole situation, and partly because many of my friends obviously still attach great value to the effect of Parliamentary speeches.

It is, however, exceedingly important to realise the present strange mental condition of Members of Parliament, a condition which exists to an almost equal extent in both Houses, as may be gathered from reports one receives from the few individual M.P.'s who have managed to retain their sanity. The plan fact is that the vast majority of the members of both Houses have come to resemble the ostrich of the Book of Job, in that God (or perhaps the Devil?) "hath deprived them of reason"! They are completely filled with war hysteria and emotionalism because they believe what they read in the National Press whose Editor-in-chief in these days must surely be Beelzebub the Father of lies and hatred! The result is that, to borrow a phrase from the religious field, they are completely "gospel-hardened" as far as arguments in favour of a negotiated peace are concerned. Every plea that can be put forward in favour of peace has already been brought to their notice times without number, sometimes by the minority of intelligent Members already alluded to and sometimes by a great variety of outside agencies, among which I can include myself: but the effect has been nil.

The propaganda value in the country of anti-war speeches made in Parliament is also now universally small, for the warmongers' Press either ignores such speeches or reports them briefly and perhaps inaccurately, giving undue prominence to hostile replies in order to discredit the peace effort.

Two things, and two things alone, can make the slightest impression on Parliament in its present state of mind. The first is a further succession of military disasters, shipping losses, and disappointments with regard to help from Allied countries; the second is a change in public opinion towards the war. I will return to this point later on.

Though I would not for a moment suggest that they should be abandoned by those who believe in them and find that they are able, even in a quiet way, to do effective work through them, I feel that public meetings are now of comparatively little value because, owing to black-out and air-raid hindrances, audiences tend to be even smaller than before the war and more strictly confined to those who are already converted. If by any chance the appearance of some speaker of unusual eloquence, or a change in public opinion, did bring large and receptive audiences of people hitherto indifferent to peace, the Government would quickly take steps to suppress the hindrance to their war effort, either by imprisoning the too-eloquent speaker for causing "despondency and alarm," or by the indirect but equally effective method of issuing, on the quiet, instructions to all owners of halls forbidding them to let their premises for meetings where the speaker to whom the Government took exception was likely to appear.

In regard to conferences, the conditions which now obtain have made the issues on which effective action can be taken so simple and so few that there is really nothing much to confer about! It is better to get on with the job than to talk. Some people think that conferences are helpful for the planning of the post-war world, but if we already know the spirit which should animate international policy in the post-war world and understand the financial and foreign trade technique necessary to give practical effect to our desire for neighbourliness, it does not seem to me that there is much point in trying to work out a detailed scheme when only wishful thinkers can imagine that we alone shall possess the deciding voice in the post-war settlement and when we do not know, and cannot get in touch with, the other important contributors whose decisions will carry quite as much weight as our own.

We come now to the point — and, in my opinion, almost the only point—at which practical effort can, and should, be applied on the material, as distinct from the spiritual, plane. I have said just now that the only thing, with the exception of disaster, that will make the slightest impression on the mentality of our war-hypnotised Parliament is a change in the outlook of an adequate number of British citizens. Militarist Members of Parliament have repeatedly defended their attitude on the ground that the majority of the nation are in favour of continuing the war, and we have got to face the unpleasant fact that as long as they are able to say this with truth the war is going to continue. Our first task, therefore, is to increase by every means in our power the number of people whose attitude towards the war is reasoned and intelligent. Each one of us has his own contacts and his own opportunities, and of these he must train himself to make the best possible use. All that is needed in the way of mental equipment is now available for him, since he can obtain at the cost of a few pence literature containing reasoned arguments against every idea that can be put forward in defence of the war and its continuation. In Peace News, also, he can find up-to-date comments on recent happenings which are of extreme shrewdness and interest.

A working knowledge of the reforms needed in the monetary and foreign trade system, if the economic causes of war are to be removed and prosperity is to be made possible, is a very useful asset to the worker in the cause of peace. People are much more likely to become keen on an early peace if they can see that there is a chance of really good times ahead, and they will become especially impatient at the prolongation of the war if they realise that every day of its continuance makes the chances of a rapid entry into prosperity less good. It is particularly necessary to be able to convince those who are lukewarm about peace because they have well-paid war jobs, that there is not the slightest reason why, if they can do a useful job well, the cessation of hostilities should involve them in a lowering of their present standard of living. They should also be helped to realise the selfishness and shortsighted folly of their outlook. Just because they are all right does it really not matter to them that thousands of other people should be killed or ruined? And just for the sake of a few months', or at most a few years', comparative prosperity, is it worth while tolerating a war which, by its continuance, may bring disaster upon the whole country and, in the long run, involve them also in a protracted period of acute distress?

But the extension of an enlightened attitude towards the war is not the only task. It is of the utmost importance to drive home into the public mind the responsibility of the Government and of Parliament for the continuation of the war. A hazy idea is common that Hitler is entirely responsible for the continuation of the war, but unless, and until, Hitler rejects reasonable peace terms not deprived of all practical value by foolish clauses such as the unilateral disarmament proposal in the Eight Points, it is our Parliament and Government and not Hitler, who are responsible for the continuation of the conflict.

Our third, and perhaps in some ways our most important, task is to convince those who are opposed to the war of the duty, value and necessity of making their views known continually to members of the Government and of Parliament, not necessarily only their own Members, though these should, of course, receive special attention. Anti-war constituents of a militarist Member of Parliament commonly feel that it is quite useless to write to him, and therefore refrain from doing so. If by "useless" they mean that their individual letters will not convert him to an anti-war position they are probably right, but this is not the point. Their action is needed to give volume to the popular demand for a negotiated peace, regardless of what the personal views of the Member of Parliament may be. Experience with regard to other issues has proved again and again that a government will always alter its policy, even against its own wishes, as soon as it has evidence of a sufficiently strong popular feeling against the plan which it proposes to follow or alternately in favour of some other plan. At the present time it is numbers, and numbers alone, that count, anyhow in a very important field, and it is those numbers that we must create and mobilise, for apart from numbers there is no hope.

There is an old legend of a waggoner whose vehicle got stuck in the mud and who, in his agitation, prayed to the god Mercury for assistance. Mercury appeared, but instead of performing some miracle to assist the waggoner, he suggested that he should put his shoulder to the wheel in the right place. He did so, and, with this assistance, the oxen managed to drag the waggon on to firm ground. Now our "waggon" is Parliament, and the Government, deep in the mud of war hysteria and the sticky, evil-smelling slime of Press dope. The toiling oxen are our good friends Maxton, McGovern, Rhys Davies, Stokes, Sir Ernest Bennett, Lord Ponsonby, and others like them, who have neither lost their heads nor sacrified their principles. The situation demands pressure from the rear. Our job is to put our shoulders to the wheel and shove, and as soon as enough of us get shoving, out she'll have to come!

There is another reason why I would impress upon my friends the need for personal effort and personal initiative. They cannot afford to rely too much on the help and guidance of one or two men. At any time illness, or accident, or the action of powerful enemies may deprive them of Guy Aldred's help, or of my own, or perhaps of that of both of us. If this should happen, seeing the great task which is committed to them by God for the service and salvation of humanity, can they afford to become a disunited and dispirited mob without purpose, plan or initiative — mere sheep without a shepherd? Certainly they cannot afford to do this! Each one must himself develop a capacity for leadership and, if we should fall by the wayside, he must be ready to carry forward the gospel of truth and peace, certain alike of the goal at which he is aiming and the methods which he must employ to reach it.

These are dark days, with much in them to discourage and depress us. Let us not forget, however, that the greatest forces in the world are on our side, the forces of God and truth. We have also another and more grim ally, one whom in a sense we should rather be without, yet from whose aid our cause may greatly benefit. That ally is the inescapable nemesis of events which brings disaster upon those who seek good by methods of evil; put their trust in blind guides and frail alliances; and, refusing to learn the lessons of experience, prefer to continue, if one may quote in all seriousness lines from a famous classic in light humour, "to madly force a right-hand foot into a left-hand shoe." Perhaps also we may, just for a moment, allow ourselves the luxury of a calculation which errs on the side of optimism. Although ordinary daily papers are apt to be destroyed when only one person has read them, experts say that journals of the character of The Word commonly get into the hands of from five to ten different individuals. If, then, we could assume that The Word has half a million readers, each of whom decides to devote himself to the cause so thoroughly that every week he gains one other to be as keen a missionary as he is, how long will it be before the day of peace dawns when the new order of hope and happiness can begin? Not long indeed!

Yours sincerely,

BEDFORD.

SOCIALISM AND THE BANKS

LORD KINDERSLEY MAKES AN ADMISSION

By F. W. JOWETT

[The following article by our comrade, F. W. Jowett, appears in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for September 5, 1941. Jowett was First Commissioner of Works in the 1924 Labour Government. See reference in another column. In consequence he is a Privy Councillor, and in the P.C. list his name follows that of Thomas Johnston, M.P. Jowett remains an uncompromising Anti-Militarist and opponent of war, notwithstanding his one-time membership of the Labour Government. Lord Kindersley has been a Conservative M.P., a soldier, and stockbroker. Finance and politics have landed him in the House of Lords. He believes in finance and Jowett believes in Socialism. Thus is the issue joined.—Ed.]

The National Debt, which at the beginning of the war was £8,494 millions, is now £12,561 millions, so that we are borrowing at the rate of five and a half millions a day (W. J. Burtt, City Editor, Daily Herald).

Lord Kindersley, leader of the national savings campaign, is complaining that well-to-do savers only invested less than £3,600,000 last week in Government loans although there is £3,000 millions in the banks on deposit and in current accounts.

This very ugly fact of the rapidly increasing public debt whilst a very large amount of money is in the banks in deposit and current accounts of investors has compelled Lord Kindersley to recognise at last that banks only inflate currency, which increases prices, when they create credit for paper loans to the Government. These bankers' loans, Lord Kindersley has found it necessary to admit, are MERE BOOK-ENTRY LOANS.

Lord Kindersley's trouble with the well-to-do people who keep their money in banks ready for more profitable investment or speculation, is that they excuse their refusal to lend the Government the money they have in the bank by a fallacy—a false argument. The false argument is that there is no need for them to lose control of their money by lending it direct to the Government until it suits their convenience, because the banks lend it themselves to the Treasury.

This false argument which has so often been exposed in the I.L.P. News, Lord Kindersley blows sky-high, although by a little verbal subterfuge he shows how reluctant he is to expose the bankers' bluff.

Appealing to the class of people who at present have £3000 millions in banks and are keeping it there "to withdraw their money and put it into Government war loan," Lord Kindersley said: "You can't lend money by proxy," and went on to explain why. This was the way he explained the procedure, as we have done on so many occasions:—

"When a private individual invests his money in a Government security, Lord Kindersley explained, he transfers command over goods and services from himself to the Government.

But when a BANK LENDS PART OF A DEPOSITOR'S MONEY to the Government, not one depositor transfers his purchasing power to the Government.

He can still spend his money, and if he does so, his purchases are added to the expenditure of the Government instead of the Government expenditure being substituted for his. This leads to inflation."

The little verbal subterfuge (which does nothing more than show how reluctant Lord Kindersley is to make his long-overdue open admission that bankers' credit loans are NOT REAL LOANS AT ALL but just increases of currency causing inflation) is in the words I have put in capitals. These words are "when a bank lends part of a depositor's money."

Lord Kindersley's own explanation of bank credit loan procedure makes pure nonsense of these words, for if, as Lord Kindersley admits, "not one depositor transfers his purchasing power to the Government" to enable the bank to make such a loan, how can it be possible that "a bank lends part of a depositor's money" for the transaction"?

It is helpful to have this tardy admission of the root causes of inflation from the officially appointed whipper-up of savings for investment in Government loans. Because, however the war ends and whenever it ends, this money question will have to be effectively dealt with if the vast majority of the people are to emerge from the horrible experience that still lies before us all free from financial dictatorship. And I see no sign on which to found any belief or hope that the leaders of the Labour Party have any intention of dealing effectively with the money question.

This is a most amazing thing to have to say after the experience of the last war which has left us with nearly £8000 millions of unpayable debt, and the first two years' experience of the present war which has already increased the debt to £12,561 millions which is being added to at the rate of £5½ millions a day.

One prominent Labour M.P. who claims to be an authority on financial and money questions, Mr. Arthur Woodburn, goes so far even now as to assert that the public credit which is being issued by banks is being "issued without inflation." "The banking system," says Labour M.P. Arthur Woodburn, "IS ONE OF THE CLEVEREST INVENTIONS OF MODERN MAN," and he doesn't think that a big war debt at the end of the war will be a serious burden for the community to bear. If Mr. Woodburn had been an appointed agent of the financiers who control the banking system of this country, he could not have been more industrious and persistent in defending their nefarious and anti-social activities.

Soon after the war began, I expressed the opinion that at the end of it the national debt would not be less than £20,000 millions. A very large proportion of the £20,000 millions or whatever the amount of the debt may be, will consist of bankers' credit loans such as Lord Kindersley has described which are duplications of real money which alone has value representing goods produced and services rendered.

Being money created by banks it is in substance COUNTERFEIT MONEY as well as being one of the greatest of all sources of inflation.

If this method of issuing the nation's money is going to be continued after the war then all Arthur Greenwood's Government sponsored after-war reconstruction schemes and Professor Harold Laski's Labour Party reconstruction Committee's schemes can give no more substantial promise than Lloyd George's "homes for heroes" promise made nearly 25 years ago.

If, as it is assumed, not only by the Tory and Liberal party, but by the Labour Party so far as can be ascertained from its official publications costs of after-war reconstruction and all the measures necessary for the social security which has been promised are to be met by more borrowing and additional taxation, then Messrs. Greenwood, Laski and Shinwell may as well roll up their blue-prints of the new social order and put them away, for the new social order cannot be built on borrowed money and additional taxes. What alone will be possible after the war on the borrowing plus taxation plan will be a VERY MUCH WORSE DEVELOPMENT OF THE OLD SOCIAL ORDER.

And the pity of it is that there need be no such blockade as the present money sstem constitutes against the new social order. This much at all events has been made perfectly clear by experience in this war. THE ONLY LIMIT TO WHAT THE NATION CAN HAVE FOR ITS USE OR MISUSE—for the public well-being or for destructive warfare—IS THE LIMIT OF WHAT CAN BE OBTAINED FROM LABOUR AND AVAILABLE NATURAL RESOURCES.

But to think of starting after-war reconstruction for a new social order with a debt of, say £20,000 millions on more borrowing and more taxation, is sheer madness.

After all, the experience of the past two years, and Lord Kindersley's admission that banks are issuing duplicated supplies of money which, although it is bank-created credit money, is being added to the national debt, proves that the nation could issue its own money not as debt but as national credit for whatever purpose it needed money.

The State could (as I see is explained in a circularised statement by the Duke of Bedford) issue its own money and:—

"earmark for its own use whatever percentage of an annual debt-free creation of money was needed for an adequate financing of its services. It would not borrow any money at all and it would USE TAXATION ONLY AS A MEANS OF COLLECTING FOR DESTRUCTION SURPLUS MONEY FOR THE PREVENTION OF INFLATION."

Can anyone find a reasonable objection to this straightforward proposal? It would give the Government the power it professes to need, to limit private spending: it would drive right through the tangled thicket of City and Treasury pacts and understandings (and incidentally set free some thousands of executives and their staffs for more useful work) and it would set the nation free, at the end of the war, to make the best it can of the real wealth (goods, labour, natural resources) then at its disposal.

THIS WE CAN DO!

By OSWELL BLAKESTON.

Pacifism is not worth the things which pacifists are enduring if it is without political and economic significance. That is so obvious many people keep it well at the back of their minds. They can be startled out of their complacency only by such direct statements as: Is your privilege of "peace" to be purchased at the expense of your neighbour, and do you really enjoy claiming a share in the exploitation of man by man?

The pacifist is he who is opposed to aggression (not just war) and, therefore, to imperialist politics, predatory economics, and aggressor.

How, then, is the pacifist to obtain the world of abundance for all, which, logically, is the world of peace? How indeed! were it not for non-co-operation? Thank goodness (which has everything to do with it) that non-co-operation has shown a way! for without it pacifism would be—passive.

Pacifists have not been slow to pay lip-service to non-co-operation. Faced with the pertinent "How would you deal with the evils of the Nazi system if the Germans conquered?" we have come back pat with "We would co-operate with whatever is good in the system (certain matters of social justice, etc.) and refuse to co-operate with whatever is bad (Jew-baiting, etc.)." We have explained how, by the positive moral force of non-violence, we would win in the end, just as Gandhi wins, on the higher plane where conflict may be resolved. Our enemies would become our comrades!

And often our questioners have curled their lips and said they couldn't see us doing it. We have replied valiantly that we would be only too willing to make our "battle" sacrifice on the field of non-violence, offering ourselves constructively for peace where we have refused to offer ourselves destructively for war. And sometimes our questioners have pushed it further and asked for proof, have even suggested that we might be getting on with the job. We have told them that we are preparing ourselves for the historical moment, for the Gandhi who will be ready to lead us when we are ready for him.

Well, we have reached a new stage in the exercise. The tragic thing is that so many pacifists seem unaware of it.

Why is so little stress laid on the really important part of the conditionally exempted C.O.'s refusal to accept the new conscriptions? The National Service Act and Industrial Conscription have brought about a totally new situation—if only we could realise it. For here, for many of us, is the opportunity to show our witness that this thing is possible in spite of legal compulsion.

We know that the "absolutists" of the last war have, by their heroic stand, made many things much easier for the pacifists of this war. Many of us accepted the conditions of exemption almost as a tribute to them. But the authorities have chosen to regard our compromise as a surrender, as weakness rather than a reasonable pacifist gesture. They have increased the pressure. Resistance to this pressure now takes on its full heroic stature.

The pacifist who refuses now has a profounder significance than the pacifist who refused in 1914-17. This is because the idea of non-co-operation has reached a more general consciousness. It is, as they say, in the air. To-day the pacifist who refuses does more than protest against the principle of compulsion, he gives evidence that the power exists which alone can make pacifism a policy as well as a blue-print for personal conduct. By indirect propaganda (always the most potent kind) he demonstrates that pacifism can be a living creed for the fiery blood of the young idealist as well as for the calm mind of the meditating sage.

To-day the individual pacifist, by his willingness to take the consequences of refusal helps others to understand that men could be found to stand shoulder to shoulder in a campaign of non-violence. Individual example can show that the things pacifists promise are not all talk, that pacifism can be, as it must be, politically and economically effective, that pacifism can mean real peace.

There are many who have scorned pacifism as passive, but who have their fill of proof that "war wins nothing, cures nothing, ends nothing." Once they realise that a non-violent struggle for an age of abundance is not an escapist's dream, they may become the men among whom we may look for our Gandhi. It is the refusal of the pacifist to co-operate with the new conscriptions, his willingness to bear the penalties of civilian and military punishment (and the stories are grim enough in the little left-wing papers), which will effect the wholesale conversion.

Only the exceptionally strong-minded are without any twinge of shame when declining to render some useful service to the community in the hour of need. Often the best pacifist has moments of wondering if he is not unreasonable in refusing some job as being a fire-watcher for the crops. Yet the pacifist need feel no guilt if he reminds himself of what he is doing positively by saying "No."

Of course there is a lot of "hedging" in the ranks. It is necessary for each to find out for himself how much of this is an attempt to rationalise our fears. If the editor will allow me, I should like to examine the main objections in another article. For the moment it is enough to remember—enough to live or to die for—that pacifism can be enough!

Why, why, why do we not say all this more often, more fervently, to our comrades, to ourselves?

NON-MILITARY WAR SERVICE
CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION
DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PROTEST

The Catholic Herald, London, for September 26, published the following valuable and powerful letter from the Duke of Bedford:—

Sir,—The Government's refusal to recognise the conscientious objection of men and women to forms of non-military war service imposed by the State marks another step in the direction of complete totalitarian tyranny. The treatment even of conscientious objectors to military service is steadily becoming more harsh and unjust and if nothing is done to remedy abuse I have just referred to our prisons will be filled still further with high-principled and perfectly sincere people whose only crime is that they refuse, like the heroine of a modern anti-Fascist play, to admit that "The State is all"!

THE ROOSEVELT-CHURCHILL STATEMENT

Is It An "Honest-to-God" Declaration?

by Alexander Ratcliffe

The opinion freely expressed in Britain from the Premier down to the humblest of citizens is that Hitler is not to be trusted: that Hitler could not make an honest statement, and that Hitler's word is not worth a brass farthing. Away back in December last when Mr. Churchill made a war statement before the House of Commons, he said, "Certainly it would be very convenient if Herr Hitler or the important chiefs in Germany were to give us every fortnight or so an honest-to-God statement (laughter) if they were capable of it." (Glasgow Herald, 20/12/40). It was truly typical of the mentality of our Parliamentarians that they should titter at the very suggestion that anything honest could emanate from Germany: especially it was the time for hearty laughter when the suggestion was made that Hitler and Co. could make an honest-to-God statement.

My purpose now is to deal with the Statement of President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill on the "Peace Aims" of Britain and her Allies. Everybody has heard of the famous Eight Points: but does anyone see through them? Is this Statement of the two leading Democrats of the civilised world an honest-to-God declaration? Can there be found any substantial and valued opinion upholding the vague and inconsistent and utterly worthless platitudes that constitute the Atlantic Ocean Declaration? I am inclined to the opinion that Roosevelt and Churchill were at sea in more senses than one, as they drew up that mess of mendacious meanderings. The reception which these Eight Points has got has not been an encouraging one. The press was at its wits end to explain away these silly sea sayings. The point to note, however, is that that Statement is not an honest-to-God declaration: it is merely a smoke-screen to hide the real purpose of that Oceanic Overture, so ably performed by these versatile voices.

The first thing to note particularly is that the Eight Points begin thus: No. 1, "Their countries seek no aggrandisement, territorial or other." It is to be observed that No. 1 and the other Seven Points do not constitute the basis for Peace with Germany. It is definitely stated in the Preamble that these Points are the "common principles in the national policies of their respective countries, on which they base their hopes for a better future for the world."

The Declaration, then, is merely an Agreement between one country at war and another country not at war: an Agreement between Neutral America and Warring Britain.

I do not think any purpose is to be served dealing with each of these Eight Points, for all of them savour of hypocrisy and smug complacency. No. 1 was the foremost Point for Peace with the Germans at the last war, and we all know the result, how after solemnly promising the Germans and her Allies that no territory would be filched from them if they accepted President Wilson's Fourteen Points as a ground for Armistice, Britain and her Allies tore up the Agreement and treated it as a Scrap of Paper; Britain subsequently benefiting by the gain of nearly a million and a half of enemy territory, most of it German. Of course, it may be safer this war to urge No. 1 Point, for at present it would seem that there is little hope of us adding to our territory after this war.

No. 2 Point is also suspect: it solemnly declares that there are to be no territorial changes "that do not accord with the freely-expressed wishes of the peoples concerned." That also was stated solemnly at the last war, the result being that again Britain and her Allies betrayed the Germans and her Allies by forcing the peoples of one nationality to live under the despotism of another nationality. One might here note that had Roosevelt and Churchill made these Declarations before the present war commenced, and agreed with the Germans and Hungarians, etc., to right the great wrong that caused hundreds of thousands of one nationality to live, against their express wishes, under the rule of another nationality, the present war would not have taken place. For it was with a view to setting free the peoples of one nation from the peoples of other nations that Hitler invaded Czechoslovakia and Poland. None seek to deny that fact to-day. Notwithstanding, neither Mr. Roosevelt nor Mr. Churchill has seen fit to make any reference to the injustices prevailing on the Continent of Europe before the present war started, injustices which, if swept aside before Hitler was even heard of, would have obviated the rise of Hitler, and the war we are suffering from to-day.

Point No. 3 is another piece of mendacity, for it coolly states that the people of any Nation must be at liberty to choose their own form of Government. Notwithstanding, Point 6 declares that the "Nazi Tyranny" must get its "final destruction." The Germans have chosen Nazi-ism as their form of Gavernment, for Messrs. Roosevelt and Churchill know, the latter especially, that in 1937, two years previous to the declaration of war, the Germans voted for Hitlerism 99 per cent.: this because of what Hitler had done for Germany in four years of rule. So, it would seem that every country but Germany, and probably Italy, is to have the choice of its own form of Government. But there must be no Fascism or Nazi-ism for foreign countries. Britain and America evidently are to be at liberty to dictate to other countries what form of Government they must enjoy!

The other Points are all likewise reeking of hypocrisy and inconsistency, so having dealt briefly with the few, the others can be passed over.

As for the Statement that Hitler is not to be trusted, and that Hitler always breaks his word. We are not excusing any man breaking his word, but every politician who is honest (if there is such an one!) must admit that where Hitler has broken his word, he has been driven to it by this country and our allies. But why point the finger at Hitler? Did not our respected and honoured political representatives break their word in 1919, when they foully betrayed the Fourteen Points of President Wilson which constituted the basis for the Armistice of 1918? Our politicians, our leading and honoured Cabinet-members, agreed to tear up an Agreement once they got Germany to lay down her arms. Once the Germans were disarmed and an Allied Army marched on to German soil, Britain and her Allies broke their word by tearing up the Armistice Terms, and they continued to break their word till they had reduced Germany to starvation, want and abject misery. What did that get us? We have heard some silly and stupid people say that "we must finish Germany this time." As if Germany could ever be finished this time as Germany was last time!

And if the boot is on the other foot, this time, what reason have we to squeal? If Hitler were to deal with us, were he to procure a victory, as we dealt with the Germans at the last war, could we blame him? If Hitler is the base rascal that he is said to be, then if Hitler were to break his word given at any Peace Conference, could we blame him? If Hitler and the Germans are the "scum of the earth" and beyond redemption, then let us just be prepared for what is coming to us. But sane and sensible men and women know that all that talk about Hitler and the Germans is mere war propaganda. They know that, what time it is urged that we never could talk with Hitler or discuss matters with him, our political advisers to-day are the very men not only to talk with Hitler, but to side with Hitler if it will serve their own personal ends.

THE ATLANTIC CHARTER

Miss Ruth Fry, whose labours for peace are well-known, has sent us a very detailed analysis of the Atlantic Charter, in which she puts forward a more conciliatory approach than that adopted by Mr. Ratcliffe. Owing to an accident in going to press we will be unable to publish this important analytical essay until next month.

LEACH AND WAR

Criticism of a Labour Militarist

By The Duke of Bedford

Dear Aldred,

In my letter in the September issue of The Word, I mentioned the difficulty I had in understanding how Labour M.P.'s, at one time sensible on the war issue, could change their outlook in the astonishing manner of which some have proved themselves to be capable.

A letter by the Labour M.P., Mr. William Leach, in the issue of Forward of September 6th, seems in some measure to answer my difficulty for me.

Mr. Leach tells us that he was an inveterate opponent of the last war, but he is an ardent supporter of the present one by reason of the antipathy which he feels to Hitler and Hitler's policy.

Mr. Leach is doubtless quite sincere, but it is evident from what he writes that his anti-war feeling of earlier days rested, not on and fundamental principles, but on prejudices and emotion.

People of my school of thought have a conviction that war is indefensible on Christian grounds because Christ, by precept and example, forbade the use of destructive violence against people who believe that they are doing right, even in cases where they are mistaken. They feel equally strongly that war is indefensible on grounds of justice and common sense, because, in the attempt to strike at some objectionable individual or group of individuals, correct their faults and restrain their wrong-doing, it kills and ruins milions of more or less innocent people, while the real offenders usually escape. On these two grounds we are finished with war under all circumstances, and no matter how much we may object to a Dictator's character and policy, we are convinced that war cannot possibly be a right or sensible method of dealing with him. Mr. Leach, however has no such settled convictions about war but, setting on one side both religious considerations and all consideration of war's fearfully clumsy and unjust method of operation, he supports or condemns it according to the feelings he entertains for the statesman at the head of the country with which we are engaged in hostilities.

Mr. Leach's attitude towards the persecution of minorities by the State also appears to be based on emotional feeling and personal preferences and not on fundamental issues. He is moved to the keenest indignation against Hitler because of what he has done to Jews, Socialists and Communists, presumably because he has a soft place in his heart for Jews, Socialists and Communists; but, as is evident from other passages in his letter, he is more than ready to condone and forgive the cruelties inflicted by the Soviet Government upon their political enemies, presumably because these enemies have consisted, among others, of landowners and aristocrats for whom Mr. Leach has little use.

People whose attitude towards State tyranny and persecution is based on fundamental principles but is at the same time understanding, condemns equally the harsh and unjust persecution of all large classes of people, realising that all large classes are composed of the good, the bad, and the indifferent, or in other words of the innocent, the guilty and the partly guilty and that in this respect, there is probably little to choose between Communists and Jews in Germany and artistocrats and landowners in Russia. Bearing in mind, however, the widespread weakness which induces numbers of people of all nationalities to persecute indiscriminately, once their passions and resentments have been aroused, while they may be deeply moved by the horrors and injustices of State tyranny, they avoid hysterical anger and emotionalism and seek to remedy the evil by methods which, unlike war, are not caneulated to accentuate them. One may, indeed, say that the man who fiercely condemns the persecution of one large section of a nation while he thinks nothing of the persecution of another large section of another nation, himself suffers in no small degree from that harsh and one-sided outlook which is a characteristic of the tyrant whom he opposes.

Yours sincerely,

BEDFORD.

Newton Stewart, Sept. 5.

[The case against Soviet Russia, that is, to-day, Stalin, is not the persecution of former landowners, but the bogus trials, terrorism, and persecution AFTER THE REVOLUTION of fellow Socialists, Communists, and Anarchists. All genuine pioneers and fighters in the social struggle. Leach was condemned in detail for his attitude towards the Arabs in Iraq in our work "At Grips With War." His 1924 speeches are disgraceful in one who was once a Socialist and a conscientious objector.—Ed.]

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

We have received a further heavy correspondence from all over the country, urging the Duke of Bedford to become the leader of a United Pacifist and Socialist Movement. References to the duke's attitude from other journals will be reproduced.

The editor has received much correspondence on other matters. Some of this will appear in November also.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS

IN THE DOCK

II.—GLASGOW SEDITION TRIAL, 1921

[Last month we published W. Gallacher's and H. McShane's reports of our Glasgow 1921 trial. We intended to conclude the record in this issue. This is impossible.—Ed.]

III. P. J. DOLLAN REPORTS.

The Daily Herald faithfully followed and reported every stage in the proceedings against us. In this chapter we wish only to record the reports sent in by P. J. Dollan, who was, at that time, Glasgow correspondent to the Daily Herald. Dollan displayed sympathy and solidarity. He may have expected to be Labour Lord Provost some day but he did not face the fact that he would be a war-time Imperialist Lord Provost, and he did not feel at enmity with the extreme sections of the Socialist movement. He was even indignant at our suggestions that Imperialism was the logic of parliamentarism.

We precede the Dollan reports with the date of the issue of the Daily Herald in which each report appeared:

Friday, March 4, 1921.

SEDITION TRIAL.

Sequel to Article in the "Red Commune."

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Thursday.—A sedition case was opened here to-day, when three persons, one a woman, were remitted to the sheriff for trial in connection with an alleged seditious article published in "The Red Commune" in January.

The accused are Andrew Fleming, a printer; Douglas McLeish and Jane Hamilton Patrick, alleged to be the joint authors of the offending article.

The article, the police allege, was calculated "to excite popular dissatisfaction, commotion and violence to popular authority."

Tuesday, March 8, 1921.

GUY ALDRED IN COURT.

Sequel to Article in the "Red Commune."

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Monday.—A further stage in the charge against Guy Aldred, Andrew Fleming, Douglas Mellnish, and Janet Hamilton, of Partick, was reached to-day, when they appeared for a declaration before the Sheriff, and were committed for further inquiry. Bail was refused, and all four were returned to the prison.

The charge has arisen in connection with an article in the "Red Commune" containing an appeal to the Glasgow members to organise its anti-Parliamentary activities so as to give concrete expression to its principles, which article, it is alleged, was calculated to promote disaffection and resistance to lawful authority.

The court was crowded, many being refused entrance.

Aldred, in response to the charge, stated he had nothing to say. He will conduct his own defence.

Councillor Rosslyn Mitchell appeared for the other three persons.

Earlier in the day Aldred was brought before the police court and was formally remitted to the Sheriff.

Monday, March 21, 1921.

ALDRED REFUSED BAIL.

Three Other Communists Granted Bail.

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Sunday.—Three of the prisoners charged in connection with an alleged seditious article in the "Red Commune" were liberated on bail yesterday. The bail for Andrew Fleming, the printer, was £200; and for Jane Patrick and Douglas McLeish, £150 each.

The Lord Justice Clerk, however, refused to allow bail for Guy Aldred, who is under arrest on the same charge.

Aldred has been in prison fully two weeks, and it is stated that his trial will not come on for another six weeks yet. Aldred is detained in Duke-street Prison.

Wednesday, May 11, 1921.

HUSBAND PENALISED.

Sequel to Raid on Offices of "The Spur."

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Tuesday.—In a recent raid on "The Spur," the paper edited by Guy Aldred, the name of a woman was found on the list of subscribers.

The information has evidently been conveyed to the employers of her husband, who has been dismissed in consequence.

The matter is receiving attention, but it is doubtful if the man will be reinstated.

Thursday, June 2, 1921.

GUY ALDRED'S TRIAL.

To be Held at Glasgow on June 10.

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Wednesday.—The trial of Guy Aldred and three others on a charge of publishing an alleged seditious article in "The Red Commune"—which was originally intended to be held at Edinburgh—has been fixed for the High Court, Glasgow, on June 17. A pleading diet will be held on June 10.

Bail has been refused for Aldred, who has been in prison for almost three months.

Wednesday, June 22, 1921.

GUY ALDRED'S SENTENCE.

Eloquent Appeal for Free Speech.

From Our Own Correspondent.

Glasgow, Tuesday.—Guy Aldred, Douglas McLeish, Jane Hamilton Patrick, and Andrew Fleming were to-day found guilty of acting in concert to print and publish the "Red Commune," the official organ of the Glasgow Communist Group and affiliated bodies, containing alleged seditious articles.

Aldred was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, Miss Patrick and McLeish to three months each, and Andrew Fleming, the printer of the paper, to three months, plus a fine of £50, or a further three months.

Persecution!

In continuation of his defence, Aldred spoke for a further hour this forenoon and in an eloquent plea for free speech said Communism might be wrong, but a free Press was always right. He reminded the jury that Liberals had threatened to destroy the House of Lords and were not persecuted. If that was proper advocacy it was equally proper to urge the destruction of the Commons as an agency of Government.

Very telling was his reminder of the persecution of Catholics because of their religious beliefs. As it so happens, the judge, Lord Sherrington, is a Catholic.

Aldred also referred to the speeches of Carson and Lord Birkenhead, who, he said, prevented a peaceful solution of the Irish problem, and were responsible for Irish murders. Now these men were Judges!

Aldred also pointed out that he had been 100 days imprisoned, awaiting trial, which was longer than the sentences imposed on some convicted of sedition in other courts. He was to some extent their main writer, and on that account he pleaded for leniency for his comrades. . . .

The jury included eight women, one of whom was the forewoman.

We have omitted from the last report only details of sentences included in the reports published last month. To-day Dollan indentifies himself with the class that rejoiced in our prosecution.

IV. CONCERNING GUY ALDRED.

By JOHN S. CLARKE.

[Reprinted from "The Worker," the organ of National Workers Committees, Glasgow, for October 8, 1921. Clarke was editor at that time. Subsequently Clarke returned to the Labour Party, became M.P. for Maryhill for a while, and then adapted himself to Capitalist journalism. We have attacked Clarke bitterly at times and have resented his developments. We hold that he has wasted or dissipated his ability and knowledge. Clark has answered our attacks by maintaining an attitude of undiminished friendship. Recently he presented us with a rare copy of Cartwright's "Legislative Rights of The Commonalty Vindicated," published in London in 1777, presented by the author to the Committee of Sussex, inscribed in the famous Radical's bold writing, and dated "3rd March, 1780." Also the exposure of the spy system, pursued in Glasgow, 1816-1820, with the original letter of Andrew Hardie, published in 1833. Clarke sent a letter of warm friendship with these gifts, accepting our attacks as facts, and commending our discipleship of Richard Carlile. In "The Worker" article reproduced in part below, Clarke recalls the appeals he wrote and published in "The Worker" for March 12 and March 26, 1921, and later appeals issued by the Anti-Parliamentary Group itself. The unnecessary details are omitted. Clarke cites them only to deny the suggestion that he was wanting in solidarity. We reproduce the rest of his signed editorial reviewing the trial and sentence. The title was used by Clarke in the original articles.—Ed.]

There is a feeling in some quarters that we have not been as sympathetic toward the Aldred-Patrick-McLeish case as we might have been Because we did not make any comment when sentence was passed, we are suspected of being callously indifferent. . . .

But the lock-out began and E.P.A. commenced to operate. Our readers know the result. Some thing like one hundred Communists were arrested in different parts of the country and sent to jail. Aldred and his friends were tried at the time that scores of others were being similarly tried. For us to have commented on each case would have necessitated turning the Worker into a kind of Prison Bulletin or Police Budget. . . .

With this explanation (an Editor has to be continually apologising for his existence) let us make some, if belated observations on the case against Aldred. Whatever savagery a vindictive hatred prompted the ruling class bullies to inflict upon our E.P.A. victims, it apparently inspired them to be outrageously severe on Aldred. They kept him in confinement for four months prior to his trial, refused him liberty on bail. They gave him a longer sentence than anyone else. Aldred not only gets no remission of sentence but will not enjoy the reduction of the four months which he suffered previous to his trial. For the trivial offences he was found guilty of this punishment is positively monstrous. Not justice, but blind, bitter hatred sent him to endure the horrors of a Christian prison. Such martyrdom it has been his unfortunate lot to bear on several occasions in the past.

From our point of view—from your point of view—his political opinions may be hopelessely wrong. This is a point which must carry no weight whatever in our consideration of his case and our judgment of his splenetic tormentors. Such opinions are not only held by many, but have been held in the past by the loftiest spirits of the race. We may not agree with them, but we have got to agree that their right of expression is as legitimate as our own. Only bigots think otherwise, and a bigot is always a tyrant. As for his "crime," it is one that every self-respecting man has committed and intends to commit time and time again—an attempt to stir up the people until they realise that the common heritage of Nature and Society is deliberately and systematically thieved from them by a small section of gilt-edged scoundrels and rapscallions who hire a swarm of flunkeys and brutal bullies to keep the people from realising their own sordid subjection. This is the long and the short of the capitalist-landlord system and the comfortable hogs who thrive upon it. They are to-day as their predecessors were in the time of Christ, a gang of whitewashed sepulchres mouthing their stinking hypocrisy the while their carnivorous fangs are dripping with the blood of women and little children. His alleged crime was that he advocated "the preaching of sedition." We say "alleged" because we are as certain as we are that light follows day that his persecutors only made that excuse to get him.

Those who saw the original paragraph which constituted the chief count in the indictment will recollect that the word "sedition" was printed in quotation marks—"sedition." Such marks are employed by all literary men and women in cases like this one as determinatives. They are intended to point out to the reader that the word they embellish is only used in a derisive sense. Every cultured person in the court knew this little point as well as Aldred, but when the wolf has the lamb at its mercy ignorance becomes a virtue and legal technicality as sacred as the Sermon on the Mount.

When one remembers the speeches and actual deeds of Carson and Smith and the subsequent immunity these creatures enjoyed, it makes one vomit to think that the people who sent Aldred away for sixteen months, for a triviality, profess to have assimilated the teaching of the man who spoke of his own ruling class as those "who strain at gnats and swallow camels."

Aldred commited only one crime—he tried to awaken the working class. That is a villany beyond forgiveness in the eyes of the lechers and lickspittles who manipulate the machinery of coercion on behalf of the filthiest ruling class that has ever plundered a quiescent proletariat.

We are not in favour of petitioning even Labour M.P.'s to move in a matter of this kind, for if they were really one hundredth part of what they profess to be—the representatives of the working class—they would have fought a case of this kind long ago, even though the principal victim is uncompromisingly anti-parliamentarian. . . .

A man who bravely spoke for the dispossessed and browbeaten, is eating his heart out in a prison cell and his friends are powerless to help him because they lack the means. Gallacher once assured me that instead of "getting used to it," to adopt the familiar expression, prison life becomes more horrible each time one returns to it. Aldred has already suffered over three years and has been in prison now for seven months on a ridiculous charge. What kind of a hell, physically and mentally, must it be to an active minded, cultured man? Try to conjure it for yourself. Try to be sentient for any sake, to feel what others feel, and do something to save further suffering on his part. Don't shake your heads and piously commiserate, and don't take pity on Aldred the Martyr. Aldred can dispense with pity, he can keep his back up, and pity is for those who can't. . . .

As a penalty for active service in the class war we might excusably ignore the loss of a warrior. As the phrase goes, "he only got what he dared for." But Aldred's case is different. He got more than he dared for. In his case it is a fact of utmost importance to remember that the punishment does not fit the offence. As long as men like Carson are loaded with honours instead of being shot as traitors to the realm, the persecution of Aldred is transparently an act of revenge on the part of the animated carrion who control the capitalist system. . . .

Forget everything but the fact that your enemy has got a comrade down; a comrade who has fought valiantly for you for many years; one whose hands bear not the smutch of corruption; one who suffers because—

"The people is a beast of muddy brain
That knows not its own strength."

OUR PRISON SYSTEM

An Essay intended to be of interest to Socialists and "Conchies"

[Last month we published an essay written in August 1918, at Deepcut, whilst in detention awaiting our fourth Court Martial for resisting military service. The following essay was planned at the same time but was not written actually until we were released, for the first time, under the "Cat and Mouse" Act. Just after writing it we proceeded to Wandsworth Common to speak, where we were re-arrested and returned to Wandsworth for more hunger striking and prison discipline resistance. The story of the Wandsworth Prison C.O. revolt is told in "The Word" for April 1940 and February 1941.

Study of the courageous work of Richard Carlile caused us to be interested in constitutional law and the prison system before we experienced prison hospitality. From that time on, we studied, placed, and debunked Blackstone, whose ridiculous and unworthy ghost stands too often besides judges of the King's Bench, dictating over their shoulders, against the liberty of the citizen, and conferring powers on the executive intolerable to the believer in the rights of man. We studied the prison system, in England and Scotland, in person, at first hand, always as the victim, and with no desire to become the jailer. The nature of our study was revealed in our 1916 essay on "The Military Cell," published in "The Word" for May 1940.

The present essay was published in "The Spur" (Vol. V, No. 11, page 125) for April 1919. We have added (1941) the last two paragrephs.—Ed.]

We are a goodly but apathetic folk. Prison revelations disturb and surprise us. Most distinctly, we are not our brother's keeper. Of course, we will discuss his immoralities quite gladly. Scandal is our recreation. It spices our piety. But to concern ourselves with his sufferings, to protest against his being outraged—that is quite another question. The problem is one for which we have no taste, since the consequences may prove unpleasant. Smugly do we atone for our neglect by questioning, if not actually denying, the reality of another's sufferings. We are sceptical from indifference not from anxiety. We suspend our sense of duty not our judgment. It satisfies our humour, because it suits our interests, to believe that prison life is being reduced, surely if slowly, to a humane system of detention. There is an optimism abroad, which is ever ready to defend authorised iniquity. Most cheerfully does this spirit of glowing progress persuade us that huge improvements were witnessed in our prison system from the time of Godwin to that of Dickens, and between the age of Dickens and the present time. If this was true, one should shudder to think what it must have been like when Godwin wrote his Caleb Williams. That work must have been a very poor indictment indeed.

It happens, however, that optimistic sentimentalism is not only wrong, but hypocritically so. Instead of our prison system improving, it is rapidly becoming worse. To-day, the Prison Commissioners place a premium on despotism—that Englishmen would not have tolerated a century back. Yet at that time political corruption was as rife as it is now. Perhaps it was more rife, for its agents were more notorious. I am taking advantage of the Wandsworth Inquiry, therefore, to call attention to this curious evolution of our prison system, especially as regards political offences, because I am convinced that direct action and public opinion will destroy this despotism, as it can destroy every other despotism. The evil secrecy of the Prison Commissioners, the impudence of prison governors, warders, and wardresses, and their craven attendants, has to go. The State will never destroy these vices. The people can.

Under a system where despotism did not pry into the communication of every prisoner, and punish with barbarities the slave who "splits," such hideous torture as forcible feeding could not continue a day.

It is always the poor who suffer. Despotism ever attacks the friendless. At Newcastle, during the suffragist agitation some seven or eight years ago, rather than forcibly feed Lady Constance Lytton, the authorities discharged her on medical evidence, stating that she suffered from a weak heart. To her lasting credit, let it be recalled how Lady Constance exposed this hypocrisy. Disguising herself as Jane Wharton, a factory girl, she again went to gaol—and was fed forcibly. Only when, after seven days, her identity was discovered did the Medical Officer unearth her weak heart.

In all, twenty-nine women were submitted to this degrading treatment. Then the authorities succumbed somewhat to the public scandal. Under Churchill, a new set of rules were adopted for prisoners of the second division, which removed the criminal marks and practically admitted the right of the Suffragists to be treated as political prisoners.

Much has been made of the fact that C.O.'s, after suffering over twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, are permitted, always provided they servilely subscribe to the prison regulations, to enjoy certain very limited privileges under the Churchill regulation, rule 243A. These privileges include a limited period of association exercise and a fortnightly censored letter. I want now to compare this restricted and censored "right" of correspondence with the right of correspondence enjoyed by prisoners a century ago. The following letter was addressed by Lord Sidmouth, who suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, to Mr. Cunningham, the Governor of Gloucester Gaol, and issued as a circular to every county gaol in the kingdom by order of the Home Secretary:—

Whitehall, 9th Nov., 1814.

Sir,

"I address this letter to you in consequence of certain complaints that have been made relative to the government of Gloucester Gaol, and the report of the Visiting Magistrates thereon. It appears that there has been a practice of opening letters, either addressed to or written by prisoners of the classes of felons and fines, under a notion that it was your duty to do so. I feel myself, therefore, called upon to repeat the opinion which I expressed in a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions of the county of Gloucester, on the 12th July last, that the law will not warrant such a practice.

"Letters should be opened in such cases only in which there is reasonable ground to suspect that a communication is intended for purposes of confederation and crime, or which may produce disorder in the gaol, or lead to escapes, or other mischevious consequences. It must be left to your individual discretion to decide upon individual cases in which fair suspicion may warrant you in opening such letters, to prevent apprehended mischief; but if it be done as a general practice, or without probable cause or suspicion, it will be highly reprehensible. I think it also necessary to repeat, though not called for in the same degree by every practice proved to have existed in the gaol under your care, that the legal advisors or friends of prisoners should be permitted at reasonable times, to have access to them, for the purpose of preparing for their defence or trial, or for the protection of their rights and interests. But as application of this sort may be made a practice for improper or unreasonable communications, it must remain for you to exercise a fair and honest discretion in deciding whether the application for access or communication be for the real purpose stated, and act accordingly.

"I am, Sir,

(Signed) "SIDMOUTH."

"P.S.—As the High Sheriff and the Visiting Magistrates are annually appointed, I have to request that you will communicate to them from time to time, as occasion may require, the contents of the above letter."

By order of Sir John Acland, Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for the County of Somerset, this letter was entered in the Magistrates' Journal at the Gaol of Ilchester. More than a century has elapsed since this was done. Our prison system has been "reformed" and our parliamentary franchise has become democratic! With the result that a practice, denounced by a reactionary Home Secretary, in an official communication, as illegal and highly reprehensible in 1814, has become legal and official in 1919, thanks to our democratic parliamentarism and interest in prison reform! The consequence is that, to-day, prisoner and their friends are warned:

"All letters are read by the Prison Authorities."

This despotic practice renders the prisoner absolutely helpless. Yet it has been developed by our parliamentary democracy. Side by side with the extension of suffrage has grown and developed this increasing invasion of the right of prisoners. Bureaucracy has increased in impudence with every broadening of the franchise. And when some fact or other leaks through, we control our government so well, that we are shocked out of our wits. A Prison Inquiry is ordered and we fall asleep again. So much for prison-reform Socialism and the Capitalist careerist parliamentary ballot-box.

ADDED, SEPTEMBER, 1941.

There is no protection to the common people in the fact that a man has suffered imprisonment and is elected to parliament afterwards. M.P.'s have been sent to prison and have been horrified at the conditions. But then it was too late to reform the conditions for they were no longer M.P.'s and their voices no longer carried weight in respectable and official circles. Political prisoners have become M.P.'s after their release and have forgotten that the little grey home in the west remained intact, that prison conditions continued in the same bad old way, and that human beings were suffering still what they once endured.

It is time that mankind gave up playing at prison reform and the pettifogging child's game of punishment and authority, and established a sane and decent society. We think so much in the terms of jailing that even those who want Communism and Revolution, with rare exceptions, have no idea of dispensing with the medieval and counter-revolutionary institution of barren class society, termed the prison system.

CONSCIENCE (1916) CASES

The Word has devoted considerable space to the question of conscientious objection. To-day many of the 1916 cases and prison experiences will be recalled with interest. April, May, July and August 1940 numbers are devoted to this question of exempting conscience in 1916. Comrades should order the four copies, post free, for 1s. 0d.

LABOUR, WAR AND THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

The Labour Party rejected Lansbury's plea against war, and decided on a policy of war, renewing its latest National Government alliance, at the Brighton Conference of October 1 and 2, 1935. Lord Ponsonby adopted the same attitude as Lansbury and uttered some wise words about a sham fight, as regards matters of principle, not as regards suffering, being staged between the great Imperialistic Powers. He added:

"I am convinced that my duty lies in pinning my faith and giving my allegiance—not to a sham fight of international war—but to a real fight against the enemy here in our midst.

"That is our job.

"This sham fight is preventing us from building up the society that we want.

"We are losing sight of the grim and dreadful war against exploitation, greed, capitalism and all the badly-constructed injustice of society which allows one man to leave £7,000,000 and another not to leave enough money to bury him. ... ...

"That is the war that I am going to be faithful to."

This excerpt is culled from the report published in the Daily Herald, for Wednesday, October 2, 1935.

According to our contemporary, Stafford Cripps denounced the then Labour Party Policy of League and Sanctions as a policy supporting the National Government. To-day, Cripps is Britain's Ambassador at Moscow, appointed by the National Government, in evidence of the truth of his own 1935 contention. H. B. Lees Smith denounced his arguments then as "trivial and cantankerous" and described Ponsonby's contribution as "elevating but negative." Ponsonby's argument was correct and time has shown that Stafford Cripps was neither trivial nor cantankerous in his reasoning.

William Mellor attacked collective security and made a speech the direct reverse of those he has made since the outbreak of war. He said:

"The same appeals that were made to the working-class in 1914 were being repeated now. ...

...The League of Nations was retaining power politics in which the Imperialisms of France and Britain dominated every decision.

"The League was based on the robbers' treaty of Versailles, out of which had come Fascist Italy and Germany."

Charles Dukes, speaking for the National Union of Municipal and General Workers, replied to Cripps and Mellor:

"We are accused of co-operating with Imperialistic Governments," he said.

"Cripps and Mellor know that to be a lie, and they have no right to make that accusation.

"Our Socialism is as good as theirs, but as responsible men and women we have to say not what we hope may happen in the distant future, but what we are going to do to-morrow . . ."

"I envy Dr. Salter his optimism, but I do not believe that singing psalms to lions will work in this year of our Lord."

Cripps and Mellor were right about co-operating with Imperialistic Governments. Dukes was right when he said that his Socialism was as good as their's. It was as good—and as bad. For it was simply parliamentarism, power politics, and not Socialism at all.

Rhys Davies recalled that he had been a C.O. in 1916, but, after much mental agony, took his stand by the League against Cripps. Davies has made some telling speeches against war and militarism in the present House of Commons and must know that his Brighton speech was nonsense.

George Dallas said that he had returned recently from the Labour and Socialist International. The Socialist parties on the Continent of Europe were looking to the British Labour Party for a lead. Which meant that George Dallas had engaged in some joy-riding at the expense of the working class. One would like to know all about those mysterious Socialist parties. What a sorry joke that parliamentary-Socialist-job-seeking business has proven!

Jack Williams, of the Miners' Federation, compared Stafford Cripps with Oswald Mosley, and declared that the statement about supporting the National Government was "shallow and dishonest."

John Wilmot, M.P., also denied the National Government argument. Thus:

"Let us be clear about this. There is no question of this party throwing in its lot with the 'National' Government."

CONCHIES, SOCIALISTS AND PRISON CONDITIONS

All over Britain, conscientious objectors are being sentenced to twelve months imprisonment for refusing medical examination. This directs attention to the question of prison conditions, and to the further fact that several persons who complained of prison conditions in 1916 to 1919, became M.P.s in 1923, and did nothing to remedy the appalling conditions of which they complained. This fact is an outstanding disgrace to the parliamentarians.

The name of Hubert William Peet is to be found in Who's Who. To his credit he recalls his 28 months' hard labour as a conscientious objector. What he suffered during that period he tells in the following letter:

"The attempted imposition of silence is unmoral, even if not immoral; the isolation drives the man into himself, and tempts him at every turn to fulfil the human instinct of communication with his fellows, a course possible by the exercise of some petty deceit or the breaking of a rule. The prison regime provides every temptation to atrophy, and to let oneself vegetate. Several times I felt acutely the danger that my pacifism might become passionism, and that if not watchful I might let my life develop into meals and mail-bags. . . ."

In 112 Days' Hard Labour, Peet wrote:

"There is in prison no method of recording permanently thoughts that occur during reading or meditation, of noting for future reference passages that may be found helpful or striking, or of making notes for plans on return to ordinary life . . . and personally the one single alteration which would go to make gaol life more tolerable than anything else would be the provision of pencil and paper, and the permission to retain the latter on release."

Hubert Peet wrote thus in 1917. It is now 1941. For 24 years this intolerable barbarism has continued, under Labour and Tory Governments. Compare the conditions with those enjoyed in Sidmouth's days by Richard Carlile!

Stephen Hobhouse wrote in 1917:

"Sometimes when I feel tired and ill, I long for some little homely comfort, such as a glass of hot water or some tea and dry toast. I felt cruelly the restrictions of what seemed the most elementary needs. I did not think that my body with its weak points would stand it long. The struggle is often intense. Prison life has its own special temptations—to selfish introspection and the like. . . . I think the worst pitch of depression was one foggy and dark Sunday, when it was impossible to see either to sew or read in one's cell, and on remonstrating in the evening with one of the warders for not giving us the gas light, he answered, 'You are not worth it—it is not a work day.' The answer sank in."

In another letter, Stephen Hobhouse wrote:

"I told the Governor that it was impossible to keep the silence rule, in fact I came to the conclusion it was morally wrong to keep it, though it is not good for one to have to regulate one's talking according to one's distance from the warder and his character. There is no doubt that the prison system encourages artfulness and deceit. Deadening of intellect is one of the great dangers for educated prisoners, while others, owing to harrying, spying, etc., lose self-respect and all confidence in their power to lead a strong moral life."

Clifford Allen wrote during his second period of imprisonment:

"One hundred and ninety-five days of stitching, each of twenty-three hours and fifty minutes' silence. I think the greatest torture of enforced and perpetual silence is the never-ceasing consciousness of thinking in which it results. You cannot stop thinking for an instant. And if you seem to, it is only to listen intently to the beating of your heart drumming in your ears. You cannot escape thinking about the most trivial matters of routine. I thing of the very knots in the boards each time I scrub them, until I could scratch them out of the floor to rid myself of their arrogant insistence upon themselves. One inevitable result is a consequent and hopeless inability to think of those very things that are your interest, and would stimulate and hearten you. . . . And then I seem to have no way of escape from dwelling upon the horror of the war, and just because I cannot be active, my imagination is the more vivid, until I am driven almost to the breaking point of despair by thinking of all the agony of the world. . . ."

We indicted Clifford Allen's record in The Word for May 1940. He was made a Baron in 1932, for supporting Ramsay Macdonald's Imperialist Coalition. To his credit, in Debrett, Allen recalled the fact that he was imprisoned three times as a conscientious objector. But Allen became a peer whilst these conditions continued behind the grim walls of our prisons. Allen is dead now. He died in honour. And a second generation of C.O.s is being condemned, under a semi-Labour Coalition Government, to these conditions complained of and indicted in 1917. The fact is unbelievable but alas it is true.

FREETHOUGHT BIOGRAPHY

Chapman Cohen, the veteran editor of The Freethinker, and President of the National Secular Society, in The Freethinker for July 27 last, gives a kindly notice to the new edition of our "life" of Richard Carlile, and makes the following interesting reflections on the subject of Freethought biography:—

"We like the following remarks of Sir Ronald Storr, as given in 'The Times Literary Supplement.' They are taken from a speech delivered in Edinburgh.

'Reading,' said Sir Ronald, 'must bear not only the blossom of delight, but the fruits of absorbed and assimilated experience. . . . The spirit of books is the spirit of freedom—universal through, yet independent of time, clime, religion and race; the first book written was the first nail in the coffin of tyrants all over the world.'

"That is sound philosophy, and it reminds one that ever since books have been published, both Church and State have done their utmost to regulate what books should be published and what should be said in them. The Roman Church has a colossal index of forbidden books, and the other Churches, while not issuing an official index, still have a lengthy list of forbidden books. Both State and Church look upon books as something that must be regulated in the interests of established opinion.

"We repeat that we have no official index of forbidden books, although their suppression in this country is not unknown to the law. But the great weapon in this country is the boycott, far more cowardly and contemptible than any form of published legal proscription. The majority of Christians will not read a book on Freethought, the majority of hard-crusted Tories will not read anything that threatens their power or privileges. Above all, there is the boycott—the most cowardly and the most contemptible of all weapons. So far as we are concerned, the meanest form of this is manifested in the sphere of religion. Shopkeepers are threatened if they display Freethought papers, booksellers if they display uncompromising attacks on religion. . .

"Yet we have achieved, in spite of Church and State, a measure of freedom. But, how it has been fought for! Just over 100 years ago there were scores of men and women imprisoned for selling Paine's 'Age of Reason,' and a long list of books might be given that have brought their writers or sellers terms of imprisonment. The State does not like freedom of publication, whatever shape the State is, but the Churches hate it because it strikes at their very existence. Sir Ronald Storr is right—the spirit of books is the spirit of freedom. But they may also be used to crush freedom and, when too late, the writers find that they have been forging chains for themselves. . . .

"Among the very greatest Freethinkers of the nineteenth century stands the heroic figure of Richard Carlile. The years he spent in prison—on different sentences—indicate the heroism of the man, and his conduct affected every reform movement of his time. The working classes owe more to him than most people know. It is for these reasons that we welcome a new edition of 'Richard Carlile, Agitator,' by Guy A. Aldred (Strickland Press, Glasgow, 1s. 6d.). The sketch extends to 160 pages, with a number of plates and is, in these days of dear printing, marvellous value for money.

"It will probably not come in our time, but one day we hope that some wealthy person will see to it that a series of biographies of famous Freethinking men and women is published. As we have so often said, in this country we have a very effective method of burying our great heretics. We neglect them when living, and ignore them when dead. If possible, their names are never mentioned. If as prominent in their day as was Paine or Carlile, just a passing mention is made of them and their work which leaves the student quite ignorant of what they did, and with the impression that there is no need to bother about them.

OBEDIENCE TO CONSCIENCE

[The following important statement was issued by the Meetings for Sufferings of the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, Friends House, Euston Road, London, N.W.1., in June. Copies may be obtained direct for 2d. We publish it as a statement of great value and supreme importance.—Ed.]

RECOGNITION OF CONSCIENCE.

It is fundamental to the faith of a Christian democracy that a citizen has obligations which may over-ride his duty to obey the laws of the land. The British Parliament has recognised this in several Statutes by providing exemption upon grounds of conscientious conviction. The most recent examples are the military service Acts.

The Prime Minister has declared "the rights which have been granted in this war and the last to conscientious objectors are well known, and are a definite part of British policy. Anything in the nature of persecution, victimisation or man-hunting is odious to the British people" (House of Commons, March 20th, 1941). The Minister of Labour and National Service has emphasised the same principle by repeatedly expressing disapproval of the action of local authorities and private employers who have victimised conscientious objectors because of their views.

PRESENT LIMITATION OF THIS RECOGNITION.

The Society of Friends is thankful for this recognition of conscience, but is the more disturbed that the extension of the principle of conscription to industrial purposes, fire watching, and civil defence should be accompanied by a drastic limitation of the recognition to be accorded to conscientious conviction. On behalf of the Government this limitation was stated by the Minister of Labour and National Service (House of Commons, April 1st, 1941) in the words "I cannot admit the principle of conscientious objection to civil work," and "To say that you can have a conscientious objection to State mechanism would resolve itself into turning the whole of the State into a state of anarchy."

In view of this new limitation the Society of Friends is impelled to state now what it believes to be the basis and consequent importance of obedience to conscience.

CONSCIENTIOUS CONVICTIONS THROUGHOUT HISTORY.

Men and women in every generation have felt constrained to live in direct relation to loyalties beyond those accepted by their contemporaries. One of the earliest statements of this to which our Christian tradition turns is found in the reported reply of the three Israelites to Nebuchadnezzar:

"If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burnings of the fiery furnace, and he will deliver us. . . . But if not, be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou has set up."

This story recounts a direct refusal on the part of loyal servants of the State to obey its demands when they conflicted with loyalty to God. The particular witness of each age has varied in the differing circumstances, but it gives constant proof of the compelling character of the obedience demanded. Throughout history this faithfulness to conscience, though condemned at the time, has come to be recognised as of lasting worth. Readiness to accept suffering for convictions has given a redemptive character to life and revealed human effort in "a costly but noble state of tension" through which the quality of life was raised.

Our own Society was born in the experience of men and women who met publicly for worship knowing that the cost would be disturbance by the magistrates and soldiers, loss of goods and chattels, imprisonment or even death. They bore all this faithfully, conscious that they were being led into truth. In the furnace of persecution through which they passed they too desired only that they might serve their God as they understood His will. Friends have always found in their first-hand experience of God within the soul what they have called the Light or the Light of Christ. This Light illuminates the conscience and gives power to do what is perceived to be the will of God.

FOUNDATIONS AND GROWTH.

The Society of Friends has always associated conscientious conviction with the revelation of God within the heart. In using such language we would not suggest that obedience to conscience is compliance with the vetoes or injunctions of a mysterious inner oracle. It is the acknowledgment by a man's whole self of a loyalty—to a principle, a cause or a person—to which he feels committed and which he may not betray. Conscience is a "sense of oughtness," capable of development as its promptings are obeyed. Training, heredity and example, thought, reason and religious experience—all help to determine its quality. At its best it becomes an impelling power, not so much prompting a certain course of action as making it impossible to do anything else. In the words of Martin Luther: "Here stand I—I can no other."

It is our experience that faithfulness to conscience illuminated by the Light of God in the heart produces a life which issues in service to the community. Sometimes this service is of obvious and positive kinds, sometimes it may be the apparently negative service of refusing compliance with laws or regulations which are felt to hinder the higher loyalty. The test of sincerity is the kind of life lived, though the full meaning and significance of it may not be immediately apparent. John Woolman felt "a stop in his mind" when instructed by his employer to write a Bill of Sale for a negro slave, but this was a prelude to a lifetime's devotion to the cause of the slave.

CREATIVE CHARACTER OF CONSCIENCE.

We recognise that there is increasing need for the regulation by the State of economic relationships and social services. Moreover, that the State cannot on the score of freedom condone laziness. We can understand that to those pre-occupied with active forms of social and national service the claims of conscience may seem sometimes an excuse for evasion or inaction. Conscientious objection, however, arises from the claims of the State to prescribe for a man what his service shall be, and when these demands are felt by some citizens to be contrary to the will of God they will be bound to say "No." The idea that this endangers the State overlooks the fact that the democratic State can function only on a basis of tolerance, and that it runs far greater risks in overriding the conviction of minorities than in accepting them. Many sincere people, first become aware of the claims of a great moral principle in terms of what they feel constrained not to do. The general assertion remains true that even in its negations conscientious concern is primarily creative. It develops a relationship to the community which makes for the righteous ordering of the State. This is in accordance with the experience of our Society in the past, and to-day we expect that our members will give positive as well as negative expression to their faith.

ITS VERDICT AND AUTHORITY.

We do not assert that he who claims to be following the lead of conscience is infallible. There are inevitably instances of honest self-deception, in which through lack of self-knowledge, motives are mistaken and some deep rooted inclination or disinclination, which has no moral basis, is thought to be the voice of conscience. We may too readily identify a latent fear of the dangers of war, or a mere dislike of discipline as a conscientious objection. A conscientious decision therefore should not be hastily reached, glibly formulated, or arrogantly proclaimed: it should be a first-hand judgment not an echo of a point of view caught from others. But a man who has done his best to see clearly and judge honestly upon the moral issues confronting him is under obligation to act upon the conclusions he has reached, even though fuller enlightenment might show him to be in error, for to do otherwise will be to betray the right as he sees it. The verdict of his conscience is binding upon him, for the alternative is to surrender to external pressure, and abandon the right and duty of moral choice and personal responsibility.

CONSCIENCE ALWAYS ENTITLED TO RESPECT

If conscience is sometimes mistaken it is equally true that no human tribunal can be sure of judging whether it be genuine. The National Service (Armed Forces) Act in providing for the recognition of conscientious objection has enabled many men to make clear to an understanding Tribunal the way in which they feel free to serve the community. There will, however, always be many men who feel that any alternative to secure their compliance is as unacceptable to them as is the principal service required under the Act. Others again will feel compelled to refuse to change their occupation at the behest of a Minister for a purpose which they must conscientiously disavow. Their conviction should meet with respect even at the risk of some insincere claimants receiving treatment which they do not deserve.

Respect should be accorded also to many whom we know to be equally sincere but whose thoughts run more easily in political channels and phraseology. Our own belief is that conscientious conviction always arises from the Light of God in a man's heart, but those of whom we are now speaking would themselves make no such claim. They should not be misjudged by the assumption that moral convictions must always be given an avowedly religious basis. The proof of a man's moral enlightenment lies in whether his convictions lead sooner or later into a true and extending human brotherhood and understanding—an understanding which we believe can only reach its fullest depth as it is linked with a unity in God.

The noblest example of individual loyalty to a guidance within the soul is found in the life of Jesus Christ. In Him the Light of God shone at its brightest and his determination to follow its leading is seen as he set his face steadfastly towards Jerusalem to meet the fate which he knew awaited him there. His conduct might have been criticised as being both unpatriotic and unpractical, but his crucifixion remains a judgment upon conventional opinion as well as a revelation of the redemptive love of God. His loyalty to the guidance of God, and the spirit in which he met persecution, set free the most potent force for overcoming evil which the world has known. Thus he stands for all time the revealer of the Father and the inspiration of those who follow him.

EDITOR'S REPORT

We issued a special appeal for £1,971 11s. 3d. in November 1940. Last month this deficit stood at £1,780 14s. 4d. During the interval there had been regular monthly losses on the paper. If we can recover this sum we can carry on for some time, despite our monthly losses, without begging further. The circulation of the paper is rising. Lady Clare Annesley sells it in the streets at Coventry. Lady Stalbridge has sent £10 towards its peace work. A working man comes in on the first of each month and gives 10/-. A London doctor, who believes in healing and sanity, has sent £1 and promised to do so each month. On all sides comrades are urging us to keep the work going. The total return last month was the highest yet: £62 7s. 8d. Many workers have left 6d. and 1/- donations at George Street shop. The deficit now stands at £1,718 6s. 8d. Comrades, it is a year since we issued this appeal. Could we not raise this balance in a month and end this feature. Our circulation is rising steadily. Each comrade needs but to make one response now!

RICHARD CARLILE

Until such time as a fourth edition of my "life" of Richard Carlile is called for, this essay must stand as a further appendix to the third edition. It is written, therefore, in the first person singular instead of the customary editorial plural.

Many comrades have expressed appreciation at the recent publication of the third edition. The work would be improved by the additions indicated in this commentary. They were not incorporated in the third edition owing to a printer's mistake, and the difficulty of repairing it, when discovered, without unduly postponing publication.

I. CARLILE'S BIOGRAPHERS.

The 1941 preface makes reference to W. H. Wickwar's monumental work, The Struggle For The Freedom of The Press. This treats largely of Richard Carlile and his magnificent fight. It should find a place in every Freethinker's library, notwithstanding its shortcomings.

Wickwar compares the three biographies of Carlile: G. J. Holyoake's; Mrs. Carlile Campbell's, and my own. (See page 68 of Wickwar's work).

Wickwar states that Holyoake's biography is "based on a close study of Carlile's writings." Actually, Holyoake's biography is notoriously slight and reveals no such study. I dealt with Holyoake's falsehoods thoroughly in THE Spur for February, 1916 (Vol. II., No. 9, pages 73-74), and the essay will be revised and reprinted. Holyoake can be accepted as an authority on the struggle of Carlile, subject to the most careful examination and analysis. His comment is helpful. His record of fact, interested, unreliable, and contradictory. That Wickwar was unaware of the real value to place on Holyoake's writings detracts from the worth of his own writing. It lessens considerably his critical authority. He also shows that he cannot read, for his statement as to period over which Holyoake knew Carlile is inaccurate and contradicts the book.

Wickwar states that Mrs. Carlile Campbell hardly remembered her father, but had some of his correspondence and knew some of his friends. This is correct.

Wickwar describes my biography as a "Communist compedium of miscellaneous information picturing Carlile as a demi-god among demons." The "Communist" adjective is introduced from bias. The "compedium" reference implies that I cannot write. The "demi-god" is meant to accuse me of false writing and unbalanced judgment.

These three charges are most unfortunate for the man who makes them. The adjective has no place in the record, for it is obvious that I am a complete libertarian, and, as regards Carlile, my bias is towards the principle of the absolute Freedom of the Press. Certain folk, claiming to be Communist, falsely in my opinion, object to a Free Press and favour dictatorship over opinion. It is not correct to say that the work is a "Communist compedium," for it does not mention nor discuss Communism. It is correct to say that the Wickwar's comment is an Anti-Communist inaccuracy, for it betrays spleen and exposes the writer's narrow approach. As for "compedium," it may be that I cannot write: but to state facts simply and directly is more useful than to write falsehoods eloquently. Many liars are eloquent. The "demi-god" touch is as unfortunate as the rest of Wickwar's comment. Sir G. M. Trevelyvan, who was not a Communist, but was a great and worthy scholar, in his British History in the Nineteenth Century, expresses the same view of Carlile and his shopmen as is expressed by me in less powerful language. Trevelyvan cannot be accused of Communism and cannot be indicted for producing a compedium. But he shares my offence of admiring Carlile. Perhaps Wickwar will try to write down Trevelyvan's history, which increases in repute with the lapse of time. And perhaps if Wickwar should reissue his work, he will apologise to his readers for spoiling a splendid work of research by a quibbling legal and ruling class bias. If Carlile was too great a personality for him to understand, he ought never to have attempted the task.

Wickar insists that Carlile was no orator. This is true. The fact makes Carlile's speech from the dock a magnificent performance, for it breathed eloquence and possesses, even to-day, a living fire.

Wickwar objects to Carlile's conduct in the dock in 1819. He ought to know that Carlile's contentions were right and that the judge's conceptions of blasphemy and sedition were ridiculous. They have been repudiated from the bench since then in most learned verdicts that read like second-hand versions of Carlile's original reasoning. Carlile's aggressive conduct was the behaviour of the agitator. Wickwar is unable to appreciate its splendour because he has the mind of a pigmy scholar and is capable only of wandering round in a maze of legal jargon unrelated even to jurisprudence, the mental cobweb of despotism. Carlile belongs to the despised underworld of agitation and agitators. The first Christians belonged to this world in the days of the ancient Roman Empire, when Christianity was despised and rejected. This underworld has been the real overworld of progress. Since the days of Caesar to those of Labour-Lord Advocates and Labour Ministers of Home Security, the real underworld of thought has been the fashionable political and intellectual world of class authority: the mean, contemptible, underworld of lawyers and judges, the routine mediocrity of bench and bar. There have been great lawyers and great judges. But these have been rare and usually fell on bad times because of some kink of genius that routine could not suppress. But the run of the fraternity has been of the type of Lord Justice Abbot. He was one of the worst judges despotism employed for its evil purpose. It is but natural that Wickwar should evidence studied regard for his memory. The reader must turn to Chapter IV., in which Abbott's career is detailed.

Wickwar objects to my eulogy of Carlile; but he quotes Trevelyvan—whose very name spells learning—and the very work to which reference is made in this essay.

Trevelyvan says that the revival of Paine's influence was due to Richard Carlile, who "suffered and achieved more for the liberty of the Press than any other Englishman of the nineteenth century." This comes perilously near the pictures of Carlile that my biography outlines. The truth is, that I am in entire sympathy with my subject. Holyoake was never in real sympathy with him, and few modern Rationalists or Freethinkers are. Which explains why Wickwar prefers Holyoake to myself as a biographer.

I conclude this chapter on the subject of Carlile's importance and his biographers, by recalling a truth written by Robert Louis Stevenson in a moment of rare insight:—

"To write with authority about another man, we must have some fellow-feeling and some common ground of experience with our subject. We may praise or blame according as we find him related to us by best or worst in ourselves; but it is only in virtue of some relationship that we can be his judges, even to condemn. Feelings which we share and understand enter for us into the tissue of the man's character; those to which we are strangers in our own experience we are inclined to regard as blots, exceptions, inconsistencies, and excursions of the diabolic; we conceive them with repugnance, explain them with difficulty, and raise our hands to heaven in wonder when we find them in conjunction with talents that we respect or virtues that we admire."

In other words, all or any criticisms which we may pass upon the subject of a biographical sketch are as much indicative of our own temperament as of that of our subject; as much an index to the character and temperament of him who censures as to that of him who is censured, to the mental calibre of the praised as to that of the praising. Hence it will be seen that the more nearly the biographer's ideals and circumstances correspond with those of his subject's, the greater is the weight which one can attach to the accuracy of his views, and their agreement with the feelings of his subject. The difficulty, then, of Radical thought, turned Whiggist, and Freethought reduced to complacency, doing anything like justice to the memory of Carlile, Social Republican and journalist of the poor has but to be stated to be recognised.

On the other hand, my imprisonments, almost equal in time to Carlile's, but more vicious in character, and more extensive in place, enables me to share Carlile's outlook and manner of approach.

II. VICARY GIBBS.

Chapter IV. of Carlile's "life," headed "Legal Biography," records the story of Vicary Gibbs and ends with a reference to his "levity," by which he meant leniency, or hesitation to prosecute charges of sedition or blasphemy. The chapter should have continued and concluded as set out in the following paragraphs.

* * * * * *

Perhaps Gibbs expressed his "levity" in its most expansive form in the case of Perry, proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, the leading Whig paper of the day. This paper published an editorial containing the following passage:—

"What a crowd of blessings rush upon one's mind that might be bestowed upon the country, in the event of a total change of system. Of all monarchs, indeed, since the Revolution, the successor of George the Third will have the finest opportunity of becoming nobly popular."

For these words alone, exactly as they stand, aggravated by no innuendo or additional passage, Perry was prosecuted on an ex-officio information by Sir Vicary Gibbs, who, as Henry, Lord Cockburn, a judge of the Court of Session, wrote later, "might have been Attorney-General to Henry VIII."

Gibbs maintained that these words implied that blessings were kept from the country by George the Third, and that this lowered his majesty in the esteem of his people! Gibbs overlooked the fact that no comment could lower George the Third in the esteem of the common people! In any case, the comment was directed against the political and social administration, for which the king was supposed to be responsible no longer, and not against the king's personal dignity. Even Ellenborough was in favour of the acquittal that took place. But the prosecution expresses the outlook — the hungry pendantic self-seeking logic born of the metaphysics of self-interest—of the legal mind. It placed Gibbs, the aspiring hireling of constitutionalism based on exploitation, in his proper category, as the enemy of Richard Carlile; and it elevated Carlile, as his enemy, to his place of worth in history.

In addition to prosecuting Perry, Gibbs also prosecuted, among others, Cobbett, and John and Leigh Hunt. His reward came in due course, and he became one of his Majesty's Judges, in company with the following notorious ex-Whigs, Best, Copley, Scarlett.

What a mean scramble, law and politics present! During the 12 years, 1818-1830, there were 9 Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, all hating Carlile, for a living! Eldon reckoned that there were 18 during the 20 years ending 1824!

THE BREAKDOWN OF THE STATE

By C. H. NORMAN

[The following valuable essay from the pen of our comrade, C. H. Norman, was published in The Railway Review, for July 4, 1941.—Ed.]

In 1895, Messrs. Heineman published a translation of a book by an Austrian writer, Max Nordau, entitled "Conventional Lies of our Civilisation," a careful and far-reaching analysis of the evils then afflicting European and English civilisation, as they struck a humane and learned mind.

The width of subject-matter covered by the book—which has been ignored by most English writers on social and political questions—can be judged by the chapter headings: "The Monarchical and Aristocratic Lie," "The Religious Lie," "The Political Lie," "The Economic Lie," "The Matrimonial Lie," "Lesser Lies," dealing with the Press and the methods of journalism under its growing capitalistic business organisation, and various subsidiary evils of modern society. The book winds up with a remarkable chapter on the possibility of harmonising the social, moral and economic conflicts in European and American civilisation before the disharmonies within society would disrupt that society completely. The warnings of this gifted writer were unheeded, and to-day one has the pain of witnessing the catastrophe clearly forseen in his book.

Incidentally, the capacity of the writer can be judged by the fact that the chapter on "The Economic Lie" has not the limitations so obvious in Marx's analysis "Capital," as Nordau is not fettered by the ideology of Marxian-Hegelian philosophy.

CLASSES AND CLASS INTERESTS

Nordau did not make the error of assuming, because there were classes in society, all those classes had necessarily an economic motive governing their relationship to society. Marx assumed a class interest in the working class arising from labour power. Class interest does not arise from labour power: but only from the possession of economic privilege—derived from the profitable exploitation of labour power by a non-labouring class. Hence the muddle and upper classes hold a privileged position, which creates a general economic interest in them as classes: whereas the working man has only his labour power, which does not create, psychologically or economically, a class interest in him.

So the working class, as a class, can always be beguiled, when occasion of political or economic crisis requires it, by the other classes into thinking their interests are those of the middle and upper classes: whereas, on the Marxian analysis, they should see their interests were opposed to those of the other classes—as, in fact, they obviously are.

It is because the working class does not move from class motive that the Socialist and Trade Union Movement has always found itself acting as a lackey of the Capitalist class, as was shown in full effect during the war of 1914-1918 throughout Europe, as was seen in the history of the Labour Governments of England, and has been conclusively demonstrated by the action of the working class and their leaders since the war began in 1939, during which period the working class has been content to accept the leadership of its two past outstanding enemies in Messrs. Neville Chamberlain and Winston Churchill, whose political careers were stamped, prior to the war and during the war, with a common reluctance to take any administrative action to advance the interests of the mass of English people, and whose war records have the common factor of having brought the people of the country under their leadership, to the verge—if not beyond it—of irretrievable disaster.

THE CITIZEN AND THE STATE

One interesting passage in the book referred to deals with the relationship between the citizen and the State as illustrated by the coercive regulations of government, taxation and the demands of military conscription. The function of the State has been to organise society, to protect the citizen from tyrannical acts and dangers and to safeguard the citizen's life and property. It is rather a humorous fact to notice, at a time when the State seems overwhelming in its power, that all the sanctions for its existence are disappearing. So far from the State protecting the life and property of the citizen it has abdicated that function entirely. In circumstances of air warfare the State cannot protect the life and property of the citizen, as the condition of many cities in England and Europe conclusively proves. Both sides, by gradual and persistent attack, given time, could wipe out every city and village of any size in the respective countries. There is no moral question involved in that process: it is merely a matter of mathematical calculation.

DETESTABLE STATE OF AFFAIRS

Vast numbers of citizens to-day are paying half their earning to the State by way of taxation—direct and indirect—but none of them has the slightest guarantee that, on returning to their work in the morning, they will not find their place of employment destroyed—or, perhaps, will themselves have been blown to atoms with their families and property during the night.

It is hardly creditable to the citizens of Europe that they should so meekly accept such a detestable state of affairs. The very statement of the matter is enough to represent the horror the modern State has brought upon mankind.

The jargon of "We can take it!" has really no sense in the circumstances, for to-day everything has been taken away which the State professed to protect. The inviolability of the home has disappeared by the action of the State. The right of personal property no longer exists.

The right of personal security from imprisonment by administrative degree without accusation or form of trial has gone.

When it is alleged that the people are wholeheartedly in support of the war, one may wonder why the Government should think it necessary to intern ex-Cabinet Ministers, admirals, colonels, barristers and working men of all kinds, who are British subjects, without any form of trial, or any pretence that they could be convicted of any offence, even under the wide provisions of the Statutes of Edward the Third and Henry the Seventh, which stand unrepealed. It was not done in the last war. Such action by the officers of the State is evidence not of belief in their cause, but fear that public discussion and debate would destroy the morale of the people. The fact that the legislative and administrative machine in Britain and Germany is working on parallel lines is only another example of the irony of the situation.

PROTECTION FOR THE CITIZEN?

Max Nordau, in his references to conscription, points out how absurd the contradiction is between the institution of military conscription and the claim of the State to afford protection to the citizen. The soldier who is conscripted is denied any opportunity of protecting his own family from danger. Men who are fighting in the Balkans cannot protect their families from air attack in Berlin or London. Indeed, one of the curiosities of the present war is that the civilian is forced to support a vast Army and Navy which cannot protect either him or their own families at home. It is only a question of time, at the present ratio of destruction of ships, when there will be no commerce-carrying vessels on the seas at all. The State is carrying its destructive propensities so far that even they may become self-destructive in the exact sense. Should the over-sea submarine and air fleets of Russia, the United States and Japan engage actively in the war, in a matter of 18 months practically every merchant ship of the belligenent Powers would be at the bottom of the sea or laid up in harbour, leaving a few ships sailing under the protection of neutral flags to carry on the commerce of the world!

"KING, LORDS AND GENTLEMEN"

It is rather instructive that in 1938 in Stuttgart there was published a book carrying Max Nordau's analysis of the situation right up to date. The book, too, was published in translation by Messrs. Heinemann in 1938 under the title "King, Lords and Gentlemen," and has been equally smothered by the critics, as apparently was at that time Nordau's splendid book. Though normally referable to British institutions, this German book had a general relationship to the European sickness unto death. Considering what is said by propagandists about freedom of discussion in Britain, it is certainly strange that two of the wisest political books ever published should have been written by an Austrian and a German in Vienna and Stuttgart, translated into English and completely ignored!

It is certainly the fact that

Herbert Spencer's warnings concerning the coming slavery by the State have proved true. The fact that the slavery is imposed by Liberalism and Socialism does not alter the practical effect.

When those excuses about the New World after the war are uttered by the tyrants of to-day, let us remember that, when this war is over, as was the case in 1919 onwards, the people will be so exhausted that the privileged class will re-assert their authority with ease, as those who put forward this soothing syrup about the new social order after the World War of 1914-18 knew.

At the moment, the only goal in this war which is cerain is the establishment of economic and political slavery everywhere, or a complete breakdown of State organisation by its own contradictions being brought home to the mind of everyone by the tyranny of war-time demands, in which life, youth, property and home are committed to a common destruction by that State whose main excuse for its existence is the protection of those values which it is engaged daily in destroying.

"Take for example that miserable production by a late Minister of Education, 'A History of Europe,' by the Right Hon. H. A. L. Fisher, published a few years back. In his excellent 'British History in the Nineteenth Century,' G. M. Trevelyan said of Richard Carlile that he 'suffered and achieved more for the liberty of the Press than any other Englishman of the nineteenth century. He and his like bore the brunt of the early struggle. . . . Thanks to these sturdy predecessors the decorous and well-to-do philosophers of the Victorian era were able without fear of the law to write whatever they thought about the relation of science and literature to dogmatic belief.'

"In another part of his work he dwells on the good fortune of the working class of their day having three such servants as Owen, Cobbet and Place. But one may look through the whole of the 1,300 pages of Mr. Fisher's book for any reference to their work. Those whom a scientific history has consigned to the muck heap of humanity are there galore, but not the names of the heretical men and women who fought so well, suffered so greatly and achieved so much for humanity.

"It is a cowardly and contemptible policy, this burying of great men and women. Young students, and now aged teachers, are ignorant of how much these early reformers did for the world that they spend no time in finding out what these men and women did. And not only is the policy of punishing our great reformers carried on by the Churches, but modern politics takes a hand. Politicians are as frightened of offending a wrongly educated public opinion by praising notorious Freethinkers as religious leaders are of evaluating heretics in such a way their flocks may be led to read their works.

"We think our copy of Fisher's 'History of Europe' cost us 10s. 6d. We advise others to wait until they pick it out of a shilling lot on a second-hand bookstall."

CREECH JONES

We have made several references to the excellent speech made in the House of Commons by our comrade, Creech Jones, on April 10 last. That speech is in type and will be published in our next issue. Comrades interested in Rhodesia and the question of Colonial exploitation and development ought to read this speech. Order the November Word now.

F. W. JOWETT

ENEMY OF MILITARISM, POVERTY AND WAR

I. A GENERAL REVIEW

Because we believe that it is necessary to make a coalition for Socialism and Peace, we are paying tribute, in this issue, to a parliamentary Socialist who maintains an attitude of uncompromising hostility to war, and has rendered great service, in days gone by, to those who suffered for conscience and anti-militarism. Our reference is to F. W. Jowett.

Born in 1864, Jowett commenced work in a Bradford weaving shed as a half-timer, when he was eight years of age. For a number of years he followed his trade, mastering it until he held the position of manufacturer's assistant. But he was thinking and he felt the call to Socialism. William Morris and Belfort Bax were engaged in their great Socialist Educational agitation through the old Socialist League, and Jowett joined the organisation. That is 55 years ago, and he has been struggling to realise the Socialist ideal ever since. He could tell a great deal that is now forgotten of the early struggles: the conflicting ideals of reforming the terrible conditions and speeding the social revolution: the many discussions as to which was imperative: struggles to get hungry children fed; to secure better houses for working folk, etc. As a parliamentary Socialist, Jowett engaged in a thirty years' struggle to destroy the present system of Cabinet Government. In reply to our criticism of parliamentarism, Jowett points out that it is essential for the common people to understand that it is not a system of parliamentary government we are enduring and living under, whether such a system is bad or good in itself, but a system of Cabinet Government, backed up and rubber-stamped by party caucus machines.

We were not a year old when Jowett was stating the case in the Bradford local press for Labour representation in Parliament. We do not think much of Labour Parliamentarism and we think our opposition has been justified. But Jowett was advancing his Labourist views in 1887, and at the same time conducting a vigorous general Socialist propaganda. The first Socialist Parliamentarians in Britain were not afraid to define the class struggle or urge the need for a Socialist Commonwealth.

Jowett played an active part in the great strike at the Manningham Mills, from December, 1890, to April, 1891. The rights of public meeting were attacked by the authorities and the Riot Act was read in Bradford Town Hall Square. Out of this activity arose the Bradford Labour Union. In 1893 Jowett was its delegate to the Conference, at which the I.L.P. was established as a national organisation. The year before he had been elected as a Labour representative to the Bradford Town Council.

In 1895 unemployment and privation were very severe in Bradford. Jowett, condemned, at a public meeting, the action of the Council for refusing to admit in an official report the existence of distress arising from unemployment. This speech evoked bitter hostility among the other members of the Council, and at its next meeting he was refused a hearing and solemnly censured by resolution. The following year the same Council elected him as Alderman. In 1898 he became Chairman of the Health Committee.

For fifteen years in all, Jowett was a member of the Bradford Council. On its Education Committee he was responsible for the inauguration of the Movement for feeding necessitous school children.

It is now 37 years (November, 1904) since a sub-committee of which Jowett was a member, reported to the Town Council that 329 children had gone to school breakfastless and it had resolved (1) to undertake to provide food for the children who go to school without sufficient food, (2) to make an application to the City Council for a grant to enable the Education Committee to provide food. These resolutions were accepted by the Council, but at the next meeting which lasted from 3 p.m. on one day to 2-35 a.m. the next, it was rescinded despite the fiercest opposition of the then Labour group.

Two years later Jowett was elected to Parliament for West Bradford. His maiden speech was on the School Provision of Meals Bill, which afterwards became law.

A persistent advocate of international peace, prior to the great war of 1914-1918, Jowett sought for information by means of questions to Ministers, regarding the commitments of this country. He was one of the small group in Parliament which spoke and worked as opportunity offered, for peace and a reasoned settlement.

Jowett consistently urged that Members of Parliament should cast their votes on the merits of the question before them regardless of Cabinet or Party interests. He is the acknowledged exponent of the case for the democratisation of Parliament. His views were explained in detail in the report submitted to the Annual Conference of the I.L.P. held at Gloucester, 1925. Briefly it may be said that he urges the institution of a committee system with a Cabinet Minister as chairman of the committee concerned with his Department, and the members of which are entitled to question officials and secure any necessary information relating to the committee; the material proceedings of such committees to be reviewed by the full House of Commons, and the voting records of the committees to be available for publication. Such procedure, he maintains, would afford complete and more effective Parliamentary survey of departmental administration and legislation arising therefrom, and the departments would have better contact with the legislature. It would also give to members the opportunity and the right to take an active and more informed part in the administrative as well as in the legislative work of Parliament.

Jowett was a Chairman of the Labour Party in 1921-22, and for many years, beginning in 1916, a member of its Executive. In October, 1924, at the "Red Letter" forgery election, he lost his seat by only 66 votes. At the 1935 election, his first serious illness contributed to the loss of his seat. Whether in Parliament or not, his zeal for Socialist propaganda has never abated.

During 1916-1918 Jowett harassed the Secretaries and Under-Secretaries for War and Home Affairs, respectively, with searching questions in defence of civil liberty and the rights of conscience. We can indicate but feebly in this essay his tireless activity on behalf of those victimised and persecuted for their war opposition, or poverty-stricken and oppressed under war conditions. We do not say that Parliamentary Socialism is the way of working-class emancipation. We think that, apart from the peace interlude of poverty, the second World War proves that Parliamentarianism has failed. We still applaud the service rendered to liberty and justice, in the House of Commons, during a period of war crisis by one who, believing in Parliamentary Socialism, fearlessly proclaimed his war opposition and his belief in the rights of conscience. Jowett was one of the small band to whom the cause of conscientious objection owes a debt that can never be repaid.

Jowett's questions thoroughly exposed the prison system. Why, when the Labour Government came to power, it failed to tackle this problem at least, we cannot understand. Labour Parliamentarians ought never to have allowed the old brutal prison system to remain.

Jowett's questioning over the year 1916, 1917, and 1918 will be detailed in the second part of this essay. The selections will be casual rather than deliberative. But they will show how exhaustive was his questioning and will compel the reader to turn to the columns of Hansard with an appetite for more.

As First Commissioner for works in 1924 Government, Jowett rendered a service to humanity of great symbolic value. One day it will be recalled. Meantime, during the days of sadness, he has every reason to feel secretly proud. When his life has passed for ever into the ever-flowing stream of life of all humanity, it is well that it should not be forgotten. Jowett who had questioned the Labour members of the Coalition War Government, who had defended conscience and Anti-Militarism so fearlessly during the outcast and outlaw years of 1916-1918, gave the instruction for the words to be inscribed on Nurse Cavell's monument: "Patriotism is not enough. I cannot hate any man."

Before he became First Commissioner of Works, Jowett had read that these were Edith Cavell's last words. Consequently, he examined the file of documents relating to her case and discovered that the statement was correct. He enquired as to the omission of these vitally important last words, and was assured that it was within his power, as Minister in Charge of all similar monuments, to have the words inscribed. Gently and delicately Jowett pursued his private enquiries and made sure that Nurse Cavell's next-of-kin would have no objection to the famous last words being remembered for all time. Then, without any publicity, until the job was done, Jowett ordered the inscription to be made. And so to-day, Nurse Cavell, brave servant of humanity, being dead yet speaketh. In the heart of London she proclaims her message: "Patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred or bitterness for anyone."

Jowett's name will be linked forever with these last words because he insisted on a Government recording them. Enemy of war, fearless defender of a really united Anti-war front, Jowett gave life and hope to Nurse Cavell's memory and made a dead monument a vital message of human love and fellowship.

(To be concluded.)

IS PEACE POSSIBLE?

A LETTER FROM THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

[The following letter on the question of peace was received from the Duke of Bedford after the November issue had gone to press. As events move so fast, we thought that it might be better to circulate it as a supplement instead of holding back its publication for a month.—Ed.—The Word.]

Dear Aldred,

Hitler's speeches, though of course ignored or ridiculed by the National Press, are always of great interest and importance to those of us who are constructive peacemakers, even though we may not always agree among ourselves as to what kind of man Hitler really is.

His recent speech, delivered in Berlin at the opening of the Winter Help Campaign, was, taking everything into consideration, not too unhelpful. It did not, as one always fears may one day happen if our statesmen persist in their foolish obstinacy in refusing to negotiate while we are still strong enough to make a good bargain, contain a declaration that he would not listen to any terms, no matter how reasonable or by whom offered. His references to Divine aid for the German forces are, of course, repellant to all true Christians, who realise how utterly alien to the methods of God are the evil processes of war, whether carried out successfully by the Germans, or unsuccessfully by ourselves. Hitler, however, is not the only national leader who mistakenly assumes that Divine blessing can attend the military operations of his country. It would, indeed, be very interesting to know how much or how little real chance he has ever had of understanding the true religion of Jesus Christ, for the answer to this question would be of great assistance in forming an accurate judgment of his character and possibilities.

Hitler's praise of his fighting Services and of the war effort of his people, and his anticipation of further victories call for no special comment, being the normal policy of a leader of a country at war.

His reference to what he claims to have been the Russian demands in regard to Finland, Roumania, Bulgaria and the Dardanelles was interesting, although we shall have to wait until the passions and falsehoods of war are over until we can judge with any measure of certainty how far his statements were justified.

As on many former occasions, Hitler stressed his original desire to avoid war and his efforts to bring the conflict to an earlier conclusion; but in this connection there was an interesting addition, not unkindly in tone, in the declaration of his belief that the British people had not originally wanted war. It has, indeed, been characteristic of the present conflict that whereas the propaganda on both sides has directed an equally bitter attack against enemy leaders, there has been, on the part of Germany, a very striking absence of any hate campaign directed against the people of Britain. It is unfortunately on our side that, in spite of the high ideals for which we profess to be fighting, this singularly false and ugly feature in Press propaganda has made its devilish appearance.

Events in Russia have been moving rapidly and on a tremendous scale and it may be that sooner or later, and perhaps sooner, we shall witness the collapse of that country. If Russia is defeated, the struggle for peace will begin to enter on a new phase and we shall be able to speak to our militarist friends with increasing directness and with a new tone of authority, having on our side, moreover, the growing support of a number of people who are not at present opposed to the war.

The fall of Russia will mean quite definitely that we have no more chance of victory over Germany, and the only alternatives that will remain will be a negotiated peace or defeat. This is not merely a pacifist opinion, for certain papers like the "New Statesman" have expressed it already. It may be that, if Russia is actually defeated, they will endeavour to retreat from their former position, but this will not alter the fact that their former position was the correct one. If Russia goes, it will be in the truest and most obvious sense patriotic for us to point out that the real "defeatists" are those who, by hindering and delaying, still further, peace by negotiation, are preparing their country for the grim evil of a German victory. The real Fifth Columnists, moreover, will be those who, when chances of victory no longer exist, extend still further the useless destruction of life and property.

We shall be entitled to point out that whereas our nation in this tragic conflict has displayed physical courage in abundance, there is now an acute need, especially in its leaders, of a corresponding display of moral courage—moral courage expressed in the form of willingness to admit to oneself, and to confess to one's fellows, that one has blundered gravely and is willing to make amends by standing aside, if need be, so that others, as far as possible, may save the victims of those blunders from further suffering.

It is all very well to talk about "fighting to the bitter end." Such talk may be heroism but it may also be arrant, selfish folly. Before one decides to fight to the bitter end in a conflict that involves others besides oneself, it is well to consider most carefully what that end will be like. If, as sometimes happens, it is so exceedingly bitter as to constitute the worst of all imaginable evils then obviously the person who refuses first to explore every alternative, including even those alternatives that are far from attractive, is both a rogue and a fool.

The reason for feeling that, in the event of the defeat of Russia, we should no longer possess any chance of defeating Germany, are so numerous and so plain that they must convince any person, no matter how war-minded originally, who has not surrendered his intelligence to wishful thinking and is not prepared to sacrifice his country in the hope of saving his face.

Should Germany achieve victory in the East, we shall be again seriously outnumbered both as regards men and equipment and, even if it be admitted that, man for man, British troops are superior to German, sad experience has already proved on more than one occasion that we are unable to resist such heavy numerical odds.

Germany would have access to vast resources in war material which do not have to be conveyed by sea; as well as to numerous armament factories which our bombing planes would be unable to reach and destroy, though no such immunity can be claimed for our own factories. Germany also possesses a monetary and foreign trade system far better fitted than our own to make the best use of all available resources.

For geographical reasons Germany even now has a great advantage for the conduct of air warfare and she is in a strong position for the conduct of submarine warfare also.

Our shipping losses, in regard to which we are allowed so little information for reasons by no means convincing, continue; while our autumn air attack on Germany has yielded disappointing results, our losses in planes being, by reason of the strength of the German defence, considerable.

In the all-important field of morale, the German nation has been encouraged by many victories and is stiffened by the memories of Versailles which have been recently stimulated by the foolish unilateral disarmament threat contained in the Eight Points.

It is fantastic, therefore, to assume that American aid, coming to us across dangerous waters, can counterbalance these serious handicaps. The American nation is exceedingly divided on the question of participation in the war and objection to full participation would probably increase greatly with the defeat of Russia. This opposition to full participation in the war, does not, it is well to realise, spring merely from pacifist ideas. There are an enormous number of non-pacifist Americans who feel, very understandably, that in the unlikely event of a German attack on America, it would be better that hostilities should be conducted under conditions which impose on Germany the tremendous handicap of landing an expeditionary force and transporting it across the still formidable barrier of the ocean.

We must point out also that, even if our Navy is able to prevent invasion, it is rash folly to suppose that we can wear Germany out by conducting a defensive war of many years' duration. For such a war of exhaustion our position is obviously in every respect the weaker of the two. There is no good reason to suppose that we can stand indefinitely the drain of shipping losses, or that our harbours and industrial centres can endure for an unlimited period the terrible hammering of air bombardment to the effects of which some already bear the very grimmest testimony.

If, after the fall of Russia, the war is still continued without any attempt being made to explore the possibilities of a reasonable peace by negotiation, it will be evident that, whatever others may be professed, our real war aims are the saving of the Cabinet's job and Parliament's face. To these war aims two drawbacks are attached and both of them are fatal: the first is that they are not worth attaining at the cost of even a single human life; the second is that they are unattainable.

Yours sincerely
Bedford

MILITARISM, DIPLOMACY AND WAR

WHEN RAMSAY MACDONALD TALKED SENSE

BY

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Labour leaders have an unfortunate tendency to resemble bulls of the dairy breeds of cattle in that, with advancing years, they become unreliable and increasingly desirous of destroying members of the human race. Although I do not think he displayed any marked militarist tendencies, the late Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald in the latter part of his career made some serious mistakes and caused disappointment to his friends. We should not, however, on this account lose sight of the fact that, as a younger man, he said things which were both wise and courageous and which can with great profit be recalled to mind, for they are as true now as when he first uttered them.

In the course of an address delivered at Derby on November, 24th 1917, Mr. MacDonald said :—

War is a political incident. It only comes when the political machine ceases to go round; a deadlock then happens and the way that deadlock is faced and dealt with is by war. Now the democratic view of the situation is this. If war is a political incident, only a political settlement will end the war. If you would see quite clearly the political ends which you want, the political purpose for which the war is being carried on, lay that aim down as a matter of justice; as a matter of fair play; as a matter of common security. Say it does not matter what the military issue is: the moment that your aim is gained then we have the security for the peace we want and the people who were out for moral ends have won the victory they set out to attain.

Several things follow from this; the first thing is that the responsible leaders of democracy should have an opportunity for conferring together; not for the purpose of settling the terms of peace, but for the purpose of seeing what common platform is available for the Democracies of Europe. It is not that the Government should settle it, or even that Parliament should settle it. We have to have some sort of agreement; some sort of understanding between the men who hold important positions in the great international organisations—Labour, Trade Unionism, Socialism, the Church, which, at any rate in theory, is a great international organisation. That is why we were so keen about Stockholm (where it was suggested a conference might be held); and that is why, in days to come, those who opposed Stockholm will have to face grave responsibilities for defeat, unsettlement, and the prolongation of the war, the like of which few can imagine.

"If Governments alone settle it, you will have secrecy, underhand bargains, agreements made that will not be politic or political, like the agreements regarding Constantinople. You will find men afraid of offending their constituents and afraid of the clamour against them that can be got up by the Press and by interested parties in the constituencies. The Parliaments will be the last representative organizations to accept a condition of things which is justice and not conquest. What is required of us is to get men and women who earn their living by the sweat of their brow, the men of influence among them, to indicate the settlement first of all. This is the answer to the question "Could the statesmen of Germany be trusted? Could we accept an agreement with them?"

I do not want the statesmen of Germany to be the spokesmen of Germany, just as I do not want the statesmen of England to be the spokesmen of England. I want this war to create a condition of things which mean that the people of England will speak and the people of Germany will speak. If the people in cooperation will settle their differences of their won freewill, then you have the only guarantee that a nation will keep its word. You and I can come to an agreement, but if we do not want to keep it, we can always break it; and, what is more, we can always find good grounds for justifying ourselves in doing so. The one who is aggrieved will always accuse the other of breaking his word and they will both say the same things about each other and the friends of the one will back it up with the same arguments and considerations as the friends of the other. Try and think of what is actually going to happen and not to use phrases such as "the statesmen of Germany, or "the Kaiser of Germany." The settlement, to be democratic, should be told to the people so that, if they do not accept it, you will hear of it and it will have to be altered if justice requires it. If it is altered and accepted, I have the greatest faith that the people of Europe will keep their agreement and if they want it altered will refer to a court of reason and not to a court of war.

Diplomacy should be open, even for England only. We can afford to make our diplomacy perfectly open, because when you are conducting secret diplomacy, wicked people in other countries know all about it and the decent peace-loving people do not know about it. If you think that our negotiations were not known in the Wilhelmstrasse, you are mistaken. Of course they were known to the Kaiser and others. Every one of the documents and conversations were picked up by gossip and spies in Whitehall and at clubs in Pall Mall, from persons of knowledge, and passed over to Berlin and pigeon-holed there. Every secret arrangement that Berlin made with Vienna was picked up in the same way and passed over to Paris or Petrograd. All the arrangements for the invasion of Belgium were known before the war broke out.

My point is that the devils, the people we are up against, the secret intelligence departments, know what is being done, whereas the men and women of goodwill do not. Therefore they walk in an innocent way, whereas the people with all the manipulation of the wires are informed. The evildoers on both sides know each other's policy. The war thus comes without our being able to stop it.

Mr. Macdonald went on to say that "open diplomacy is good for the nation and there is no such thing as secret diplomacy, so far as evil-minded rulers of the countries are concerned. I repeat that again and again. We should have a chance, both ourselves and the other nations, to speak and think and look into each other's faces and say 'Why are we going to kill each other over this question? If your rulers want you to do it, well, then be done with your rulers'; and they would do it before they allowed war to break out. Treaties, therefore, should be open and published. If we get democracy after the war, then in Russia, France, Germany, Italy ,Austria and here, one of the first things that ought to be done is to publish every word of the secret agreements come to during the war."

Since Mr. Macdonald's day the growth of totalitarianism has made contacts between peoples and meetings between the representatives of peoples rather more difficult—more difficult but not impossible even in war and in peace-time still quite easy. The development of wireless has also made contact between peoples easier, in spite of the war-time restrictions on listening-in imposed by certain Governments.

It is unfortunate, indeed, that Mr. Macdonald's plea for open diplomacy has not been heeded, for few things are so important to the peace of the world. There are persons to-day serving long sentences of imprisonment in this country for alleged betrayal of official secrets, but with the exception of those pertaining to the military defences of the country (which, in a non-pacifist nation, must obviously be preserved), there should be no official secrets to hide, such secrets being merely a respectable title given to the dangerous and discreditable intrigues of foolish statesmen.

"WE'RE GOING TO TO BUILD A GRAND NEW PALACE WHEN WE'VE GOT EVERYTHING SMASHED UP"

Mr. Macdonald's words regarding the growth and destruction of militarism are also worth quoting, especially at a time when the suicidal demand for unilateral disarmament has once more been revived.

"So long as you have militarism," Mr. Macdonald said, "you will have war. You cannot help it. If I was threatened by a neighbour and I bought a gun to protect myself, he would very soon hear about it, and if there were an armament firm about, that firm would be perfectly certain to tell my neighbour that I had got a gun and that he had better employ the firm to make one for him. He would say that one against one would only establish equality and they would go on to say 'I suggest you ask us to make two.' My neighbour would get the two, and what would I do? I should not be content with one and I should order two and as soon as this is done my neighbour will probably order six. Now what happens? War inevitably, because a time is bound to come when any little thing that upsets us will set us blazing away at each other to our hearts' content. A mere touch of a feather, the insult to the ambassador, the murder of an Arch-Duke, the forging of telegrams, the spy in the employ of a Government who has to earn his living and who tells lies in order to do it—anything like that will give just the necessary shock to this state of unequal equilibrium and the two armed camps, the two armed nations, will fire off their guns and fly at each other's throats.

That is the story of militarism and then, when it is all over and one side wins and the other side is beaten, you do not get peace. You only get a patched-up peace, a military truce and after the two sides have gone through a few years of resting, they begin to order other guns because the one that was beaten wants to wipe off the disgrace of the beating. They order guns and then the grandchildren of the original combatants find themselves engaged in a war, infinitely worse and more deplorable than the previous war was.

Militarism is bound always to produce war and how are we to abolish it? By giving personal security, by giving security to the nations; by isolating and removing the causes of war; by bringing into play and operation those co-operative tendencies and desires and forces that make people bring their grievances always to a table and discuss them; bring them to a court of reason and not to a court of force, and, having brought them to a court of reason, then justice will be done and the very worst people on the face of the earth are bound to accept justice, especially if they have not been playing with militarism."

Yes, Mr. Macdonald undoubtedly at one time talked sense. It is a pity that Labour leaders and, indeed, the whole country, did not long ago take as their motto "Hold fast that which is true." It is the almost universal abandonment of that which is true for that which is false which has brought this and other countries to their present plight.

LADY STALBRIDGE

On another page we publish a letter urging pacifist unity from Lady Stalbridge.

Lord Stalbridge served in the South African War and also in the Great War. He was mentioned in despatches in both wars, received the M.C., and generally deemed one of the gallant defenders of British Liberty.

Lady Stalbridge is a pacifist and has renounced the idea of war for sometime. Her sister, Mrs. C. E. Payne, was a pacifist during the last war, and was a friend of George Lansbury.

Mrs. Payne had a young family to tend in those days and had little time for politics. She was marked, nevertheless, for her pacifism, which she avowed quietly and firmly when necessary or in response to challenge. Notwithstanding this record, in 1940 her home was visited by the police and her papers searched. It ought to be added that this was done at Northam, where she was born, and was well-known consequently. Her sympathies are Labour and Pacifist.

Lady Stalbridge had a similar experience to her sister. She was submitted to several hours' cross-examination by police officers in a district where her family-record was known thoroughly. There were no grounds whatever for suspecting her of Fascist sympathies.

EMRYS HUGHES AND REJECTED C.O.'s

HIS STAND, VICTIMISATION, AND 5th COURT-MARTIAL

Emrys Hughes published a splendid article on the imprisonment of conscientious objectors in the columns of Forward for September 13 last. Hughes comments on the cases of C.O.'s who are being sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for refusing medical examination. C.O.'s who refused medical examination are those who have been transferred to the medical register because they have been deemed to be not genuine C.O.'s by the Tribunals. Hughes can write with feeling on this matter because he was deemed not to be genuine in 1916. At that time he experienced five district Court-Martials. This did not prevent the post-war Labour movement from considering him a worthy member of the Labour Party. Thomas Johnston, now Secretary for State for Scotland in a War Government, and Regional Commissioner under that Government, welcomed Hughes as a colleague. To-day he is editor of Forward. C.O.'s who are refusing medical examination should note this fact and take courage accordingly. Emrys Hughes is their complete colleague, their champion from conviction and experience, and their mascot.

In The Word for July, 1939, we detailed fully the account of Emrys Hughes' first Court-Martial. We now report the parliamentary questions concerning his case, and his fifth Court-Martial.

On Thursday, December 14, 1916, Mr. T. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for War a question concerning the treatment of two conscientious objectors, named Thomas Allen and Peter Allen, who had been deemed not genuine by the Central Tribunal. The question was answered by Mr. Hayes Fisher, who replied at the same time to a question put by Mr. John. We reproduce question and answer:

Mr. JOHN asked the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Emrys Hughes, of Abercynon, a conscientious objector to military service, was sentenced to two years' hard labour, and afterwards to nine months' detention, and later to 112 days; that he was subsequently court-martialled in Devizes, sentenced to twenty-one months' hard labour, which was commuted to three months, and that he was afterwards taken to Wormwood Scrubs and appeared before the Central Tribunal, who decided that he was not a genuine conscientious objector; and whether it can be stated on what grounds such a decision was arrived at

Mr. HAYES FISHER: The President of the Local Government Board is informed that these cases were considered by the Central Tribunal, and that, on their report, the men were not offered work under the Home Office Committee. The Central Tribunal determine each case on its merits.

Emrys Hughes is to-day Editor of Forward. For a number of years he has been the close colleague of Thomas Johnston, Editor of Forward, now Secretary of State for Scotland. No one considers Hughes to have been "not genuine" because of the Tribunal decision against him. Yet Johnston is member of a Cabinet that justifies the imprisonment of conscientious objectors to-day because Tribunals have turned them down. If they survive the war, in the post-war years they will be regarded as genuine, even as Thomas Johnston considered Hughes to be genuine, despite the decision of the Tribunals. The Labour movement must realise, surely, that there is something wrong in this state of affairs.

Emrys Hughes was court-martialled five times in all. He faced his fifth District Court-Martial at Redcar, North Yorkshire, in August, 1918, when he was charged with refusing a lawful command given by a superior officer, and using insubordinate language.

Speaking in his defence, Comrade Hughes said:

"This is the fifth time I have been tried by court-martial for refusing to obey military orders. I have been in the prisons over two years, but I come back once more as determined and persistent as ever to continue to refuse to take part in any of the military and industrial organisation necessary for carrying on the war. I believe that every Government is equally responsible for the international situation which led to the outbreak of the war . . . and the series of military massacres that have meant so much bloodshed and suffering among the nations involved. I have been unable to agree that the interests of the people of this country have been served by the attempts to settle the International problems at issue by military methods, but that such means could only lead to further calamities and foster a spirit of revenge, and a desire for retaliation fatal to mutual understanding and the establishment of a lasting peace . . . .

"I regard Conscription as the most monstrous form of social tyranny, and hold that the only honourable and courageous course to take is to oppose it steadfastly and resolutely refusing to serve in the army in any capacity. I am also opposed to taking part in any alternative war service or in any of the industrial efforts to solve the problem of the conscientious objectors, by first of all compelling them to work under degrading conditions in penal settlements and then allowing them to find other work if they promise to agree to refrain from propagating their opinion.

"I think the greatest service I can render to the people of this country is to oppose the military institutions which have been introduced and established during a time of panic and terror and by which thousands of men have been forced to submit to a loathsome routine of military discipline and then sent to be miserably butchered in a bloody, futile and foolish war, in which their rulers have involved them. The greatest menace to the liberty of the people is the Conscription Law; the greatest duty of the intelligent citizen is to oppose it at all costs and to continue such opposition and defiance until it is overthrown."

At that time tremendous service was being rendered to the cause of Socialism and conscience by the fearless Labour weekly, The Merthyr Pioneer. Emrys Hughes was associated with this paper, whose editor at this time, we believe, was a comrade named Yates. In its issue for September 14, 1918, The Pioneer, which had supported us throughout our imprisonments for resisting militarism, published in full the statement we made before our 4th District Court-Martial. The Pioneer commented:—

"We reproduce below the statements of our Comrade Guy A. Aldred before his recent court-martial—a repeated experience with him as with others—not as an exceptional case, but as typical of many that are to be found in the country to-day—one on all fours with our own local Comrade Emrys Hughes, for instance; and also because the Editor of "The Spur" shows in his statement the evasion of the actual legal position which is being practised in these cases. Anyone acquainted with these cases in any detail at all must feel strongly about them, for they know how the continuous strain of the repeated sentences are sapping the very life out of these heroic young men—though the weakening of th body does but seem to strengthen the resolve to suffer even death itself rather than yield the priceless right of their conscientious conviction. In this connection we are told that the robust health of Emrys Hughes has been sapped away from him, and equally we hear from two comrades who were in the guard room with Guy Aldred that after his return from prison to camp he had three nervous and mental relapses in one week of so serious a nature that they were compelled to the opinion that nothing should be left undone to procure his immediate release if his life and his reason were to be saved. It is ironical that British labour which justly boils with indignation and protest over the case of a Tom Mooney in San Francisco, should sit so calmly by whilst some of its most promising recruits are thus broken upon the wheel of British militarism, under acts which specifically included safeguards for those with conscientious objection to military service. The pretence that the only possessors of conscience are those who subscribe to the 39 articles, bow the knee in adoration to the God of an infallible Pope, or whisper the mumbo-jumbo of Nonconformity, is a transparent pretence to all who have read history of freedom. It is outside of those things that men have ever shown the willingness to guarantee their conscience by their immovable determination to suffer rather than yield—and in their sufferings have helped along the birth of the rational spirit and outlook and effort that has been the real dynamic of progression. But surely the time has arrrived when martyrdom—long drawn out and horrible despite its pseudo-legality—is unnecessary as the actuating motive behind progress. We live in the days of light and breadth and spaciousness—the days when right is stirred to war for transcendent ideals. Even the cynics preach that, even pessimism is conscious that man is better and more rational than the middle ages showed his forebears to be. But against that belief you have to place the brutal facts of the Guy Aldreds and the Emrys Hughes—and the result looks like negation."

THE ATLANTIC CHARTER

By A. RUTH FRY

The conscience of mankind is distraught as, perhaps, never before. A century of unparalleled progress in industry, science, and other human activities, has been succeeded by one in which these advances have been prostituted to the service of evil, so that science lends its vast powers to material destruction, whilst ingenuity in lying and deception become praiseworthy. And all this output of evil is proclaimed as essential good. The belligerents in this terrifying war assert that their aim is peace and prosperity, that their means are determined by the monstrosity of the means used by the other side, and the futility of any other method of dealing with the situation.

So the ghastly competition goes on, with ever-increasing misery extending to wider and wider areas.

We are challenged by the old question, "Does the end justify the means?" to which must be added the further question: "Do the means attain the end?"

To both of which I answer, No.

This is a world-wide question.

If, as is possible, an increasing number of people in the world is joining in that double NO, it is time for the spirit of man to arise, to save his civilisation, his sanity and his material existence.

The continued demand in this country for a statement of Peace Aims, in order to give to Hitler's victims a preferable alternative to his New Order, has, at length been met, in part, by the ATLANTIC CHARTER, recently signed by Roosevelt and Churchill. The Charter is in vague terms, with no indication whatever of the means to be employed to realise the principles therein enunciated, nor of the intention to attempt to obtain acceptance of them by reasonable negotiation. In fact, it is made clear that Allied Military Victory must precede any implementation of its principles. No inducement is offered to accept them, and we could have wished for some guarantee that they would not merely remain pious hopes, as have so many former words of politicians, but that some supporting action was imminent. Even the statement of what act of renunciation would follow on their acceptance would have been an inducement to give them consideration.

Nevertheless, the statement itself is of such importance that it behoves us to make every effort to take advantage of it. With this in view, the following statement has been drawn up with the idea of focussing thought upon the terrible evil of continued warfare, and the means which might be taken to end it, in fact, to give an opportunity to express support of some elements in the Atlantic Charter, and an appeal for its amendment, its amplification and its immediate application to the urgent needs of humanity

This statement intentionally omits emphasis on the retrograde features of the Atlantic Charter, e.g., the insistence on military victory, the retention of national sovereign rights, the repeated mistake of unequal treatment with regard to disarmament, made after the last war. It is believed that more good can be done by seizing on its hopeful points, insisting on them, and building round them a structure which may be demanded by the peoples everywhere.

A DECLARATION

The President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain have together registered a remarkable step in human history.

In the midst of a terrible war, they have stated their adherence to certain principles which, in other wording, include :—

(1) The renunciation of aggrandisement, territorial or other.

(2) The renunciation of territorial changes that do not accord with the expressed wishes of the peoples concerned.

(3) The respect of the right of all peoples to choose the form of Government under which they will live.

(4) The endeavour to grant equal access to the trade and raw materials of the world to ALL NATIONS.

(5) The desire for economic collaboration between all nations with the object of securing for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.

(6) The desire for a peace according safety in their own countries, and assurance of freedom from fear and want to all men (but qualified by prior destruction of Nazi tyranny).

(7) The consequent safety of ocean travel.

(8) The belief that "all the nations of the world for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of the use of force." To implement this, they advocate the preliminary disarmament of aggressor nations, or those who may threaten aggression. "They will likewise aid and encourage all other practical measures which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments."

This declaration marks an advance in two important points, the more remarkable for being made in war-time :

(A) The needs of all humanity are envisaged as a whole.

(B) The necessity for the abandonment of the use of force is endorsed for realistic and spiritual reasons.

This realisation that war is useless has been stated by many seers for thousands of years, years, but its acceptance in the midst of war, by the leaders of two great countries is a fact of immense importance. It is in line with the Christian teaching that Satan cannot drive out Satan, and that love and forgiveness are due to our enemies; it is in line with the ancient Indian teaching, "To the man that causelessly injures me, I will return the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him, the more good shall flow from me."

It is further a realisation that nations, like persons, must obey moral laws, and it points to the fact that if the use of violence is, in principle, of no avail, then it is as useless as war to-day as in any future period.

For this war is leading to :—

(1) The destruction of millions of lives on both sides, material goods beyond enumeration, many of them irreplaceable treasures.

(2) The increase of hatred between nations, and the aggravation of all the problems which war is supposed to solve.

So that every day that the war continues, it becomes harder, materially as well as spiritually to rebuild a better world.

As it is declared that violence should not be used as deciding force, a realisation that there is no connection between possession of the greatest number of devilish implements and the strongest moral position—it follows that reason must be arbiter, and might be so to-day, even better than when victory of either side has produced an inequality between the fighting nations.

It has been realised in this war, as perhaps never before, that propaganda is a weapon of vast importance—that peoples' minds and spirits govern their actions—that men cannot continue to fight even under military coercion, if their hearts are convinced of the error of their cause

Untrue and deceptive propaganda has been widely used and has been frequently successful in doping the people into false beliefs. But it is suggested that in order to support the Atlantic Charter in the most effective way, it is necessary to employ truthful "psychologic offensives" with as much energy as soldiers believe in military offensives. They should be carried out by broadcasting, by dropped leaflets, by every possible means of reaching all the belligerent peoples of the world.

The main theme of such offensives should be that only by a peace founded on the good of all can a way out of the increasing chaos and catastrophe of the world be found, and that the sooner an Armistice can be arranged, in which discussion of such a true peace can be effected, the better.

Among the many world institutions essential for the carrying out of the Atlantic Charter, the following may be suggested :—

World General Council.
World Economic Council.
International Labour Office.
International Arbitration Court.

These bodies would be charged amongst other matters with the following :—

(1) The complete reform of the financial system, so as to prevent, incidentally, the present anomaly of the destruction of food, whilst millions of people starve for the need of it. The new system should take into account the immense potential power to produce an ample sufficiency of goods for all people living in civilised countries, and, ultimately, when up-to-date methods of production are universally employed, in the more backward nations as well.

(2) A just distribution of raw materials and the resources of the world, together with freedom of exchange of goods and services.

(3) The demilitarisation of all frontiers.

(4) Progressive disarmament of all nations, and the concurrent employment of demobilised soldiers on works of reconstruction oi a non-profit-making basis for improving the general welfare. Such as :—

(A) Prevention and cure of disease; provision of hospitals and Sanatoria in health resorts.

(B) Development of natural resources of food, etc., made possible by chemical discoveries.

(C) The reconstruction on improved lines of the destroyed areas of the world.

(D) Relief of war victims.

An era of world history is at an end, and on us falls an important share of the responsibility of building a new era. This is a call to all those who believe in the ethical principles as the only basis upon which a good society can be founded, to join with us in a crusade to build it, and to plead unceasingly for an end to the appalling catastrophe being enacted before our eyes.

With a view to considering what united action is possible, in urging the programme sketched in this statement, and the obtaining of a righteous peace at the earliest possible moment, all those who approve of it are asked to communicate with the Editor of The Word.

WAR'S VESTED INTERESTS

The Daily Mirror, London, is one of the most reactionary papers published in Britain. Nevertheless, it often expresses vital truth. This militaristic never-endian war organ, in its issue for Tuesday, September 30, published the following interesting editorial :—

EXPLANATION.

How does it happen that an increasing number of people do in fact face a very long war with surprising fortitude in foresight?

Because, as war goes on, it mechanically creates various vested interests. For one thing, it creates jobs.

It is a criticism of our degraded civilisation that, in peace, hundreds of thousands drift helpless, without security for to-morrow. In war they are "provided for."

Who will blame them for subconsciously dreading the economic uncertainties of peace?

The Daily Mirror leader-writer should have added that these persons, who dread "the economic uncertainties of peace," hate the conscientious objector and the pacifist and the Socialist enemy of war, for economic reasons. They then commit the hypocrisy of pretending that their fears are dictated by heroism and patriotic devotion, and hide their motives behind a smoke screen of abuse directed at the people who have no fear of peace but only a hatred of war.

NORTHERN RHODESIAN COPPERBELT

NATIVE CONDITIONS EXPOSED IN A STRIKING HOUSE OF COMMONS SPEECH

By

A. CREECH JONES, M.P.

[Reproduced from 1935 Election Address.

[In the House of Commons, on Thursday, April 10, 1941, on the motion for adjournment being moved by Mr. James Stuart, M.P., our comrade, Creech Jones, opened an interesting discussion on the subject of the Northern Rhodesian Copperbelt. The speech was interrupted by the message to attend the Lords Commissioners, to receive the Royal Assent to following Acts:—

1. Public Works Loans Act, 1941.
2. National Service Act, 1941.
3. Isle of Man (Detention) Act, 1941.
4. Army and Air Force (Annual) Act, 1941.

Creech Jones' factual indictment of conditions prevailing in the Northern Rhodesia Copperbelt drew forth a defence of those conditions from Mr. George Henry Hall, who has been Labour M.P. for Aberdare since 1922. Mr. Hall has been Parliamentary Under Secretary of State to the Colonial Office since 1940. Born in December 1881, this man started work at the Penrikyber colliery at the age of 12, and continued to work as a collier until appointed checkweighman in 1911. Member of the South Wales Miners' Federation and an official for 15 years. Served on Mountain Ash District Council for 14 years. Defeated C. B. Stanton (who won the seat as a Labour Imperialist and war-monger) by a majority of 5,217, WITH THE AID OF PACIFIST VOTES. Stanton had a majority of 16,500 in 1918!

Hall's apology for the Copperbelt conditions is a study in parliamentarism and trades-unionism, when one considers his antecedents and personal experiences.

It is regrettable that space does not permit the full discussion to be reproduced in one issue. As it is, we must divide the excellent speech made by Creech Jones into two instalments. We must summarise the opposition. The reader can turn, however, to the "Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons Official Report," for Thursday, April 10, 1941, Vol. 370, No. 50, cols. 1731-1761. This report will repay study. The remarkable story of Creech Jones' interest in the dark continent, his association with Winifred Holtby, his acquaintance with Clements Kadalie, the General Secretary of the I.C.U., and how the plight of the black workers roused his sympathy, is told well by Vera Brittain, in Chapter XV of "Testament of Friendship," her "life" of Winifred Holtby, published by MacMillan, 1940. We advise our readers who wish to understand the following speech to read the Holtby chapter. We reproduce this speech with pleasure. It shows clearly that our comrade, Creech Jones, is not a Government placeman. He takes his stand boldly as a man of independent thought and a champion of social justice.—Ed.]

Mr. Creech Jones (Shipley): Although the situation in Europe and Africa is grim and we seek to vindicate certain great principles—principles of importance to the future of Africans—I am sure the House will not begrudge spending an hour of its time in discussing the well-being of Africans for whom this House has a special responsibility. The Copperbelt Report has occasioned considerable interest because the repercussions of the questions in dispute have been felt in all parts of Africa, and how the problems raised are handled will have a great importance in our future relations in that great Continent. I regret that the Commission appointed to investigate this dispute was a Commission of the Northern Rhodesian Government. This was not the responsibility of Lord Moyne or of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, but the fact remains that, as it was a Commission of the Northern Rhodesian Government, there has been considerable delay and very great difficulty has been experienced by many bodies interested in the problems of the Copperbelt, in obtaining copies of the report itself. I hope that this method of investigating such special grievances in the Colonies will not be adopted again. I would like to say, in this connection, that I am a little puzzled that the draft report should have been submitted to certain interests whose activities were in review before the report was officially published.

I think, as a House, we should congratulate the Commission——

[Royal Assent Interruption. Adjournment again proposed.]

Mr. Creech Jones: I was about to remark that we are grateful to the Commission in question for the speedy way in which they discharged their duties. It may be that one does not altogether agree with the rather narrow way in which certain aspects of the problems have been dealt with, but I think we are all agreed that they approached the matters in question in a practical and commonsense way. I regret that the Northern Rhodesian Government have not accepted certain of the recommendations which the Commissioners made. To-day I want to resist the temptation to discuss British policy generally in Northern Rhodesia, or to say much about past neglect, present needs and the slow social development. A series of illuminating Reports all point the way the Territory should go. It is largely an undeveloped country. Its manhood and its wealth have, to a degree, been drained away, and its people are very poor. We have obligations to the native people, and I hope that the British policy will rest on the principles of the paramountcy of African interests and opposition to racial theories and practices which are based on the assumption of the superiority of the white man. The mines in Northern Rhodesia have, in recent years, been the outstanding economic feature, and in 1935, when a disturbance in the Copperbelt occurred, the Commission appointed then, with prophetic vision, made these remarks:

"Here (in the Copperbelt) there are considerable numbers of natives concentrated in compounds without chiefs; with their tribal organisations being broken down by disintegrating influences; becoming accustomed to machinery and modern methods; feeling an increasing desire for luxuries, and what has been called pathetic contentment rapidly giving way to what has been called divine contentment. Experience in all countries shows that industrial disputes give rise to violent passions and often to sudden violent destruction, to the loss of all parties, which is afterwards regretted; and it is unreasonable to hope that no such industrial dispute will ever take place on the Copperbelt. It is a possibility which must increase with the development of industrialism, and it seems necessary to recognise the fact and to take such measures as are necessary to reserve the public peace.'

That was stated by the Commissioners in 1935, and I think it will be generally agreed that following that report comparatively little was done beyond the setting up of a Native Industrial Labour Advisory Board. It is true that three years afterwards Major Orde-Browne did report on the situaton as he saw it at that time. He stated that the unfortunate neglect by the Government of the new problems arising out of mineral exploitation, and the large measure of industrialisation which had suddenly overtaken the native population, called for attention. He pointed out the glaring defects in respect of accurate statistical evidence as to native movements, disease, contracts, wages, and cost of living. He also referred to the lack of comprehension in the relations between industry and the administration and the lack of experienced men and people to deal with recent industrial growth and developments. Following Major Orde-Browne's investigation, it is quite true that a Labour Department was created, that a Labour Commissioner was appointed at the centre, and that the Labour Advisory Board was improved. He recommended that there should be at least four labour officers appointed in the Copperbelt. At the time of the dispute no labour officer had been appointed, and it was then obvious that a great deal still needed to be done if the grievances of the employees were to be focussed. It was obvious that certain machinery should be created in order that the views of the natives concerned should be made known.

The absence of suitable industrial machinery should be kept in mind when dealing with the problems of the dispute. The Northern Rhodesian Government did not heed the 1935 warning which I have already read to the House. I stated that there was no broad machinery for the ventilation of these grievances or to deal with disputes. The Government in the present dispute had warning of the trouble which was brewing. That is brought out in paragraph 46 of the Report. They must have been conscious that there had been no adjustment in wages to meet the new necessities, that the cost of living was rising, and that industrial problems had been neglected over a period. It was clear, even when the dispute was coming to a head, that the Government there were still half-hearted in their proposals and the kind of intervention which was necessary if the crisis was to be avoided. Industrialism and wage earning have spread practically into all corners of the British Empire, and it is imperative that we should not wait on events but should go all out with a well-conceived and well-planned labour policy in respect of the whole Colonial Empire.

About the dispute itself, we all deplore the loss of life, but I feel that the authorities had a very nasty situation to handle. There may be grounds for criticism that, for instance, there was not enough tear gas available, which might have avoided the necessity of shooting, or that it is a pity that the management paraded the native workers who had been at work on the pay day in sight of the strikers. But I think the situation was an ugly one, and undoubtedly the authorities handled it in as practical a way as the circumstnces of the moment permitted.

But the report reminds us that something is not altogether right in regard to wage relations as between the mines managements and the African people. It is true that the standard of wages is higher than those operating in other parts of the area and that the mine-owners appreciate the value of a healthy and contented labour force, and they have a great deal to their credit in regard to the provision that they have made in respect to medical care and sanitation and certain aspects of welfare. But wages have remained, until this dispute, pretty well unaltered all these years and, following the slump, they never recovered with the prosperity of the mines. There was no attempt to bring the African wage-earners up to a standard more consistent with the return of prosperity to the Copperbelt. I think it is fair to say that the mine-owners have always taken advantage of cheap labour in the Protectorate, of the lack of organisation among the workers and of the desire of the Africans for wage employment because of their poverty and their tax needs. The Commission has been extraordinarily modest in its recommendations in the matter of wages, and only some very tardy concessions have been made. No one will suggest, however poor the standard of living of the Africans, that an increase of less than 1d. a day is a satisfactory wage accommodation. A ticket carries with it 30 shifts, and it means that every day of the month must be worked in order that the half-crown shall be earned in that month. Probably this is deliberately done to compel the worker to work every day of the week, Sundays included, so that he can claim no special rates in regard to his week-end employment.

The same tardy concession is seen in the bonus which was agreed to of 2s. 6d. to meet the increased cost of living. Even that bonus is subjected to the good will of the compound manager. That is to say, the compound manager, a civilian outside the immediate work, may make deductions or determine whether the full bonus should be paid. I should like to ask why, when the Commission recommended that no deductions for disciplinary purposes should be made from the bonus payments, the Northern Rhodesian Government do not accept the recommendation, and why these new disciplinary powers should be placed in the hands of the compound manager. I believe that under Statute they have no right to exercise these disciplinary powers.

Likewise, in regard to overtime, the Government reject the proposal of the Commission that there should be a fair basis of calculation of overtime rates, and the grounds of the rejection by the Government are that the method recommended is contrary to local practice. I should have thought the Commission made its recommendations because of what the local practice was, and I am astonished that so flimsy a pretext should be offered. The other wage adjustments proposed are almost illusory, because so many of the Africans do not stay at the mines much more than six months and therefore cannot earn the special increments which are likely to accure for service beyond this period. In any case any additional costs which these adjustments may involve are not likely to fall on the copper companies at all. There is an arrangement in regard to the output of copper with the Ministry of Supply where any additional working costs to which the companies are put will be borne by the British Exchequer. I submit that more generous arrangements might have been made as far as wages, overtime and bonus payments are concerned.

Something must be radically wrong in our Colonial methods when we allow such intense poverty and so much disease in a Territory where there is an enormous drainage of great wealth from it. This aspect of the problem has received considerable attention outside the House. All the missionary bodies and associations concerned with the well-being of the African people have urged from time to time that there should be some limit to this draining of wealth in order that the welfare of the Africans in their own lands shall be built up or safeguarded. I would submit that in the case of the Copperbelt an end ought to be brought to the perfectly infamous arrangement whereby the British South African Company are able to levy a perpetual toll on industry in royalties on the work that is done. I need not tell the history of that transaction, but sooner or later, and the sooner the better, this miserable story ought to be brought to an end, because probably as much is taken out of the territory in royalties as the total wage bill of all the black people who are employed on the Copperbelt. That is a grossly unfair situation.

Likewise, the Copperbelt companies are making an enormous contribution in taxation to both the local and Imperial Exchequers. We are receiving in taxation from the Copperbelt a vast sum of money every year, and I would suggest that that money should be returned to the Colony and used as a trust fund for social and economic development. In addition, a vast sum of money is annually distributed in this country to the shareholders of the Copperbelt companies. It may be argued that, taking a long period, that return is not as large as is often assumed. In point of fact, between £3,000,000 and £5,000,000 has been sent out in the past few years, and it amounts to from 12 to 16 times the total wage bill of the 26,000 Africans who are engaged in the work. The miserable wages paid on the one hand and these enormous profits on the other are completely unjustifiable.

(To be concluded.)

SHEER HUMBUG.

By The Rev. W. GRAINGE WHITE.

Vicar of Haughley.

Pacifists, as all convinced children of the God of Love must be, need to refuse to apologise for their position. They should "carry the war into the enemy's camp." The weapon used must be the "Sword of the Spirit," which is the "Word of Truth."

Let us examine a cheap gibe that the Pacifist accepts the food for which men of the merchant service risk their lives, and that they (the Pacifists) accept the protection of the armed forces.

But—we do not ask to be born. So, at the outset, we are not free agents. We can not select the race, nor nation, nor political hegemony, into which we shall be born. Nor can we select our parents and the social and economic position in which we shall enter this life. No referendum of the nation is taken before the Government declares war. Nor is Parliament summoned to a debate (open or secret). Nor do we know—until there is un fait accompli—what measures the Foreign Office, or other officials, have taken, which make war inevitable. As an example: The cleverly camouflaged pact with Poland, who was, as a people, prevented from coming to terms with Germany's reasonable demands, by the stipulation made that any agreement would have to be guaranteed by other Powers. In the Government White Paper this stipulation is recorded!

Now, to take a hypothetical case: Supposing a man, born of English parents, finding himself in England when war (about which he was not allowed to vote) is declared, said: "I do not agree. I refuse to accept this state of affairs. I do not wish to be "protected" by the British Forces. I prefer to be under the "protection"—as you call it—of Germany." Would that man be allowed the freedom of his choice? Oh! no! He would be placed in a concentration camp—a British invention, adopted during the Boer War. If able-bodied, such a man would have to register. And, if he had the moral courage to object to war as being "contrary to the will of God" (Lambeth Encyclical, 1930), what sort of treatment would he receive from his employers?

The trouble lies very deep in our traditions. James I. and the Bishops of the "Established Church"—(fancy Bishop's in God's Kingdom on earth allowing "Institutionalism" and its "Establishment" by the Laws of Man!) knew well why they scrapped the three versions of the "Sacred Scriptures" then in use—("The Great Bible"—one of the three—having been placed in every church by Thomas Cromwell, under Henry VIII.'s Order of 1538). They knew that the version, put out in 1611, under their "authority" was full of errors (due to ignorance of languages) and that it contained deliberate falsifications, to support certain political, social, economic and theological "doctrines." And they knew why they propounded and broadcast two special "doctrines."

(a) The Divine right of kings (retained in the expression "Thy chosen servant," in Holy Communion Service).

(b) The Bible (this version) is the Word of God.

They knew that utter confusion in the minds of the unlettered and uninitiated would result by omitting the personal name for the God of the Israelites and substituting the title "Lord." Because, when the Old Testament was read in church, and people heard "Thus saith the Lord, go and annihilate Amaleh—men, women, infants and even cattle," the listeners, taking this to be indeed the Word of God—("Our Father" of the New Testament)—would feel assured that war is God's will for His children (always supposing that some people were specially "chosen" to be His instruments of chastisement for their political enemies—with the corollary that we are a "chosen people" for such purpose).

Similiarly (see Falsehood in War-Time by Ponsonby) when they heard read: "Now hath the Lord put a lying spirit in the mouth of these thy preachers"—to deceive the king and send him to his death, these listeners would, as now, excuse any lie, to our own nation or to the "enemy" as being in accordance with God's own methods, as declared in "The Word of God."

And so, twisting a passage here (I. Cor. xvi., 2), putting a false heading there ("prodigal son" instead of "Lost Son," thus shifting the emphasis from spiritual to material), and misrepresenting our Lord as "angry," and as losing His temper and "driving" the money-changers and sellers furiously out of the Temple, they would effective make God in the image of man—in the image, indeed, of the Englishman, or of the Anglicised Scotsman who had become King of England.

And so, in Catechism and Communion Service, the sixth word "Thou shalt not kill" becomes "Thou shalt do no murder." While the 39 articles (to which clergy give general and not particular assent—scarcely honest?) gave support and afforded great comfort to those "predestined" to salvation from hell and damnation, in the inscrutable counsels of an arbitrary and partial Deity, even before the foundation of the world.

And thus it is that the appeal succeeds when the "religious pedal" of the political organ is pressed and folk feel warm and nice as they become "sanctified patriots," while, however, loudly protesting (if a preacher dares to follow his Lord, or even to emulate Jeremiah) that "Religion has nothing to do with politics."

More's the pity, when it is so, since "Religion" is man's relationship to God—the God of Love—and this God is "the Father of the spirits of all flesh"—which, however, is not tantamount to the mischievous claim that every child born is a new and special creation of God's own will. This, too, is utterly false Theology.

UNITARIAN NOTES

On Saturday, September 13, the Unitarian Peace Fellowship held a service at our Golders Green Church which was conducted by Rev. G. S. Spinks. The sermon was given by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, who took as the theme of his discourse the poem which Whittier addressed to those in England who were seeking reforms by peaceful and Christian means, dwelling especially on the verse:

The truths ye urge are borne abroad
By every wind and every tide;
The voice of Nature and of God
Speaks out upon your side.

Although many were dismayed by the war and felt that all hopes of a constructive world order had been shattered, the true pacifist was not discouraged for his principles could not be defeated. Below all the efforts to stir up hatred, the work for world order went on. They should, therefore, reconsecrate themselves, he said, to return good for evil, to develop mutual trust in one another, however difficult, and go forward still with the hope of world peace in their hearts.

The Rev. F. W. Woodruff has resigned his ministry at Warwick and intends to devote himself to founding a Unitarian Community. He holds that "Community" is a word with a practical meaning to-day. A clear statement of his attitude, discussing pacifists and conscientious objectors, will appear in our next issue.

The Unitarian Union for Special Service devotes its 4th leaflet to the subject of "Christian Communism." We hope to reprint this interesting leaflet soon. Meantime all enquiries should be addressed to: REV. E. G. LEE, 125 PRINCE GEORGE AVENUE, SOUTHGATE, LONDON, N.

NOVEMBER ANNIVERSARIES

The editor was born on November 5. This fact would not be recalled if November were not such a good month. It is the month of the execution of the Chicago Martyrs in 1887. Their story is told very fully in Pioneers of Anti-Parliamentarism. This work is published at 1s. 0d., post free, 1s. 2d. November is also the month of John Maclean's death, this story is told in John Maclean, Martyr of The Class Struggle. This work is issued at 4d., post free, 6d. Both can be ordered from THE STRICKLAND PRESS, 104 GEORGE STREET, GLASGOW, C. 2.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

MORE CORRESPONDENCE

Dear Guy,—Many thanks for the September issue, which is as good as ever, I have wanted to thank you many times for The Word. It is more helpful than any journal I know on this war business.

Your open letter to Churchill was as good as anything you have written and the exposure of Ernest Thurtle was searching and timely.

We carry on at the Church with the help of a faithful few. I am pretty well considering the many calls on my strength.

You can put me down as one who will gladly serve under the leadership of "Bedford." His vision of the present issues seems to me clear and his courage is an inspiration.

With affectionate greetings in the struggle,

Yours Ever,

RICHARD LEE.

Coventry, September 8, 1941.

Dear Sir,—I am in great sympathy with the views expressed by the Duke of Bedford in your columns.

I believe that the spirit of Love which animates the teaching in the New Testament is incompatible with the driving force behind war. I am, therefore, a pacifist.

I also believe that "poverty in the midst of plenty" as demonstrated in the last twenty years, is one of the root causes of war and a negation of the spirit of truth.

I believe that money, the means by which this plenty can be distributed, must:

(a) be issued in some relation to the real wealth it has to distribute;

(b) be controlled by the community;

(c) be put into the pockets of the people in some new way additional to the "wages system" which is inadequate in an age of callous saving machinery to dispense sufficient purchasing power to absorb the production of power machinery.

I would, therefore, as one individual in this community, like to support the Duke of Bedford's United Pacifist-Socialist Movement.

With all good wishes.

Yours truly,

(Mrs.) DOROTHY R. PUGHE MORGAN.

Formby, Sept. 7, 1941.

Dear Friend,—After reading The Word for the first time I regret deeply my failure to get your admirable journal earlier.

It is obvious from the correspondence published that the statements made by the Duke of Bedford has aroused great interest among many socialists and pacifists who, like myself, have been disappointed by the apathy, disunity, and lack of effective leadership in the anti-war movement. When one compares the magnificent fight put up by the handful of pacifists and conscientious objectors in the last war, and their subsequent effect on post-war thought in politics, with the feeble performance we seem to be making in this war one feels that a serious session of self-criticism is highly desirable.

The Duke is obviously one who wants to cut the cackle and get on with the job and as such he has my support. I hope that he will take his seat in the House of Lords although in doing so he is making sacrifices which only those who have seen this museum piece in action can appreciate. I believe that as the War progresses the people will turn more and more to those who have honestly and sincerely opposed it and providing that we are united and have a constructive policy to offer to both the rantings of the megalomanic Hitler and the wheezings of our home-grown gas-bag Churchill we shall succeed in utilizing the inevitable reaction for Peace and Socialism.

The moth-eaten Jacobins of the Labour Party are fast losing what little popularity they possessed and it is our duty to see that when the demand for the ending of the War and the evil system of which it is the expression is voiced, we can canalize it. There is all the difference in the world between Pacifism and passive-ism.

Best Wishes,

ALAN MASON.

Norwich, September.

Dear Sir,—May I add my plea that the Duke of Bedford should take his place as leader of a Peace Party in this country and the world. The long tradition of public service in his family, and his personal abilities and integrity, and zeal for peace, point to him as the desired head of such a movement. In a world which is almost engulfed in waves of hate, malevolence and destruction, some refuge of hope, peace, and social construction could be made manifest which might appeal to peace-loving peoples in countries.

Yours sincerely,

M. H. GRIEVE.

Wallasey, 30th September, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—I like the Duke of Bedford's articles. He is so beautifully sane. Thinking of him in terms of music, he is a Tone Poem, the loveliest of all music :—"Andante con-expressione." How much is due to lucky birth and an easy life, I wonder.

Yours Fraternally,

ISOBEL KNIGHT.

Aberdeen, September 2.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I enclose subscription to The Word. It gives me a feeling of hope that some sanity does exist in the world, and is able ot emerge. The leadership of the Duke of Bedford would be absolutely magnificient. The country is waiting for someone of his calibre. The moment is not yet but it is bound to come. I wish it were possible to bring the great intelligence of Mr. Middleton Murry to unite with the Duke of Bedford and yourself. Unity is strength ; and those who share the same sane views should not be in different camps.

Yours Faithfully,

GLADYS STALBRIDGE.

Northam, September 14.

THE BAPTIST VIEW

Crisis, like adversity, makes strange bedfellows. Yet it advances humanity. It destroys sectarianism. Some folk have written to us, as 125 years their ancestors wrote to brave and fearless Richard Carlile, and ask us to assure them that we are not Atheistic. We can give no such assurance, and we would not if we could. We notice that, on the side of militarism and error, Theists of all shades gladly and readily unite with Atheists. Why not on the side of Anti-Militarism and Truth? Is the important thing a theological dogma, a formality of prayer, or a definite integrity of soul and conscience, a true public affection of real social service and witnessing unto peace? We have no bigotry and we expect to meet with none. That is why we can co-operate so openly and so freely with the Duke of Bedford, who is a Christian and therefore a man of wide democratic understanding. He measures Christianity by its concrete social expression and not in the vague terms of mere phraseology. He judges the tree by its fruits, and believes that, although a pretence of works cannot atone for an absence of faith, the living presence of faith must find its expression in works. "Faith without works is dead."

Our contemporary, The Baptist Times, London, in its issue for September 4 last, publishes some comments by the Rev. M. E. Aubrey, M.A., General Secretary of the Baptist Union, under the heading: "A Duke's Family Prayers." Mr. Aubrey's name will be familiar to our readers, and we make no apology for reproducing his comments :—

Following a mild protest concerning a paragraph which was based on a mistake, afterwards handsomely admitted, I have had a pleasant and unusually interesting correspondence with the Editor of THE WORD, a Glasgow monthly. It is not, as the somewhat Barthian title would seem to suggest, a theological paper but has a threefold purpose: "To rouse the People, to combat Fascism, and to speed Commonweal." We sympathise with all these aims even if the line of approach is not our own.

One of the Editor's kindnesses has been to send me a copy of "Some Family Prayers used in Time of War," by the Duke of Bedford. They are printed only for private circulation. I like the title, for it means that these prayers have really been offered. While we have no reason to think that a Duke's prayers (I am sure he would agree) are necessarily more acceptable to God than those of his poorest tenant, for that depends on the humble and contrite heart, they are very welcome to us. I cannot remember any book of prayers previously written by a Duke though we think gratefully of the many who have borne such a title who knew the way into the Holy Place.

I trust he will not mind my reprinting here the prayer "For a full Acceptance of the Truth of Christ."

There is no need to reproduce this prayer, for the Duke of Bedford is quite willing to send a copy of his prayers to any Christian reader who wishes to have them.

Mr. Aubrey continued :

To that prayer with its humility and insight we may all say "Amen," and perhaps we can use it for ourselves.

I quote it because it seems to me to reveal a right attitude, that of the true disciple who would bring his thoughts and life into subjection to the mind of Christ. How hard that is, all of us know.

It would be an impertinence for a man like me either to praise or to defend the writer. Frankly, I do not always agree with him. He is an ardent and (if the adjective does not seem unkind) a militant pacifist. Once a soldier, he has become a strong anti-militarist. People who confuse purpose and method have described him as "pro-Fascist" because he thinks that the use of armed force is not the way to overcome Fascism. He says, in an interview with THE WORD, that he is "trying to be a Christian." He believes that the Society of Friends and also Baptists and Congregationalists, with their "records of steadfast standings for conscience and the rights of civil and religious liberty," have a part to play. We have, and we think we are playing it. He will give us credit for our sincerity as we gladly acknowledge his, even when we differ from him.

We are all pilgrims. The Duke is not at the end of his pilgrimage. Where will it bring him? Will God, who used the Countess of Huntingdom, in her place of influence and witness, to be a focal point in a great revival of religion in this land, pour out His Spirit on and through another servant of His, highly placed and born to privilege and power, to help Him lead this nation to a fuller light and a richer life? Who among us will not lift up his heart in praise if that be His will? "He that seeketh findeth."

The fuller light to which Britain needs to be led is the same fuller light as that to which every nation in the world needs to be led, the light of peace and social justice. We call that light tersely and simply: Socialism.

LORD PONSONBY'S VIEW.

[Lord Ponsonby is better well-known as Arthur Ponsonby. During the last war he took his stand for peace and joined the I.L.P. He has had a distinguished political and diplomatic career but became a political outcast because of his loyalty to Socialism and Pacifism. In December, 1926, he organised the huge Albert Hall Peace Letter Campaign at which Herbert Morrison pledged himself to oppose all future war. See Word, April, 1941.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you for sending me the current number of The Word. If I have not acknowledged copies you have sent me before it is because such a mass of stuff is sent to me I often miss acknowledging good stuff in the midst of the far larger amount of bad.

I congratulate you on being able to produce such an interesting sheet considering the times and your own personal difficulties.

I have always said that international war must be based on hyprocrisy and humbug. But I never imagined that it would reach the pitch it has today.

Remember me to Fred Jowett my old friend who is among the small minority who have remained faithful.

Yours Sincerely,

Arthur Ponsonby.

JESUS AND WAR

Sorensen Questions Official Unitarianism

In The Inquirer, London, for September 27 last, the Rev. Reginald Sorensen, M.P., who was known in the No-Conscription Fellowship for his Socialist Opposition to the War of 1914-1918, takes to task the editor for his pro-war attitude. Comrades will recall that in the September Word we defended the Rev. Sidney Spencer, of Liverpool, and the Rev. Richard Lee, of Coventry against the attacks of our contemporary. The editor maintains silence rather than attempt a reply. He attempts to answer Sorensen.

Our Comrade Sorensen writes as follows :—

Sir,—You state, "To allow all the infamies to take place . . . without saying a word about them, is . . . a far greater horror than war. To hand over all armed power to the Hitler's and Mussolini's means in the long run silence over blasphemies against the human spirit. There were pacifists in Germany; they were soon reduced to silence."

Was not Jesus reduced to silence?

Surely, the significance of the Christian faith lies in the nature of its technique in overcoming evil, its power arising neither from the incentive of returning injury for injury nor in the amassing of overwhelming physical and military strength, but from the ultimately irresistible spiritual capacity for reclamation.

Infamies are not a modern invention and certainly to say no word about them or to evade their challenge to true human values would have been moral treachery as much in the time of Jesus as in our own age. Yet all armed power was in fact handed over to Caesar and, Jesus uttered no direct condemnation. Is the religion of Jesus therefore futile because (a) He called for no military V campaign against Roman oppression, (b) He condoned a "far greater horror than war," and (c) He was reduced to silence?

The answer is to be found not only in the existence of the Christian Church but also in the attitude we should adopt were Hitler and Mussolini, like Caesar, to be successful. We know that success would be confounded if devotion to the Truth received our tenacious devotion.

But what of the silence over the alleged evils of Communist Russia? Yesterday it was urged there was little to choose between the two powers now engaged in the west. Personally, I did not accept this, but those who did, now find it expedient to suspend their former accusations. Is this a blasphemous silence or the exercise of requisite patience in view of an ultimate purpose??

And what of the relative silence over the blind hate that gathers momentum every day and increasingly destroys our capacity for making a fair and gracious society. Is this a greater or less horror than war?

Truly, the mass of people reject the application of a reclamatory technique as impracticable, and with moving heroism and fortitude they seek to destroy an evil they rightly discern as a menace to civilisation. Better that than spiritual paralysis. But need that mean therefore the paralysis of those "who know a more excellent way" ? Barrabas probably was a brave man who hated his country's enemies. Is he to be accepted as more potent for human liberation than the Son of Man who was reduced to silence?—Yours,

London. REGINALD SORENSEN.

To this letter, the editor of The Inquirer makes this awkward reply in a footnote :—

[Frankly, we hardly know what point Mr. Sorensen wishes to make. Does he, for instance, draw any parallel between the death of Jesus (for so we interpret his sentence, "Was not Jesus reduced to silence?") and the silence of the German pacifist group? Does he draw any parallel between the present silence "over the alleged evils of Communist Russia" and that imposed by Hitler on some of his countrymen, and, by implication, would impose on all those who did not like him? Does Mr. Sorenson wish everyone to be silent under the infamies of the modern Caesars because, as he alleges, Jesus uttered no direct condemnation of the Caesar of his day? The Christian Church which Mr. Sorensen seems to suggest was the triumphant result of Jesus' "silence" has certainly never for any length of time been silent upon such matters; and certainly—since perhaps there is a hidden point behind all this—its great thinkers and most of its saints have never refused to sanction force to put down iniquity. As for hate, would there be less hate in the world at the moment, if the Nazis with their doctrine of hate, their leaders dripping hate from their mouths every time they speak, had had their way with the world? Less hate in Czechoslovakia and Poland for instance? "Overcome evil with good"—for so we interpret one of Mr. Sorensen's paragraphs—but what in heaven's name is to be done with evil until it is overcome? What is to be the interim policy until everyone sees the light as Jesus saw it? To refuse to answer those questions is, in our opinion, to retard the day when war shall be no more.—Ed.]

This is no reply to our comrade, Sorensen.

The pacifists in Germany are reduced to silence, or to seeming silence, for there is dangerous underground propaganda, by exactly the same methods as those employed against Jesus and the first Christians. We thought that this was the case against Nazi Germany : the existence of torture, concentration camps, spies, and summary persecution : the worship of State power under the names of Nazism and Hitlerism. We draw a distinct parallel between the case of Jesus and that of German pacifists and Socialists. Does not the editor of The Inquirer?

Our editor friend makes no reply to Sorensen's Russian argument. He simply side-steps to avoid saying either "yes" or "no" to a direct question that must be answered either "yes" or "no" if it is to be answered at all.

Nazism is founded on hate. But the hate is not one-sided. Nor can hate be cured by hate, which is mixed with expediency, and qualified by self-interest. Why is the hatred of Nazism and Fascism developed today by politicians and in a press that betrayed Spain and slandered the Spanish Anarchists and Republicans, who gave their lives to save Spain, Europe, and the world from the savages and impostures of Fascism? Why was the hatred of Fascism not expressed on principle in those heroic 1936 days? Why forget Spain and speak of Czechoslovakia and Poland, which were not genuine democracies, workers countries, or Anti-Fascist countries? Has the editor of The Inquirer never studied the wage conditions in Czechoslovakia or Poland? Does he not know that Jews were outraged and persecuted in Poland?

Why must he, if he is a christian, sneer at the light of Jesus? If he believes in Paganism, let him say so and leave the Christian pulpit for ever. He has no place there. Does he not know that it is on record that there were times and places when the word conquered the sword, that martyrdom has been more successful than victorious militarism, that love has conquered hate? Does he not realise that war will never end his way, because his sole reliance is on power, on might, on the machinery of conquest? His way is to throw huge masses of people against each other, because of the accident of birth : to permit no individual thought : to reduce mankind to soulless herds : and to consider the herd to which he belongs idealistic and the herd to which he does not belong materialistic. This policy is to be repeated every twenty years. We are to call the slaughter "the war to end war" and to give it other fantastic names. We are to rule out conscience and the civil duty of disobedience to militarism and the claims of Caesar. We are to be respectable and well-groomed and to possess or to masquerade a soulless allegiance to a vicious military sense of State duty. Is this Christianity? Is this the way to peace? Is this Unitarianism?

For the editor of The Inquirer to refuse to answer these questions, as he refused to answer our defence of Sidney Spencer and Richard Lee, is, in our opinion, to make impossible the day when peace shall triumph over war, and harmony shall reign throughout the world. We plead guilty to heresy. Our friend commits blasphemy, for he worships a false God, the national God of Imperialist war, instead of the God of civic righteousness and civic disobedience. Have no fear : the civic man will triumph over the militarist : the God of Peace will overcome the God of War : the son of man, who has not where to lay his head, will inaugurate, without guns or tanks or armed airplanes, the day of human well-being ; not without martyrdom but most certainly without adding murder to murder. To The Inquirer I say, in the words of one of long ago, whose voice is heard above the roar of guns : "Oh ye of little faith!"

In The Inquirer for October 11, Richard Lee takes his stand by Sorensen in the following challenging letter to the editor:

Sir,—Whatever Mr. Sorenson's point may be, yours is tolerably clear, that gross evil can only be overcome by more evil. For none except moonstruck idealists can see anything in war but a "hideous and loathsome business." That is The Spectator's description. The Bishop of Chichestor says "Modern war is a demon that not only kills human lives, but by its awful unreason, its perfection in the technique of mass-murder, turns the individual from a person into an unmeaning thing."

You assume that evil can be overcome in no other way than by the vile instrument of war.

Lord Salisbury was wiser. Faced with the cry from many quarters for war against the Sultan, who was responsible for unspeakable atrocities, this is what Lord Salisbury said: "Suppose the Sultan will not give these reforms, what is to follow? The first answer I should give is that above all treaties and all combinations of powers the nature of things, if you please, or the Providence of God, if you are pleased to put it so, has determined that persistent and constant misgovernment must lead the Government which follows it to its doom. The Sultan is not exempt more than any other potentate from the law that injustice will bring the highest on earth to ruin."

This is not the only method that Christian wisdom and love could pursue. Love will knock at a hundred doors rather than adopt the foul and fiendish devices of modern war.—Yours,

Coventry. RICHARD LEE.

"ACCUMULATIVE HELL"

A LETTER AGAINST WAR TOLL AND HUMBUG.

From R. SORENSEN, M.P.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Your journal The Word is certainly a sharp and challenging contrast to other current literature! Your quotations from former utterances by Herbert Morrison (and others) transported me so swiftly over the archway of the last 25 years that for a moment I confused him with a person by the same name I knew today. In fact I suppose they are just distant relatives and perhaps that is why opposition to war is a relative term.

Although I possess an unorthodox faith I remember the biblical sentence "'When I was a child I thought as a child, but now I am become a man I put away childish things." Some evidently believe their former convictions belong to their political childhood but I rather feel the "childish things" refer to superficial foundations that do not stand the test of time and experience. For my part I feel the only sure foundation of Socialism and Peace belongs to human maturity rather than infancy and therefore I am still convinced that the pursuit of "an eye for an eye" is morally and politically futile. Those like our Prime Minister and others who vocalise that hypnotic delusion no doubt think they are striking a brave and comforting note. Actually, they are simply being tragically primitive.

How best to make that clear is a difficult task and we each have different media. We can believe, however, that even if the race still has a long way to go before it is grown up that the witness of those with vision is not lost. Meanwhile we can and must give what human service we can in a spirit of fraternity and seek to preserve as many elements of sanity as possible.

Scorned derisively as it may be there is profound philosophy in the technique of overcoming evil with good, and if we are big enough that could be applied internationally as well as privately. The alternative is the realism of accumulative hell.

With Kind Regards,

Yours Sincerely,

R. SORENSEN.

ARMY GAOLS

The Railway Review, for September 12, 1941, publishes a valuable and well-informed article, signed "Escort," entitled "THE DISGRACE OF ARMY GAOLS." We shall endeavour to republish this exposure in the interest of every man in uniform, who lives under the menace of the shocking conditions described in our contemporary. Since The Railway Review is a trade union and Labour Party organ, it has no interest in publishing false statements to the democracy at the present time.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS

IN THE DOCK

[We have reproduced accounts of the Glasgow 1921 by W. Gallacher; H. McShane; P. J. Dollan; and John S. Clarke. We pass to the ordinary press reports. These bring out the illegal nature of our arrest "without a warrant" in London; the absolute indifference to that illegality by the Bench and the Crown; the assumption that it was sufficient for police witnesses to say they knew nothing about the question of legal or illegal arrest; and the deliberate shelter of these witnesses and the corrupt proceedings by the Judge presiding. Arising out of this Glasgow trial was the Edinburgh High Court Case of the documents, in which the Crown lost, and the victimisation of a man who had ordered literature from us, out of sheer curiosity, following an advertisement in "The Freethinker." Reports of these events, and newspaper comment, will be reproduced.—Ed.]

V—"GLASGOW HERALD REPORTS.

[The "Glasgow Herald" reported the trial in its issues for Tuesday, June 21, 1921 and Wednesday, June 22, 1921. Items in other reports that depict the trial, or add comment, or indicate more clearly what took place, will be noted separately. The "G. H." reports are accepted as the basic factual description. The date of the paper is indicated above each report. We omit the sentences, already stated, and from the second day's report, the repetition of the charge.—Ed.]

TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1921.

GLASGOW HIGH COURT.

(Before Lord Skerrington)

NORTH COURT.

Practically the whole of the proceedings before Lord Skerrington and a jury in the North Court were occupied in the hearing of a charge of sedition against Guy Alfred Aldred and three others.

Aldred has been in prison awaiting trial, and the three others associated with him in the charge —Jane Hamilton Patrick, 166 West Graham Street, Glasgow ; Douglas McLeish, 194 Baltic Street, Glasgow ; and Andrew Fleming, 171 Wellshot Road, Shettleston—entered the dock when their names were called

The indictment extended over eight pages, and contained many quotations from the "Red Commune." It bore that between January 1 and February 10, 1921, at 28 Kirpatrick Street, Glasgow, and at 28 Great Hamilton Street, Glasgow, and at 13 Burnbank Gardens, Glasgow, and elsewhere in Glasgow, the accused, acting in concert, seditiously printed, published, and circulated a newspaper entitled the "Red Commune, Official Organ of the Glasgow Communist Group and Affiliated Bodies," containing "articles and words calculated to excite popular disaffection, commotion, and violence and resistance to lawful authority."

One passage quoted in the indictment was as follows :—

Our platform is a very simple one : it consists of the following five planks, platforms and principles :—(1) The complete overthrow of capitalist society and the establishment of the Communist Republic : (2) the class struggle ; (3) the dictatorship of the proletariat (4) destruction of Parliamentary government and the substitution of the Soviet or revolutionary workers' system of administration ; (5) anti-Parliamentary activity (a) boycotting the ballot-box, (b) Communist anti-Parliamentary or Sinn Fein candidature."

WHAT IS SEDITION?

Mr. Robert Morton, K.C., on behalf of Fleming, raised the objection to the relevancy of the charge. There was nothing quoted in the indictment, he argued, that expressed more than a desire to get rid of a form of organisation of industry and society of which the accused did not approve. He presumed that in order to be seditious any publication must intend to interfere with the organisation of society or Government of the State in a forcible way. There was nothing in the articles quoted except an intention on the part of these people to act by ordinary political means for the purpose of altering the system of society.

Lord Skerrington directed counsel's attention to the statement—"This implies war on all Parliamentary Communist organisations."

Mr. Morton—I do not think they mean physical.

His Lordship asked what other methods there were.

Mr. Morton said they meant boycotting the ballot-box.

His Lordship—What are the ordinary political methods other than Parliament?

Mr. Morton—One method is very prominent just now—the strike. He held that a person was entitled to work for the establishmnt of a Republic provided he used lawful means in bringing it about.

The accused Aldred, speaking in his own defence, objected to the relevancy of the indictment on the ground that there was nothing in it that warranted its being put before a jury, and cited legal opinions in support of his contention.

Lord Skerrington asked accused what his interpretation of sedition was.

Aldred replied that his interpretation was that there must be an active, illegal, violent element present to constitute sedition, and that there must be direct incitement to violent action, and there was nothing like that in the indictment.

Lord Skerrington repelled the objections, and asked the accused persons to plead. Each in a clear voice responded, "Not guilty, my Lord."

The jury was then empanelled, eight of those balloted being women.

VALIDITY OF A SCOTTISH WARRANT.

Detective-Lieutenant John M'Gimpsey, Central Police, Glasgow, was the first witness. He said the Glasgow Communist Group was founded about 1912. It was fused with the Glasgow Anarchist Group in 1916, and in 1920 it took the name of the Glasgow Communist Group. Witness described a visit he paid to a house, where he took possession of 51 membership cards, some bearing the name of Glasgow Anarchist Group and some Glasgow Communist Group. He and other police witnesses spoke to other documents having been taken possession of in other premises.

Detective-Inspector Noble said he arrested Aldred at Scotland Yard on March 5. Accused was at that time in custody, but he arrested him on a warrant he carried.

Aldred asked witness if he was aware that that Scottish warrant could not be executed lawfully in London unless it was backed by a London Magistrate.

Witness, while not admitting the correctness of Aldred's view, said the warrant was endorsed by a London Magistrate before it was put into operation.

Aldred—Are you aware that according to a decision of the English Judges sedition is a misdemeanour at English law, and not a felony?

Witness—I have not studied English law.

Aldred, at the close of his cross-examination, complimented witness on the courtesy he showed towards him on the journey north. "He performed a somewhat unpleasant duty very nicely indeed," he remarked.

MANNER OF ALDRED'S ARREST.

Inspector Thomas M'Grath, of the Special Branch, Scotland Yard, gave evidence regarding Aldred's arrest at Richmond Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, London, on March 2. Aldred drew from witness the fact that in arresting him he was acting on instructions from Glasgow police as conveyed in a letter dated February 26.

Are you aware, asked Aldred, that you cannot arrest me legally for sedition without a warrant, being in your personal possession?

There was no answer, whereupon Lord Skerrington asked witness, "Do you know anything about that?" Witness replied, "I have not looked up that , my Lord."

Aldred, while pursuing this question of arrest was reminded by his Lordship that the question for the jury was "guilty or not guilty" of the indictment.

Aldred said his purpose was to show that the police were not prepared to abide by the law ; that they were acting from panic.

Ann Menzies Scott Donaldson, a young women residing at Dalmuir, who acted as minute secretary of Glasgow Communist Group, stated that in November the group decided to issue an anti-Parliamentary manifesto.

Replying to Aldred, witness agreed that at the same time they adopted him (Aldred) as Parliamentary candidate for Shettleston, this candidature to be the basis of their anti-Parliamentary propaganda. The discussion after the business meetings were on philosophical ideas, and there were never any suggestions of violence or incitement. She never saw the accused Fleming at any of the meetings.

The Rev. Alexander Strang, Sandyhills U.F. Church, Shettleston ; Mr. Chisholm, headmaster of Shettleston Public School ; Mr. Robert Shanks, ex-councillor of Glasgow ; and Dr. Dunlop were among the witnesses who spoke to the character of Fleming, who is a printer to trade and an ex-member of Shettleston School Board. They could not, witnesses agreed associate Fleming with the doctrine of violence.

THE PRINTER'S DEFENCE.

Accused Fleming in the witness-box, said he carried on a stationers' and printers' business at 28 Great Hamilton Street. He had been about 16 years in business, and his firm did printing for manufacturers, small businesses, trade unions, literary societies, Masonc lodges, religious organisations, and other bodies. His office was half a mile distant from the workshop in Great Hamilton Street. He was very busy at the time the first issue of the "Red Commune" was printed. Prior to that he had printed for Miss Patrick tickets for socials, picnics, and dances, postcards, and letter headings—all in the ordinary way of business. He told Miss Patrick when asked to do so, that he was willing to print the "Red Commune" on condition that they were to be careful about the publication. Much of the matter had previously been printed in other publications, and he took that as good security. The job was sent to the workshop, and on his periodical visits there he saw it. He glanced at the matter ,but did not read it. Anything printed in the "Red Commune" which might incite to violence would not be in accordance with his views. He did not act in concert with the accused in the sense that there was any conspiracy. It was a pure matter of business. A large poster was produced to illusrtate the nature of Fleming's business. It was for a candidate at the last municipal election in Glasgow, and contained the lines :—"Electors, don't be bluffed ; the Socialists are out to enslave you."

The other accused did not lead any evidence Aldred, addressing his Lordship said :—"We are responsible for the publication, and the publication is good in law."

ANTI-PARLIAMENTARY PROPAGANDA.

The Advocate Depute (Mr. A. M. M'Robert, K.C.), in addressing the jury, said that the modern tendency was not to prosecute in case of sedition unless something was done likely to cause violence of some kind or resistance to lawful authority. The declaration for the "'destruction of Parliamentary government and the substitution of the Soviet or revolutionary workers' system of administration," showed how they meant to go about effecting the charge not by Parliamentary and constitutional methods but by other methods. The only way other than through Parliament was by doing something that was unlawful, because the only lawful way of changing the laws was by the constitutional way through Parliament. He quoted from a published passage regarding "abstentionist tactice" as follows :—

"The election address to contain . . . (2) a definite pledge to work outside Parliament, on the streets and in the workshops, for the revolution, preaching open and avowed 'sedition' and agitating towards the insurrectional crisis."

He submitted that this statement was not capable of an innocent meaning.

COMMUNIST ADDRESSES THE JURY.

After Mr. Morton K.C., had addressed the jury on behalf of Fleming, the accused Aldred spoke on his own defence, and in defence of Patrick and M'Leish. What he had done, he said, had been open to the public and all the world. He believed he had not exceeded the constitutional rights of a British citizen to say what he thought was right. It was those who wished to tamper with the right of free speech who were inciting and who were preventing the solution of the great problems of poverty and misery that afflicted the community. The Constitution was dynamic and not static, and hence the view of what was sedition was dynamic and not static. Not long ago,said accused, addressing the mixed jury, it was considered that to give women the vote and to place women in the jury-box would be subversive of the British Constitution. To-day women had the vote and women sat in jury-boxes in accordance with the British Constitution.

After accused had spoken for about an hour Lord Skerrington, interrupting, suggested that as the jury would require to return to-day in any event it might suit everyone's convenience to adjourn the case till 10.15 a.m. to-day.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

When the sedition trials in the North Court—before Lord Skerrington and a jury (of whom eight were women)—was resumed yesterday Aldred, one of the accused, continued his address to the jury on behalf of himself and of Patrick and M'Leish. . . .

The indictment, which with the list of productions and witnesses, covered eight pages, quoted a number of passages from the "Red Commune," including a declaration for the "destruction of Parliamentary government and the substitution of the Soviet or Revolutionary Workers' System of Administration," and an excerpt from an article in which "the only possible line of attack" was stated to be "the line of direct revolutionary mass action."

Aldred entered the dock from the cell below, and the three other accused, who had been on bail, responded when their names were called.

ACCUSED REPUDIATE VIOLENCE

Aldred, in his resumed address to the jury, declared that free speech was more important than any Constitution. If the statements quoted in the indictment were sedition we had better close down our printing presses in this land of the free. After recalling the speeches of Sir Edward Carson and Lord Birkenhead some years ago during the Ulster crisis, Aldred said what the workers felt was that if you preached sedition in a certain way you might be honoured by being invited to fill the highest positions in the land. But the worker was at the disadvantage that he was uncultured and lacked a University education. Towards the close of his address Aldred exhibited to the jury, to counter a suggestion that a cartoon in the "Red Commune" depicted violence, a banner of the Communist Group, which he said, represented militarism being destroyed by the working man. That was their motto ; he submitted it proved that they did not believe in violence. Communism, he declared, might be wrong, but the freedom of the press must always be right.

His address, interrupted by the adjournment of the Court on Monday, occupied more than two hours.

JUDGES' DEFINITION OF SEDITION.

Lord Skerrington, in summing up, said it was quite sufficient to establish sedition in the case of a newspaper such as the "Red Commune" if they came to the conclusion that it advocated the bringing about of political changes in this country by the use of means which were illegal and unconstitutional. On the other hand, if the jury took the view that while it advocated political changes of a very drastic character it intended that these changes should only be brought about in a constitutional manner by the action of Parliament, then they would find that it was not sedition, and it was of no importance whether they approved or entirely disapproved of the political changes that were advocated.

It was plain that these people had an extremely low opinion of Parliament. They took the view that they might ask for what reform they liked, but that they would get no reform worth taking from Parliament. That was not sedition itself, but it was coming pretty near being seditious.

The Advocate-Depute's interpretation was that they wanted drastic political changes, and that they said that the regular constitutional method was not workable and of on use. And the Advocate-Depute put two and two together and said that this was just incitement to the people to rise up and seize for themselves the power which Parliament would not give them.

The jury with one exception, found all the accused guilty as libelled.

Mr. Morton, K.C., appealed on behalf of Fleming for leniency. The ends of justice, he suggested, would in his case be met by a pecuniary penalty. . . .

His Lordship, addressing Aldred, said he could not regard these seditious publications as otherwise than of a serious character, and he could not help regarding Aldred as the master mind and leader in that contravention of the law. . . .

CARLILE BIOGRAPHY.

The Literary Guide, London, in its issue for September 1941, gives a very friendly review to Richard Carlile. Our contemporary says :—

Mr. Guy A. Aldred has now published the third and revised edition of his life of Richard Carlile. The work is a worthy reminder of the strenuous fight which a gallant Freethinker made long ago in behalf of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," a masterpiece which is still sold in tens of thousands. He may have lacked the culture and the graciousness of such successors as Thomas Henry Huxley and George William Foote, but he was possessed to the full of all their courage and steadfastness. When arraigned before Chief Justice Abbott (of execrable memory, similar to that of Mr. Justice North, who passed judgment in Foote more than half a century later), and in due course sentenced to a fine of £1,500 and two years' imprisonment, he simply bowed to the court and forthwith suffered his doom. Nearly the whole story of his subsequent heroic crusade is recorded by Mr. Aldred. . . .

In commending the new edition of Mr. Guy A. Aldred's "Life of Richard Carlile," Mr. Chapman Cohen, in the "Freethinker," reminds us that Mr. G. M. Trevelyan (who, by the way, was a Director of the R.P.A. for one or two years), in his "British History in the Nineteenth Century," pays a well-deserved tribute to Richard Carlile. . . .

The Trevelyan quotation appeared in these columns last month. We do not agree that Carlile lacked culture, but we thank our contemporary for its kindly notice.

Free Expression, London, in its issue for September 1941, also notices Richard Carlile. The reviewer, our Comrade, S. D. Frances, says :—

This is a book which will have a special appeal to readers of "Free Expression." Richard Carlile lived in the days when to publish the writings of Thomas Paine was to commit a crime punishable by imprisonment; when a tax was payable upon every copy of every publication which automatically prevented poorer people obtaining reading material of any description.

Carlile devoted his life to the cause of liberty and the rights of man; fearlessly he fought in the vanguard against the stunted mentalities of his time. Over and over again he went to prison, never flinching, maintaining steadfastly his right to publish the writings of others.

Readers will learn that Carlile was responsible for the liberty of publication that is enjoyed to-day. Deliberately challenging the Government, Carlile published Paine's "Age of Reason." An excellent report is given of the court proceedings of Carlile's defence, his insistence on the validity of Paine's writings and the sentence which he deliberately incurred in the cause of the freedom of the press. The imprisonment of Carlile did not seriously impede his self-imposed task. Carlile's wife carried on the work of selling Paine's writings. When she was arrested and sentenced, the work was carried on by Carlile's sister, who was in turn sent to gaol and succeeded by defiant volunteers. In all, 150 persons suffered incarceration for acting as Carlile's agents in his struggle. The Lord Chief Justice finally intimated that enough had been done in the way of prosecuting Carlile and his shopmen. The cabinet in council acknowledged Carlile invincible in the the course of moral resistence which he had taken.

While Carlile was imprisoned, a Press Act was passed imposing a stamp duty upon publications, which necessitated the finding of sureties before publication and the submission of MSS. Characteristically, Carlile entirely ignored these regulations, his policy being defined as resisting the "imposition of a duty on political information for the better preservation of ignorance among the labouring classes."

After reading this book you will be surprised that so little is known of such a man as Carlile; his name does not appear in history books or in the British Encyclopaedia. It has been left to Guy Aldred to undertake the valuable work of making available for the public full information on the life and activities of an agitator for freedom.

Guy Aldred writes not as a historian, but as a disciple of Carlile, believing sincerely in the ideas and aims for which Carlile fought. Aldred himself has deliberately challenged the Government by insisting on his right to publish the writings of others, and he served his first sentence in 1909 at the age of 22 after conviction at the Old Bailey.

Those who know even a little of the idealism of Guy Aldred will understand that this History-cum-Biography has been written by one who has complete sympathy and understanding of the facts of Carlile's life.

HENRY J. ADLARD.

In The Word for December, 1940, and January, March and June, 1941, we have published articles by, and studies of, the work of the Rev. Henry J. Adlard, a Unitarian and Socialist Minister, now of Trim St. Chapel, Bath, who was formerly Unitarian Minister at Duluth, Minn., U.S.A. As our readers are aware, Mr. Adlard is a radical thinker, who seeks to make the pulpit the centre of libertanian thought and vision.

From Duluth recently, we received the following letter, which describes Mr. Adlard's activity there. To many readers of this journal this letter will make interesting reading :

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I thank you for copies of The Word. I loan them to Mr. Adlard's friends to read.

From 1907 to 1928, I was not in Duluth, having left Duluth early in 1907. I was in Calumet, Michigan, from 1907 to 1917, managing a department store. The firm owning that store, and the one here in Duluth, then sent me to N.Y. City to manage its office there for 5 years, after which they had me go to Cleveland Ohio for 5 years. Then, in 1928, they transferred me back (to Duluth) to this, the Glass Block Store, where I am now employed. Therefore, it was in 1928 that I first met Mr. Adlard, who had recenty returned to the Unitarian Church here.

To me and others, Mr. Adlard was the most outstanding and progressive minister in Duluth. There was one other progressive minister here, a Rev. Dunnington of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, strange to say, it was located at the other end of the same block to Mr. Adlard's Church.

I cannot give you any information concerning Mr. Adlard's work in Duluth between his first occupancy here and 1928.

Through the winter months, Mr. Adlard always had "Book Reviews" at the Church and was frequently invited to give these reviews to other groups.

The public saw in Mr. Adlard a person of clear mind and insight, and the rare accomplishment of transferring his ideas and thought to his lesteners in a clear cut manner so that they knew what he was talking about. As you know, there are prominent speakers who are sadly lacking in the ability to make themselves clear to an audience. We have all of us been bored by such. Mr. Adlard never left his audience in that frame of mind. They knew what he said and what was in his mind.

Yours truly,

GEO. T. MILLER.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Friend,—I am a Christian Pacifist (C.O. doing Land Work) and a Socialist with a strong tendency towards Anarchism. Of the many publications which I have read, issued by Pacifist and Left Wing organisations, I think yours beats all others for actual news. Thanks also for your extreme tolerance for all approaches to Pacifism and Socialism.

Yours sincerely,

ALBAN LITTLE.

Broxbourne, Herts, July 14, 1941.

Dear Sir,—A correspondent, in this month's issue, airily makes the followin statement: "I also have no interest in theology."

In a very varied experience in England, Burma, and British Guiana (my birthplace) I have been forced to see that at the back of all human history stands Theology—man's notions about God. Even the atheist is concerned, as his very designation indicates. He has been led to face the issue and he proclaims—"There is no God."

Have not all man's troubles resulted from ignorance of God? "Forgive them: they know not what they do."

English-speaking people have, for centuries, based their laws on their notions of God. And, in this war, our "Fathers in God" (as they are called) have turned a complete revolution since the Lambeth Conference of 1930—which stated:

"The Christian must condemn war . . . but far more because it is contrary to the will of God."

They owe it to the world to explain and justify, on Christlike grounds, their volte face.

Very few people seem to realise the trick played upon them by the issue of the "Authorised Version" of the (so-called) Bible, in 1611

Not only is this version erroneous, as a result of the pardonable ignorance of those days: It is erroneous, also, as the result of deliberate falsification. Intensive study of this subject has revealed the amazing extent of this.

And I see little hope for the world until the false theology of the cliché "Almighty God" is utterly destroyed. By its very character, Love is unable to coerce: Therefore Love can not be almighty.

Incidentally, the New Testament (in spite of the 1611 English version) nowhere claims, nor says, that God is almighty.

Together with (para.) God all things are possible.

Yours faithfully,

(Rev.) W. GRAINGE WHITE.

Haughley, Suffolk, September 23, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—Enclosed a P.O. in response to The Word appeal.

As a C.O. of Dyce Camp (1916) I appreciate your good work on behalf of C.O.'s, Anti-Militarism and Peace, and cherish a copy of The Granite Echo and photo group of Dyce C.O.'s.

Yours fraternally,

WILFRID BRUTON.

Mitcham, Surrey, September 21, 1941.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I wish to acknowledge the receipt of Richard Carlile, Agitator, His Life and Times, 3rd Edition, 1941. It is placed with your books and booklets in the Labadie Collection Library, University of Mitchigan, and I thank you very much in the name of the Collection for it.

I suppose you knew of old Joe Labadie. He died in October, 1933. His collection is well known, now, by scholars of the labor movement. I have worked in it for many years.

I sometimes hear of your late wife's, Rose's, sisters, and of Rudolf Rocker, through Bertha F. Johnson. She lives on a farm in Pennsylvania.

My parents both came from Scotland, and I was there once—long years ago—passed through Glasgow and Edinburgh. My mother came from Straven, near Glasgow. I am 70 years of age. My mother was 43 years old when I was born, and she came over at the age of eleven, in 1839. That was the time of the introduction of the spinning jenny and the factory system one reads about in the histories of the Chartist movement and in the days of Robert Owen.

Sincerely,

AGNES INGLIS.

Ann Arbor, Michigan, U.S.A., August 6, 1941.

Dear Guy,—Since you published my letter in September Word, quite a few "Go to it" Communists feel peaved at me. Incidently, you will have noticed that "Our Wullie" apologised to Winnie, but not Winnie to Wullie! In other words Gallacher accepted the allies' comradely accusations!

I was pleased to read your reply to the editor of The Enquirer. Richard Lee is a stalwart, well remembered in Glasgow. Real men like him and John MacLean are too rare. D. Paterson on V for Victory, is pert and logically witty. C. H. Norman's survey is of outstanding value. All power to your press.

Yours in cold logic,

G. CALDWELL.

Glasgow, September 12, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—May I say how much I appreciate and await The Word each month eagerly. I do hope that you will be able to carry on your good work for Peace.

I am a conditionally registered C.O., and am doing forestry work. I refused to register for fire-watching under the local authority. As there is no conscience clause for exemption, I felt I could not register. There is one other here in the same position.

Most of the local pacifists did register, but say that they shall refuse fire watching at premises connected with the war effort. I think it would have been wiser and clearer to have refused to register.

May I add that I support the proposal that the Duke of Bedford represent the pacifist minority in the House of Lords. Although not in favour of the House of Lords, I do think it advisable to use any and every opportunity for expressing the pacifist views.

With Best Wishes, Yours fraternally,

S. STAY.

Salisbury, September 14, 1941.

[Comrade Stay was fined £5 for his refusal. Report in next issue.—Ed.]

Dear Comrade Guy,—I received Rebel and His Disciples and have disposed of them. Our party, the S.P.G.B., are holding good meetings in Hyde Park still. I saw Matt Kavanagh yesterday. The Anarchists were having a meeting.They have some new members, ex-P.P.U. members. F. A. Ridley writes in their paper, although he associates with the I.L.P. and the Secularists, as you know. The Anarchists have a hot time from the C.-Pers now, as you know, since the latter changed from war-resistance to war-support overnight. I hope you are keeping well in these days of stress.

Yours fraternally,

JACK LAW.

Kilburn, London, N.W., August 11, 1941.

Dear Guy,—The so-called Red Platform is out again after being in cold storage. It is all out for U.S.S.R. and Victory. What good acrobats the Trotskyists are! They rival the Stalinists in the rapidity of the turn overs, and seem even more jingoistic than the Stalinists. The Anarchist platform is the only anti-war platform in the park. Vicious, malignant opposition is offered by the C.P. The latter try to smash up our meetings but we are commanding enormous crowds. Quite a number of old comrades have started turning up at the meeting. The S.P.G.B. has a turn at attacking us, and seemed almost as annoyed as the C.P.

The C.P. must be spending enormous sums of money. They have expensive posters on all the Underground Stations. Pollitt and Bramley are speaking at the factories every day, urging militarism and patriotism.

You are being well attacked by some of your former friends over your friendship with the Duke of Bedford.

I met G. Cores, of the old Freedom Group, the other day. He thought all the Anarchist and Socialist Anti-Militarists ought to be jailed "because the Hun must be crushed." He asked: "Would The Word or The War Commentary be allowed to appear in Germany?" I told him that he was a real colleague of the late John Turner and that neither ought to have been associated with Anarchism. He was never very fond of me and my direct talking has not increased the affection. What a crowd the old Freedom Group was! Most of them are away. They are no loss to Anarchism, although I am not wishing those that remain personal ill. I write only of their pretence of Anarchism. Their dying off is a political gain and not a loss.

Yours as ever,

MATT. KAVANAGH.

London, N., September 6, 1941.

Sir,—All conchies who left prison to take alternative work, offered by the Government, were not defaulters or those who could not stay the course. I know one man who liked prison in preference to the alternative service he had accepted, yet he remained in alternative service. Prison has a terrible demoralizing effect on some and not on others.

Absolutists of those days would have had a puzzle if they were confronted with doing work or otherwise or Fire Watching as required to-day.

Voltaire said something about dying for your right to say it, but I can tell you of a secret—he was overheard to mutter—"Yes say it—but I'll sock you one on the jaw if you do it!"

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES E. BERRY.

Paignton, Devon, August 8, 1941.

Dear Sir,—

RE. THE RIGHT HONORABLE HERBERT MORRISON.

You will remember as vividly as I do in the last war every species of scurrility and vituperation was poured out upon the C.O.'s. And chief among the popular phraseology of abuse were the terms coward, shirker, and scrounger. It was only mildly allowed here and there that there could be anybody genuinely opposed to the organised wholesale slaughter of one's fellow creatures for any purpose, and least of all for imperialist aims and ambitions. But whilst we were indignant at this kind of attack, some of us were old enough and sufficiently experienced in human nature and affairs to realise that some of the shots must have found a mark. Every movement will have its imposters and shady characters. And what light do some of the events of to-day throw upon the past? Where are we to place the Morrisons, the Dollans, the Woodburns, and the rest? Are these people just plain imposters or do they belong to the very large crowd without any proper understanding of affairs? Certainly some of their writings and speeches of the past would at least suggest some small understanding. These particular gentry will know best themselves where they really stand—now or twenty-five years ago. But whether imposters or dunces is not either a good and sufficient reason for their expulsion from any kind of public office? If the former then public decency demands it and if the latter their place should be study, not the forum.

And what of the discredit such a choice collection of turncoats throw upon the C.O. to-day.

Yours sincerely,

V. WILSON.

Wittington, September 12, 1941.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Please send me The Word for a year. You are doing great work! Thanks for the copies of Duke of Bedford's latest, which I read with great interest.

Best Wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Sir,—I am sending a Postal Order for 3/- as a donation towards the expenses of producing The Word. It is a small contribution but I hope it will help to ensure the continuance of a paper whose aim is to print the Truth.

Welwyn, Garden City, September 19, 1941.

Dear Sir,—"Though they may forget the singer, they will not forget the song."

I quote this to show that the singer is not always forgotten; for, in my case, I well remembered hearing you in Hyde Park many years ago; and, although you did not burst into song, you certainly exhausted yourself in two of the best orations I have ever listened to—and I have heard some. To listen to you was like music in my ears. I speak of the time when Robert Forder and Wheeler and Pack, and G. W. Foote carried the flag in front rank and bore the whips of scorn of time" which, I hope, have not lacerated your constitution too much.

Seeing your name mentioned in my recently arrived Literary Guide, in connection with a revised edition of Richard Carlile, I thought I would write you and obtain a copy..

I have read The Freethinker off and on since I was 15 years old and now I am in my 73rd year. Of course, having been under the lash of labour's indignity for all that time (up to 65) fortune has provided me with an old age pension of 10/- a week.

Yours sincerely,

FACT VERSUS PROPAGANDA

By C. H. NORMAN

[The following interesting and factual study appeared in the " Railway Review " for July 11, 1941. —Ed.]

At the outset of the German invasion of Crete, Mr. Winston Churchill took upon himself the responsibility of stating in the House of Commons that the German paratroops had landed in the uniform of New Zealand troops.

The statement was later repeated as without doubt by other Ministers. Then, in the debate on the causes of the retreat from Crete, the Prime Minister admitted that there was no foundation for the report that the German troops in Crete had dressed themselves in New Zealand uniforms.

A general of the Northern Command not long ago said that there was no proof of any case in which the Germans had used this means of disguise since the war begn.

According to the English Manual of Military Law, this is a legitimate stratagem, but generally used when endeavouring to cross the opposing lines: so that all the Press hullaballoo on that particular point seems without foundation.

Going back to the beginning of the war, there was the "Germany starving" stunt, which was very noticeable in the Press in September and October of 1939. It was invoked as a supposed justification for setting going that boomerang weapon, the unlimited blockade. How absurd that piece of war propaganda was can be judged on a moment's reflection. 1939 was a year of specially good harvests in Central Europe. Germany has always produced 80 per cent. of her food supply. In September-October, 1939, when these stories were circulated, the harvests had only just been garnered. How, then, could the German food supplies have been so soon exhausted that the people were already suffering from privation or shortage? Had that story been put about in May, 1940, when the harvest store could be approaching exhaustion and the new crops not available, there might have been some sense in the propaganda; but, curiously enough, May, 1940, passed without any such suggestion being made by the Ministry of Information.

Then there is the case of Herr Hess and the outbreak of the Russo-German War. The English people have not been told much concerning the visit of Herr Hess; but what they were told was that Herr Hess had been strongly opposed to Russo-German collaboration and had fled to Britain because he was gainst a Russo-German military pact. That particular explanation seems a little wide of the mark in the circumstances of to-day.

Then all "our diplomatic correspondents," the gentlemen under the table and with their ears to the keyhole, told the listening world that the conversations between M. Molotoff and Herr Hitler in August, 1940, concerned increased supplies of oil and grain from Russia to Germany. It turns out that the interview consisted of quite definite inquiries on questions of the international policy of the two States as regards each other and their smaller neighbours.

This account of the interview is confirmed by the events which have taken place since on the international field.

" BATTLE OF THE ATLANTIC."

The situation in the so-called "Battle of the Atalntic" is further proof of the recklessness of some of Mr. Churchill's early propaganda. In his broadcast in October, 1939, denouncing any mediation at the instance of the King of the Belgians and the Queen of Holland, Mr. Churchill told the world that the U-boat campaign was well under control; yet in May, 1941, the losses of tonnage were very great and the total loss since September, 1939, on the British and Allied side has amounted to nearly 6,000,000 tons, which is hardly a justification of Mr. Churchill's rosy optimism of 1939.

Then there was the campaign run against the alleged treachery of the King of the Belgians. Sir Roger Keyes was recently able to expose the complete falsity of those charges; but the newspaper which was condemned stated it had received its information from the very highest sources in Britain. That malevolent campaign was no doubt induced by the desire to place the blame for the calamity on anybody's shoulders other than those really responsible, who were certainly not Belgian generals or politicians. The British propaganda machine at that time was worked at full speed against the King of the Belgians, as anyone who cares to look up the papers of those days can judge—not excepting the "Railway Review!" Anyhow, the lie had been kept going from April, 1940, till June, 1941, without authoritative contradiction by English responsible authorities or by the Press.

The only really efficient propaganda carried out by the Government machine and by the British Press during this war has been to keep hidden from general circulation what people are saying and thinking about the various wars and their conduct by the Government. At the moment, the clever statesmen of Britain and Europe have created this tragic and ludicrous situation. Britain and France, fervent allies of 1939, are now fighting in Syria.

Finland, the protege of both France and Britain in 1939-40 in the Russo-Finnish War, is being used as a base by Germany with no protest from Finland, and Great Britain has seized Finnish ships in consequence.

Poland, the ally of Britain and the primal cause of the whole trouble, is at war with Russia and to-day Russia is co-operating with Britain. Finally, Russia and Germany, the confederates of 1939, are now at war. What the state of parties will be at the present rate of progress in, say, 1943 all the astrologers and prophets might well hesitate to forecast. But there is certainly some ground for saying that Carlyle's bitter reference to the English as a nation of 27,000,000 " mostly fools " could be extended to the population of 400,000,000 Europeans and English engaged in the present fratricidal and incomprehensible war, and even the Marxian theory will not explain the present alignment of combatants.

Next we are told that the cause of the Russo-German War is the great need of Germany for oil and other necessities in the shape of certain metals. As Germany is likely to expend much more oil and metals in a campaign against Russia than a successful campaign could produce for a long period, that particular explanation of the Russo-German War is ridiculous on the face of it. If Germany had used all the material required for a Russian campaign in an attack on England, her alleged purpose in this war would have been more easily accomplished than by adopting the method of undertaking a vast campaign against Russia as a preliminary to a final attack on England.

NO ATTACKS ON CAMPS!

Another curious feature of this war, very beneficial to the men concerned, is the apparent reluctance shown by the respective high commands of the various air forces to bomb the military camps of their opponents. Hardly any report of the high commands even suggest that the air forces had been instructed to search out and bomb the military camps of their opponents.

A word also must be said about the series of operations in the air which took place over Britain from 6th September, 1940, till about mid-December, 1940, which have been dramatised by Mr. Churchill and his colleagues under the title of " The Battle for Britain." One has been asked to believe that that continuous air attack was intended as a kind of invasion by air which had failed. But another explanation of those operations is that the German Air Force was then being employed to engage the British Air Force continuously while certain important factories in Germany and France were bodily removed out of the range of British air attacks. This interpretation is supported by two facts:—

(1) That no attack of the kind was made immediately after Dunkirk, when admittedly the resources of defence in Britain were not well advanced.

(2) That the German production of war material during the winter months was hardly affected by British air operations, judging by the great superiority of material possessed by the Germans in the various campaigns in 1941, and by the fact that the Germans are so well equipped that they have been able to launch an attack on Russia while Britain is still active and American hostility to Germany is increasing in the form of despatching supplies to the Near East in protection of the American oil interests there.

Had the German Commander been contemplating invasion it is difficult to understand why the German victories in France and the Netherlands in May-June, 1940, were not followed up by an attack on either Britain or Ireland. One aspect of German methods would bring forth a strong doubt about there being any real intention of direct invasion. All the countries occupied or invaded by Germany have been not only self-supporting but have been exporting food countries. Why should the Germans take the risk of invading a country which is dependent for 40 per cent ?

F. W. JOWETT

II.—THE WAR YEARS.

During the war years, Jowett made a splendid stand for Anti-Militarism and Free Speech. After the Conscription Acts were passed Jowett took up the struggle for conscience. His forthrightness in the House of Commons during the years 1916-1918 was evidenced by his severe questoning of the Government. We divide this study into three years.

1916 QUESTIONS

On Wednesday, August 16, Jowett directed the attention of the President of the Local Government Board to the case of two Norwich C.O.'s, Archie Victor Hobart and Cecil Arthur Hobart, who were arrested on June 9.

On Tuesday, November 28, Jowett asked the Home Secretary if he was aware that on the 2nd March, 1915, the Attorney-General, speaking on behalf of the Government in a Debate on the Defence of the Realm Amendment Bill, gave the Committee of the House a definite assurance that the Government would not prosecute persons for statements of opinion, however foolish, but only for prejudicial and injurious mis-statements of fact; that, on the 7th November, 1916, the Public Prosecutor obtained the conviction of Mr.. Arnold Lupton under the Defence of the Realm Act for publishing and circulating a pamphlet headed 'What are we fighting for?' notwithstanding that no mis-statement of fact was charged or alleged; that the prosecuting counsel's speech was merely critical of phraseology; and that no evidence was called to show that the pamphlet in any way contravened the Defence of the Realm Act or the Regulations; will he say if the defendant has given notice of appeal; and, if so, whether, having regard to the assurance given for and on behalf of the Government, the Government will withdraw from the prosecution and ask the Appeal Court to allow the appeal?

Mr. Samuel's reply was unsatisfactory and need not be noted.

On the same day, Jowett asked the Prime Minister if he was aware that Mr. C. H. Norman had been in litigation since October, with Sir Charles Matthews and Sir William Nott Bower in connection with certain seizures of documents, the property of Mr. Norman, under the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Regulations; whether he was aware that the Committee on Employment of Conscientious Objectors had refused any opportunity to Mr. Norman to take further steps in this litigation, which Mr. Norman has had to conduct himself since his solicitor was arrested at the instance of the public authorties, who were defendants in this and other suits in which Mr. Norman was plaintiff; and whether he would take steps to put an end to these tactics by pubilc authorities, who were utilising their powers for the purpose of preventing Mr. Norman exercising his rights as a citizen to obtain the audience, to which he is entitled, of the Courts of Justice?

Samuel replied on behalf of the Prime Minister and made the usual evasive reply.

The following day, Jowett asked the Home Secretary to state, in general terms, the powers, functions, and financial commitments of the Committee on Employment of conscientious objectors. Samuel replied in elaborate detail.

On Tuesday, December 19, Jowett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mrs. Annie Carr, of 34 Lawson Place, Dundee, the wife of a conscientious objector now employed at Wakefield on work of national importance, is now receiving 11s. per week for herself and two children, aged, respectively: four and six; whether he is aware that, while she herself is earning 10s. per week, she has to pay 5s per week to have these children looked after, and has other heavy expenses for insurance premium, and rent and rates; and whether, in view of the distinct hardship thus created, he is prepared to make an additional allowance?

Sir G. CAVE: Mrs. Carr was originally granted separation allowance at the rate of 11s. a week. At that time she refused full information as to her circumstances. This was afterwards furnished, and she has been awarded an allowance of 17s. a week as from the 13th instant.

Our selections are made casually rather than deliberately, and only indicate Jowett's searching questioning. Most of the replies were formal and evasive and are unworthy of record. The interested readers can consult Hansard. Where two questions are recorded under the one date, they were put on that date.

1917 QUESTIONS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

Mr. JOWETT asked the Home Secretary whether he can inform the House of the state of health of G. C. Williams, a conscientious objector, whose last known whereabouts was Wormwood Scrubbs Prison; whether this man has been forcibly fed; whether he has been fed on bread and water for 25 days between the 25th November and the 23rd December; and if so, whether he will undertake that this sort of treatment of conscientious objectors in the secrecy of civil prisons will be put an end to?

Sir G. CAVE: The prisoner referred to has refused to undertake under civil control work which is unconnected with the war, and is accordingly serving his sentence of imprisonment. He does not suffer from any illness, but at one time he refused all food and had to be forcibly fed four times, after which he consented to take his food in the natural way. He has refused to work in prison, and has been punished by the Visiting Committee in the same way as other prisoners who refuse to work. There is no more secrecy in his case than in the case of any other prisoner.

Mr. JOWETT asked the Home Secretary under what powers two conscientious objectors, named Clay and Leathley, who have been found genuine by the Central Tribunal and have been engaged on work of alleged national importance at the Warwick Settlement, were arrested at Warwick on Friday, 9th February: whether the only offence alleged against these men is that of travelling on a railway; whether, on 10th February these two men were taken before a number of magistrates sitting in camera in the Chief Constable's office at Warwick, though the military and police authorities had been fully informed of the intention of the friends of these men to retain counsel and solicitors to defend them; and whether he will state the names of the magistrates who acted in this manner, and the statute, Order in Council, or Regulation under which a conscientious objector of civilian status may become liable to arrest for travelling on the railway, and the date when such statute, Order in Council, or Regulation, if in existence, was first promulgated?

Mr. JOWETT asked the Under-Secretary of State for War if he is aware that the regulations relating to detention barracks have been withdrawn from sale to the public; whether he will state the reason of this prohibition; and whether he will undertake that persons in litigation with the authorities for alleged ill-treatment at detention barracks shall be supplied with copies of these regulations for the purposes of preparing their cases for trial?

The same day, Jowett addressed a very exhaustive question to the Prime Minister, requesting full details as to the numbers and situation of conscientious objectors. Sir John Cave replied as follows :—

The total number of men who have been sentenced to imprisonment by courts-martial, transferred to civil prisons, and reported to the Central Tribunal as alleging that their offences were prompted by a conscientious objection to military service is, I am informed, 3,025. The Central Tribunal has reported 2,369 of these cases to the Committee on Employment of Conscientious Objectors, and of these 2,297 have been or will immediately be offered release from prison and from military service on condition that they perform work of national importance under the Committee. Of these, 265 have refused to accept release on these conditions, 1,731 have been released, and 284 are awaiting release. Of the 1,731 who have been released from prison to work 101 have subsequently refused to work or have broken the conditions on which they were released, and have accordingly been sent back to prison or to the Army. There are 339 men now in prison whose cases have not yet been considered by the Central Tribunal.

MALCOLM MACCOLL.

The Rev. Malcolm MacColl was formerly a well-known figure in the Socialist Movement in Glasgow. He was an active Socialist Anti-Militarist and no one could have anticipated his entry into the Ministry. Today he writes from The Rectory, Ballachulish, Argyll. In February of this year he wrote in the Scots Independent, Glasgow, to protest against that journal's description of Emanuel Shinwell as a "Polish Jew." MacColl describes the phrase as being "offensive, unethical, and inappropriate" and complains of the Westminister Coalition not making use of Shinwell's truly first-rate services. With the first part of the complaint we agree. As to the second, being still an Anti-Militarist, we can say nothing.

MacColl proceeds to describe Shinwell's early early years in Glasgow and later association with the Lobour movement. The recollection is interesting and nothing to note, however much we may differ from Shinwell's development's since the war of 1914-1918.

MacColl writes :—

"I first set eyes on Shinwell when we were both boys in our early teens. It was in Glasgow Green where he was surrounded by such venerable men as Godfrey, Jamieson, and Matthew Glass, and it seemed to me he was taking those pundits out of their depths by quoting Spinoza. The comparison of Christ among the Doctors occurred to me then. I got to know him in the Labour movement later on. We were nearly always opposed in our views, as in the Seamen's Union dispute, the formation of the Advisory Council of the Labour Party, and on the general line of difference between the S.D.F. and the I.L.P. He beat me for the chairmanship of the Glasgow Trades Council, in the Executive Committee of which I learned to admire his practical grasp of the essentials of every question that came before us and to appreciate the fairness of his mind.

"He never seemed to me to be other than the pure root of a Glasgow Keelie. . . . I never thought of him as a Jew, still less did he suggest Poland. Like St. Paul, he was proud to be a citizen of no mean city, which has no reason to be ashamed of him."

This letter proves that MacColl is not afraid to recall his activities in the Labour Movement. He will have no objection, therefore, to the publication of the following letter of friendly criticism recently received from him :

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I was very greatly interested in the autobiographical pamphlets which show the road you travelled. Your John MacLean is splendid and it seems as if it must be the substitute for the MacLean biography promised by Maxton. Your study is in a certain sense dispassionate, you have no need to represent him as a member of the I.L.P. or of the C.P.B.G., malgre lui, as would be the case if Maxton or Gallagher were to write. Stalinism, like Romanism, seems to call for a reconstruction of the facts of history to suit the propaganda of the moment. I recall that MacLean looked upon Gallagher as a sentimental anarchist and not as a politically reliable scientific Social Democrat. Willie always showed a bias towards the anti-parliamentary position.

I shall be glad to have The Word—just like you to choose an almost blasphemous title! I need not underscore my disagreement with you, but I do wish your analytical and critical faculties were more directly effective in the service of the Labour movement today, that your gadfly stings could make the animal restive. We need the Daniels of the old evangelistic hymn: "Dare to be a Daniel, Dare to stand alone, Dare to have opinions firm, and dare to make them known." If to be a Daniel has been your destiny you are able to say with St. Paul, "I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith."

Yours ever,

MALCOLM MacCOLL.

As we go to press, we have received a further and most interesting letter from Malcolm Macoll. He traces the evolution of his thought and explains that he was one of the first members of the No Conscription Fellowship in Scotland. Although opposed to the Great War of 1914-1918, he feels that he must support the Labour Party and the T.U.C. in this war. He is opposed to the guilty men of the Tory Party who betrayed Spain and the suppression of opinion. We hope to publish this long and interesting letter in our next issue.

The Journal of The MacColl Society for May, 1941, publishes a portrait and a very full account of the career of the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, in which a full account is given of his Socialist and also Irish Labour activities.

18B: CITIZEN AND EXECUTIVE

Our contemporary, The Patriot, was founded in 1922, as a journal of Anti-Socialism, by the 8th Duke of Northumberland. We never expected to quote from its columns with approval. From its issue for November 6 last, we reproduce the following comment on "The Liberty of the Subject." Except that we prefer and insist on the term of "citizen" as opposed to "subject," we quote the passage with complete endorsemnt:

Judgment was given by the House of Lords on 3rd November in two cases involving the liberty of the subject. The appeal of Mr. Benjamin Greene, which was an application for a writ of 'habeas corpus,' was dismissed unanimously. The case of Mr. Robert William Liversidge likewise failed, on a majority decision of four Lords to one, the dissenting opinion being that of Lord Atkin. It is now made clear that in this matter of operating the Defence Regulations the decision of the Home Secretary is not subject to judicial review, and until Parliament, which, in the opinion of many, very unwisely granted these powers to the Executive, decrees otherwise, the British people will have to submit to the present limitation of their liberties. By the amendment by Order in Council dated 23rd November, 1939, whereby the wording that the Secretary of State can act "if satisfied that it is necessary so to do" was altered to "has reasonable cause to believe," Parliament thought that it had introduced a safeguard, but it is difficult to see that this is now so. It is interesting to note that, in disagreeing with the other four Lords in the one case, Lord Atkin was very emphatic on the point that words were being given a wrong meaning, a very common failing in these days, and, quoting from "The Times" of 4th November:—

"He protested, even if he did it alone, against a strained construction put on words with the effect of giving an uncontrolled power of imprisonment to the Minister. The words had only one meaning: they were used with that meaning in statements of the common law and in statutes. They had never been used in the sense now imputed to them; they were used in the Defence Regulations in the natural meaning."

Whether, in view of these remarks, the House of Commons will be content to leave things as they are remains to be seen, but that there is a growing belief in the country that these Defence Regulations, rushed through in an emergency, were approved without a full understanding of their implications, is not in doubt.

In The Freethinker, for November 16, Chapman Cohen commented vigorously on the judgment, as follows:—

Lord Atkin said he viewed "with apprehension" the present attitude of the Executive towards such cases. Generally speaking, 40 years ago, a British subject had the unquestionable right of appeal to the Courts against the rulings of any executive person or body. To-day that is very nearly non-existent. The subject is the legal slave of the Executive. If he is treated favourably, so much the better for him. If he is treated harshly or contemptuously, so much the worse. But it is the Minister of this or of that who decides, and against his ruling there appears to be no greater opposition than an Italian to a decree of the Fascist Council.

The following from Lord Atkin's protest should be studied by all who are not to be satisfied with mere talk about British liberties:—

"It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty, for which on recent authority we are now fighting, that Judges are no respecters of persons, and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachment on his liberty by the Executive.

"In this case I have listened to arguments which might have been addressed acceptably to the Court of King's Bench in the time of Charles I. I protest, even if I do it alone, against a strained construction put upon words with the effect of giving an uncontrolled power of imprisonment to the Minister.

"I know of only one authority which might easily justify the suggested method of construction. 'When I use a word,' Humpty-Dumpty said in a rather

THE PURSUIT OF PACIFISM

Even in the days of Castlereagh and Sidmouth the press did not dare to carry headlines like those included in the above composite picture. We have another picture ready to publish next month. Fellow-countrymen of Thomas Paine and Richard Carlile cannot afford to tolerate such continued invasion of the rights of citizens. This journal supports Lord Atkin in his considered judgment and the sixty odd M.P.'s who have revolted against 18B Regulations. The powers of the Home Secretary are absolute and he has rejected the findings of his own Advisory Committee in 128 cases. Dukes should be prosecuted like dustmen, if necessary; but neither duke nor dustman ought to be denounced in irresponsible headlines like those produced above from the millionaire press.

scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean.' The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean different things. The question is, which is to be master—that's all.'"

That is all. It was the question that Hitler put to the Germans, and which he decided by appointing his own judges and deciding the question beforehand. The late Lord Chief Justice published a book denouncing the destruction here, step by step, of the freedom about which we boast so much. The right of the subject to appeal to the Courts against even the most powerful Minister of State was never questioned until recent years. To-day it is being openly spurned. We are pleased to find one of our Law Lords reminding the world of what liberty means—or did mean.

Very many times in recent years we have called attention to the way in which the constitutional rights of the English people were being frittered away by successive governments. We now, not for the first time, mention but one phase of this destruction of individual freedom. For years Parliament, with the general public showing its customary sheep-like docility, has been frittering away civil liberty from the subject by a transference of almost despotic power to the Minister of this and that Department. We need not be conquered by Hitler to become a nation of robots—Parliament, unless watched, will see to that by its development of Ministerial autocracy before the war, its elaboration during the war, and—unless the English people act in an un-English manner — its continuation and establishment afterwards.

Lord Atkin is one of the most distinguished jurists of our time. He has been Lord of Appeal in Ordinary since 1928. Born in 1867, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, Lord Atkin became a Barrister in 1891, a Bencher and a K.C. in 1906. He was a Judge of the High Court, 1916-1919, and Lord Justice of Appeal, 1919-28. During the conclusion of the last war he was Judge of the Munitions Tribunals Appeals Court, 1918-19. Since the close of the last war Lord Atkin has occupied the following positions: President of Naturalisation of Aliens (Revocation) Committee, 1918-19; Chairman of War Cabinet Committee on Women in Industry, 1918-19; Chairman of Termination of the War Committee, 1918; Member of Committee on British and Foreign Legal Procedure, 1918-1919; Lord Justice of Appeal, 1919-28; Chairman of Irish Deportees Compensation Tribunal, 1924; Chairman of Committee on Crime and Insanity, 1924; President of Medico-Legal Society, 1923-27; Chairman of Council of Legal Education, 1919-34, etc.

We do not think that the citizens of Britain ought to set aside lightly the reasoned judgment of this jurist. Nor should the democracy put the aggressive utterances of the Prime Minister or the Home Secretary above the argued legal statement enunciated by Lord Atkin. In The Word for June, 1940, we reproduced the House of Commons discussion and Government's undertakings as to the nature and extent of its war defences. To every intelligent and reflective reader it must be clear that the present attitude of the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary violates the pledges then given and constitutes an unpardonable breach of faith.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT VISITS TO IRELAND

HERBERT MORRISON ATTACKS THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

[. . . In the House of Commons on Tuesday, October 21, 1921, Sir Irving Albery raised the question of M.P.'s visits to Ireland. We have the OFFICIAL PARLIAMENTARY REPORT (Vol. 374, No. 110. Tuesday, October 21, 1941, vols. 1703-1754) before us. We regret that space does not permit the publication of full report and we ask our readers to obtain the full report from H.M. Stationery Office, post-free, for 7d. Meantime readers are asked to content themselves with this summary, which omits the trimmings. Unfortunately some of the trimmings are as tell-tale as the essence of the speeches, and make more delightful reading.

John McGovern's speech should be read in full. Summary does not do it justice and the more curious and entertaining passages are omitted from this record as being irrelevant. McGovern said that, at no time had he done anything to sabotage the efforts of the country or aid the enemy in any way. Some people think that the very fact of being an anti-militarist in war-time is sabotage. If McGovern meant to say that he had no sympathy with Nazism, the point could have been made better. Socialism has nothing in common with Fascism. It has nothing in common with Imperialism either. Eugene Debs on his famous trial in Cleveland, Ohio, in September, 1918, defined the Socialist attitude towards war in war-time in one of the most wonderful orations delivered from the dock. The function of the Socialist is to be opposed to ALL Imperialism and ALL Imperialisms equally.

McGovern reminded Morrison of the violence of his (Morrison's) Anti-Militarist declarations during the Great War. This point was sound. But when he related his conversation with Healy and proceeded to describe the Duke of Bedford's visit to Dublin in 1940, he was pitifully weak. McGovern said: "I DID NOT MEET THE GERMAN AMBASSADOR BECAUSE I HAVE NOTHING IN COMMON WITH SUCH PEOPLE." This is pandering to reaction, stupidity, and fear. Of course, McGovern ought not to have anything in common "with such people." BUT HE DID VISIT BOTH GERMANY AND ITALY. George Lansbury met both Mussolini and Hitler. Did Lansbury have anything in common with these people? And Labour Prime Minister, Ramsay MacDonald was photographed shaking hands with Mussolini.

The great facts overlooked in this discussion are: (1) A member of the House of Lords does not enjoy the same alleged representative position as a M.P.; (2) The Duke of Bedford has not asked to go to Ireland and his no wish to go there. The whole business is a question of an analogy, quite interesting and even sound up to a point, being pursued to an absurdity, to justify irresponsible powers being enjoyed by a single Minister of State.—Ed.]

Sir Irving Albery (C.—Gravesend), raising the question of the refusal of the Home Office to allow Mr. McGovern (I.L.P.—Shettleston) to visit Northern Ireland on what he considered to be one of his Parliamentary duties, said that it raised two issues. One was the right of the Home Office to prevent members going anywhere they wished in the United Kingdom, and the other was the refusal to allow a member to inquire into a detention under Regulation 18B.

The issues were raised by the stand taken by Mr. Peake, the Under Secretary for Home Affairs, on Tuesday, October 14. Sir Irving disputed the right of the Home Secretary to apply either veto. He also could not bring himself to believe that the Under Secretary in taking this position was accurately interpreting Mr. Morrison's mind.

Sir Hugh O'Neill (C.—Antrim) pointed out that the regulations governing the issue of exit permits to Ireland provided that a permit could always be granted in the case of a journey being undertaken on any point of national importance. He would have thought it was a question of national importance for an M.P. to exercise his rights and privileges by travelling to Northern Ireland to investigate the case of a person detained under Regulation 18B.

The only consideration which ought to weigh with the Home Secretary would be if he thought that the M.P. concerned was himself likely to do something prejudicial to the national security. If it were so, probably the M.P. should be arrested. At any rate the permit could then be properly refused.

Mr. Maunder (L.—Wolverhampton E.) maintained that unless there were overwhelming grounds of national security involved a member of Parliament should be allowed to travel to any part of the United Kingdom and to any British Dominion.

Squadron-Leader P. W. Donner (C.—Basingstoke) said that the principle at issue affected every member of both Houses of Parliament. He believed that one had to draw a distinction between M.P.'s and the general public, because M.P.'s had certain constitutional functions to fulfil, whereas the ordinary citizen has no such similar function. There were two schools of thought. One said that, in order to win the war, we must surrender a great number of liberties and much of our freedom. The other believed in making as few infringements on liberty as possible. He sympathised with the second view. "Dora" remained for 20 years after the last war and never disappeared.

Mr. J. J. Davidson (Lab.—Maryhill) asked why Squadron-Leader Donner had supported Franco, who suppressed Parliamentary representation.

Donner said he believed in parliamentary democracy in Britain, but held that it was corrupt and incompetent in a Latin country. He asked the Home Secretary to rescind his decision.

Mr. Herbert Morrison (Home Secretary, S. Hackney, Lab.) said that he had administered the 18B regulations fairly. He had released well over half the members of the British Union who had been interned.

It was a far more serious thing in one way to allow a man to go to Dublin than it was to allow him to go to Australia or Canada or even America. It must be remembered that in Southern Ireland there were friends of ours, but let us not hedge the fact there were enemies of this country as well, and moreover in Dublin, unlike the capital of Australia, of Canada, or of South Africa, there was a German Legation, and the fact of that German Legation being in Dublin was a material consideration which the House really must take into account.

Mr. McGovern's applications, one of which was written and one made by telephone, requested permission for a visit to Ireland generally, both Northern Ireland and Eire.

If the Home Office received an application from an M.P. it was always given careful and special consideration, and if there was any reasonable ground of public interest it would be their wish to say "Yes." They would much sooner say "Yes" than "No." That was the spirit in which they had sought to administer the regulations.

He was only asking that a member in making application should give reasonable grounds as to why, in the pursuance of his Parliamentary duties, it was to the national interests that he should go.

Mr. Morrison continued that the House of Lords had as much right to their privileges and liberties as the House of Commons.

Mr. Morrison added:—

"There is one noble lord whom I have not detained. I am not saying anything about him except that I am interested in his activities, and so long as I am Home Secretary and so long as his opinion and activities are what they are he will not go to Dublin. That is the Duke of Bedford."

If there was to be no restriction it would mean that the Duke of Bedford or any member of the House of Commons, whatever his opinion about the war effort might be, would automatically have the right to go to Ireland, and that would be dangerous. As Home Secretary he could not be party to giving the automatic right to any member of the Legislature to go to any part of Ireland.

Mr. Stokes (Lab.—Ipswich) asked whether it was in order for a Minister to impute wrong-doing to a member of the House of Lords when no charge of any kind had been preferred against him.

The Speaker: It would be better not to refer to a member of the House of Lords.

Mr. Morrison said he was obliged to Mr. Stokes for warning him off ground which it was better for him not to tread.

Continuing, Mr. Morrison said Mr. McGovern's first application was to go to Ireland as chairman of the I.L.P. for special observation and survey and in order to ascertain from various people in Ireland what they thought was the best means of defeating Nazism and Fascism.

Having regard to the nature and the policy of the I.L.P. he was not at all sure that it would be right for him as Home Secretary to give Mr. McGovern specific permission because it would mean that he was, so to speak, giving him some kind of recognition.

Within a few days Mr. McGovern went to him and raised a different reason for going—a reason unrelated to his first. He said he had seen Mr. Cahir Healy in Brixton Prison and that he wanted to go to Ireland to investigate Mr. Healy's case and to get further information so that Mr. Healy could lay it before the Home Secretary. He could not convince himself that a visit to Ireland by Mr. McGovern would affect one way or another Mr. Healy's case.

Mr. McGovern (I.L.P.—Shettleston) said he did not agree with Mr. Morrison's interpretation of the rights of members. He said he received a letter from Mr. Healy and saw him at Brixton Prison. There was no difficulty in seeing him and the officials were very courteous. Regarding his arrest, Mr. Healy told him that an interpretation put by the Home Office on one of his letters differed from that which he himself held.

Mr. McGovern said he told Mr. Healy that he might be able to assist if a wrong interpretation was being put upon his proposed acts. Mr. Healy expressed willingness that he should go and see the people in Ireland, find out from them what they were prepared to say on their honour, and place the information before the Home Office.

He told Mr. Healy that if he found out that he (Mr. Healy) or any of his associates proposed to do anything that was detrimental to the State he would wash his hands entirely of it, because he was opposed to war.

Earl Winterton (Horsham and Worthing, U.) said that he supported the Home Secretary in his contention that the restrictions must apply in some cases to members of Parliament. But he felt strongly that this case smelt of political discrimination. Other members had been allowed to go to Ireland. Why then drag in now the question of the neutrality of Southern Ireland?

Mr. Morrison said that he hoped he was not guilty of political discrimination. He was certainly not conscious of it.

Earl Winterton said that if the Home Secretary was going to say that Mr. McGovern should not be allowed to go to Ireland because he was a dangerous person, they were getting near to political discrimination. There might be a general rule that no member should go to Ireland, but the Home Secretary had propounded a new doctrine.

Mr. Churchill, Prime Minister (Epping, U.), said that a statutory duty was imposed on Mr. Morrison personally as Secretary of State, and he could not avoid it. It was a little unjust to put him in the dock for carrying out a duty which Parliament had imposed upon him.

Earl Winterton said that if it was argued that the regulations placed on the Home Secretary a duty to decide whether or not it was in the national interest that a particular member should go to a particular part of the country, the sooner the regulations were altered the better.

Sir A. Southby (Epsom, U.) said that any member could be locked up under 18B without the House being told why. The Home Secretary arrogated to himself the right to decide whether or not Mr. McGovern should go to Ireland.

Mr. Churchill.—The Home Secretary does not arrogate that right to himself. This duty has been placed upon him by the House. That may be right or wrong. If wrong, the House can change it. The House is all-powerful. But to say that the Home Secretary arrogates this right to himself is most unfair.

Sir A. Southay said that in the House and the country there was a feeling that Regulation 18B was passed in haste and should be, to some extent, amended.

Mr. J. Griffiths said that on the whole the Home Secretary had operated 18B to general satisfaction.

Mr. Maxton (Glasgow, Bridgeton, I.L.P.) said that the Home Secretary's statement was not satisfactory. He hoped the right hon. gentleman would get into contact with representative members of the House and put the matter on a basis satisfactory from the point of view of the national welfare and in keeping with the democratic right of members.

Mr. Churchill said that there was no part of the powers conferred on the Government in this time of trial that he viewed with greater repugnance than those of exceptional process against the liberty of the subject without the ordinary safeguards which were inherent in British life. Habeas Corpus, the Petition of Rights and trial by jury, were part of what we were fighting to preserve. They were determined that they should not be inroaded upon by anything except the need of self-preservation which arose in time of war.

He recognised that this legislation and the regulations were passed at a moment of great danger. It was possible that if in this lull—it was only a lull—the matter were considered the House would be in a different temper. He would feel very proud, very happy, if he could come to the House even while the war was going on and say that our position was so good and solid, the path before us so firm and clear, that the Government could, even in time of war, of their own free will give back to Parliament those special powers they had entrusted to them. Unhappily that was not the case at present.

In the meanwhile he could not conceive how Parliament could better get control of the exercise of those abnormal powers than by insisting upon their being exercised on the discretion of a Minister present in the House and accountable to them. The Minister had been made accountable to the House. He had explained in the greatest detail his use of the powers in a particular case. It must be a discretionary power. The manner in which his right hon. friend had explained the position had given the House a feeling, first of all, of the submissiveness of the executives to the Parliamentary institution, and, secondly, of the ease with which those powers were exercised.

He particularly resented the suggestion that they were adopting the methods of Fascist States. They were not. They were the servants of the House.

Mr. Bevan (Lab.—Ebbw Vale) said the whole issue was, did the Home Secretary exercise his powers in a judicial and reasonable manner? "I am not satisfied that the administration of the Home Secretary is impartial," he said.

Mr. Logan (Lab.—Scotland, Liverpool) suggested that the Home Secretary and Mr. McGovern might have a chat together over the situation.

The House rose.

BRITAIN'S CONCHIES

Many citizens will be shocked to learn that in spite of all assurances and protestations against the penalisation of conscientious objectors, there is now over 500 young men in prison for war resistance. Of these over one hundred are serving one year, the maximum penalty that can be imposed by Police Courts in England and Sheriff Courts, by summary conviction, in Scotland. Most of them, when released, will be liable to be prosecuted and imprisoned again and again.

Section 13 of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, provides an opportunity for conscientious objectors who have been unsuccessful before the tribunals and have consequently been drafted into the Army to present their cases again to the Appellate Tribunal if they have been sentenced by court-martial to imprisonment for three months or more.

If the Appellate Tribunal considers that the offence which led to the court-martial was committed on grounds of conscience it may recommend that the man be transferred to non-combatant duties or that he be registered as a C.O. conditionally on performing civilian work or that he be so registered without condition. These recommendations are binding.

A concession allows a similar right to soldiers who did not register as C.O.'s before going into the Army.

Conscientious objectors who resist service in the Army are, therefore, entitled to have their cases reviewed after they have been imprisoned for their beliefs. This right forms a valuable safeguard against "cat-and-mouse" treatment.

Most of the C.O.'s now in prison are there because they refuse on conscientious grounds to be medically examined for the Army. They believe medical examination to be solely for military service and the first step towards that service which their consciences forbid them to perform. Upon that they have made their stand.

In no circumstances are C.O.'s who resist medical examination entitled to have their consciences re-examined at any time.

It ought to be the business of the Government to devise means whereby these may be accorded similar rights to those serving in the Army.

"Odious to the British people." That is how Winston Churchill, speaking in the House of Commons on March 20, 1941, described anything in the nature of persecution, victimisation, or man-hunting of conscientious objectors. In spite of this declaration, the imprisonment of upright citizens continues, because they have more conscience than the Tribunals supposed.

Some of the Court cases are a disgrace to democracy.

R. Elcock, 34 Goldsmith Road, Acton, W.3, came before the Middlesex Recorder, Mr. St. John G. Micklethwait, K.C., at the Quarter Sessions, Westminster, on September 25. He had been remanded for trial from Acton Petty Sessions on a charge of failing to obey a Court Order that he should submit to medical examination.

Prosecuting Counsel opened the case by saying that this was the first case to be brought on indictment. He briefly reviewed the legal position before the passing of the 1941 Act.

The Recorder: Can't they examine him if he refuses to agree?

Prosecuting Counsel: No, there is no power to examine if he refuses. Counsel then summarised the facts of the case. Defendant had been sent two Medical Notices and had failed to attend in response to either.

Counsel said that defendant refused to be examined unless he was guaranteed entry into the Medical Corps. He had been told that since he had been given non-combatant duties he would be put into a corps which fed the Pioneer Corps and the R.A.M.C.

Defendant, when asked whether he wanted to say anything, said that as a Christian he thought it wrong to destroy life. He had no objection to service in the Medical Corps in order to save life.

The Recorder: But the Non-combatant Corps does not destroy life.

Defendant: It is allied to those who kill.

The Recorder: Is it—felling trees, and so on?

Prosecuting Counsel, in reply to a question from the Recorder, said that at the end of his sentence defendant would still be liable to be served with another Medical Natice and the procedure repeated, though he (Counsel) had not yet heard of any such case.

The Recorder then addressed the defendant and informed him that he had defied the Order of the Court. He had refused to do his duty; no decent Englishman would refuse. He (the Recorder) was glad to hear that defendant would still be liable to be proceeded against at the end of his sentence. Defendant would go to prison for one month.

William V. Sedgwick of Guiseley, and Frank Kershaw of Bradford, appeared before the Bench on the charge of failing to comply with an order of the Court requiring them to be medically examined.

Sedgwick was sentenced to ten months, and Kersham to six months, both in the second division.

The Bench was told that Sedgwick and Kershaw had been taken before the medical board at the same time.

Stipendiary Magistrate: "It was a psychological mistake to take them there together. They back each other up."

The prosecuting solicitor said he would draw attention to the suggestion.

On September 30, sentencing Joseph C. Slater, the Chairman of the Crewe Bench, said that the magistrates had no alternative but to send him to prison for 12 months. On October 9, the Tottenham Police Court, which had given many sentences of 6 months, sentenced Norman Blunsdon to 12 months' imprisonment. Their patience was exhausted.

Lambeth Police Court reversed its attitude. Previously it had sentenced "conchies" to 2 or 3 months. On September 12th it sentenced Jack Monk of Leeds, who was doing I.V.S.P. demolition work, to one day's imprisonment.

At Norwich, Herbert Storey, a schoolmaster, registered by the Tribunal for non-combatant duties, was prosecuted for refusing to attend his medical. First hearing was adjourned for five weeks; second hearing was also adjourned. At the third hearing, on October 4, Storey's solicitor pleaded the Probation of Offenders' Act. By a majority, the Magistrates placed Storey on 12 months' probation (own recognizance of £5) on condition he took up ambulance work or similar work under the Society of Friends or P.P.U. or agriculture. This is the first type of decision in this war.

APATHY OR AWARENESS

By EVELYN DAWSON

Throughout the ages mankind has often been stricken down remorsely by the inexorable hand of nature in her various forms, and also by accidents caused by human negligence, but never until now has humanity been such a victim of sudden death and terrible suffering, nor been forced to face desolation and destruction through the wilful instigation of man. This has not descended on us as an unexpected catastrophe. For twenty years the Pacifists have predicted the inevitableness of the horrors of the present grim tragedy unless a complete change of international policy was effected, but the controllers would not hearken to our words, and the masses were influenced by them, or else were apathetic. The majority failed even to read the writing on the wall during those months of unprecedented frightfulness in Abyssinia, in Spain and in China, else surely the leaders would never have allowed the approaching avalanche to gain such momentum as to make it well night impossible to stop. If there had been any general proper awareness of the realities of modern warfare, and its after effects, it would have aroused a determination to remove the causes of the threatening calamity. Then, late as it was, there would have followed some constructive policies instead of that concentration upon destruction which was so predominant in those years of armed peace which preceded this war.

Undoubtedly, it is to the amazing lack of real active imagination, particularly during the last two decades, that must be attributed most of the responsibility for the precipitous descent towards our present state of existence, which is worse than barbarism. And it would seem that this same noticeable failure to understand with sympathetic awareness what is really happening, or to perceive the appalling possibilities of this hellish form of warfare, is preventing any widespread desire to stop the war.

The majority of people never even contemplate any alternative policy to the continuation of aerial reprisals attacks, which will by the very nature of war increase in intensity and diabolical inventiveness. Through the propaganda of the press and the B.B.C., which not only gives primary importance to the lack of military damage here, and the reverse with our exploits over Germany, but gives no proper idea of the casualties at the time, the full effect, significance and horror of the raids has not been realised by the nation as a whole. Personal sufferers have been tragically aware of their own loss and experience. The people of each town see the devastation, and some will know what has been involved in such havoc, but the realisation appears to be largely confined to this, except when the public imagination is stirred, for a short period, by a Coventry or a Fire of London. War always destroys the value and sacredness of human life, and this is particularly evident now, even when the casualties reach into the thousands for a month. Far fewer victims in peace time would have aroused active sympathy throughout the world, and called for inquiries and for drastic steps to be taken for the avoidance of the possible recurrence. One recalls the great world-wide reaction to the Titanic disaster, the Gresford Colliery catastrophe, the R.101, or "The Thetis." To-day far greater tragedies than these are regarded almost as something inevitable that we must endure, or "take it" for the sake of that "new world" ahead, which will be new, but not in the way that the masses are thinking—if they think at all. The outcome of this war is certainly not going to be the assured decisive victory that so many imagined in 1939, but whatever happens, all the countries concerned are going to be bereft of valuable lives, and filled either with physical wrecks, nerve-shaken and maimed, or with people dulled and lifeless through personal loss of friends, or of evertyhing that makes a home. The prevailing attitude towards the tragedy that has befallen us is being proclaimed as real courage, and rightly so in the cases of hundreds of individuals, but there is a grave danger of the general calmness leading to complacency. That is why the adaptability to shelter life—a sad existence for twentieth century civilisation, whatever steps are taken to ameliorate the conditions— is alarming because of its conscious and psychological effect upon the people. It is all tending to develop a static state of mass-mindedness with a consequent repression of individuality, which is an unhealthy condition for the present, uut, as well, is making the way ready for a totalitarian state when the war does finish.

Dare we continue to foster this apathetic mass atrophy of soul? It is vital for the sake of present humanity and of posterity, for civilisation and culture, comprising all the creative power of man throughout the ages, for the sake of the Eternal values of Life, that the imagination should be fully alive both to the realities of the appalling tragedy that people are experiencing, men and women of flesh and blood like ourselves, and of the state of the world afterwards. Also, it is equally essential that there should be proper realisation of the life for which we are preparing, if this holocaust of human life, this suffering, this wanton destruction and chaotic waste is allowed to go on and on. Once there is more awareness the living sap will begin to rise again, and we will emerge from this dark, almost dead winter that man has produced. The desperate need of the hour is the courage to start and stimulate this revivifying power, the kind of courage of pioneers, of the martyrs, of Gandhi, of Jesus of Nazareth, the supreme example for all time.

. . . . Last month we reproduced the "Glasgow Herald" reports of the 1921 trial. In this issue we note passages from other Capitalist press reports. These cover incidents omitted by the "G.H." or reported differently. Where a report is quoted at length date of the paper is indicated above each report.—Ed.

MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1921.

GLASGOW'S HEAVY HIGH COURT.

Police Precautions at To-day's Sittings.

AUDIENCE SEARCHED.

A somewhat unusual calendar of cases was submitted at the sitting of Glasgow High Court which commenced at the Justiciary Buildings, Jail Square, to-day.

In all there are 29 cases, involving 74 persons. Two capital charges are included in the list, but most interest will centre in the trials in which a Sinn Fein element is introduced. Several batches of individuals are charged with one or other of the following offences:—Sedition; illegal drilling; contravention of the Explosive Substances Act; mobbing and rioting. The last named charge is brought against eighteen persons, the arrests being the sequel to the apprehension of Father McRory in Abercromby Street on the night of the Sinn Fein ambush on the police patrol van. . . .

GALLERY AUDIENCE SEARCHED BY POLICE.

Unprecedented interest was taken in the court proceedings. Hundreds of persons assembled outside the Justiciary Buildings—perhaps a record crowd in the recent history of High Court trials in Glasgow, but the police were more vigilant and alert than hitherto, and refused to allow them to linger opposite the court buildings. As a result the Saltmarket pavements were deeply lined with people. . . .

The demands for admission to the court galleries were heavy, and the police took the unusual precaution of searching every person who entered the court precincts.

Lord Skerrington presided in the North and Lord Hunter in the South Court. The Lord Provost and several Magistrates were present at the outset.

SEDITION CHARGE.
Guy Aldred in Court.

A long legal discussion heralded the commencement of the sedition charge against Guy Alfred Aldred . . .

Mr. Aldred, who was undefended, in a long speech, also held that there was nothing seditious in the statements. . . .

TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1921.

CITY COMMUNISTS ON TRIAL.

Prisoner Cites Sir E. Carson's Speeches.

VERDICT AND SENTENCES.

Lord Skerrington at Glasgow High Court today resumed the hearing of the case in which Guy Aldred, London, the well-known English Communist and editor of The Spur; Jane H. Patrick; Douglas McLeish, and Andrew Fleming, all of Glasgow, were charged with seditiously printing, publishing and circulating a newspaper called The Red Commune, the organ of the Glasgow Communist Group.

As was the case yesterday, the police took the precaution of searching all persons who gained admission to the public galleries of the court. The new policy of refusing to allow crowds to congregate opposite the courthouses had the desired effect, and to-day, there were more police than public outside the buildings.

ALDRED AND SIR E. CARSON.

Aldred, who last night spoke for over an hour, to-day occupied another hour in his resumed address to the jury. He recalled the speeches made eight years ago by Sir Edward Carson and Lord Birkenhead, speeches which were so well calculated to incite to violence and sedition that they prevented a constitutional solution of the Irish problem and were responsible for the murders and outrages taking place in Ireland to-day. These men were now honoured judges in England, and what the workers felt was that if you preached seditton in a certain way you might be honoured by being invited to fill the highest positions in the land, but the workers who were without culture and University education, and said things bluntly, found that a different attitude was taken up in regard to anything they might say.

Continuing, Aldred produced the banner of the Communist group in Glasgow. Holding it up to the jury, he pointed out that it depicted the rising sun of Communism, the golden era of freedom, and the sword of militarism being destroyed by the working man. "Freedom our battleground" was their motto, and he submitted that this banner showed that they did not believe in violence. In conclusion, he said Communism might be wrong, but freedom of the Press must always be right, and he asked for a verdict of not guilty . . .

VERDICT AND SENTENCE.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty as libelled, only one dissenting from this decision.

Aldred pointed out to his Lordship that he had already served one hundred days in prison. He had only been guilty of a general kind of sedition, not pointing to anything immediate, and persons recently convicted of direct incitement had received sentences much less than the hundred days already served by the speaker.

Aldred later scored a point by protesting that the certificate relating to a previous conviction bore a different date from that which appeared in the list of productions.

Mr. McRobert, Advocate-Depute, acknowledged that a mistake had been made, and agreed that his Lordship should rule the evidence of the conviction as cancelled . . .

VII.—"EVENING TIMES," GLASGOW.

The Evening Times, Glasgow, for Monday, June 20, 1921, reported the trial beneath the following main heading and cross-headings:—

WHAT IS SEDITION?

A Communist Publication.
Foundation of Communist Group.

Scots Warrant in England.

This report covered much the same ground as the Glasgow Herald report, but expressed a little more colour. We quote the following passages from the Times' Monday's report:—

"The next case in the North Court was the trial of four persons, including Guy Alfred Aldred, the well-known Communist. All four accused were of respectable appearance. One of them, Jane Hamilton Patrick, was a lady of small stature, wearing a brown costume. The two other accused were Douglas M'Leish and Andrew Fleming, two middle-aged men. . . .

PHILOSOPHICAL IDEAS.

Ann Menzies Scott Donaldson, an attractive young lady from Dalmuir, gave her age as 22 years, and said she joined Glasgow Communist Group in May, 1920. She was examined regarding the meetings of the Communist Group of which she was for a time minute-secretary. The discussion after the business meetings were on philosophical ideas, and there were never any suggestions of violence or incitement. She never saw the accused Fleming at any of the meetings."

The Evening Times for Tuesday, June 21, gave the following headings and cross-headings to its report:—

COMMUNISTS SENTENCED.

Cases at the High Court To-day.

SEDITION CHARGE FOUND PROVED.

COMMUNISTS' DEFENCE.

Communist Banner in Court.

The Times' report again introduced a little colour. We make the following extract:—

"The closing stages of the sedition trial were entered upon this morning in the North Court before Lord Skerrington and a jury. Of the latter eight are women. When the Court met this morning the Clerk (Mr. Rae) read the names of the jury, and it was observed that one of the women members was absent. Shortly afterwards the absentee hurried to her seat. . . .

"When the Court adjourned yesterday Aldred, who was defending himself and Patrick and M'Leish (Fleming, the printer, was defended by Mr. Morton, K.C.), was engaged addressing the jury. His speech had extended to more than an hour when the Court adjourned. To-day he resumed his address. He had been in custody overnight, but the three other prisoners had been out on bail, and when they took their seats to-day it was observed that Fleming wore a 'buttonhole' of pansies."

LEIGH FISHER CONVICTED

In our June issue we reported the Tribunal hearings of our Comrade, Leigh Fisher. The Tribunals held that he was genuine in his views and statements, but that his objections were political, and not conscientious, within the meaning of the National Service Acts.

On Tuesday, November 4, he was convicted at the Sheriff Court, Hamilton. The Hamilton Advertiser report reads as follows:

C.O.s IN COURT.

Burnbank and Fallside Men Detained for "Medicals."

Two conscientious objectors were convicted at the Sheriff Court on Tuesday of having failed to comply with notices served in terms of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939. They were Leigh Fisher, 118 High Blantyre Road, Burnbank, and John Callaghan, 1 Sanderson Avenue, Fallside, Uddingston.

Ministry of Labour officers and others gave evidence. Both accused, it was stated, registered as conscientious objectors. They appeared before the local Tribunal, and their names were ordered to be removed from the register of C.O.s, and the Appellate Tribunal upheld those decisions. The notices referred to in the complaints were subsequently sent to them by registered post, but the accused failed to appear at the medical board centre in Motherwell, as required, on July 28 and August 21 respectively.

Neither of the accused asked the witnesses any questions.

Fisher, addressing the Court, said that he remained a conscientious objector and was not willing to engage in war. He had to square his conduct with his conscience, and he felt that he must refuse to acknowledge the right of the State to impose military service upon him. He was registering his protest, he added, with great respect.

Callaghan did not make any statement.

The Sheriff imposed on each a penalty of £5 or 30 days' imprisonment, and made an order that they be detained for medical examination.

EDDLEWOOD MAN'S ATTITUDE.

A plea of guilty was tendered by John Thomas Carracher, 53 Meikle Earnock Road, Eddlewood, to a charge of having failed to appear at the same centre on September 4.

The accused was asked if he was now willing to submit to medical examination.

"Yes," he replied, "under protest."

He was fined £1, with a month to pay, and undertook to go to the centre for examination.

CAROLINE TEAPE.

Comrades of the Anglican Pacifist Fellowship and the United Socialist Movement will regret to learn of the death of Caroline Teape, wife of our comrade W. M. Teape. Born on June 2nd, 1870, Mrs. Teape passed away on July 27, 1941. Mrs. Teape was an earnest pacifist and member of A.P.F.

NORTHERN RHODESIAN COPPERBELT

NATIVE CONDITIONS EXPOSED IN A STRIKING HOUSE OF COMMONS SPEECH

By

A. CREECH JONES, M.P.

Mr. Leslie Boyne (Gloucester): The hon. gentleman has informed the House that a large sum of money is paid annually by way of dividends. In order that the amount he mentioned might have some meaning, will he say on what capital it has been paid? I am not asking for any purpose except for genuine information.

Mr. Creech Jones: For some of the companies the average yield may be 5½ per cent. over a long period of years. The actual dividend in recent years is infinitely higher. The point I am making is that out of the Colony, something like £3,000,000 to £5,000,000 is distributed every year to shareholders in London. This wealth is taken from the Colony where the total African wages are £3,000,000 to £5,000,000. That disparity is completely unjustifiable. It is not a question of how much capital is invested. It is a question of the enormous drainage of wealth from the Colony which ought to be retained for the well-being and happiness of the people.

The poverty, ill-health and under-nourishment of this Territory have a bearing on the industrial problem. When the Royal Commission reviewed the situation a year or so ago they pointed out how thin was the whole economic apparatus of the Territory. They urged a policy of development in agriculture and subsidiary industries which, they said, should be vigorously pursued, even in war-time. Otherwise, the drainage from the villages will not be modified and the appalling social consequences stopped. Major Orde-Browne pointed out in his report that there were probably 280,000 adult tax-payers in the Dependency. Of these, 90,000 were involved in employment out of the Dependency, 48,000 were unfit for full manual labour, 67,000 were wage earners in employment in the territory, and only 60,000 earned their livelihood other than by wageearning employment. These figures reveal how far wage-earning has developed over a great section of this Territory. The fact that people are obliged to leave their villages to seek wage-earning employment which has brought them in turn into contact with Western influences has a most unsettling effect.

I cannot appreciate in these circumstances why the North Rhodesian Government cannot make up their minds, as is revealed in their statement attached to this Report, on the vital issue whether there should be attached to the mines a permanent labour force. The Report informs us that 18 months is the average time away from the village on the Copperbelt. Large numbers of persons who leave their villages never return. The mine-owners themselves submitted in their evidence the necessity for the presence in the compounds of the wives and families of the labourers, and they pointed out that if there were to be contentment, morality, health and well-being among their people, proper arrangements must be made for the wives and families of the labourers to come into the compounds. At the Roan Antelope Mine three out of five men who are employed are married. How far accommodation can be provided depends on the general policy of the companies, but, judging from the figures in Major Orde-Browne's report, it is reasonable to say that in all cases the percentage where wives accompany husbands has tended to rise in recent years and that there is also a corresponding increase in the average period of employment of each labourer. At the Roan Antelope Mine 35 per cent. of the African labourers have stayed more than two years, and 21 per cent. have stayed for six months to two years. At Mufulira 23 per cent. have stayed for two years or more, and 25 per cent. from six months to two years. At Nkana 27 per cent. have stayed for more than two years and 31 per cent. from six months to two years. These are significant figures showing a tendency to the creation of an industrialised class of labour among the Africans and the creation of an African who is steadily becoming detribalised.

I submit that that tendency cannot easily be reversed. In point of fact, so far as the Belgian Congo is concerned, it has been accepted as a fact that a system of family settlement should be established, and the deliberate aim in the Belgian Congo is that the second generation of workers should not drift in from the villages but be born on the spot. If you are to stabilise and develop the countryside, then I think some greater stability will also have to be found in the Copperbelt itself; but the Northern Rhodesian Government would seem to have no definite policy as regards stabilisation or the establishment of a permanent labour force, and seem sometimes to ignore the fact that a wage-earning section of the African community has now been created, because, as pointed out by the Commission itself, with the vast resources of copper in this region the industry cannot be regarded as other than a permanent one.

The present uncertainty in policy seems to hold up social improvements in the compounds and makes for unsteady industrial conditions, because a well-thought-out policy cannot be pursued if there is a continuously changing mining population. After all, many of those people have left tribal authority and all that is associated with tribal life behind them. In a recent count in the Copperbelt it was found that two-thirds of the children were actually born in the mining areas. They have no real tribal life, and so it seems futile to prevent permanent settlement in order to preserve the tribal system when the Africans are subject to all these disintegrating factors. The abnormal social conditions in the Copperbelt are generally recognised, and they are an additional argument for building up a permanent labour force around the mines. The irregular unions, the uncontrolled and undisciplined children, create for those who are administering in this area some very grave social problems. In those conditions you cannot hope to preserve very much of the structure of tribal life, with its predominance of tradition, as in the villages. I suggest that if the Government do not favour a permanent family settlement at least they should hurry on with proper arrangements in respect to repatriation and recommitment and there should also be better schemes in respect of deferred pay. Above all, there should be a policy for agriculture in the villages.

Now let us look at the question of accommodation as provided in the Copperbelt. Surely more should be done to provide the accommodation required by married workers and their families. In my submission, home-making ought to be encouraged and everything done to ensure a stable permanent nucleus. If a slump did overtake the Copperbelt in the future it would be unlikely that it would have very much effect on the permanent labour force established in proper proportions along the lines I have suggested. Accordingly, the compounds should be made much more attractive and less ugly, greater privacy should be available for the Africans, and, as is pointed out in the report, there ought to be more tree-planting to reduce the dust and the glare. More should be done for recreation and diversion, I submit, and facilities provided in the compounds for the wives and others to grow vegetables and have a little land to cultivate.

I have not the time to say much more about the social needs of these areas, of the problem of the children, the adolescents and the women, and the necessity for the extension of education, but all these are fundamental questions in those areas. May I, in passing, emphasise the danger of this industrial bleeding artery which is draining away from the villages the vitally necessary manhood of the country? In some way or other the evil ought to be controlled, certainly modified. The social consequences in Northern Rhodesia are disastrous. Large numbers of men never return to the villages, where the standard of life tends to get steadily worse. If we are to counteract in some degree the effect on native society of all these disintegrating forces a more vigorous agricultural policy is urgently and fundamentally necessary, difficult as the working out of such a policy may be.

Then the Commission recommend means of expressing grievances and negotiating with managements on the special industrial problems of the Africans. They suggest that an "elder" system might be established to bridge the way to trade unionism. One recognises the difficulty of establishing full-fledged trade unionism among an illiterate people, and a people who have not grown up in a long industrial tradition, but I would point out that the "elder" system is not generally operative in the Copperbelt. At best, it has only functioned for compound purposes, and when the dispute occurred it seemed to break down altogether. Obviously, with the flow of labour in and out of the Copperbelt, the forms of combination such as we are most familiar with in this country cannot be established very easily, but I hope that in the case of the permanent labour force, of the more experienced Africans established about the mines, the practice of combination may be allowed to develop and, indeed, encouraged in every way.

I would hope that the labour advisers will do all they can to give a guiding and helping hand to the Africans, and that they will as time goes on seek practical methods of bringing into operation a more effective form of combination than the Elder system for dealing with all the problems that arise out of industrialism. But I notice that the system of "elders" does not altogether recommend itself to the Northern Rhodesian Government, and I should like to know whether they are retreating from this recommendation of the Commission. I suggest also that the labour officers should make it their business to intervene or to help the Africans in their industrial relations by not waiting for grievances to flare up but by seeing that modifications and improvements are introduced into African conditions of employment and thereby prevent friction and greater grievances arising. I would make the suggestion that labour officers should not be appointed merely for three years, but should have, as far as possible, a proper avenue of promotion and of first-class work inside the Labour Department itself, so that we should not have in the Colonial Service these continual transfers in and out of the labour officers. There should always be experienced labour officers to deal with the problems of industry.

I also ask the Under-Secretary of State to say what the Government are doing in respect of the problems of recruitment and repatriation as are mentioned in paragraph 198 of the report. Also, is it intended that penal sanctions shall be completely abolished in this territory? If so, how soon? Will early steps be taken to improve the existing workmen's compensation law? It is true that a new Ordinance has been put upon the Statute Book in recent months in Northern Rhodesia, but it is not as generous as it should be in its terms. In the event of death, for instance, the calculation is based on a computation of three and a half years' life. There should be a nearer approximation to the methods which have been adopted in our own country, inadequate as they are.

My last point is in reference to the colour bar, which is of fundamental importance. The colour bar is practised in the Dependency. The Commissioners desire that it should be modified. I submit that the policy, as set out by the Northern Rhodesian Government, looks very much as though that Government desire to perpetuate it. This matter really is the touchstone of British administration in Africa. The notice of the Commissioners was drawn to the bitter resentment caused among African workers by the terms of address and the sneering attitude frequently used towards Africans by Europeans. Africans are employed to a limited extent on certain supervising jobs, and frequently on work calling for a great deal of skill. When the Commission was in Northern Rhodesia the Africans challenged the Europeans as to the volume of work which they as a team could produce in comparison with a team of Europeans, and as to the quality of the work which they performed. In their proposals, the Northern Rhodesian Government seem to shugle over the whole of that question. They timidly refer to the conditions after the war and suggest that the revised wage scales to which the companies have agreed will afford very considerable advancement on the present lines and will offer to Africans reasonable satisfaction during the next few years.

I am amazed at the use of such words. What is the considerable advancement promised by the Report? What is this reasonable satisfaction, when the cost of living is rising and wants are increasing and when other influences are stirring the Africans to new aspirations? The use of language such as that is surely humbug in these circumstances. I suggest again that this is the touchstone of our liberal faith in Colonial administration, and some assurances must be given to the African workers on the matter. If the Africans cannot be admitted to the European trade unions, the Government must limit European employment and insist upon an increased quota of employment in supervisory jobs to the African workers. The entrance of European workers must not be permanently allowed, it should be controlled and the Government should declare that European employment must not prejudice the future prospect of the African workers in the industry. We cannot and dare not shut out the Africans in their own land. If he is to advance, the African must be allowed to exercise increasing industrial and political responsibility. It would be unfortunate for the British Government to accept the somewhat specious reasoning submitted by the Northern Rhodesian Government. Let me remind the House that the Africans regard this matter as one of cardinal importance in European Colonial policy.

I hope that our Colonial Ministers will come out boldly in their directions to the Northern Rhodesian Government on the matters that have been raised in the Report. I hope that the British Government will not delay action, and will not rest complacent. Northern Rhodesia is one of the unhappy lands in our Colonial Empire, brimful of perplexing problems. This Report ought to be used in order to repair the past and to give an occasion for a sounder policy, based upon the wisdom, science and experience expressed in the many important Reports of recent years which have been written on the problems of this important Territory.

[. . . This concludes Creech Jones' principal speech. It is impossible to conclude the discussion in this issue, as a virtual debate ensued between Mr. George Hall and our comrade. We shall conclude in our next issue.—Ed.]

(To be concluded).

Mr. Creech Jones is chairman of the Fabian Colonial Bureau. Dr. Rita Hinden is Secretary. We hope to publish, from time to time, a summary of the questions and speeches in Parliament on Colonial questions made by the Labour M.P.'s attached to the Bureau. We shall endeavour to publish Creech Jones' speeches in pamphlet form, because of their importance. Readers of "THE WORD" who wish to join the F.C.B., should write to the Secretary, at 11 Dartmouth Street, London, S.W.1. Please enclose stamp for reply.

United Socialist Movement Meetings, Sunday: 7-15 p.m.; Mondays: Group Meetings; Thursdays: Study Circle, 8 p.m. 106 George Street, Glasgow, C.1. (Opposite Albion Street). Green cars stop at the door (going East) and directly opposite (going West). All welcome.

IN EAST AFRICA

By

The Rev. HUMPHREY CHALMERS, M.A.

(Minister of High Cliffe Baptist Church Warrington)

The Colour Bar in East Africa. By Norman Leys. The Hogarth Press. 7s. 6d. net.

One hundred and sixty years ago William Wilberforce had begun his life's work on behalf of the negro slaves of the West Indies. It took forty-five years to rouse the conscience of this country to enforce the abolition of the wrong. In our days the cause of the native African population under the British flag, not now expatriated across the Atlantic, but none the less expropriated and exploited, has been pled by Leonard Barnes, Lord Oliver, Leonard Wolff and Norman Leys. How long will their task employ them? Can they succeed at all in times when moral principles appear to be invoked only for propaganda purposes against others?

Certainly Mr. Leys has pertinacity like that of Wilberforce. His leading book, Kenya, was published in 1924, and followed a few years later by A Last Chance in Kenya, but conditions there and in most of the newer African colonies have become worse. Mr. Leys attributes this to a loss of idealism on the part of the British people. On account of the ideals of the nineteenth century the colour bar is constitutionally and in practice non-existent in the British West Indies, and is scarcely to be found in our West African dependencies, but in the Eastern part of the continent it is rigidly enforced alike by law and custom. As Mr. Leys admits, the term colour bar is unsatisfactory. "Racial Discrimination" is better. It exists in the Rhodesias, Nyasaland, Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya, being at its worst in the last named and least severe, as Mr. Barnes has elsewhere pointed out, in Tanganyika. The worst feature of the evil is that it scarcely is found in Africa except under British rule. In French, Belgian and Portuguese Africa natives may acquire land and property, learn and practise skilled craftsmanship and even enter the learned professions and the magistracy.

Mr. Leys proceeds to allege the systematic exploitation of the native. In the Kavirondo country the crops are bought cheaply by the white man in time of plenty and, in the fashion of Joseph's Egyptian premiership, resold to the native producer in time of scarcity at double price. All the land has been taken over by the Government and the natives herded into small reservations which are almost without water and fertile soil. Nemesis has come in the fact that European methods of cultivation are ruining the fertile areas and much of the land and many of the buildings are now being abandoned. Yet the native cannot return to save the situation, as he is forbidden by law to purchase or even to rent any portion of the land which once belonged to his people.

Europeans have made great profits and suffered great losses. Here is an example. A farm of 640 acres was granted to A for £85. Two years later he sold it to B for £640. B built a stone house and laid down 150 acres of coffee, spending in eight years £5,000 on improvements, during which time the income received repaid the capital expenditure. Then he sold out for £17,000. The estate is now worth perhaps £1,000.

The native must spend two-fifths of each year working for the white man. For this he receives about 48s. The sale of his own produce may bring him not more than 12s. in addition. To this may be added £4 10s. as the value of produce not sold but reserved for his own use and that of his family. From this total of £7 10s. in money and goods he must pay something between 29s. and 30s. in direct taxation. There are also local rates, but the receipts from nearly all taxation are spent for the benefit of the white settlers, roads being only made and maintained in their districts, while the subsidies to mission schools for the elementary eduration of native children have now been with-drawn. There are heavy customs duties on goods for native consumption as against free imports of motor-cars, tractors and other requirements of the settlers, while the railway rates on goods for native use are from four to ten times those charged on plantation products for export.

The book is well written and contains adequate references to sources of information, but—and this is a serious omission—it contains no index.

THE NEGRO CITIZEN

Our Comrade, E. N. McKenzie, commenced to publish in Birmingham, in May, 1940, an interesting monthly booklet, entitled The Negro Citizen. This claimed the inalienable rights of man for negroes. In the second number; under the caption, "Sympathy From High Quarters," the editor wrote:

From the Duke of Bedford, a gentleman who, though highly placed in Great Britain, respects the rights of men, and himself the author of several pamphlets dealing with the present situation, came two pages of foolscap with comments on the pamphlet that served to encourage the work. It is, also, in this case regrettable that space is too limited to permit of the publication of those most interesting points he raised. The following concluded his remarks:—

The remarks quoted from the Duke's letters were as follows:—

"I fully sympathise with the desire of the West Indian negroes for a greater share in the government of their own country and for a voice in its disposition. It seems extremely unfair that they should be leased to, or bartered with, America, without being consulted. You might be able to get a certain amount of sympathy and support on this matter from Labour—probably more from the labour movement outside than inside Parliament—but with a corrupt and tyrannical government, fighting a desperate and what is probably a losing battle, I am afraid the chances of your receiving fair treatment appear at the moment to be by no means bright. I wish I could take a more hopeful view but, by a strange irony of fate, I feel that we both, in different ways and for different reasons, are under the heel of the same oppressor." ... ...

Workers will sympathise with the Duke's reference to the Labour movement outside rather than inside Parliament.

The Duke's attitude towards negro fellow-citizens and comrades is an answer to the suggestion that he has Nazi sympathies. Actually, he supports strongly the splendid struggles being made in the House of Commons by our Comrade, Creech Jones, and his Labour comrades, on the African question.

IGNORED SPEECHES

By Members of the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group, F.N.O.I., includes James Barr, M.P.; George Buchanan, M.P.; Rhys J. Davies, M.P.; S. S. Silverman, M.P.; A. Sloan, M.P.; R. W. Sorensen, M.P., and R. R. Stokes, M.P.

Ever since the early days of the war the national press has adopted the practice of ignoring speeches made in Parliament which represent the so-called "minority" view. In the belief that a vast number of people agree with the views expressed from time to time by members of the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group, all of whom are Labour Members, it has been decided to publish speeches made in Parliament since the outbreak of war by Members of that Group. At the end of the book will be found three of the memoranda issued by the Group, to the first of which is appended a list of the original Members.

Issued by the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group, price 9d. per copy (postage 1½d. extra) or 8s. per dozen, post free.

Send your order to R. R. Stokes, M.P., 32 Victoria Street, London, S.W.1.

Ignored Speeches can be obtained at the Strickland Press and at all U.S.M. meetings.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—I have continuously seen your adverts, which appear to me to contain a wealth of information.

I am a C.O. of the last war, and to-day still take my stand with those who dare all for conscience sake. My friend has just gone to jail for refusing medical. I enclose 2/- in all to cover Periodicals and Bedford's Pamphlet. Wishing you every success in your work for the C.O.

Yours sincerely,
GEO. WATLING,
(Secretary Collier Row P.P.U.).

Romford, November 5.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Shall be glad if you will send me a copy of your "Life of Richard Carlile."

Was very glad to see you were still active in the best of causes. I remember you many years ago. I have been very badly bombed, but managed to save a copy of "The Agnostic Journal," containing part of an article of yours, "The Passing of the Miraculous," 22-9-1906. Also a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason," published by Richard Carlile, and other pamphlets, including the "History of Freemasonry." All the best.

Yours sincerely,
ROBERT ROSE.

London S.E.1, October 31.

Dear Aldred,—We are old C.O. comrades of 1916, and I have a hazy impression that we had some correspondence either then or a bit later, when you were setting up your bookshop. Anyhow I want to say that recently (only) I have seen a few copies of "THE WORD," and it has been a great pleasure to read much of them. I like the good print, etc., and admire your generous tolerance both of the Christian witness against war, etc., and of men (like my old friend Creech Jones, not now (alas) pacifist, but with us on other vital matters. May you succeed soon now, with the help of Providence (or Destiny?) in clearing off the debt!

Incidentally I think (e.g., in your October issue article) that you should recognise that a number of things in the prison regime have changed much for the better since 1923 when Ruggles Brice went and Alec Paterson came in and our book came out. I believe the latter has quite good ideals, up to a point, and would like to do much more to make prison life more normal. E.g., now every prison has an "earning scheme," i.e., men can, I think, buy cigarettes, etc., for their work, which is less monotonous; and many, if not most, of the younger prisoners are not locked in cells at all, but live mainly in association, even in camp.

All good wishes,
STEPHEN HOBHOUSE.

Broxbourne, Herts., November 11.

Dear Sir,—In the last year or two I have seen several copies of "The Word," and I have just finished reading the current issue. I must have it regularly.

You may be interested to know that I am a pacifist of many years' standing; for about ten years I was Secretary of the New Zealand No More War Movement, and also Co-Leader there of the Free Religious Movement, which derived its inspiration from the work of the late Dr. Walter Walsh. In Portsmouth I am Chairman of the P.P.U. group and Secretary to the Advisory Bureau. I mention these personal facts just to assure you or my keen interest in the job you are doing through "The Word."

Last Sunday, November 9—Armistice Sunday—my church was crowded out for a United Service of Pacifist Witness, which was conducted by myself, supported by a member of the P.P.U. and of the F.O.R. In the congregation were members of these bodies and of Baptist, Methodist, Congregational and Anglican Churches and the Society of Friends. It was a great demonstration of Religious Unity, as well as an encouraging witness to pacifist conviction in this "Army and Navy" city.

Friendly greetings,

Yours cordially,
CHARLES H. COLE
(Minister High St. Unitarian Church, Portsmouth).

Cosham, November 10.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—You need have no fear about criticising me at any time; I am one of those who adhere to the full to Voltaire's dictum: "I disagree with what you say but will fight to the death for your right to say it."

The present international situation is literally distressing and I am appalled at the lack of imagination among those in authority as to the prospects for our Country and all the peoples of Europe in the immediate future.

With kind wishes, Yours faithfully,
RHYS J. DAVIES.

House of Commons, October 22.

Dear Comrade,—I find great pleasure in reading The Word. There is much food for thought and inspiration within its pages.

I was glad to see the article in Peace News by the Duke of Bedford this week and I look forward to the day when I shall see one in the New Leader. My allegiance is, at present, divided between the U.S.M., the P.P.U. and the I.L.P. In unity there is strength; and in the not far distant future that strength will be needed, if all we deem worth while is to survive.

A fortnight ago we had Stuart Morris at a meeting of the groups in Cumberland and Westmoreland. He gave an excellent speech, noteworthy for its commonsense and practicability. He spoke of the member's pledge renouncing war, the organisation of the P.P.U., and the necessity to preserve minority opinion. Surely a common ground of approach can be evolved between the P.P.U., the I.L.P., and the U.S.M.? Most Socialists must agree that violence is capable only of breeding a worse violence in whatever form it is used by man to attain an end, and, by its resilience, destroying the very end for which it was used.

I am tempted to compare the present crisis of civilisation with the crisis in a man's life when he is attacked by some such scourge as cancer or tuberculosis. In the past he has failed to hear the voice of nature, until, by wrong ways of living, he has collected toxins and poisons within his system and it takes this means of cleansing itself. If he has sufficient "clean matter" within his system he will survive. In the Strength of Unity and Truth must we prepare for the days when war and its hangers on of plague and pestilence are outlawed from society once and for all time.

I approve of Ruth Fry's amended charter.

Sincerely yours,
CUTHBERT LEIGH.

Keswick, November 2.

Dear Comrade,—I should like to express my appreciation of The Word and of your efforts towards sanity and justice.

I am a conchie forestry labourer, with a wife and baby to support, and since for my week's hard labour the kind and beneficient government is pleased to reward me with 48/9½, you can imagine that there is little money to spare.

We take no other publications but The Word, but we feel that the money spared for this purpose is well worth it.

I have been deeply interested in the Duke of Bedford's writings. He seems to me eminently suitable for the leadership of the large body of Socialist-Pacifist opinion with no outlet for expression at the present time. He impresses me as an extremely sane and reasonable thinker, with nothing to gain personally from his actions, and deeply sincere.

A few words on a subject which has interested me for some time, that of conchie land-workers blacklegging. There are many hundreds of C.O.'s doing land work now, most of them from families in a fairly comfortable financial position at least, and from jobs in offices where the boss and worker relationship is not a continual battle as in agriculture and industry. They do not realise that the worker has to be always fighting to maintain and improve his conditions, and the best way of fighting is through the trade union.

I know that many C.O.'s are awake and in the fight, but I also know that there are many, perhaps more, who through ignorance or lethargy are not only not helping, but perhaps hindering the fight by accepting bad, even illegal conditions. If we C.O.'s in agriculture could fight and succeed in bringing agricultural working conditions at least up to those in industry generally, we should have achieved something to be proud of. If we worsen conditions through war we shall have failed lamentably in our struggle for justice and peace and—Socialism.

The address of the National Union of Agricultural Workers is 63 Bushley Hall Road, Bushley, Herts. I wish you all power in the struggle.

Yours fraternally,
E. WILLIAMS.

Coniston, Lancs., November 2.

Dear Guy,—Do you get La Protesta, the Spanish paper. If not could you get it for some weeks back. Have been told that Rocker has an article in it boosting British Imperialism and supporting the war. He points out how generously India is treated by offering them Self-Government, and how well treated Ireland is by England.

Since I cannot read Spanish it is impossible for me to give you the full text. Ordinary Imperialists are bad enough, but when professed revolutionary anarchists take up the role of apologists for British Imperialists we have surely reached the limit. During the last few years we have had Rocker trotted out as the great anarchist theoretician. If the article is as it has been represented to me, it is time the bubble was burst.

I am only telling you what has been told me.

The few Spanish CNT-FIA men that I know are in support of the war against Hitler and Mussolini. They are not anti-war. They think that only the defeat of Fascism will enable them to get back home. They think that Hitler's downfall will bring down Franco. They run a little duplicated paper.

I have heard that there have been replies in La Protesta to Rocker. He may have been writing in the same strain in Yiddish. Most of the old Jewish comrades have lost their heads and their anarchism over the war.

I hope that Morrison does not rope you in because of your association with Bedford. It seems that he would like to silence Bedford. Might that mean you also as an Anti-Militarist? For a Duke and an anarchist like you to go down together in defence of Anti-Militarism would be history. But it would be unfortunate. Morrison, the ex-conchie, is, to my mind, just a little snipe. He has power and is out for blood.

Best wishes for November 5—and after.

Yours fraternally,
M. KAVANAGH.

London, November 3.

[. . . We have received "La Protesta," Buenos Aires, August, 1940, containing the Rocker article. This article is being translated and will be published. We would ask Comrade Kavanagh to suspend his criticism of Rocker till he reads this translation. Ed.]

Dear Guy Aldred,—My mind goes back these days, as I expect your does, to those of 1916-18 and after; let us hope that the time may come sooner than seems possible, when we shall be able to do some really constructive work.

With all good wishes.

Sincerely yours,
H. RUNHAM BROWN.

Enfield, Mdx., October 9.

[We hope to publish an essay on War Resistance throughout the world by our comrade, Runham Brown, at an early date.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—The recognition being given to F. W. Jowett pleases me very much. I was associated with Bradford Socialism from the beginning up to 1931 I then became disgusted with all passing as "polities" and have since conducted a campaign of my own. I believe that a sane monetary system would inevitably lead to the peace and plenty desired by all. I am no longer interested in equality of service or equality of reward. These things are useless in the world of overwhelming abundance we live in.

You will be aware that your sketch of Jowett's career is very condensed. I am struck with the sentence "In 1898 he became Chairman of the Health Committee." This sentence covers a long period of tireless activity, and during this time F. W. initiated innovations in town sanitation that were copied all over this country and have since been copied over a large part of the world. Without any doubt he was the most distinguished Chairman of the Health Committee this City has had.

I well remember you as a "stormy petrel" during the last war, but the Press is cluttered up with one stunt monger after another, and those who fought selflessly for others are elbowed off the stage, as is the case with F. W. Jowett.

I wish to thank you for your efforts to give recognition to my old friend—but the real story of his labours for the people is, I am afraid, beyond the space limits of The Word.

For your perusal when you have time, I enclose two items showing some degree of attention I have received, in preaching social unity in circles presumed to be hostile to such advocacy.

With best wishes for The Word.

Yours sincerely,
GLYN THOMAS.

Saltaire, October 19.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I would like to thank you very much for the books received. The copy of What A Game has been passed on to our family doctor, who was very pleased to have it. The sincerity of John MacLean, which you have so ably recorded in your book, is most inspiring, and has moved me very, very much.

Yesterday, in the Manchester Guardian, was an extract from the absolutely splendid article written for Peace News by the Duke of Bedford. Needless to say how delighted we were in our home to read it.

Glasgow means a lot to us, because Dick Sheppard was elected Lord Rector of its University just before his death, and Winston Churchill was at the bottom of the poll.

The November issue is splendid as usual.

Yours sincerely,
ALICE GOODRICK.

Manchester, November 11, 1941.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—What is an Atheist?; an Anarchist?; and what is Communism?

My father could have answered these questions, but he died last year. He was a well-known pacifist in this town, called mad by some people, and loved by others. He hated war, and left the Church 25 years ago because he said the Church upheld war. I could not see eye to eye with him until this war started. I kept saying, why doesn't the Church stop this war. No one has the right to make human beings suffer like this.

Then I read Mr. Middleton Murry's book, The Betrayal of Christ by the Churches; The Faith Called Pacifism by Max Plowman, and 2 lots of other books. Then I saw The Word advertised in Peace News, and now I have a lot more books to read; even so, I still know nothing, because I do not know anything about Socialists or politics.

JAMES DICK.

In this picture Comrade Dick is holding paper in front of banner. On other side of banner is Comrade William Dick, well-known for his Anti-Parliamentary and United Socialist and Anarchist activity. The two Dicks are not related. The banner is the famous A.P.C.F. banner, seized by the Glasgow Police at the time of the 1921 trial, and detained by them for nearly two years. Its picture was the cartoon discussed during the trial.

I notice that it is the church-going people that worry most about what the German soldier will do to us if they ever come here.

I have twin daughters, aged 14 years, and some friends said to me last week: "Arn't you worried about your girls, because you can just imagine what would happen to them if the Germans got hold of them."

I said: "I never think about such evil things, and I certainly do not worry. I've tried to teach my girls to hate no one, and to do all they can to help others."

I see that the hounds, in the shape of the daily press, are after the Duke of Bedford. A letter of his has been handed over to legal experts of the Crown.

Does it make you think of a long time ago when another man was being watched by the legal experts of his day, waiting for him to speak just one word that would betray him? Human nature doesn't change, does it? It seems that a man of peace will always be hated until people change, but while we who understand have men like you, the Duke of Bedford, Mr. Middleton Murry, and a few others who are faithful to a good cause, we have nothing to fear. The world will be a lovely place when others can see what we see.

I like these words by James Lowell: "Be noble; and the nobleness that lies in other men sleeping, but never dead, will rise in majesty to meet thine own."

I am, yours sincerely,

(Mrs.) MAY FARMER.

St. Albans, November 5, 1941.

HENRY J. ADLARD

We regret to announce the death of our comrade, Henry J. Adlard, Minister of Trim St. Unitarian Church, Bath, on November 10th last. Comrade Adlard had been in ill-health for some time past, and contracted a severe chill on November 1st. Pleurisy and double pneumonia supervened.

Last month, Mr. George F. Miller, of Duluth paid a tribute to the great activity of Mr. Adlard in that city. Articles by and on Mr. Adlard appeared in The Word for December, 1940, and January, March, and June, 1941.

An account of Mr. Adlard's great actfvity will appear in our next issue.

CONSTANCE LEE.

Constance, the eldest daughter of the Rev. Richard and Mrs. Lee, passed away on Wednesday, November 19, at the Towers (Coventry and Warwickshire Hospital), Kenilworth. She had been ill for several months and had been seven weeks in hospital.

Miss Lee, owing to her delicate health, took little active part in public affairs, but she had a deep interest in the social question, and in the problem of peace.

Poetry, music and drama occupied her mind. Her favourite writer was an Indian poet, Tagore.

To the intimate circle who knew her she was one who will be sorely missed by many friends in Glasgow, Dundee and Blyth, as well as Coventry.

GLASGOW ANARCHIST OBJECTOR

At the Glasgow Sheriff Court, on Tuesday, September 23, James Dick, of 36 Hoggs Road, Pollokshaws, was sentenced to the usual twelve months' imprisonment for refusing to attend medical examination. He received also an extra 14 days' imprisonment for contempt of court.

Dick appeared before the local and appellate Tribunals but was removed from the C.O. register, largely because he was deemed to be a political objector.

From the dock, James Dick made the following vigorous speech defining his opposition to war and militarism:—

"What I have to say may not be relevant according to the usual court procedure. I have no respect either for this court or the laws which it administers. This court is not a court of justice; it is a court of hypocrisy. You ask me to take an oath on a book, the Bible, which expressly forbids me to swear, either by it or its mythical God. A certain passage bids you to judge not lest ye be judged. Another states: "Thou shalt not kill." I am here before this court not because this collection of writings forbids me to do this or that, but because my own intellect, my own conscience, my own philosophy, which is the philosophy of Anarchism, bids me. I am here before you because I refuse to kill. Strange, isn't it? One day you are trying a man for killing, and the next you are trying a man for refusing to kill. Isn't it about time you were making up your minds which is right and which is wrong? For many years you have been denouncing the Anarchists as bomb-throwers. You have condemned them, prosecuted and persecuted them; and now, lo and behold, when the Anarchists refuse to throw bombs they are also condemned. You should at least try to be as consistent in your accusations as you are in your persecutions!

"I am accused of breaking an order signed by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire. That order might well have been signed by Herr Hitler himself. It is Fascist in concept and Fascist in practice. Who is the Sheriff of Lanarkshire that he should order me to submit my body for medical examination? If I submit to this order I would be submitting to Fascism. Such orders are totally incompatible with democracy. On a previous occasion when I was present in this court, persons who appeared before you were sent to prison for not supporting their wives and families. To-day, you are going to send me to prison, where it will be impossible for me to support my wife and family. In condemning me, you are also condemning my wife and family to starvation. Does this not hurt your Christian conscience? No doubt however, it is your intention that they should starve, because if there were no starvation there would be no illegal crime, and if there were no illegal crime this court and its satellites would be out of a job.

"You want me to submit to medical examination so that my body will be used at your discretion for the restoration of Fascist Poland with its Jewish progroms, its lowest standard of living in Europe, and its mines, which are owned and controlled by the Prudential Assurance Society; for the restoration of Fascist Greece and its bloody dictator; for the restoration of Fascist France; for the defence of the Soviet Union and Stalin, which was described by Beverley Baxter, M.P. (now safely in America) in the Glasgow "Evening News" of January 28, 1941, as being not a system for human beings, but a system for human cattle, like its bastard offspring Nazism and Fascism.

"You want my body to be used for the defence of those in this country like Churchill, who helped to build up Fascism and praised Hitler and Mussolini for the grand work they were doing for civilisation! To-day, in the first case of conscientious objection before this court, after the speech by the defendant you stated that you were helpless and had to administer the regulations. If you were a man at all you would refuse to administer these regulations. That is all I have to say."

Comrade Dick is a glazier by trade. He was turned down by the Glasgow Local Tribunal on September 9, 1940. His appeal was dismissed by the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal. Yet Dick put forward a perfectly reasonable case before both Tribunals. It is unfortunate that, somehow, his associations with the Labour movement, his membership of an Anarchist group, his Tolstoyan ideas, rather than his conscience, were discussed by the Tribunals. Once these were expressed, it seemed impossible to get back to the question of conscience.

Dick's statement to the Glasgow Local Tribunal was as follows:—

"I have a conscientious objection to war. I do not base my belief on any special grounds, my objection like a man's character has not been formed by any one factor, but arising from all sides to overwhelm me. My father served in the last war, was invalided home from France, physically a broken man, eventually succumbed to tuberculosis contracted in France. He could never bear to have war mentioned in his presence; his attitude, more than speech could have done brewed with'n me hatred and horror of this thing so politely called war. I would not have any human being tortured as he was tortured, and as for myself, I prefer death."

No remarks were made on this quite reasonable statement. Questions somehow sidetracked the issue to Anarchism and Socialism.

ALAN MORLEY SENTENCED

Our readers are familiar with the stand made against war by our Newcastle comrade, John Morley, and his son, Robert. Their cases have been reported fully in these columns.

On July 9, Alan Morley, the second son, was instructed to appear for medical examination. He refused to do so and was summoned to appear at Newcastle Police Court on September 30. He refused to appear but remained at home and continued to go about his work. On November 3 he was arrested at work and taken direct to the police court.

We now quote the Newcastle Evening Chronicle reports, omitting only the headings, and duplicate descriptions:—

November 3 report says:

Alan Morley (21), "Rosslyn," High Field Road, Westerhope, was remanded in custody for a week at Newcastle to-day, on a charge of failing to attend for medical examination when ordered for military service.

Mr. Percy L. Frankham said that Morley had been difficult to trace, and had even ignored the summons.

Morley appealed for bail, and said he disagreed with the calling up act.

"I don't know of the difficulties Mr. Frankham talks about," he said. "I have come home at the same time every night. I suggest that the police have not even bothered, and what Mr. Frankham says is just not so."

Morley's father said that his son was opposed on principle to military service.

Mr. Frankham said he strongly objected to bail. An Army officer supported him.

November 10 report says:

"I am not here because I committed a crime, but because I refused to commit one," said Alan Morley, motor worker, when he was fined £5 at Newcastle to-day for refusing to submit himself for medical examination. He now refused to plead. . . .

Mr. Joseph Robinson (chairman) commented that Morley disbelieved the laws of England although he accepted privileges under them.

He was remanded in custody to be taken for a medical examination.

November 11 report says:

Sentence of 12 months' hard labour was passed at Newcastle to-day on Alan Morley for refusing to comply with the order of the Court yesterday to submit to a medical examination.

Mr. Percy L. Frankham, prosecuting, said Morley was fined £5 at the court yesterday for failing to submit to a medical examination and he afterwards refused to be examined as ordered by the Court.

Morley in Court said he did not submit to the order because he refused to join the Army.

Mr. J. Robinson (chairman) said he hoped the sentence would deter others from acting as foolishly and defiantly as he had done.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

WHAT READERS THINK

[. . . Since we published our interview with the Duke of Bedford in the August "Word," readers from all over the country have written demanding that the Duke shall become the voice of pacifism and Socialism in the House of Lords, and shall lead the common people of the country towards political and social sanity. We publish more correspondence below.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—In the last war, George Lansbury stood for Christianity and Truth. In this war, the Duke of Bedford is standing for exactly the same thing; and thousands of people, like myself, thank God that there is still an Englishman who has the courage and the wisdom to speak the Truth. It would seem that, in the Duke's leadership, lies the only chance of salvation for those remnants of the youth of Europe, who have not been crucified already. Crucified through the mistakes of politicians, "irresponsible people with bad records."

If, as is admitted, "war is the bankruptcy of statesmenship, why do we allow the delinquents of 1939 and even 1918, still to function in the politics of democracy.

Northam, Oct. 22. C. E. PAYNE.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I received a copy of The Word which you sent to me. I think that everything in it is excellent—plus! You deserve praise and warm thanks from all who have the privilege of reading it, for your wonderful capacity of being able to discover the Truth. You may have an equal as a well-informed orator and writer, but I can assure you that you have no superior! I consider that your statements in the October issue regarding War and Politicians should be broadcast through every street of every town! By which means the apathetic members of every community could have a chance of learning the Truth!

I think your writings in The Word are an eye-opener and an example of pure intelligence! It would be a country worth living in if there were thousands like you! Legalised murder would then be a thing of the past! There are a lot of cultured humane people your staunch supporters.

I join all others in saying that I believe that the Duke of Bedford is the most capable man in this country who has the capacity for Leadership! His insight into the affairs of the country —Financial, Administrative, Economical, etc., is in my opinion very great. He is a lover of humanity, a deep sincere thinker, and an enlightened Christian! When he begins to act in the House of Lords, the day of Universal Brotherhood will be within the sight of poor suffering human beings, in every country!

I hope, Mr. Aldred, that the Duke of Bedford and yourself will be spared to reap the fruits of your earnest activity! With my sincere thanks for all you are doing in the cause of Justice.

I am, Yours most sincerely,

(Mrs.) AGNES RITCHIE.

Glasgow, E.2, Nov. 6.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have read with great appreciation the Duke of Bedford's "Towards Peace: What can be done?" in The Word.

It seems to me that, at last, there emerges a foundation plan towards Peace and sanity. What a contrast is presented between this sincere high-principled, balanced, Christian, knowledgeable statement, and the crafty, self-righteous, arrogant, hypocritical, selfish hysterics to which the public is subjected from government spokesmen and supporters! On the one hand we have a Man, a Human Being, and on the other merely a crowd of the crudest materialists, and unprincipled self-seekers the world could produce.

The article by C. H. Norman is also very valuable, and it has seemed to me for some time that more prominence might well be given by workers for Peace to the degrading, sub-human caricature of life to which the masses everywhere have allowed themselves to be subjected, down to a grossly inadequate standardised food ration (e.g., one egg per week!) in a world of abundance.

So cunningly is attention focussed on Hitler and his misdeeds by those who do not themselves appear to be "without sin," and therefore privileged "to cast stones," that the people have lost all sense of proportion, and fail to appreciate the condition of slavery, and loss of personal freedom and initiative in which they are enmeshed.

Best wishes for your good work.

Yours sincerely,

J. CYRIL PAGE.

Dear Comrade,—I would ask housewives to awake. I would say to them: "Do not wait for halls or public meetings—have friends and neighbours to your homes for discussion and plan the future you want. Let us support the Duke of Bedford in his magnificent stand."

Various groups are meeting in this city, groups which I only heard of recently: fireside groups: really Socialist.

In the struggle,

I. KNIGHT.

Aberdeen, Oct. 23.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—A friend has sent us the 3 last copies of The Word, which my sister and I find extremely interesting. Will you please send another copy of October issue as it is very good and useful for lending to those who believe every word o f the Daily Press and the Radio.

In our opinion the Duke of Bedford would make a splendid leader. We have heard him many times in London and admire him immensely.

Yours truly,

L. & M. ALLPORT.

Forwood, Oct. 18.

Dear Sir,—We find the facts in The Word very interesting. I will enclose a letter of support for the Duke of Bedford from the Stamford F.O.R. next time I write.

Yours fraternally,

G. E. DARTNELL.

Stamford, Lincs., Oct. 10.

Dear Sir,—Very pleased with your November issue. Duty impels me to communicate to you my view on several points.

(1) I should much like to see the Duke of Bedford as Parliamentary Leader of a Peace Movement, agreeing also with Lady Stalbridge's remark that close co-operation with Mr. Middleton Murry is highly desirable.

(2) My wife and I heartily approve A. Ruth Fry's scheme regarding "The Atlantic Charter."

Doubtless more unity and aggregate and individual success will come to the Peace, Social and Humane Movements in general, as the world chaos grows and deepens.

Yours sincerely,

ALFRED Hy. HAFFENDEN.

Manchester, 1/11/41.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—After reading the encouraging letters in The Word regarding the Duke of Bedford's Articles, and also his wish to serve the common cause, I decided to sign the membership form of the U.S.M. and wish it every success.

Bedford will be a leader worth the following, because one can feel his sincerity. Knowledge alone will not do; man must be converted to the cause.

I have come to the conclusion that we must have better men first, and then all things will be added unto him.

Good cheer, Yours fraternally,

W. H. JOHNSTON.

Ashton-in-Makesfield, Nov. 6.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—A few weeks ago you were kind enough to send me some literature concerning the U.S.M. and your own personal views, and I have also subscribed to The Word since then. I would like to congratulate you on your courage, public spirit and broad-mindedness in giving publicity to the efforts the Duke of Bedford is making as the champion of peace. As a pacifist of some twenty years' standing, I am proud to stand by the Duke. Although I do not necessarily accept all your views or his opinions, we are all agreed that the brotherhood of man and human liberty, safety and happiness are destroyed by a state of war. Please count me as a supporter of the efforts that you and the Duke are making for peace.

I enclose a donation to help with the expenses.

Yours sincerely,

BEDFORD PARALLELS

From two very interesting letters addressed to us by the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, from the Rectory, Ballachulish, on November 5, we make two extracts concerning the Duke of Bedford.

In one letter, our comrade, MacColl writes:—

My Dear Aldred,—Please don't imagine that I am imputing any inconsistency to you because you give space to the Duke of Bedford and allow him untrammelled freedom of expression. I was imagining what others would say—indeed repeating what I had heard said. I have never known you refuse a hearing to anyone. You will allow, however, that there is an irony in the fact that an avowed Christian like Bedford finds his freest expression in the organ of an avowed atheist! A Duke finding a mouthpiece in an Anarchist Communist! "Che sara, sara," as the Bedford motto goes.

These circumstances reflect only honour upon you and the Duke, an honour perilous in your case, as the authorities would not think it scandalous to attack you, but might be tender to His Grace, not for his sake, but for the sake of the Order to which he belongs.

There are not many parallels to Bedford. Byron, perhaps, but how unlike they are; or the famous Earl-Bishop, Hervey, Earl of Bristol and Bishop of Derry, who backed the Irish Volunteers, and was feared and hated by George III.; but Hervey was hardly a Christian though a Lord Bishop.

Bedford makes excuses for Adolf Hitler, but he does not eulogise him as Byron praised Napoleon. Has anybody ever traced the "little Englanders" and "detrimentals" of the war against the French Revolution? We know about Hunt, Carlile, Muir, Fish, Palmer and other similar prosecutions, and what about Shelley, Byron and others who were too high to be prosecuted?

There is scope there for some of our British Museum bookmakers—a Hutchinson volume with portraits at 18s. 6d.

To come down to more recent times, Why is there no current edition of Jack London's "THE IRON HEEL?" Or of Winston Churchill's glorification of dictatorship in "SAVROLA?" That book is never mentioned in the lists of the P.M.'s writings. It was once a popular "DAILY MAIL" sixpenny novel. Both novels are almost topical. Have they been forgotten—or too well remembered."

I am,

Yours faithfully,

MALCOLM MacCOLL.

In his second letter, referring to an earlier private letter from which we wanted to quote, MacColl writes:—

"My Dear Aldred,—I do not remember all that I wrote in what you propose to publish. As Bedford is the object of attack in last Sunday's "SUNDAY TIMES." I would like to be sure that my reference to him does not imply a criticism that might encourage his enemies. Kemsley's rag is dirty, the leading article reminds me of that in the "IRISH INDEPENDENT" which "spotted" James Connolly and Sean MacDiarmid and led to their execution after the rest of the leaders had been shot.

I would have no hesitation in signing a warrant for the internment of Kemsley, Camrose and Iliffe for the duration of the war on account of their pre-war pro-Hitler record, when their kept man, Beverley Baxter, was snarling at those who wantonly libelled foreign statesmen.

It seems only too possible, however, that the Duke is pushing himself into attitudes difficult to defend because his appeals for peace are meeting not with the consideration they deserve but with unreasoning abuse.

Alas—the years have passed away and we can remember occasions on which we have been led to take up positions we never thought to accupy because the controversies went that way.

But I never had a conscience so sensitive as Bedford's or so generous an imagination. Giving the Devil his due is all very well, but Bedford credits his own good heart to Hitler, who has abundantly proved himself unworthy of credence and trust—and not only is this the case, but Hitler himself has told us in the oft cited passages from Mein Kampf, which are even more impressive in their context.

This second letter was unfinished.

Malcolm MacColl's accounts of the old Socialist Movement in Glasgow, and its worthies, make interesting reading. We will publish them as soon as possible.

BEDFORD AND MOREL

RAMSAY MACDONOLD ON WAR-TIME PATRIOTISM

The denunciation of the Duke of Bedford for his stand as an Anti-Militarist and enemy of war reminds us of the stand adopted by E. D. Morel, afterwards M.P., during the last war. Everyone knows how he was victimised and imprisoned on a trumped-up charge.

In the Labour Leader for September 13, 1917, Ramsay MacDonald addressed an Open Letter of congratulation to Morel. Unfortunately our copy of this issue of the Labour Leader is torn and the opening passages of the letter are lost. We reproduce in full the text that remains.

MacDonald writes to "My Dear Morel":—

"You have been a sore offence to every blackguard who has been making holiday and cash upon the top of the wave of popular passion and credulity. They knew they could go to any length in their attacks and slanders. During a war, thrice is he armed who has prejudice on his side. I know how often you considered a prosecution and how often you were advised to treat the scoundrels with indifference. I also know how the Intelligence Department has been laying snares for you; how you and I once shared the charming smiles of an AGENT PROVOCATEUR, paid for from our own taxes, and how the poor thing whom we pitied came to grief when she found she could not ensnare us; how your letters have been opened, read, returned to their envelopes, and then delivered; how officers have tampered with your staff and offered them appointments if they would give information against you; how, in short, you have been living in a glass house for years where there has been no privacy, with every action spied upon and reported, and running the risk that your most innocent and ordinary conduct might be converted and perverted into a criminal one. You have come scathless out of it all—and you have been trapped because you wished to send a pamphlet to Romain Rolland and some of his friends! Sneered at as a naturalised Frenchman you are now in prison because you obeyed the instincts of an Englishman and not the regulation of a Prussian official. That is the best that a Government with unlimited cash to employ spies and agents, unlimited powers and no scruples to pry into every act of yours, and an unlimited desire to get hold of you, could do against you. Such a charge as that preferred against you is, under the circumstances, the most magnificent testimonial to probity, honesty, and single-mindedness that any Government has ever given to a citizen who holds liberty in greater esteem than law, and independence of thought in greater value than departmental orders, who honours the fine motives that are making our soldiers willing to die so much that he is determined to vindicate them against all the powers and principalities which range themselves against them.

The reason for your imprisonment reminds me of the traditional French sportsman. He starts in the morning in spick-and-span hunter's garb, a bag bulging with cartridges on his back and a prodigious gun on his shoulder. That is the Government. All day he blazes away turning sparrows into eagles in his imagination, and succeeding by sunset to knock over nothing but himself. But he cannot return to supper and glory in the bosom of his family without some prey, so he "shoos" a chicken into the corner of a farm yard and puts a bullet through its head. With that he returns in triumph. That was the skinny little thing that the Bow Street Attorney, under the admiring eye of the Public Prosecutor, produced as your crime from the bag of the intelligence Department of the War Office, the livery of which has so appropriately and with such unusual honesty been chosen as green.

You are serving six months in Pentonville. Before being condemned you were refused bail. That was the scourging and the spitting process. Though your crime was political you were sent to the second division. They had to try and insult and humiliate as well as punish you. Thus they have only secured the completeness of your triumph and opened for you the higher orders of the knighthood they have conferred upon you.

The highest service that adversity does to a man is to sift his friends for him. The Congo was the crime of another ruler, and we could apply morality and righteous indignation to that. In that the Church blessed you and the mighty ones patronised you. But even then you discovered our Foreign Office. Now you are fighting a different fight, and I know how surprised you were at first that what was so plain to your Congo principles was so deserted by your Congo colleagues. You were very innocent of the world then. You will remember, perhaps, what a friend said to us one night three years ago: "I opposed one war, and I am not going to oppose another." With you the opposing of war was an incident; the supporting of truth was the concern. You were troubled, I thought, when I remarked of friends that "they will be fewer yet," but you left me without a reply when you observed that it was our families who bore the brunt of these things. That is only too sadly true. The children suffer with the fathers and for them. Never mind! The day will come when your Pentonville papers, framed and displayed with pride, will be valued by your children and your children's children as the most precious heirloom that your uprightness in character and conduct has enabled you to hand down to them."

An appreciation of E. D. Morel is overdue. When it is written MacDonald's bold words of challenge, penned in war-time, ought to be reprinted in full by way of introduction.

In 1922, Morel became M.P. for Dundee. He died in November 12, 1924. His Congo exposures and his magnificent work for the African natives is known to every lover of mankind.

We suggest to the Duke of Bedford that Morel's enemies are his enemies and for the same reason. He is denounced in the same press, owned by the same interests, by a second generation of hireling day-labourers, miscalled journalists. Unless we translate "journalist" as meaning a day-labourer, scribbling to order. The Duke might do worse than atone for the failure of the Labour movement to honour Morel by producing a tribute to the memory of this able and sincere enemy of war and exploitation of the Colonial peoples.

CHILD MURDER

WHAT WAR MEANS

By

The REV. RICHARD LEE, M.A.
Minister of the Great Meeting House, Coventry

[. . . In the course of an address delivered at the Great Meeting House (Unitarian), Coventry, on Sunday, November 2, our Comrade, Richard Lee, said that one of the primary objects of the beligerents was to starve millions of children in Europe. That was one war-aim to which many pious war-supporters turned a blind eye. It was one aim which was being achieved by the mutual efforts of those who made blood their argument. War-mongers posed as realists, but many of them were blind to the realities which faced Europe as the result of the mad quest after victory.

Richard Lee's address was entitled: "The Future of Europe: The Problem of Food." We quote the conclusion.—Ed.]

Let us look, for a few moments, at:—

(a) What is being done.
(b) What we did twenty-two years ago.
(c) What might be done, if we are not daft.

You think of the horrible bloodshed on the Russian front. So do I. Do you also think of the terrible sufferings of hunger and starvation all over Europe?

In one country the people are allowed a few ounces, not one half the ration for bare subsistence, of dark stocky bread made of flour and potatoes.

In 8 months there has not been one ounce of butter or margarine for many millions. Meat very rarely is seen. Milk is extremely scarce and when it is obtainable the civilians get one-sixteenth of the soldier's ration. There is hardly any coal for the average household.

These are the conditions which obtain over a good part of Europe. The other day I saw in one of our British hospitals a babe who seemed a month old. The child was actually 17 months old. I asked the reason and was told "malnutrition." The mother was helping to make the weapons of mass-murder.

"Can a woman's tender care Cease towards the child she bare?"

It can. War will make people callous, brutal, crueller than beasts. That exceptional child in Britain you can multiply by thousands in Europe as this war goes on.

You say: "Hitler, he is responsible." I say war is responsible. If you support war this horrible starvation and massacre of children is your aim. Not Hitler alone but you are the criminal.

(b) WHAT WAS DONE 20 YEARS AGO.

Twenty years ago I went into hospitals in Central Europe and saw three-year-old children weighing 8 lbs.; seven-year-olds weighing 22 lbs. Towards the close of the last war in Germany, in Austria, in Czechoslovakia, in Hungary, the people lived on cabbage and turnip soup. They had no fat and no flour. They lived in cold rooms full of pestilential air. Tuberculosis was rampant. New-born babes had to be wrapped in newspapers. The official British Report after the Armistice said that raw materials were only 40 per cent. of what was required and fifteen million Germans should be transferred to other countries.

Yet against Germany and Russia we kept up our senseless and inhuman blockade for long after the Armistice. What War is doing to-day and will do to-morrow, Britain and France did with ruthless cruelty over twenty years ago. Whether under Hitler or Lloyd George or Churchill or the Archangel Gabriel, war is this monster devouring the lives of men, and killing them by the wickedest, cruellest method on earth, the slow torture of starvation.

No, the statesman-prophet would go to Hitler—to Churchill—to Stalin—and to Roosevelt—and would say :—

Stop your insane and brutal murder. Forget the struggle for power and territory.

Get together and plan with all your strength and genius how to feed the hungry in Europe.

In planning this which is your proper work you will find yourselves. You will cease to be what you are now—

"Creatures that once were men."

All the ingenuity, the wealth, the skill, the courage you show now in the massacre of men, you can use in satisfying the needs of men and women and children.

(C) FOOD THE WAY TO PEACE.

There is a better way and if we had a statesman who was a prophet of humanity he would choose that way.

Amos or Hosea or Isaiah would choose this better way. They would never have stained their hands with the blood of children.

And the other prophet, greater than Amos or Isaiah or Hosea, would plead with us to follow the way of peace by feeding God's children.

I do not mean that we should begin to share out the food when we have had another year or two of futile destruction.

History is never antiquated.

Humanity, sweaty with labour, is always hungry for bread, struggling to wrest from nature and from hostile men bread, the bread of God.

That is why the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," is fundamental.

If there were a Christian nation or a Christian Church it would set a child in the midst and declare to those who choose the dastardly method of murder and destruction.

"When will you draw out your soul the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul? Then shall your light rise in obscurity and your darkness be as the noonday?"

There is not pity enough in heaven or earth.
There is not love enough, if children die
Like famished birds, or less mercifully.
A great wrong's done when such as these go forth
Into the starless dark, broken and bruised,
With mind and sweet affection all confused,
And horror closing round them as they go.
There is not pity enough.

THE EARLY CHURCH AND WAR

Preaching at Hope Street (Unitarian) Church, Liverpool, on Sunday afternoon, November 9th, the Rev. Sidney Spencer said that 300 years after Christ, a certain Christian, called Maximilian, refused to accept the soldiers' badge. "I cannot serve as a soldier," said he, "I am a Christian." Maximilian's attitude was not one typical of the Christian Church throughout the centuries. Was it one typical of the outlook in his own time?

Even after the days of Constantine the Church was by no means unanimous in its acceptance of war. Martin of Tours refused to engage in an impending battle, and offered to go in front of the troops, unarmed. After the death of Constantine participation in war was definitely condemned by the Churches of Asia Minor. In the third century, many Roman soldiers who had enlisted as pagans, left the service on becoming Christians. Origen, perhaps the deepest thinker amongst the early fathers, wrote, "We do not serve as soldiers of the Emperor, even though he requires it." In the third century a church order laid it down that soldiers must abandon their calling before they could be baptised. Up to the time of Marcus Aurelius, no man could remain a soldier after he had accepted Christianity.

Justin Martyr, in the second century wrote that the prophecy of Isaiah, about beating swords into ploughshares was being fulfilled by the Christians. The positive motive that, in the early centuries, led men to reject the way of war, was not something secondary or incidental to religion; it was the direct outcome of their Christian faith.

As the Christians grew in numbers, the issue presented itself to them more and more in regard to foreign wars, and in the administration of Roman law. The main fact about the early Christians was not a belief in a speedy end of the world. Their repudiation of war, and the barbarities of the penal system was not bound up with any such belief. Christians stood aloof from the Roman gladatorial games, but by the end of the third century the inhibition was breaking down. The repudiation of war, and the barbarities of the penal system, arose out of what was most vital and essential in the Christian way of life. Origen, who did not accept the general view of the Second Coming, based the repudiation of war on the law of love, as Christ Himself had preached and lived it. In the history of the early Christians they would find emphasis constantly laid on the adoption of a new and distinctive method in dealing with evil. Stress was laid on the necessity of doing what was new, of meeting hatred with love, and evil with good. "The early Church liberated the mind of man from the fetich of revenge." It was this new way of meeting evil that led to the rejection of war. It was the tragedy of the Church that this creative spirit in the face of evil and wrong came to be so largely forgotten, and denied. The Church fell away from the vision and faith of Jesus Christ. It fell into a state when increasing emphasis was laid on creed and dogma, and there arose an increasing tendency to bitterness, intolerance, persecution, a willingness to accept prevailing standards, traditions, and ideals. For them there could be no return to the forms of life and thought that prevailed in the early Church, but there could be a rediscovery of that essential and inmost fact, of that love of Christ which goes out to all men, and which, in the end shall conquer all the evil which stands in its way.

NIGHT BOMBING

The Committee for the Abolition of Night Bombing forwarded the following petition to the Prime Minister on October 31 last :—

"Recognising that all bombing from the air increasingly involves suffering to the civil population, we believe there is a widespread desire that night-bombing, as the most indiscriminate form of such attack, should be abolished.

"The undersigned, therefore, urge H. M. Government to seek a convention for the mutual abolition of night-bombing. Alternatively, they urge the Government to announce that as from a stated date they will discontinue night-bombing, reserving the right to reconsider their decision if the German Government thereafter continue the practice."

The signatories to this petition included the following :

The Bishop of Chichester, Bishop of Birmingham, Bishop of Bath and Wells, Rev. James Barr, M.P.; Dr. A. D. Belden, Miss Vera Brittain, Dr. J. C. Cadoux, Rev. Henry Carter, Roger Clark, Clifford Curzon, F.R.A.M.; Rhys Davies, M.P.; Miss A. Ruth Fry, Lady D. Gibb, Laurence Housman, Professor C. E. M. Joad, Stuart Morris, J. Middleton Murry, Sir Hugh S. Roberton, Alfred Salter, M.P.; Dr. W. B. Selbie, R. W. Sorensen, M.P.; R. R. Stokes, M.P.; Dame Sybil Thorndike, Cecil Wilson, M.P.; Dr. Alex. Wood, Lord Ponsonby, and Lord Faringdom.

This petition reminds us that, at beginning of the war, the Duke of Bedford, then Marquess of Tavistock, issued a manifesto, addressed to working women, headed: "There Must Be No Bombing."

This manifesto stated :—

"Fortunately the dread prophecies of death and destruction from the air have not yet come to pass. German planes have not rained death on London—British planes have not slaughtered German women and children.

This manifesto stated that the wealthy were prepared to sacrifice the poor in war, and made these two quotations as from "bloodthirsty old men."

Rt. Hon. Leopold Stennett Amery, P.C., M.P. (a prominent Conservative leader).

"Our air policy should be to force on the German air arm a war of wastage, to compel the enemy, by continual raiding, to use petrol and machines in defence, and provoke him to retaliatory measures against Britain. Determination of our people to resist the aggressor would only be intensified by air damage. . . ."

Mr. H. G. Wells. Famous writer and war propagandist and lifetime supporter of the Labour Party.

"The Germans have insisted on being a nuisance to all the world . . . I am convinced that vigorous bombing, bombarding, wrecking towns, and the like would be an entirely wholesome and chastening experience for them. . . ."

For this humanistic protest and appeal the Duke of Bedford has been denounced as a traitor and a wealthy member of the ruling class by persons who have built their fortunes on the oppression of the people, squandered thousands of pounds on racing stables, and hired scribbling journalists to "write down" pioneers of freedom and upholders of human liberty.

To "THE INQUIRER" for November 15, the Rev. Sidney Spencer contributes a powerful letter in defence of pacifism, to which the editor makes an unsatisfactory reply.

For SOCIALISM and PEACE

Read the EDINBURGH CLARION
(One Penny per month)

Published by The West Edinburgh Divisional Labour Party, KEIR HARDIE HALL, Bryson Road, Edinburgh.

IN TIME OF WAR

even more than in time of peace it is necessary for Socialists to maintain their independence of thought and of action. The troubles confronting the world to-day are almost wholly economic in their origin, and the Socialist solution is still all-important. The demands of the workers of all nations are moderate, and ask only for social justice and a distribution of the economic necessaries of life on the basis of the right to live and not subject to the accident of heredity.

THE FIGHT FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A NEW SOCIAL ORDER must be continued without relaxation, even under present War conditions, and Socialists have a responsibility in ensuring that their Socialist principles are not put into cold storage for the duration of the War.

"THE EDINBURGH CLARION" was founded by the West Edinburgh Divisional Labour Party, at the outbreak of War, as a Monthly Newspaper for the expression of the Socialist viewpoint on day to day problems arising in wartime even as in time of peace. WORLD WAR

By The Duke of Bedford

Without troubling to consult the wishes of the people beforehand, or giving them full information on all the important factors of the situation, Mr. Churchill and the Government have involved us in a new batch of wars in addition to what one might have thought were already our more than ample commitments.

The declaration of war on Hungary, Finland and Roumania was particularly foolish as well as morally indefensible, as none of these countries were threatening to do us the slightest injury. The people of Hungary have always shown themselves friendly and hospitable towards British visitors and they only became involved in the last war through having at one time come to be included, much against their will, in the Austrian Empire. By the Treaty of Trianon they received extremely bad treatment, contrary to the hopes that they had formed of Britain's fairness and generosity.

Both Finland and Roumania have been recent victims of Russian aggression, yet Mr. Churchill has declared war on them for refusing to do the very thing which he himself always refuses to do—negotiate with an enemy before the latter has been completely defeated.

We seem to have been let in for the grave evil of war with Japan through Mr. Churchill associating us closely with an American quarrel, in regard to which, before the commencement of hostilities, we were given no detailed information. We could not even be certain that President Roosevelt was not trying to interfere and lay down the law in a matter which was not really America's business. More than a month, however, before the final crisis, Mr. Churchill uttered the threat that if hostilities broke out between America and Japan, he would declare war on Japan within the hour. British politicians might surely have learned by now that it is not wise to threaten powerful totalitarian countries, as a threat is likely to be followed by a blow without further warning being given.

Japan for many years past has certainly been behaving in an aggressive and indefensible manner in China, but in condemning her for what, after all, were more or less our own tactics during our Empire-building days, we should not forget that her country is barren and over-populated and that the Empire and the United States have done little to help her to solve her problems in a peaceful manner. They have on the contrary put up barriers against her emigrants and against her export trade, partly from race prejudice and partly from adherence to a faulty monetary system and the "work-complex." Although thrifty and hard-working Japanese emigrants would have added to the output of goods of the country in which they settled, it was feared that they might increase unemployment among white citizens, the government of the country concerned lacking the intelligence to create and issue new money to unemployed as well as employed persons to enable them to buy the products of the Japanese settlers and any other goods for which a shortage of consumer purchasing power existed. Much the same thing happened with regard to trade. Although cheap Japanese exports would be an addition to the supply of goods in the country receiving them, they were feared as a possible cause of unemployment in home industries and were therefore excluded with the result that the Japanese found it harder to obtain imports in exchange. Obviously, however, it would have been better to accept the exports and, as before, to create and issue money to the unemployed as well as to the employed, in order to make it possible for the Japanese goods to be purchased and consumed.

Now that we are at war with Japan we need to keep our heads about the Japanese people, as we need to keep them about the German and the Italian people. As in Germany, there is undoubtedly in Japan an unpleasant element, hard, ruthless and self-seeking, but that should not blind us to the more encouraging fact that British visitors to Japan have usually found the ordinary people a merry and friendly race with distinct possibilities when they are approached in the right spirit.

Dr. Alfred Salter, in spite of the handicap of serious ill-health, recently delivered in the House of Commons a touching and beautiful speech naturally unreported in the Daily Press. In this speech from beginning to end he spoke the purest and plainest Christian truth about war, reminding the House that Christ's message was that any creed, however brutal and bestial, could only be overcome and finally eradicated by spiritual weapons and never by destroying men, women and children indiscriminately. His teaching was to meet evil with good and hatred by love and sympathy.

Now Christ's opinion of a matter is also God's, for which reason, as I have sometimes pointed out, those who adopt a different policy are thinking that they know better than God and, because God is always right, disillusionment and disaster must be their portion.

Nearly all the world is now engaged, or is preparing to engage, in an orgy of mass slaughter, but all the time there is a perfectly simple and infinitely preferable alternative, an alternative in harmony with the will of God. Put into simple language, that alternative is to say, "This policy of mass-slaughter is folly and madness. The world, if its resources are properly developed and fairly distributed, can provide comfort and happiness for all its inhabitants. Let us, therefore, stop killing one another and get together for the first time in history and see how the resources of the world can be utilised fairly for the benefit of the people of the world, those nations which are at present in possession of the richer areas, recognising their responsibility to assist in making adequate provision for the people living in the poorer areas, no matter what their colour or political opinions may be. We do not very much mind who the statesmen are who meet together to conclude the preliminary peace because we believe that once a sane world objective is clearly perceived and honestly and whole-heartedly adopted, the peoples of the different nations will display sufficient good sense and good feeling to control their respective leaders and restrain them from any policy likely once more to plunge the world in the fury and desolation of modern war."

German propaganda continually asserts that the democracies are controlled by Jewish International Finance. We can disregard the anti-Semitic part as we know that there are many decent Jews who are not financiers and many anti-social financiers who are not Jews; but the remainder of the charge, although but a small percentage of the citizens of the democracies are aware of it, is unfortunately only too well-founded. The governments of the democracies are, in their economic policy, undoubtedly advised and controlled by those who make the interests of producers and consumers subservient to the interests of money-lenders, currency-speculators and Big Business monopolies which restrict production or sabotage new inventions, and their financial system makes it quite impossible for wealthy countries to assist poorer ones without getting into debt to themselves or involving others in debt.

It is an unpleasant fact that we in this country are now living under a double tyranny—the tyranny of the State over the individual which, for the prosecution of the war, we have copied from our enemies; and the tyranny of orthodox finance which the totalitarian States, in spite of their shortcomings in other directions, have been wise enough to cast out. A nation living under a double tyranny can scarcely hope to achieve victory against one which is encumbered only by a single tyranny.

A reformed financial and foreign trade system is the bridge on which the democracies could meet those with whom they are at present at war and thereby save mankind from further destruction. They could say to the totalitarian States—" In the interests of humanity we are prepared to abandon the tyranny of international finance which you declare to be your chief enemy and which we feel to be the enemy of our people also. This is the contribution we are willing to make in advance as proof of the sincerity of our desire to join with others in the building of a new world. We invite you, on your part, to make a similar contribution by restoring a greater measure of freedom than you now permit, both to nations and to individuals."

If agreement were reached along these lines, each side could claim to have secured victory over that feature in the other's régime which had appeared most obnoxious and most to justify war.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD AFFIRMS

HOUSE OF LORDS.
WEDNESDAY, DEC. 3.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack.

The Bishop of Ripon took the oath and subscribed the roll. His sponsors were the Bishop of London and the Bishop of St. Albans.

The Duke of Bedford signed the roll and made affirmation, having a conscientious objection to taking the oath.

—Times report.

Describing the scene, the Daily Telegraph for December 4, says :—

The Duke of Bedford took his seat in the House. The Bishop of Ripon had just been introduced with two bishops at his side, and the customary bowings and raising of hats to the Lord Chancellor. The Duke, wearing a grey lounge suit, with a soft white collar, stood alone at the Clerk's table.

The Bishop had taken the oath with the words, I swear by Almighty God . . . .' The Duke declared his conscientious objection to that form and used the words, " I do solemnly and sincerely declare and affirm . . . ."

Then he stepped to the Woolsack, shook hands with the Lord Chancellor, and passed out of the Chamber.

Actually, the Duke wore a dark blue suit.

The Parliamentary Debates, House of Lords, Official Report (Vol. 121, No. 7), for Wednesday, 3rd December, 1941, Col. 159, makes strange reading when read in conjunction with the above reports :—

The House met, The Lord Chancellor on the Woolsack.

LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

Geoffrey Charles Lester, Lord Bishop of Ripon—was (in the usual manner) introduced.

The Duke of Bedford—Sat first in Parliament after the death of his father.

Why the headline for the "Lord Bishop of Ripon?" Why "the usual manner?" Why no reference to affirmation? And why "sat" when the Duke of Bedford left the chamber at once?

The debate in the House of Lords on November 18, when Lords Ponsonby and Viscount Cecil of Chelwood defended the Duke of Bedford, and Lord Crewe and Lord Simon denounced him, will be reproduced at an early date, because of its great interest.

The Duke of Bedford is the first duke to affirm.

Commenting on the history of "the great house of Russell," The Western Independent, Plymouth, for November 23, remarks that the Duke of Bedford is its head. It recalls that the first Duke entered politics as M.P. for Tavistock in the Long Parliament. He fought for Parliament at Edgehill, changed his views, and changed them back again. He became Governor of Plymouth and a supporter of William of Orange. His son, Lord William Russell, was also M.P. for Tavistock. He was executed on Tower Hill for alleged treason against a regime that afterwards fell. The 6th Duke was also M.P. for Tavistock. He defended the French Revolution and was a member of the famous Society of the Friends of the People.

THE CHRISTIAN AND WAR

By RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

(Translation from the Welsh by Mervyn Ll Turner)

[Block kindly lent by the N.U.D.A.W.

[. . . Born in 1877, in Llangennech, Carmarthenshire, Rhys Davies was brought up in the Welsh tradition, and for the first fifteen years of his life, could speak but little English. During early years his health was indifferent, so that his attendance at school suffered. Three years spent on a farm, however, seemed to improve his physique, for he spent the next ten years of his life as miner in the Rhondda Valley.

He was dissatisfied with mining conditions and devoted himself to the cause of his fellows in the pits. At 22, he failed by two votes to gain election as a local official of the South Wales Miners' Federation. This led to a break-away from the colliery; he became cashier of the Ton Pentre Co-operative Society at 26/- a week, and married on that wage. None of his fellow-employees was in a Trade Union, and his success in organising them took him to the permanent staff of the National Union of Distributive and Allied Workers at Manchester, in 1907. His election to the City Council as Labour member eventually followed; he also served on the City's Education Committee.

In 1918, he was defeated as Parliamentary candidate at West Salford, but was returned for Westhoughton for Labour in 1921. He was Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs in the first Labour Government, in 1924. A serious illness prevented him from taking part in the 1929 election campaign.

Rhys Davies is now a member of the Opposition Front Bench in the House of Commons. It may be that it is his Welsh tradition that makes his opposition something real and refreshing to pacifists; his beliefs may not be popular with Members, but his sincerity and earnestness claim respect. Only a man of his courage could have spoken so fearlessly at the 1940 Labour Parliament Conference in London. His speech was so telling that the B.B.C. and the "Daily Express" thought it worthy of sarcastic and sometimes bitter attack. The Westhoughton Labour Party still supports Rhys Davies faithfully.

He specialises in Social Insurance. He did pioneer work for widows' and orphans' pensions.

Rhys Davies is an eloquent speaker and an amateur singer and musician. He has acted as Sunday School teacher, a choirmaster, and a local preacher with the Welsh Congregationalists.

His social and political utterances may not have won for him general support, but his sincerity and thoroughness have secured for him the respect of men and women of all shades of opinion.

Our Comrade Davies was one of the 42 M.P.s who voted, last month, in opposition, for conscription of wealth. He also moved and spoke strongly against the conscription of women.—Ed.]

There is nothing like war for presenting the Christian with difficulty and perplexity; he knows where he stands on almost every question but this. There is no doubt in his mind concerning lesser evils; his judgment is unwavering on thieving, intemperance, adultery and untruthfulness. Indeed he is emphatic enough in his denunciation of war—until the holocaust comes. But once the massacre is begun, most Christians follow their national Government; they clamour for the defeat of the enemy as if Church and Chapel were non-existent and the rudiments of Christianity unborn. With the advent of war the funeral of Reason is announced, and Truth shares the tomb with Christian principles.

Every Britisher, German and Italian abhors the lesser sins and violently denounces any man who kills his neighbour. Though he may have just cause for complaint against the unfortunate whom he slew, yet the murderer is hanged. But in time of war, a man in soldier's clothes is decorated and carried shoulder high by the crowd because he has killed a dozen nationals of another country whom he had never seen. War is the most diabolical folly of all!

There is hardly a Christian prepared to justify any war when the conflagration is over. It is exceptional to find any Britisher justifying the South African War, or the last Great War. The reason is that every Government, on declaring war, so sublimates its appeal that it convinces the Churches that the fight is for Religion, Freedom, Morality, and the Higher Life. But mid-way through the catastrophe, the truth comes to light, and the unfortunate Christian who has eyes to see, realises that far baser motives than he anticipated drove his country into the chaos. This holds good all the world over. Even Hitler protests that the present war is a campaign for freedom for Germany. And for every success, he, just as we do, renders thanks to the same God.

Here are two example of what happens amongst present-day Welsh Christians. One man was for over twenty years treasurer and deacon of a dignified and important Church in the North. The members decided recently to loan £100 from Church funds to the Government to buy war weapons. As a protest he resigned from his positions, withdrew his memberhip, and no longer frequents any place of worship.

The treasurer of another important Church in the South severed all his Church connections for entirely different reasons. He was exceedingly enthusiastic that the flock should collect towards a war weapons fund. When the minister refused to contribute, he left in high dudgeon, and he too never attends a place of worship. Which of the two came nearer to interpreting the principles of Christianity in relation to war?

There are in Germany more than thirty million Roman Catholics, and millions of Protestants. It is said that almost a million copies of the Bible were sold there during the twelve months prior to the war. Why, therefore, do the Catholics of the various countries kill one another? And why do Protestants do likewise? That question confuses even those who never attend Chapel or Church, and creates a difficulty for thousands who profess Christianity.

Think of the millions of Christians who live in Italy and of the millions too in this country who profess the same faith. How is it that these people shed one another's blood? That is the problem which presents itself to every man of reason. It will be borne in mind, of course, that the Pope and the Vatican are in Rome, the metropolis of Italy.

It is obvious that no Government could, in a so-called Christian country, on any pretext, declare war if the Churches refused to support the campaign. Unfortunately, however, although their consent on this important issue is never sought beforehand, the Church leaders are usually readily prepared to condone what is done by their Government. Even Members of Parliament are not asked to vote for or against war; it is also equally true that they are neither given the opportunity of voting for or against peace. Every Government, even in this country, arrogates to itself the sole right of declaring war, as well as arranging the peace afterwards.

As the Christian in time of peace is so unswervingly opposed to war, why is it that when his Government decides to shed the blood of its people he is so violently in favour of fighting? Do the principles of Christianity allow it? Or must it be confessed that those principles become impracticable? After 2,000 years of preaching and praying, is it premature in the history of man to translate Christian ethics into practice? Has man yet risen above his barbarity? The historian records that for the first three centuries of her history, the Church flatly refused to support any war in any country, and preached peace even when Governments persecuted her for it. Why the change?

The organised Church is guilty of rejecting the gospel that man is man wherever he dwells. She is not quite sure of the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," while she forgets the Golden Rule except when peace flourishes.

THE GOOD AND EVIL.

The Church has fallen into the error of spreading the fallacy that all Germans and Italians are devils, and all Britishers saints. But there are good and bad men and women in every country throughout the word. It is not geographical and racial differences that separate mankind; it is the good and evil on all Continents. That would be the Christian's standard if he understood the Gospel.

One of Hitler's failings is that he has pronounced judgment on all Jews, protesting that there is not one good man in their midst. But the amazing thing is that many Britishers too believe the same about all the people in Germany and Italy. They say that it is the Good and Evil that are at war, and, of course, all the Good must be on our side.

Such ideas are entirely contrary to the Gospel of Christ. That Gospel teaches us that the evil and the good, in various degrees, flourish in all countries alike. "Seventy million malignant Huns," declares the Prime Minister, "millions curable and millions killable." The stubborn fact is that Good and Evil are battling for mastery within each individual, wherever he resides.

It is hardly necessary to dwell upon the consequences of war—murder, famine, disease, lunacy. Think of some of the consequences for us of the Great War of 1914-18. The following are the most recent statistics, published at the end of March, 1939: 125,125 widows and orphans; 31,850 soldiers minus a leg or an arm; 5,600 in asylums; 28,900 suffering from neurosis; 24,700 consumptives; 2,730 paralysed; 1,935 blind; 1,900 not actually but bordering on insanity; 2,200 soldiers unclassified sufferers. In this country alone, apart from one million killed, there are still over 600,000 pensioners from the Great War.

We must therefore consider the all-important population problem. If we go to war every time our temper is ruffled, in another fifty years or so there will be hardly enough men left here to fight at all, nor to safeguard our homes. The problem France had to face recently was one of population as much as that of military strategy and morale!

War as a means of settling any dispute between nations is a complete failure: it leaves more problems at the end than it set out to solve. Had there been a negotiated instead of an imposed Peace at Versailles, it is quite probable that we would never have heard of Hitler or Mussolini, and might also have avoided this present war as well. In order to destroy Hitlerism we must eliminate the poison that created it.

It is said that Hitler made the present war; but the question is, who made Hitler? Some insist on beginning to write the history of Europe as from 1933 or 1934. That will not do; it is of no avail removing milestones thinking that by so doing you abolish all scales of measurement.

The Church lost ground in Britain because she supported the South African War. By supporting the Great War she lost still more. The statistics of our British Christian Churches suggest that this country is now almost pagan.

What will the position of the Church be at the end of this war? Her fate will be decided then by her behaviour now. The Pope alone ventures a counsel of reason to-day, and even he in his condemnation of war uses his words sparingly.

It is unfortunate that more Christians are ready to die for their Government than suffer for Truth. And let us remember that Truth is not the prerogative of any one nation or country; there is no chosen race. It is the Good that is universally chosen by the Almighty.

A "UNITED" FRONT.

What is most surprising in time of war is the boast made by Governments that all their people support them. They punish their critics; they bully newspaper editors; they cast their opponents into prison; only the sycophants may whisper over the Radio; and then they loudly proclaim a "United" Front in support of war.

There are those who declare that the only way to reach the goal of peace is to shed innocent blood. Such an assertion is as foolish as it is to say that the surest way to temperance is through inebriacy. It is not sufficient for the Church to exist merely for christening, marrying and burying people. It is not enough to create a desire for peace when all nations are of one accord, and then unsheathe the sword when Government calls.

Has the Christian Church in Europe to-day something better to offer the people than talk of final victory? When workers strike, sensible people insist that the best way of settling differences is for both parties to meet round the table, and if at all possible, to arrive at a compromise. Is this at all possible in time of war?

Some time ago the Pope submitted Five Peace Points which met with the unanimous approval of the leaders of the Churches in this country. The Pope was not asking for peace, but seeking to influence the rulers of the warring nations to eliminate malice, hatred, and jealousy from the peace terms when the day came to settle. He took that step believing that the present tragedy was engendered by the Versailles Treaty. That is at least one step that the Churches can take at the present time: to prepare the people to cease talking of "hanging the Kaiser" as was done in 1918. We wonder what is the reply of the Churches to the Five Peace Points. It is obvious that these are difficult times in the history of the Churches. What would be the Saviour's answer to the present challenge? If I am not mistaken, He would declare Himself a conscientious objector in whatever country He dwelt. And did I believe otherwise, I would not direct my steps to any Chapel or Church ever again.

It will be remembered that the Saviour lived under the Roman yoke; the laws of the Roman Empire were quite as cruel as may be found in any other country to-day. But He protested against them, and it is certain that He would never join the Forces of His country to fight for any cause, whatever the attitude of the Government of His day.

Everybody is agreed that bombing civilians is of the devil; but as is the custom in war, each party blames the other; it is always the other side that offends. And both sides, through their clergy, pray to the same High Power for victory; and God laughs when He beholds their childishness.

It is strange celebrating Christmas, the festival of the Prince of Peace, in the midst of war. We sing carols to cherish the memory of the Angels' Song with its thoughts of "Peace on earth and goodwill to men" when the greatest and the most absolute Conscientious Objector of all times was born. The European Continent is too wicked to welcome the dove of peace, whilst the statesmen Europe has produced are ill-suited to receive the Gospel of Him who rejected the philosophy of Force. The angels weep to witness men killing one another; they are sad when starvation looms in the distance. Fortunately they may not read our Press; theirs is a different tongue. But they are familiar with our spirit and our way of living. What, we wonder, do they think of our Christian Churches in these dark days?

There is no reason for the existence of the Church unless it has something better to offer mankind than Spitfires, Messerschmitts and Capronis. And why is it that we find the clergy, who themselves are not expected to fight, supporting their Governments in all wars? It is impossible that all Governments can be right; if it were so, they would not be at war.

That is the problem the Christian has to face to-day, and it is on his attitude now that he will be judged when the catastrophe is over.

THE NEW AGE.

By the New Age, we do not mean the German, Indian, Russian or British systems of politics or economics. You may have more than one system in any one age; systems depend on the mind and spirit of those living at the time. Naturally it is the people who are responsible for the age in which they live, and not the Governments.

We need not unravel the past with its mistaken ideas and its shame, but rather to look into the future to catch a glimpse of what might well happen when the present brutish war is over.

Let us hope that the black-out, the gas-mask and the ear-plugs will be superfluous in that new age. Everybody then will be able, we presume, to buy and eat cheese and butter freely. That will be an age when it will be possible to sleep in bed rather than in an Anderson shelter; an age when the church bells will ring once again, calling the devout together as of yore.

With that New Age will come great changes. Some foresee cottages of stone and brick being built again; houses far better than the old are promised. Then will new bridges cross streams and rivers great and small, and aeroplanes will transport the millions to the end of the earth through cloud and mist and clear sky, without showering fire-bombs on innocent women and children on their flights. Then, too, man shall be free to express his opinion on the problems of the day without fear of being tripped up in the niceties of the law. And then, we hope, the Radio will be accessible to those whose voice for a time has been silenced.

Perhaps in this New Age every infant shall have his fill, every child a better education than his parents, and every adolescent his fair and just rights from Authority. Some will have it that no-one will be idle in that age; mechanical power will pull every cart on the highway, and the plough will turn the furrows by the same process. It will no longer be necessary to work eight hours a day for six days a week; everyone will have enough and plenty if he works for four hours on four days out of seven, and every worker shall have leisure to do as he will, as if he were a gentleman of means. And no more will be heard

"Dwyn ei geiniog dan gwynaw;
Rhoi angen un rhwng y naw."
(Winning his pence through suffering;
Sharing the needs of one between nine.)

Has the Church a mission for the common man everywhere to hurl at the oppressor and all who love war? Or is it content to believe that peace is but a slumber between wars; that it is no longer possible for nations to live in amity and friendship? In the New Age it is to be hoped that war is obsolete. It will not be possible to attain a New or a Golden Age until humanity is ready to sacrifice and work as much for peace as it does for war. To live in that Age would indeed be a joy.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

By The Right Hon. LORD SNELL C.B.E.
(Deputy Leader of The House of Lords)

[Summary of An Address Delivered before The South Place Ethical Society, Conway Hall, London, W.C.1, on September 14, 1941.]

It should be understood that this summary is a reporter's condensation of a lecture that took 50 minuets to deliver. The report is disturbed in its sequences, but it represents what Lord Snell said. It adds nothing: only condenses.

[. . . The following report was reproduced from the "Monthly Record" of the South Place Ethical Society by "The Literary Guide" for December, 1941. It seems to us to be a reasoned and pacific approach to the tragic situation of the world from the standpoint of one who believes the war to be right. If peace is to come to the world, militarists and anti-militarists have to enter into discussion; men of all races must confer and put aside antagonisms and hatreds: even Social Revolutionists and Social Reformers must meet and consult in some spirit of fellowship. We welcome Lord Snell's statement as a basis of discussion and consideration, in the progress towards wisdom that humanity must make.

The South Place Ethical Society has given permission for this report to be reproduced in "THE WORD," after consulting Lord Snell, who raised no objection. The reference to Lord Snell as deputy leader of the House of Lords is added by us, to emphasise the importance of his views. He spoke at Conway Hall, naturally, as a private individual, but his views are not inconsistent with his position.—Ed.]

Whenever and however the war may end, we shall be face to face with a world that is economically, politically, socially, and even morally, disorganised. There will be a clamour for the immediate solution of problems at present insoluble. This will include territorial, imperial, and diplomatic problems, and the consequences of wrong decisions will be so grave that everybody should even now be thinking about the shape of the new world. Civilisation cannot again afford to lose by the peace. Let us beware of the national vices of complacency and drift, and neither under-estimate the importance of the problems which await solution nor delay such preparations as we may have to make for them. The mind of the nation has to be made aware of the dangers of any mistaken action. Certain steps are already being taken. The British Cabinet has set up a special department, with Mr Arthur Greenwood at its head. Learned societies are undertaking detailed examination of these problems. Each of the three major political parties has set up a special Committee, and Chambers of Commerce have also got busy. The other Governments now established in London—the Polish especially—have research committees. All this is immensely to the good, but not sufficient. The responsibility must be shared by the people as well as by the experts and the Governments.

When the war is over we shall find ourselves living in a new psychological world, with new and intensified problems and prejudices. It is almost inevitable that there will be a kind of automatic desire on the part of languid people to return to old ways and thoughts. It is natural to feel that you can go back to things as they were. We tried to do that in 1918, but we have learned much since then. We must endeavour to get a true understanding of the mind of the German people and of their future place in the world. We dare not misapprehend a second time. We are inclined to think that other people are just like ourselves; but the German people regard themselves as different and superior. They never conceive that a position of equality with other nations would be entirely satisfactory, and they take a deliberate pride in this deeply-rooted prejudice. From Fichte to our time this difference has been asserted. Western standards of culture and righteousness have been denied. They repudiated the cosmopolitanism of Adam Smith and the English economists, and proclaimed a national State based on racial community; they also believed that war was better than peace because it led man to be most like himself. Now, if we are to co-operate with the German people we must really try to understand the philosophy which shapes their minds. It is not democracy, for Germany never was a democracy, and to that extent may therefore be excused at the present time. We have had hundreds of years of preparation; but the Germans have been taught and have followed a philosophy which extols the virtue of power and success. They held they could get all they desired by force, which is their first principle of State. That philosophy is quite different from our own; we have felt that our good would be most assured through the good of others. We have never felt that it could be obtained by trampling down other people. It is dangerous to assume that Germany, after the war, would be willing to approach the world in our way; there is nothing in her history or present temper to justify that belief. The Germans are intelligent, industrious, courageous, aggressive, and at times highly sentimental, but they have the souls of slaves. They are obedient to authority, and willing to do wretched things when ordered to do so. That represents a difference from our own outlook on the world. When Hitler says, "Do that," all the people say "Amen." We must learn that he is the personification of the German philosophy. There has always been a noble minority in Germany: Goethe, Hegel, Kant, Lessing, Bach, and Beethoven did not accept the Nazi philosophy; those great spirits knew the weakness of their own people. We must try to solve this difficulty. It is necessary to assume that the Allies will be successful in order that we may be able to plan the future. The problem is whether we can get psychological unity between Germans and the rest of the world.

One proposal is that Germany should be split up into small principalities. That is purely repression, and we must not waste time in examining it. Then there is the pacifist view that we must risk everything for pacification. If that should prove wrong our children will suffer just as we are suffering. There is the problem of disarmament. It must take place, as it is essential for the security of the world. We must ask whether our Allies will stand by us in the reshaping of a new Europe. That would depend in part on the peace proposals, and we must devote our minds to the realisation of the facts and of the work before us. We must hope that the present understanding with the U.S.A. will continue after the war, and that until the world can be re-shaped there may be a peace guaranteed by the almost invincible combination of the English-speaking world. That would give us time to think out the form in which a new Europe can be started. While we must try to understand the Germans, the fact remains that we have got to live in the world with them, and if we can shape a world in which they will co-operate it would be better than to suppress them; but we dare ont take any risks on this occasion. There must be nothing like revenge, but there must be precaution.

Our problem is what is going to happen to Germany itself. Order must be kept there or chaos may result. Perhaps there would be danger if Germany were handed over to the Army leaders. There is the possibility that the Nazi party and Hitler might remain in power after a military defeat. I am not saying that these things will happen. I am trying to paint a picture of a possibility we may have to encounter. Another problem is whether a sufficiently strong opposition movement with staying power can be created in Germany. It takes years to build such an organization even in an atmosphere of freedom, and it is a question whether an improvised opposition could stand without outside help. Remember the submissive character of the German people—physically brave, but not mentally brave in standing up for individual rights. There can be no spontaneous ideological revolution in Germany as in Russia in 1917; the tendency will be to do as they are told and to bow to authority. It may be that in Germany and elsewhere there will be a party of lawlessness to encounter, and our choice may be to leave Germany to the torment she has prepared for others. The difficulties of outside responsibility for order may be great, but if we can get the goodwill of the German people for five years, during which they can re-shape their institutions, it might be a blessing to the world.

Then there are the economic and commercial problems. Are we ready to face them in our of Europe as a whole. Men will be demobilized and available for industry in millions far in excess of the supply of raw materials, most of which will be in the wrong place. We should, therefore, already be preparing to bring people and raw materials together. In many materials there will be a world shortage. There may have to be international rationing, and perhaps a scheme of priorities. Old factories will have been destroyed, or have become out of date. There will be a house shortage, although camps may afford some measure of relief. European credit will have gone, food production will have own country? Reflect on the probable condition been decreased, land will be spoiled, inflation will threaten, and almost certainly vitality will be lowered. Unemployment may be great, and we cannot exclude the grim possibility of famine. How do we stand as a nation? Notice the enormously increased capacity of the U.S.A. and of the Dominions during this war. Each has built up vast secondary industries and productive power.

Is it to be supposed that when the war is over America will abandon this increased power, or that the Dominions will abolish their secondary industries? Shall we attempt to defend ourselves by industrial tariffs and intensify economic nationalism? There is the problem of India, with three hundred and fifty million people being brought into industry at a very low level of social life. Our duty is to preserve our standards as far as we can. If we could satisfy the demand which exists in Africa, the West Indies, and in India for an improved standard of living a demand for our exports may be created. That would help. We must have increased efficiency as to new processes, and be ready to start new industries. We must beware of a return to an era of cheap sweated products in order to be able to undersell Asiatic goods. The way out is to secure economic security on an international scale. We must preserve our standards through the International Labour Office. Not only is this the best of the instruments created after the last war, but it still exists. State control will have gradually to be extended during the reconstructive period. Then there is the question of finance and debt. It represents a staggering burden. The loan services may frighten many of us. Do not despair. Look at what really happens. A nation lives on its current production, and if we can so organize our production as to meet day-by-day expenses, colossal as the burden is, capital debt will then be manageable, and I think we can emerge without any serious deterioration in our standard of life. Much depends on the quality of leadership. The forces of democratic society cannot survive unless our leaders are enlightened and enduring. The influence of leadership may be seen to-day in Britain, China, South Africa, and America. We must encourage men with creative gifts whose attitude towards life will be progress without disorder or reaction.

I believe, though the times are dark, that we need not despair. We do not always see the coming light, but it will surely come. The leaders, too, will appear if we desire them. Who knows in what school or in what society to-day young leaders may be receiving their strength? One of our chief duties is to prepare the way for them, and to know them when they come.

IN THE COPPERBELT

CREECH JONES V. GEORGE HALL

[. . . Creech Jones's Commons speech (April 10, 1941) in defence of the native workers engaged in the Northern Rhodesian Copperbelt has been reproduced in these columns for November and December, 1941. In the November issue (page 40) we detailed the trade unionist and political career of Mr. George Henry Hall, the present Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the Colonial Office. Below we summarise the discussion that followed the speech made by our comrade. Then came Hall's apology, which almost resolved itself into a debate between Creech Jones and George Hall. Space difficulties has compelled us to reduce Hall's apologies largely to his factual statement. This is a pity, for his qualifying phrases and modes of approach spoke volumes. Hall revealed himself as an apologist for Government, functioning as the executive committee of the absentee financial exploiting class, and its agent on the spot. Creech Jones challenged from the standpoint of the workers' rights, and the need for useful administration and development.—Ed.]

Mr. Ernest Evans (University of Wales) followed Creech Jones. He defended the Governor of Northern Rhodesia, and declared that its policy was liberal. He spent some time in the Copperbelt in 1938.

Mr. Evans is a K.C. and was Liberal M.P. for Cardiganshire from 1918-23. He has sat for the University since 1934. He is the son of a late Town Clerk of Cardiganshire and is B.A. of Trinty College, Cambridge. It is not surprising that he should be wanting in the proletarian realistic understanding of our comrade Creech Jones.

Mr. Edmund Harvey (combined English Universities) spoke next. His speech was a poor, compromising affair, full of pious good will that lacked any suggestion of translation into worth-while reality, and concluded by expressing every confidence in the Under-Secretary and the Secretary of State.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. George Hall, spoke next. We can only make extracts from this amazing speech, which ought to be read in full in the Official Report.

Hall referred to the death, the previous day, of Sir John Maybin, the Governor of the Territory since August, 1938: spoke of his capacity as an administrator, his 25 years experience of Colonial affairs, and added: "He had great charm of manner and his outstanding qualities of tact and sympathy and his sterling character won him the esteem and admiration of those who knew him."

Hall proceeded to pay a tribute to the Commission responsible for the Report that Creech Jones had discussed. Hall considered "the Commission, made up of Sir John Foster, Sir Walter Buchanan-Smith, and Mr. Dagleish, a well-balanced Commission."

This brings us to the passage of arms between Jones and Hall.

Mr. George Hall stated that "my hon. Friend, the member for Shipley, was perhaps a little critical." He developed his factual reply to Creech Jones' critical challenge:—

The Copperbelt was first discovered only in 1925. From then until 1929, there was progress. There was a setback owing to the world depression of 1931-32, but from 1934 there has been considerable progress. . . . In 1935 the copper exports from the Copperbelt were to the value of £5,000,000; in 1937 they had increased to £11,000,000; and during the first six months of 1940 the total amount exported was to the value of £6,000,000.

Seeing that my hon. Friend has raised the question of the contribution of this industry to the Territory, it is well that we should take note of the fact that, whereas in 1925-26 the revenue of Northern Rhodesia amounted to £370,000, it had almost doubled by 1939, while this year the revenue for the territory is estimated at £2,500,000. It is interesting to note that of that amount the Income Tax is expected to yield £1,500,000. In 1938 the Income Tax receipts from the mining companies alone amounted to no less than 79 per cent. of the total tax collected. There has been a tremendous development, not only with regard to output and revenue, but in the number of people employed in the Copperbelt. In 1930 the number was 15,000. . . . In 1932 the number slumped to 7,000. At the present time the number is from 26,000 to 28,000. That, of course, does not include the Europeans employed. They vary between 3,500 and 3,800—in other words, at the rate of one European to every 10 Africans in the Copperbelt. The importance of this industry can be judged from the fact that the amount of copper at present being produced in Northern Rhodesia is about 300,000 tons a year. . . The Territory has overtaken Canada, which was formerly the greatest producer of copper in the world. The reserves of this valuable high-grade ore in the Territory amount to about 750,000,000 tons, so the source of the Territory's prosperity may be regarded as permanent. . . .

It was because of the strike of 1940 that the Commission was appointed. My hon. Friend referred to the delay in the publication of the Report. The delay was largely due to communications having to pass between Northern Rhodesia and this country. I might add that had the Commission been appointed by the Colonial Office here there would have been a certain amount of delay, for the same reason. My hon. Friend will realise the difficulties of communication and of transport. We have the Report before us. The Colonial Office, in addition to submitting the Report, have submitted a statement, giving the recommendations and dealing with the result of the negotiations between the Northern Rhodesian Government and the mine managers.

. . . When you examine the changes which have taken place, you find that the companies have not only conceded almost everything asked for in the Report of the Commission, but in some cases have gone a little farther. The acceptance by the mining companies of the recommendations, and what they have done in addition, are, in my opinion, proof of their co-operation. My hon. Friend dealt with the cause of the dispute and also with the wages question and other attendant questions. . . .

I shall therefore not go back into its history, but come straight away to the question of wages. There was one thing to which my hon. Friend did not refer when he complained about the amount of wages paid in the compound. He did not mention the fact that, in addition to wages, houses were provided, and food, not only for the worker, but for members of his family, and also a certain allowance for the renewal of clothes, all of which, of course, are an addition to the wages which are paid to the African workers.

Mr. CREECH JONES: I took the allowances for granted; everyone knows that they are made. I was merely trying to get a contrast between the total cash wage bill and the other income from the industry.

Mr. HALL: I agree that people who know the conditions of the Copperbelt know that, in addition to the wages that are paid, there are other allowances given, and when one comes to balance the wages and the value of what is given in addition, I am not sure whether that which is given in addition to wages does not exceed the amount of the wages that are paid. But I want to put it on record that, in addition to wages, there are these other outgoings. Far be it from me to say that I am entirely satisfied with the amount of wages paid even in accordance with this recommendation, but I am sure that my hon. Friend, as the hon. Member for the University of Wales (Mr. Ernest Evans) has already done, will see that you cannot relate the wages paid to all Africans in the Copperbelt to the wages paid to Europeans, nor the wages paid to Africans in Northern Rhodesia with the wages paid to the people in this country. The only way in which you can relate wages is to relate them to those which are paid in the territory itself.

Mr. CREECH JONES: Not altogether.

Mr. HALL: I am not suggesting that they should be entirely related and kept down to the level of the wages which are paid, but we have to take into consideration the relationship as between the one and the other. I would call the attention of my hon Friend to paragraph 26 of the Report, which points out that until 1926, when industrial development on a large scale commenced, there were very few Africans who had been employed in semi-skilled work, and a large number who had done nothing but rough labour, for which only 5s. per month, plus food, was paid.

Mr. CREECH JONES: Scandalous.

Mr. HALL: I agree, but even at the present time the Commission report that, relating the wages, previously given in the Copperbelt to those which are paid on the railways, in agriculture and in secondary industries, they are not excessive but are in excess. Let me take the wages as they have been fixed in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission. I am not going to say that substantial increases have been agreed to, but increases have been agreed upon. If my hon. Friend or any hon. Member in this House will look at the statement which was issued with this report, he will see that the maximum has been increased, in some instances, from 50s. per ticket to 100s. per ticket. The surface maximum has increased from 40s. per ticket to 80s. per ticket. The minimum has increased by 2s. 6d. per ticket, which is not very much. As my hon. Friend has said, it is about a penny a day. That is so, but he himself got confused in connection with the payment of these wages, and I can understand it. I had for many years some experience in dealing with the pay tickets of South Wales miners, and the way in which these wages are assessed and arrived at is almost as complicated as was the case in South Wales. He said that the 2s. 6d. per ticket cost-of-living bonus was regarded as an efficiency bonus and was only paid in accordance with the wishes or at the discretion of the compound manager. May I assure him that that is not so. The cost-of-living bonus is paid because of the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. CREECH JONES: May I point out that the suggestion was very clearly made that the compound manager may deduct from that bonus in the light of his views as to indiscipline or inefficiency on the part of the worker.

Mr. HALL: I feel sure that my hon. Friend is under a misapprehension in connection with that bonus. It may be that, with regard to other efficiency bonuses the compound manager has the power which he has ascribed to him, but as far as that bonus is concerned, it is purely a cost-of-living bonus. I have stated that, in addition to wages, there are free rents, house accommodation for the married, with free rations for the family, and there is a bonus system for efficiency and other purposes, and then we come to the question of clothing.

Mr. CREECH JONES: This is purely on a question of fact. The Commission recommended the deduction from bonus for disciplinary purposes but this was unacceptable to the Northern Rhodesian Government.

Mr. Hall concluded the debate. The reader is referred to the Official Report for his apologies. Creech Jones's indictment and plea stand. They are unanswerable.

INTERN LORD VANSITTART

By GORDON STOTT

(Advocate; prospective Parliamentary Labour Candidate for West Edinburgh).

[. . . The following short editorial by our comrade, Gordon Stott, appeared in the Edinburgh "Clarion" for November, 1941. It is interesting to note that the same issue of our contemporary publishes a letter of greeting from Herbert Morrison, dated October 27, 1941.—Ed.]

Imprisonment of a British citizen without trial is an odious business at best. The Clarion has alway urged that wherever possible an internee should be furnished with a clear statement of the charges against him and have the right to answer them before a properly constituted court. But if people are to be interned we should see to it that they are the right people—not the innocent and harmles, but those who constitute a real danger to the community.

The Sunday Times is conducting a campaign for the internment of the Duke of Bedford. The Duke is a Christian pacifist. He believes that there is a spark of goodness in every man, even the worst. He believe that there may be some good even in Hitler—and he has been rash enough to say so. The Duke may be quite wrong. His opinion may be absurd. But it does no harm to anyone. There will always be room in the world for the expression of charity and loving kindness—even towards those who least deserve it.

But what of the Sunday Times itself? Week by week, this influential newspaper publishes an article by Lord Vansittart. Lord Vansittart has no understanding of the economic and social causes which lie at the root of war. He knows nothing of the struggle of the working people in all countries. His views are based on a fantastic racial theory, which is nothing else than inverted Hitlerism. They are backed up with half-truths and unsound generalisations. Even if he were right in his pretended "diagnosis," he has no remedy to offer, but is content simply to stir up hatred and bitterness and despair destroying the effect of the Russian propaganda of social justice for all, and doing Goebbels' work by implanting in German minds the certain fear of a peace worse than Versailles.

If there are to be internments at all, why not Vansittart and the editor of the Sunday Times? They and their like are far more dangerous than any pacifist Duke. They—however well-intentioned—are helping Hitler. They are prolonging the war.

THE STRANGE CASE OF MR. TOM JOHNSTON

By F. W. JOWETT

[Reprinted from the "Bradford I.L.P. News," Sept. 26. This essay will be read with interest by all Socialists living in Glasgow who recall Johnston's one-time "Socialist War Points," and his exposure of Lloyd George's Parkhead meeting. Ed.]

In years which are now far away in the dim and distant past I read in one of the novels of Charles Dickens about a person of queer character who in the most appallingly distressing circumstances could always be cheerful. Mark Tapley was the name Dickens gave this perennially cheerful person. Mark had been led by alluring prospects to settle in a remote region of America but found when he got there he had to build his home in a swamp on the road to nowhere. But, in his mind's eye, Mark could see the sunny side when really there was no sun, so to speak, for there was absolutely nothing on which to base his optimism.

I remembered this queer character in the Dicken's novel when I read the report of a speech made by Mr. Tom Johnston, Secretary for Scotland, in last Monday's Yorkshire Observer.

Mr. Tom Johnston, formerly editor of the Glasgow Forward, and a merciless critic of all contentedly comfortable politicians, in or out of office, has now become the Mark Tapley of politics. He is no longer a critic but a purveyor of assurances in a world bristling with injustice and black with peril for the common people for whom he previously used his pen so vigorously.

Speaking last Sunday to Civil Defence workers in Stirlingshire, Mr. Johnston is reported (Yorkshire Observer, Sept. 22nd) as follows:—

". . . . it could be said beyond all doubt that any air attack on Britain would now be at least one-third less in intensity and strength as the result of the destruction of German aircraft on the Russian front. . . ."

"On the subject of food and this year's harvest, Mr. Johnston stated that for the first time in the history of Great Britain there were no empty stomachs in the land."

"From a financial aspect, too, there was reason for quiet satisfaction in that the worst perils of inflation had been avoided because we were now allied to two of the most important nations in the world."

Here are three statements, one of which is dangerously questionable: the other two are distortions, which, in my opinion, are clearly intended to give aid and comfort to the class of people which Mr. Johnston previously savagely opposed but with whom he is now in comfortable partnership.

To deal with the dangerously questionable statement first. On what ground does Mr. Johnston make the alluring, but, as I believe, illusory statement "that any air attack on Great Britain would now be at least one-third less in intensity and strength" than previous attacks? Because, he says, "of the destruction of German aircraft on the Russian front."

This statement, I affirm, is dangerously questionable. One cannot say more in challenging answer to it because the next and future air attacks on Great Britain have not happened yet. That Hitler's Nazi Germany has lost heavily in aircraft in the aggressive war against Soviet Russia is true. The loss may even be as much as one-third of its previous strength. This we do not know.

What wo do know is that whatever Hitler's Nazi Germany has lost in aircraft, the vastness of its operations shows that it is still a force so formidable that if a large proportion of it can be swung over to renew the air attacks on Britain, the attacks may be expected to be greater in intensity and strength than before.

And, in this connection, there are two considerations to be taken into account. One is that, whereas the series of attacks last year in which the German losses were so heavy compared with ours, were attempts at precision bombing at definite targets in daylight or bright moonlight, the change-over afterwards to night bombing was intended quite as much to destroy life and property with the object of destroying the morale of the civilian population.

To this latter form of air-warfare Prime Minister Churchill has challenged Hitler's Nazi Germany, and for months, whilst the German air force has been held in deadly combat by Soviet Russia (to our very great relief) the British press and the British radio have been boasting of the losses of life and property inflicted by British night-bombing raids on German towns.

There is nothing so sure as that the next great change in German war strategy, when the expected winter stabilisation of the battlefront far into the interior of Soviet Russia can be effected, will be that Churchill's challenge will be answered and reprisals in kind will follow.

If Mr. Tom Johnston had been the same man as he was in the last war, with the same outlook as he had then, he would have been warning the people of what is to be expected of this mad night bombing competition and indicating the Party leaders who lend themselves to supporting it instead of making every possible effort to stop it.

Nor would he fail to warn the people of the madness of political leaders who talk of disarming Germany and keeping Germany forcibly disarmed for twenty years or some undeclared period by means of Anglo-American military domination. Anything more sure to keep the war going for many more years yet could not possibly be imagined, for it means the invasion of Germany with sufficient force to occupy it, at least for some considerable time. An adventure that could only be regarded as a possibility by the most extravagant stretch of wishful thinking.

Of Mr. Johnston's two distorted statements the one about food is not only misleading, but insultingly ridiculous. "For the first time in the history of Great Britain there were no empty stomachs in the land," said Mr. Johnston.

Under the heading "New Jap Note to Roosevelt," I read an account in the Daily Herald on Tuesday (Sept. 23rd) of the rapid decline in living conditions in Japan which are said to be inducing the Japanese Government and President Roosevelt to continue negotiations for peaceful agreement between the United States and Japan. This is the point chiefly stressed in the Daily Herald's report on the decline in living conditions in Japan:—

"Living conditions," reports the Daily Herald, "are said to be declining rapidly. There is a shortage of fresh vegetables and other vital foods."

Mr. Johnston himself may have no personal experience of what foods are just as completely out of reach of a large proportion of working class families by reason of the prices of them as if those foods were actually non-existent. One may reasonably assume, however, that at least Mr. Johnston reads his own Party's paper, the Daily Herald, in which Mrs. Ayrton Gould's articles have appeared, and in which unimpeachable medical evidence on malnutrition has been reported. He therefore ought to know that here, as in Japan, for ordinary working class folk there is a "shortage of fresh vegetables and other vital foods." And the Tom Johnston of the last war if he were using his pen as effectively now as he did then would be flaying mercilessly the Ministry of Food and everybody else bearing any share of responsibility for the prices ramps which fill the bank balances of the big profiteers (not forgetting the big business men in the key positions controlling supplies and prices) and keep lean the diet, and empty the cupboards of ordinary working people.

As for Mr. Tom Johnston's quiet satisfaction that the worst perils of inflation have been avoided. Here again he endeavours to create the impression that there is nothing to complain of in the matter of financial chicanery as there was in the last war by making a comparison, very vaguely and insidiously, which is not only misleading but insultingly ridiculous, as his comparison was in his statement about food.

Of course we have avoided the worst perils of inflation. We are not yet in the position Macdonald and Snowden described at the 1931 election to frighten the people and help Montague Norman, as agent for the Bank of England and New York's Wall Street, to crucify the British people on the golden cross of the Gold Standard. But we are heading straight for a £20,000 millions debt and a large part of the debt already recorded is for the loan of bank created credit money—counterfeit money—inflation.

If Mr. Tom Johnston had been the same man with the same outlook as the Tom Johnston of the last war he would not only be attacking the thimble-rigging methods of the financiers but he would be exposing the share pushing speculators and the war munitions profits scandal. So far from encouraging people to hope for a financial tie-up with Wall Street as a guarantee of post-war security, he would be warning them that this tie-up is a danger to be avoided. The wealth and resources of this country will pass in pawn to Wall Street, with the Bank of England and British finance as agent and our ruling classes as bailiffs, if the British people can be induced to accept the complacent attitude of the new Tom Johnston, the contented and comfortable politician of to-day.

FROM NEW ZEALAND

We have received an interesting letter from our comrade, S. Wignall, Hon. Organiser of the Rationalist Association of New Zealand. The declaration of this Association states:

"The Rationalist Associations of New Zealand have similar objects to the Rationalist Association of Great Britain.

The headquarters of the Association are situate at 315, Victoria Arcade Buildings, Shortland Street, Auckland, C.1. Perhaps our New Zealand readers will note this address. From here they can obtain the writings or orations of Thomas Paine, Richard Carlile, Robert Ingersoll, etc.

Under date of October 14, Comrade Wignall writes:—

"Dear Mr. Aldred,—Very many thanks for the literature sent.

A Mr. Sam Anderson, a member of this Association, of Araouni, says he knew you in the early days.

As a political paper I consider your "WORD" of very high standing, and the people of Britain are very fortunate in having such a paper available for the small sum of 3/- per annum. The quality of the paper is only exceeded by the reading material thereon. However, from this Association's standpoint it is necessary to avoid the political view and approach and consider from the religious aspect.

The Life of Mr. Thomas Paine is very ably written indeed and to one who, like myself, finds satisfaction and sources of emulation in biographies, it is highly appraised and appreciated. Have not yet read the Life of Richard Carlile, but I sometimes feel disgusted to find his name omitted from certain encyclopaedias while so much attention is devoted to Thomas Carlyle, who without a doubt is hopelessly behind the times notwithstanding a good command of English.

Of course, we have to face many difficulties as all struggling minority efforts have to; none will know this better than you. Still we are glad to report a steady trend in our direction and there can be no letting up on the struggle if the forces of progress are to triumph.

In conclusion please accept our admiration for the courageous stand, the unflinching determination and steadfast work you are doing, even though we may not all agree in every way with your viewpoint. The Rationalist outlook teaches us that all progress sprang from those, like yourself, willing to suffer imprisonment and persecution, in order that posterity might reap the benefit and follow in your footsteps.

Believe me, yours fraternally,

F. S. WIGNALL."

MONEY AND PROGRESS

SOME LESSONS FROM AMERICAN FINANCIAL HISTORY

By

THE DUKE OF BEDOFRD

History provides no parallel, either in point of view of duration or extent, for the exploitation of the people of the world by international financiers operating an anti-social monetary system. The exploitation of labour by capital is mere child's play by comparison!

As the exploitation of nations by their financiers is still going on in most of the so-called Democracies; and as the methods employed are much the same in different parts of the world, episodes connected with the early history of Finance in the United States are neither devoid of interest nor out-of-date for the student of monetary reform.

In the early part of the eighteenth Century, Pennsylvania, then, of course, a British Colony, adopted a monetary system which, though not absolutely ideal from the point of view of modern progressive economists in that it did not effect a careful adjustment between the supply of money and the supply of goods, had nevertheless some excellent commonsense features and was attended by most satisfactory results.

The Pennsylvania Government created new paper money and lent it to settlers who were desirous of clearing land for productive purposes and putting up buildings. David Hume, an English Historian, describes the method as follows:—

"In Pennsylvania the land itself is coined. The planter immediately after purchasing land can go to a public office and receive notes to the amount of half his land, which notes he employs in all payments. No more than a certain sum is issued to one planter and he must pay back each year into the public Treasury one-tenth of the notes. When they are all paid back, he can repeat the operation. This caused a prosperity that Burke said was unparalleled."

Benjamin Franklyn wrote:

"Abundance reigned in Pennsylvania and there was peace in all her borders. A more happy and prosperous population could not perhaps be found on the globe. In every home there was comfort. The people generally were highly moral and knowledge was extensively diffused."

"In every home there was comfort"—some of us, before the war at any rate, were inclined to feel sceptical when references were made to "the good old times," thanking our stars that we did not live in what we were inclined to regard as an age of semi-barbarism! It is true that the "good old times" had their bad features. Savage penalties were inflicted for very minor offences; superstition was rife; medical knowledge was almost absent; and people seldom or never washed themselves! On the other hand, if we go back far enough in the history both of this country and of America, we really do reach a period when, in certain most important directions, the "good old times" were really good. Members of the weekly-wage earning class had far more comfort and security than many of them have been able to enjoy for many a long year and, if penalties for infringement of the law were foolishly severe, adequate protection by the law of the rights of the citizen was in certain directions better established. In some ways we have not progressed through the centuries but have actually gone back, various causes contributing, of which, in this country, the chief were the neglect of the old Common Law with its just fundamental principles and the substitution of frequently inferior Statute Laws put into operation by Acts of Parliament; the appearance of the financial tyranny; the increasing ignorance and corruption of Members of Parliament; and the failure of the people to take an intelligent interest in public affairs and maintain proper control over their elected representatives. Many of our modern social evils have been attributed to mechanisation and the industrial era, but had it not been for the more fundamental factors already alluded to, the industrial system would have been properly directed and controlled and would have been a benefit to all instead of a curse to many.

Reverting to the American Colonies, the subsequent history of Pennsylvania was extremely sad and teaches a lesson from which we can well profit to-day. Peter Cooper, one of the early American patriots gives the following description of what took place. "When Franklyn was brought before the Parliament of Great Britain and questioned as to the cause of the wonderful prosperity growing up in the Colonies, he plainly stated that the cause was the convenience they found in exchanging their various forms of labour, one with another, by paper money which has been adopted; that this paper money was not only used in the payment of taxes; but in addition it had been declared legal tender. It rose to two or three per cent. above the par value of gold and silver, as everybody preferred its use. One of its advantages was its security against theft as it could be easily carried and hidden on account of its having no bulk, as all kinds of specie (coin) must necessarily have. After Franklyn explained this to the British Government as the real cause of prosperity, they immediately passed laws forbidding the payment of taxes in that money(!). This produced such great misery and inconvenience to the people that it was the principal cause of the Revolution. A far greater reason for a general uprising than the Tea and Stamp Act was the taking away of the paper money."

John Twells, of London, tells much the same story. In describing the Pennsylvanian experiment and its fate he says:

"This was the monetary system under which the American Colonists prospered to such an extent that Burke said of them 'Nothing in the history of the world is like their progress.' It was a wise and beneficial system and its effects were most conducive to the happiness of the people. Half the value of his land was advanced to the head of the family in notes which circulated as money. With these notes he could hire labour and purchase instruments of husbandry and cattle, and thus, where without these notes one acre could be cleared and stocked in a year, ten would, by the assistance of the paper money advanced, be reclaimed from the forest and rendered productive. In an evil hour the British Government took away from America its representative money . . . Now mark the consequences. Ruin seized upon these once flourishing Colonies: the most severe distress was brought home to every interest and every family."

After the United States became independent, the Government for a time issued its own paper notes which were known as "greenbacks." Although the plan was a sound one and was described by Col. Edward Taylor in 1864 as "the greatest blessing the people of the Republic had ever had," it aroused the determined opposition of the financiers, who obtained no tribute of interest from a kind of money which they were not able to issue for their own profit in the form of loans. The battle, unfortunately successful, which they waged to secure control of the issue of American paper money, produced some most revealing documents in the form of a correspondence carried on in 1863 between the London banking firm of Rothschild Brothers, and the firm of Ikleheimer, Morton and Vandergould which had its headquarters in Wall Street, New York. The following are quotations from the correspondence. Rothschild Brothers wrote:

"A Mr. John Sherman has written to us from a town in Ohio as to the profits which are to be made in the National Banking business under a recent Act of your Congress (an Act which had the ultimate effect of getting rid of the State Bank notes just referred to). Mr. Sherman declares that there has never before been such an opportunity for capitalists to accumulate money as that presented by this Act and that the old plan of State banks is so unpopular that the new scheme will, by mere contrast, be most favourably regarded, notwithstanding the fact that it gives the National Banks almost a complete control over the national finances. 'The few who can understand the system' he says, 'will either be so interested in its profits or so dependent on its favours that there will be no opposition from that class, while, on the other hand, the great body of the people, mentaly incapable of comprehending the tremendous advantages that capital derives from the system, will bear its burdens without complaint and perhaps without even suspecting that the system is inimical to their interests.'"

In the above, Mr. Sherman is using the term "capital" in the restricted sense of bankers' capital, as the system which he advocated was often to prove as inimical to employers in industry as to weekly-wage earners.

The reply of Ikleheimer, Morton and Vandergould, praising Mr. Sherman and drawing the picture of the perfect politician from the financiers' standpoint, is really a gem:

"The fact that Mr. Sherman speaks well of such an investment, or of any similar one, is certainly not without weight for that gentleman possesses in a marked degree the distinguishing characteristics of the successful modern financier. His temperament is such that whatever his feelings may be they never cause him to lose sight of the main chance. He is young, shrewd and ambitious. He has fixed his eye upon the Presidency of the United States and is already a member of Congress. He rightly thinks that he has everything to gain both politically and financially (he has financial ambitions too) by being friendly with men and institutions having large financial resources and which, at times, are not too particular in their methods, either in obtaining Government aid or protecting themselves from unfriendly legislation. We trust him here implicitly. His intellect and ambition combine to make him exceedingly valuable to us. Indeed, we predict that if his life be spared he will prove to be the best friend that the monied interests of the world have ever had in America."

With this letter Messrs. Ikleheimer, Morton and Vandergould enclosed a circular, describing the new banks they hoped to found and the profits they hoped to make thereby. Two items in this circular are worth quoting:

"The interest on the bonds, plus the interest on the currency which the bonds secure, plus the incidentals of the business ought to make the gross earnings of the bank amount to from 28 to 33 1/3 per cent. The amount of dividends that may be declared will depend largely on the salaries the officers of the bank vote themselves and the character and rental charges of the premises occupied by the bank as a place of business. In case it is thought best that the showing of profits should not appear too large, the now common plan of having the directors buy the bank building and then raising the rent and the salaries of the President and Cashier may be adopted."

"National Banks are privileged to increase or contract their circulation at will and can, of course, grant or withhold loans as they see fit. As the banks have a national organisation and can easily act together in withholding loans or extending time, it follows that they can, by united action in refusing to make loans, cause a stringency in the money market and, in a single week, or even in a single day, cause a decline in all the products of the country. The tremendous possibilities of speculation involved in this control of the money of a country like the United States will at once be understood by all bankers."

Readers may not be altogether surprised to learn that the letter ends: "Requesting that you will regard this communication as strictly confidential!"

On one occasion when, during their drive to financial power, the banks succeeded in getting a measure passed which subsequently aroused the resentment even of the ignorant American public and of their representatives in the Legislature, the banks adopted a very cute dodge when the time came for the enactment of another measure with the same objective. They opposed it, calculating that the members of the Legislature, being suspicious of their activities but too ignorant of Finance to understand the purport of the new law, would conclude that, as they opposed it, it must be in the national interests and should therefore be passed. The ruse succeeded perfectly and the American Legislature passed it!

One or two prominent American statesmen whose honesty exceeded their knowledge of the financial system, realised too late the evil character of the measures they had been induced to support. Mr. P. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, who had urged upon President Lincoln and upon Congress the passing of the National Banking Act which was instrumental in doing away with the State issue of paper money, is said to have made the following statement:

"My agency in securing the passing of the National Bank Act was the greatest financial mistake of my life. It has built up a monopoly which affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed."

Abraham Lincolm who had taken Mr. Chase's advice, realised shortly before his death the evil effects which were to flow from the creation of the National Banking System. In a letter written, in 1864 he says:

"I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war, Corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow and the money power of the country will endeavour to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicions prove groundless."

Alas, subsequent history has proved that President Lincoln's fears were only too well grounded. An able American monetary reformer has written of the present Administration:

"President Franklin D. Roosevelt went into office vowing to drive the money changers from the temple; but instead of doing so, he turned the 'temple' almost completely over to them. He has given the usurers more tax-free securities than any President, during peace time, in history. He has printed Bonds instead of currency at a time when there has been as great a need for more currency than at any time in history, if not greater. (Bonds are pieces of paper issued by a government which give the holders the right to interest obtained from taxation. These Bonds, within the wide limits set by their loans and cash reserves, the banks can buy with new money created by merely filling-in cheques. In this extremely simple way they obtain a substantial income at the expense of the taxpayer.) It seems doubtful if the President was ever in actual sympathy with the legislation (legislation making possible the issue of more money.) To quiet those who sponsored the legislation he permitted it to be enacted, but reserved the power of making use of it and has then just failed to do so. His administration has made a record for producing one inconsistency after another. He has played the part of a typical politician who kids and tries to please everyone, but in the end, satisfied no one. He has temporised, qualified, and impotentized almost everything that held forth some real hope. Having been born with a gold spoon in his mouth and in a banker environment, it is difficult to see how much could have been expected from him which could have worked for the benefit of the masses."

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The Scots Socialist, Glasgow, for December, 1941, published the following editorial on the Duke of Bedford:—

The heresy hunt against the pacifist Duke has commenced, with all the swinish ferocity usually associated with Goebells. The hate and vindictiveness oozes out of the English press, and persons like Morrison, the pacifist of the last war, when he was of military age, use every opportunity to attack him with a display of savagery equalled only by Streicher, the Jew baiter. We note in passing, however, that no respectable Scottish newspaper has joined the heresy hunt; only the English fifth column press in Scotland has sunk to the level of the Nazi press.

We are glad that Lord Ponsonby has rushed to defend the Duke, at the risk of himself being included in the hunt, and his reference to Morrison and his gestapo was amply justified.

This display shows just how democratic England is and how much of the Nazi philosophy has been absorbed. That the Duke is entitled to his opinions and the right to propagate them is unassailbable and any attempt to prevent him from exercising his fundamental rights as a free citizen will be strenuously opposed by all who still believe in and are determined to preserve real democracy.

We have been overwhelmed with letters concerning the Duke of Bedford's attitude. Also we have a considerable number of interesting press comments. These will be dealt with fully next month.

In last month's issue we reproduce some of the headlines from the sensational millionaire press. Above is another composite news picture. The idea is to present the Duke of Bedford to the readers of the daily press as a person devoid of dignity and therefore an individual whose views must not be considered. He is a person to be shunned because hooligans have daubed a statue with yellow paint, etc.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS
IN THE DOCK

VIII.—"EVENING CITIZEN," GLASGOW.

The Evening Citizen, for Monday, June 20, 1921, reported the trial beneath the following headings:—

SEDITION CHARGE.

3 Men and a Woman,

PUBLICATION OF THE "RED COMMUNE."

Chats on Philosophy.

The report detailed items of the charge and evidence not included in the reports quoted already as follows:—

Three men and a woman appeared before Lord Skerrington in the High Court of Judiciary to-day on a sedition charge. . . .

One article is alleged to have stated that the platform of Communism consisted of the following five planks, namely . . . .

It was also stated that the Glasgow Communist group takes its stand on a platform of constructive revolution.

The paper was also alleged to contain an article by G. L. Malone, M.P., in which he said—"The People's Army must have its own flag, and not deceitfully salute the flag of the enemy as a preparation for striking it. . . ."

Detective-Lieutenant McGimpsey, of the Central Division, Glasgow, stated that the Glasgow Communist group was founded about 1912. . . He went to the house of the accused Jane Hamilton Patrick, whom he described as secretary of the Glasgow Communist group, and there he found 51 membership cards.

Cross-examined by the accused, Aldred, he said he had no personal knowledge of the date of the founding of the Communist group and its fusion with the Anarchist group, but had his information from an advertisement in the "Forward." . . .

A girl of 22 years of age one Menzies Scott Donaldson, who said she was at one time minute secretary of the Glasgow Communist . . .

Cross-examining on what happened at the meetings of the group, Aldred asked: Did we not sit round and have cups of tea and talk?—Yes.

Is it not a fact that our conversation turned on philosophy?—Yes.

FLEMING'S DEFENCE.

Giving evidence for Fleming, the Rev. Mr. Strang, minister of Sandyhills U.F. Church, Shettleston, said he had known accused for over 12 years. . . .

Mr. A. M. MacRobert, advocate-depute, prosecuting—You say accused is a strong Christian. Would he be a party to printing a paper showing a picture of the Bible being smashed up? Witness (examining a picture on the front page of the "Red Commune")—No.

Cross-examined by Aldred—Could there be two interpretations of the picture, one the destruction of the Holy Bible and the other not the destruction of the Bible but only the destruction of the idea of making a fetish of the word "Bible"?

Witness—Possibly.

The Evening Citizen for Tuesday, June 21, in its headings merely contented itself with descriptive statements:—

DEFENDANT'S LENGTHY ADDRESS TO JURY.

Great Public Interest.

In its final edition, the Citizen had a banner headline across the front page: "Sentences in Sedition Case."

Describing the final scene, the Citizen said:—

THE JURY'S RETURN.

After an absence of twenty minutes, the jury, by a majority of fourteen to one, returned a verdict of guilty against each of the accused. . . .

Aldred made an objection, relating to a previous conviction alleged in the indictment, and stated that the certificate of conviction was not produced. The certificate produced was of a different date from that of the alleged conviction. . . .

Aldred said that, as far as the other accused were concerned, he was the inciting person, and if there was to be any differences in the sentences, it should be passed on him.

Miss Patrick and McLeish said that they did not wish to shelter behind anyone else. . . .

As the prisoners were being taken down to the cells, Aldred was seen to kiss Miss Patrick. Miss Patrick afterwards waved her hand to some friends in Court.

IX.—"DAILY RECORD," GLASGOW.

The Daily Record, Glasgow, for June 21, 1921, reported the case beneath the headings:—

COMMUNISTS ON TRIAL.

Glasgow Sedition Charge.

The report was full and fair and summarised the speech for the defence as follows:—

Aldred, in a lengthy address, said that in vain would the Crown look through the "Red Commune" for any suggestion of violence.

Aldred had not finished his address when the Court adjourned till to-day.

The following day, Wednesday, June 22, The Daily Record introduced considerable viciousness into its record. We quote its headings and part of the report:—

"RED COMMUNE'S" SPONSORS.

Sedition-Mongers Sentenced.

After a trial lasting ten hours, the jury in Glasgow High Court, yesterday, returned a verdict of guilty in the case of all four persons tried in connection with the charge of sedition arising out of the publication of "The Red Commune."

Lord Skerrington passed sentence as follows . . .

Aldred's address to the jury lasted for over two hours.

ALDRED'S ADMISSION.

Before sentence was pronounced, Aldred asked his Lordship to consider the fact that he had already been in custody for 100 days.

At the same time, he confessed he was mainly responsible for the production of the "Red Commune," and should receive a heavier punishment than the others. . . .

It would be obvious to any decent journalist or editor that we made no confession. We did not ask the court to consider the 100 odd days we had been jailed on remand. We complained of illegal arrest, without a warrant, which was a trickery of law by an act of legal violence, and we complained of a vindictive imprisonment, through being denied bail on a purely theoretical political charge. Our acceptance of responsibility was simply a straightforward declaration, the intention of which is clear to every thinking person. Such a statement is not confession in any sense of the term. We had nothing to confess. Note also the second day's headings. That was the Daily Record view of "Communism" and "the Reds" in 1921. That might still be its view of genuine Communist activity. But it would persuade its readers to-day that somehow, "the Reds" and the Capitalist Imperialists are united in a common democracy against Fascism. What were these 1921 headings but Fascism?

X.—"BULLETIN," GLASGOW.

The Bulletin, Glasgow, in its issues for Tuesday, June 21, and the following day, publish condensed but very clear factual reports, beneath sober and responsible headings.

On the Tuesday, the report was headed:—

"THE RED COMMUNE."

Sedition Charge Against Glasgow Communists.

The text referred to "Mr. Aldred, who was undefended, in a long speech," etc.

On the Wednesday, the report was headed soberly:—

SEDITION TRIAL.

Glasgow Communists Sent to Prison.

The report was brief, impartial, dignified. But its factual details are embodied in the reports reproduced.

XI.—LABOUR SOLIDARITY.

We intercept the dry factual record to depict the solidarity evinced, or, at least, expressed on paper at the time, by all sections of the movement.

The useful and sympathetic attitude adopted by P. J. Dollan, then Glasgow correspondent to The Daily Herald, has been detailed. Later we shall refer to the Herald's news-items and short editorial comments. Influenced by George Lansbury, the Labour daily displayed magnificent solidarity.

In 1921, The Daily Herald was owned and controlled by the organised Labour movement. This movement was reformist, parliamentary, and orthodox. But it believed in discussion, thought and liberty. It exhibited breadth and showed sympathy for those who believed in revolutionary activity. It classed them as hopelessly Utopian and visionary, but welcomed their propaganda as inspirational in the struggle and part of the workers' struggle: the culture towards developed and sustained struggle. George Lansbury suffered from many errors. As a parliamentarian, he did many wrong things. But he had much sympathy and many virtues. He could speak truthfully and directly. Few parliamentarians achieve such distinction.

In its issue for November 3, 1921, The Daily Herald published the following striking editorial, which we reproduce in full:—

BEGIN AT HOME.

Yesterday we called attention to the proposal by American "justice" to murder Saccho and Vanzetti for being Socialists, under the disguise of executing them for a crime which it is known that they did not commit.

But do not let us flatter ourselves that our English "justice" is very different. We are not in a position to throw stones at America. Our whole system of legal and judicial oppression, our system of courts and prisons, is as wicked and unjust as anything in the world.

John Maclean is in prison in circumstances which, for a man of his enfeebled health after a long hunger-strike, are only too likely to involve death. His crime is to have made speeches which even if they were what the prosecution alleged, would be no worse than the activities of the Ulster leaders in 1914. No worse, did we say? Why, at the worst John Maclean made a speech! But Galloper Smith, who is now Lord Chancellor, and Carson, who is now a Law Lord, organised an army to fight against the British Constitution!

It was admitted by the judge at the trial that Maclean did not desire violence. Yet the sentence inflicted upon him was as savage and vindictive as if he had been guilty of a serious crime.

Similarly, Guy Aldred, also in prison for exercising the traditional British right of free speech, was imprisoned for four months before trial, then sentenced to a year, but not allowed to count the four months he had already suffered as part of that imprisonment.

The brutality of these sentences is a disgrace to the country, and nothing can remove the disgrace except the organised power of Labour.

Sir Basil Thomson, whose Department was notorious for so many prosecutions, has gone. By his own assertion he has not voluntarily resigned, but has been compulsorily got rid of; and his somewhat nauseating Department, which he describes as "the most loyal, zealous, and competent body of public servants," is, perhaps, to be scattered. Would it not then be reasonable, as well as decent, to release simultaneously all those whom this business of spying and prosecuting has put into prison?

This copy of The Daily Herald was smuggled into us in Barlinnie Prison by a friendly warder, who resented the fact that we were denied access to Socialist and Labour papers. He had no other idea than that of being decent. We agreed with it the tone of the editorial then. We agree with it to-day. Sir Basil Thomson's department never went. It is operating still. Although it is directed to-day, mainly against people who rejoiced at our imprisonment in 1921, who are too openly and avowedly anti-Socialist in some instances for a mean and despicably Anti-Socialist system of society upheld by some nominal Socialists, we cannot see that the Special Branch of Scotland Yard serves any more useful function to-day than in 1921. We are opposed to the spy system, no matter who may direct the spy, no matter who is the victim.

When the Daily Herald comment was penned, Herbert Morrison was putting aside his robes as Labour Mayor of Hackney. Foreign Affairs was fresh with his articles pledging the Labour movement against all future war. He was an active member of the I.L.P. and he endorsed this editorial. To-day he is Home Secretary and upholder of 18B and head of the Special Branch, so far as Parliament is concerned. We stand by the editorial which cheered us when we languished in Barlinnie.

In the Daily Herald for November 5, 1921—that is, two days later — George Lansbury honoured us with a special article treating of our imprisonment. Lansbury wrote of the Communist prisoners and continued:—

"Among these is Guy Aldred, editor of the 'Spur,' whose case is well-known to all readers of the 'Daily Herald.' He was born on November 5, 35 years ago. His life has been a strenuous one all through, and during the past ten years he has spent more time inside prison than outside. His one crime in the eyes of Scotland Yard and the Government is that he has desired to serve his fellow men and women. To-day he is serving a monstrous sentence of 12 months imprisonment, with four months added, because of a refusal to grant bail, and the charge which has landed him in prison is the old one of sedition."

Knowledge that such recognition is being accorded to him means much to the political prisoner.

On January 30, 1941, the Baltimore Sun's Washington correspondent, Dewey L. Fleming, announced in its colums that elaborate plans for the induction of conscientious objectors to military service into Federally supervised civilian work programmes were nearing completion.

Officials were working on an initial programme of twenty-five camps, with the prospect that possibly as many as seventy-five or one hundred camps would be required by midsummer. It was planned to distribute them as evenly over the whole country as facilities and feasible work projects would permit, in order to minimise the cost of transporting selectees to camp sites.

The Selective Service Act recognises two types of conscientious objectors. One is the group which objects only to service in combat units of the army. These men are assignable to non-combat groups. The second group includes those who object to participation in any form of military activity. These are the ones for whom Congress devised the civilian work camp.

The camps will be operated co-operatively by various agencies of the Government and an organisation of religious groups with tenets of non-participation in war.

This latter group includes the Society of Friends (Quakers), Church of the Brethren, Mennonites, Advent Christian Church, American Unitarian Association, Fellowship of Reconciliation, some branches of the Baptist and Methodist faith and various other religious sects. Co-operating with them is the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

The church group has organised a national service board for religious objectors to deal with the problem and has established offices for it in Washington. The officers of this board are:

M. R. Zigler, Church of the Brethren, Elgin, Ill., chairman.

Orie Miller, Mennonite bodies, Akron, Pa., vice-chairman.

Paul J. Furnas, Society of Friends, Philadephia, treasurer.

Dr. Arthur Swift, Fellowship of Reconciliation, New York.

Dr. Walter Van Kirk, Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, New York.

Dr. Charles Boss, Jr., Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, Chicago.

Paul Comly French, Philadelphia, executive secretary.

No new construction of consequences will be undertaken. Instead, use will be made of abandoned CCC camps, other Government-owned plants with barrack facilities, and some camps provided by the churches.

Roughly, the division of responsibility and activity in establishment and operation of the camps is as follows:—

(1) The War Department to furnish or loan cots, bedding and other items of camp equipment as far as feasible and necessary.

(2) The Agriculture and Interior departments to provide technical supervision for the work projects involved, such as soil conservation, erosion control, forestry, agricultural experimentation and other work which may be undertaken.

(3) The Federal Security Administration to make available such abandoned camps and equipment of the CCC as can be spared, together with certain tools and equipment.

(4) The Selective Service Board to furnish general administrative and policy supervision and inspection, and to pay the cost of transporting selectees to the camps.

(5) The National Service Board for Religious Objectors to finance and to furnish all other necessary parts of the programme, including actual day-to-day supervision, food and clothing, medical and hospital care, educational and recreational activities. The board to supply selectees with a modest, regular allowance of spending money.

Mr. French, executive secretary of the board, said that it would cost the church group about $35 per man per month to carry out its part of the progremme.

Major Guiton Morgan, the Selective Service Board's special representative on conscientious objector matters, pointed out that the Selective Service Act of 1917 made no specific provision for the service of conscientious objectors beyond recognition of their right to insist upon assignment to non-combatant units of the army.

This feature of the 1917 Act was a source of much difficulty for President Wilson, the War Department and the objectors until it was remedied to a degree by adoption of a policy of furloughing objectors to various kinds of approved work programmes. Before this solution was adopted, however, many objectors had been imprisoned.

The 1940 Selective Service Act specifically directs that persons who "by reason of religious training and belief" are conscientiously opposed to combatant military service shall be deferred from such service in the land and naval forces, but shall be inducted and assigned to non-combatant service for one year. It provided, further, that persons conscientiously opposed to both combatant and non-combatant military service shall, in lieu of induction, be assigned to "civilian work of national importance."

Another difference between the law's attitude toward objectors in 1917 and those of 1940 is that whereas it was necessary for the 1917 objector to show that he was a member of a church with non-military tenets, the objector of 1940 may assert his claim to special classification as an individual and without proof of church membership. The local selective service board decides upon the validity of his claim.

The character of this Selective Board was dealt with at some length in statements in Washington by Attorney General Jackson, on April 7 and 8.

On the first date Mr. Jackson designated William Palmer and Lamar Hardy, former Federal Attorneys in New York State, as hearing officers to investigate the claims of conscientious objectors to selective service within that State.

Mr. Palmer, former Assistant United States Attorney for the Western District, will handle the Northern and Western District of the State. Mr. Hardy, former United States Attorney for the Southern District, was assigned to the Southern and Eastern Districts.

These officials were appointed to operate under a section of the Selective Service Act which requires the Department of Justice to investigate the claims of conscientious objectors. Other hearing officers will act in other States.

The law provides that claims of conscientious objectors must be referred by appeal boards to the United States Attorneys in whose districts they are filed. They transmit the claims to the Department of Justice, which conducts an investigation through the Federal Bureau of Investigation. This report is sent to the hearing officer.

If exemption from selective service is requested on the ground of affiliation with a church or group which forbids military service, an investigation will be conducted to establish whether the claim is bonafide. For individual conscientious objectors, the hearing officer must hold an inquiry and report his findings on the basis of individual claims.

On April 8 Attorney-General Jackson promised fair play to conscientious objectors. He said that the pleas of objectors would be heard by men chosen for their "patience, tolerance, and well-balanced judgment." The hearings would not be in the nature of a trial or a judicial proceeding. They would be human and informal. They would be non-legalistic and without ordinary rules of evidence. But they would seek to discover the truth. Mr. Jackson added:—

"The interest of the registrant may well require that the hearing, in view of its nature and object, be private. It should be so conducted that the rights of the registrant on the one hand and the rights of his country and fellow-citizens on the other are recognised and protected."

The same day the Federal Bureau of Investigation announced that an investigation was being conducted by the Department of Justice of the cases of 10,500 men thought to be Selective Service evaders. Seventy persons had been convicted of evasion.

We have received from our comrade, Jessie Wallace Hughan, Secretary, War Resisters' League, 171 12th Street, New York, N.Y., U.S.A., important statements and reports on the conscientious objectors' position in the United States, under the Selective Training and Service Act, 1940. The matter will be studied thoroughly and dealt with in these columns.

ADLARD'S LAST POEM

Last month we recorded the death of our comrade, the Rev. Henry J. Adlard, minister of the Unitarian Church, Trim Street, Bath. Below we reproduce his last poem, published in the St Ives Times, November 7, 1941:—

THE LIFEBOATMEN OF ENGLAND.

The lifeboatmen of England,
Who guard our rugged coast,
Who live in cot and hamlet,
And never heard to boast.

Their deeds, not words, their story tell,
Their praise is yet unsung.
Be mine one faltering pen,
To give their epic tongue.

Ready they stand by day or night,
To rescue human lives.
With hearts as brave as arms are strong,
And swift good byes to children, wives.

The lifeboatmen of England,
Defy the raging sea,
Daring the mountain billows,
Their cruel treachery.

The lifeboatmen of England,
Sometimes are seen no more.
They find a wandering grave,
By some deserted shore.

But "Man the lifeboat" goes the word,
And Englishmen are there.
As staunch and steady as of yore,
To bear their gallant share.

Bath, October, 1941.

We do not think that this is the best specimen of Mr Adlard's work. But it does bring out the importance of saving life, the bravery of such work, as opposed to the callousness and cruel stupidity of war.

Our comrade's American addresses will be reprinted from time to time, and finally collected in volume form.

ETHEL MACDONALD

The conscription of man-power and woman-power affects our comrade, Ethel MacDonald, who now has to take her stand as a conscientious objector. Comrade MacDonald plays a large part in the setting, printing, and circulating of The Word and the various Strickland Press pamphlets and leaflets. She is definitely Socialist and Pacifist, and she knows what war means, since she went to Barcelona to assist in the struggle against Franco, under C.N.T. auspices.

Ethel MacDonald joined the Bellshill I.L.P. when she was sixteen. This means she has been a member of the Socialist movement for sixteen years. In 1931 she joined the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation. After the split in that movement in 1933, she joined the Workers' Open Forum, which pioneered the United Socialist Movement, which was founded in June, 1934.

When the Franco rebellion, aided by Hitler and Mussolini, occurred in Spain, the U.S.M. issued the series of Regeneration leaflets, some of which have been reproduced in The Word. Contact was established with our Spanish comrades, and as a result comrades Jane H. Patrick (A.P.C.F.) and Ethel MacDonald (U.S.M.) proceeded to Spain. They left Glasgow on October 21, 1936, proceeded under circumstances of great poverty, and almost hitch-hiked across a part of France. Finally, they reached Barcelona, and were established in the C.N.T. headquarters. Some of Ethel MacDonald's radio speeches to Britain from the Barcelona station, calling for resistance to Fascism and help to Spain, have been published in leaflet form, and can be obtained still from this office. Comrade Patrick proceeded to Madrid, where she served for three months in the Committee of Defence. She went back to Barcelona. Then came the famous May Days, when the reactionary pseudo-Communists made war on the Anarchist and genuine Socialist elements. The first accounts of the May Days to reach the outside world were written by Jane Patrick and Ethel MacDonald, and were published in Glasgow in the widely circulated Barcelona Bulletin. Ethel MacDonald stayed on in Barcelona, and was arrested by the reactionary "Communist" junta. Her graphic letters, describing her experiences, were published in The Evening Times, Glasgow, between June and September, 1937. On the 3rd September of that year Ethel MacDonald left Spain, under escort. She made some European Socialist contacts, and reached Glasgow on November 7.

The fact that Ethel MacDonald lived and worked voluntarily in Barcelona for about ten months, during the bombardments and air-raids, shows that her opposition to war does not proceed from fear. She sees war as something wrong in itself, that leads inevitably to reaction. It is not the way of Socialist opposition to dictatorship and reaction. Also, in the present instance, she cannot forget that the present upholders of war in Britain favoured Franco in Spain, and permitted the wholesale slaughter of the working class in Spain by Nazi bombers without uttering one word of protest. She pleaded consistently over the air, night after night, from Barcelona in vain.

Militarism is not the way to freedom. Anti-militarism can conquer and can destroy utterly all dictatorship and all counter-revolution. Ethel MacDonald considers the production of The Word of real national importance.

Copies of Save Spain! Act! Ethel MacDonald's radio speeches, and News from Spain, describing the struggle in Spain, may be obtained still from this Office, each 2d, post free 3d. That is, 6d for the two publications.

CANADA'S CONCHIES

At Edmonton, on January 7, 1941, requests of adherents of the Christian Conventions, the Moravian Church, and the International Bible Students (Jehovah Witnesses) for exemption from compulsory military training on the ground of "conscientios objection' were denied by Chief Justice Horace Harvey, chairman of the Alberta War Services Board. He ruled that they were not entitled to exemptions because they are not religious denominations whose tenets of faith forbid the bearing of arms, as required under National War Service Regulations.

Speaking the same night, at Ottawa, the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, minister of National War Services, said that it would no longer be a requirement that a conscientious objector must belong to a religious faith the tenets of which forbid bearing arms.

The amendments, published that day in an extra edition of the Canada Gazette, provided that the applicant for indefinite postponement of military training must have a certificate from a minister of religion that he belongs to some religious denomination, not necessarily one that forbade the bearing of arms, and that he is a sincere conscientious objector.

The original regulations under which men are called up for the 20-day compulsory military training provided exemption from military training for Doukhobors and Menonites.

Although issued on January 7, the regulations were made to date from December 24, 1940. This would enable conscientious objectors, whose cases had been heard and dismissed, to make fresh application in the light of the changed regulations.

We consider the insistence on a minister's certificate nonsense. Why cannot an Atheist be opposed to taking life? Many Atheists are definite conscientious objectors and have the same right to consideration as those who profess to believe in God or in the Christian religion.

The following day Mennonite leaders at Ottawa informed the Government that young Mennonites had no objection to being conscripted for any type of non-combatant work irrespective of the danger involved. Mennonites were perfectly willing to go overseas to serve as firemen, or in bomb removal squads, or as stretcher bearers.

Mr. R. A. Irwin, Registrar for Military District No. 2, and Secretary to Canada's National War Service Board, in Toronto, intimated on January 14 that young Canadians who object to the military training in any form imposed by the National Mobilisation Act, will be placed under civilian jurisdiction and given civilian jobs for the same length of period as the training camps.

Two days later, Mr. Irwin stated that, in such jobs as ambulance driving, stretcher-bearing, and kitchen fatigue duties, the wearing of uniform as well as the bearing of arms would be unnecessary.

McGill University, through action taken by its senate, made provision for conscientious objectors in its compulsory military training programme, it was announced on January 28 by Dr. F. Cyril James, principal and vice-chancellor.

The action taken by McGill followed the amendment by the Dominion Government of the National War Service Regulations.

The provision for conscientious objectors made possible the returns of two students previously suspended for failure to take the military training required.

The two students agreed to return to the University, and to undergo the special course of non-combatant training. As this course includes trench-digging, we do not understand how the University Senate agreed to impose it, or the objectors agreed to accept it.

Conditional exemption, subject to appellant's performing non-military service under the National Service Emergency Regulations at the direction of the Minister, was granted to Garnett Berry Thirkell, warehouseman, member of the Apostolic Church, and his cousin, Francis Richard Cooper, railways clerical cadet.

Thirkell did not consider farm or A.R.P. work war work. But he would not discharge either form of work under military control. He concluded:

"I am not prepared to assist the war in any circumstances whatever."

Pastor J. F. B. Thompson, president of the church in New Zealand, said the church was the outcome of the Welsh revival in 1904. Work started in New Zealand in 1934. The church was against taking up arms.

Cooper refused to take the oath and cited Matthew v. 33-37, and James v. 12, in support of his objection. The chairman, W. F. Sitwell, S.M., said:—

"That's strange. I did not know the Scriptures enjoined one to take no oath. However, I am willing to learn."

Mr. C. O. Bell said that the railways were contributing to the war effort by running troop trains and transporting ammunities. The chairman told Cooper that he was working for the biggest munition workers in New Zealand, the Railways Department, and he ought to face the fact.

On Friday, February 7, the Chairman made an interesting statement, in rejecting the appeal of Stanley Gordon Field, a member of the body known as the Exclusive Brethren. This body does not claim that name, although known by it. The New Zealand membership is about 3,000. Field said that he could not kill people for whom Christ died. He would accept non-combatant service.

The Chairman said that conscientious objectors prepared to do non-combatant service did not come within the protection afforded by the regulations to proved conscientious objectors. The board was satisfied that appellant was sincere, but as he was willing to do non-combatant service his appeal must be dismissed, with a recommendation that, if it was possible, he be posted to a non-combatant unit of the armed forces.

Seven appeals against military service on the grounds of conscientious objection were dismissed in all on February 7. Four appeals were allowed, subject to obligation for non-military service at the discretion of the Minister of National Service, and two were adjourned, one sine die and the other for three months.

One of the dismissed cases was that of Norris Gilbert Smith, salesman, who said he was a Jehovah's Witness. He stated that in England Jehovah Witnesses had been granted exemption from military service.

The Chairman: You are aware, of course, that the Jehovah's Witnesses in New Zealand have been declared a subversive organisation?

Smith: Yes, sir.

Bell: Are you a New Zealander?—I was born in New Zealand, but I claim to be a foreigner. I do not consider myself to be of the people. My allegiance is to God, not to man. I am really a neutral in this world.

He added that if he were in the army he would be under Satan's control.

Another dismissed case was that of Alexander Wilson, grocer's assistant. He believed that no man had the right to kill or to injure another man. He was not prepared to engage in militarism to defend any country. He had held these views for twenty years and was a member of the Peace and Anti-Conscription League.

Walter Royce Stagg, garage attendant, asked the Tribunal:

"Why should I travel thousands of miles to kill a man I have never seen before, and whom I will not see while I am killing him?"

Charles Stewart, assurance agent, appealed on moral and humanitarian grounds. Killing was never justifiable. To him there were no nationalities. It was merely an accident of birth whether a person was British or non-British. All men were equal in rights irrespective of this accident of place of birth and had the same rights to life, health, and happiness. The only steps he would take to preserve the happiness of the country would be peaceful steps.

Harvey Imandt, a cutter, sent in a statement, saying that he was of German descent, and that his parents were registered aliens. He would not bear arms against any worker, irrespective of nationality.

All these appeals were dismissed.

LOVE NEVER FAILS

By GUY FANANI

Since the wisdom of this world plunged our poor humanity into a futile and ruinous war for the second time in twenty-one years, I have frequently been asked to name the probable winners of the present international conflict. My considered reply has never varied. "There are no victors in war, apart from the powers of evil. But if this war lasts long enough, Joseph Stalin will reap a huge harvest at the end—if he manages to keep out." However, other men, apparently, realised what the effects of a prolonged war would be, with the result that Stalin no longer is an interested spectator!

But the first part of the reply holds good. The powers of evil will be the only certain winners in this war if it be fought out, to use a phrase beloved of the bellicose patriot, "to the bitter end." The end will be bitter for everybody, as it has already been for thousands of innocent men and women in nearly all lands.

I am penning these words as one who firmly believes that the injuries which most deeply hurt us are of our own infliction—that no earthly power can really harm and defile us if we will that it shall not be so. But I also believe that there is a reason, or a variety of reasons, for everything and everybody under the sun.

Are there men of whole nations whose methods of establishing a New World Order appear to us, to put it mildly, rather odd? Very well; we should make it our business—indeed, it is our plain duty—not only to insist on the oddity of their behaviour, but, what is more important, to discover and remove its causes. The very last thing that will convert them to our alleged superior methods and higher standards of conduct is to copy their methods and conduct—and excel them in a devilish sense! Obviously, that will only confirm them in their present strange way of going about doing good!

Our commonsence should tell us that such a terrible affliction as is now visiting us is not just the work of one man or even one nation. We should constantly remember that no state of war can possibly exist between ourselves and others while we remain their friends. In other words, "it takes two to start a quarrel."

Whenever men, be they exalted statesmen or humble working-men, start talking about destroying, extinguishing and extirpating others (and the air is full of such elevating talk just now) we can safely assume that their motives are anything but altruistic! Usually, they want to get other people out of the way because they have either good or bad reasons for suspecting them of being a menace to their own existence.

Ordinarily, men want to "live and let live." If, therefore, it be a fact that any of our fellowmen anywhere on this globe are so evilly-disposed towards us as to seek our destruction or downfall, we should ask ourselves what we have done or left undone to create so deplorable a state of mind in them. And, having answered that question, we should retrace our steps and make the necessary amends.

Destroying, extinguishing and extirpating our "enemies" is not going to make the world any better if we remain what we now are. For we shall treat others as thoughtlessly as we have treated them. And where would our New World Order be if these others—their successors—developed an even worse mentality than the "enemies" already destroyed?

It is, of course, quite foolish to imagine that the world will ever be a better place for us and our children to live in until we ourselves are better men and women.

We are none of us blameless for the unspeakable tragedy of war. Had we who can say with meaning that love never fails and have turned our backs on all other weapons to achieve our goal of a peaceful world—had we worked as hard for love and peace as others did for hatred and discord, men and women might have learned, without a second world war, that no one can live fully and truly unless we all live. Instead, they are learning through "blood, tears, sweat and toil," because that is their unfortunate choice, that the sword heals nothing, mends nothing, saves nothing, but only further divides and destroys men and women everywhere.

Nothing is more certain than that this wanton destruction of life and property will continue until either calm reasoning or much greater sufferings than we have yet endured shall have taught us to obey that law of life which the Nazarene Carpenter so plainly manifested in his life—unstinted love for all our kind, but especially for those whom our thoughtlessness or their own waywardness has caused to stray, for they need our love most.

Love is the only thing in life which, because it is the law of life, never fails.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—The reproduction in the October number of the statue of Edith Cavell, I prophesy, will meet with very great appreciation. It is so very beautiful. I notice that Mr. Punch's History of the last war only uses the tragedy of her death as a tag on which to hang war propaganda. It was simply splendid that F. W. Jowett managed to have such a pacific inscription placed on her statue. I heard at the spot where she was shot that no soldier of the firing party could fire, so great was his agitated trembling, and the officer had to fire the shot.

I feel that we should be indebted especially to The Word for the outline of Jowett's concept of a workable parliament, which you have included in the article on him. One comes up against that question all the time.

With best wishes and thanks,

Yours sincerely,

AGNES W. MACKAY.

Liverpool, October 9.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—My two winters in Glasgow were the worst in my experience, financially, but I can look back with some interest to the U.S.M. Albion St. Saturdays, the organ recitals at Kelvingrove, and the Mitchell Library.

I recall my first contact with the U.S.M. This was at Albion Street and my companion who was on his way to England to join the R.A.F. described the speaker (after listening for two minutes) as "another god damned wise guy" and hurried us along to some more "congenial" attraction. Johnston was killed in action early in the war!

Yours faithfully,

J. D. SMYTH.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I would like to recommend, very strongly, C. E. Montague's Disenchantment to your readers. It is the finest analysis of wartime and of war's stupidity that I know. Chatto and Windus have brought out a shilling edition of it. Every Socialist and Pacifist student should read Montague's summing up on World War No. 1 as it affected England. As always.

CHRISTIANITY ACCORDING TO CHRIST

By Rev. H. J. DALE

(Assistant Minister, Baptist Church, King's Road, Reading).

How frequently in the course of history has it happened that movements which were launched with the sincerest motives and highest intentions, and in the hands of their founders bid fair to achieve something of the purpose for which they were intended, have lost much of the spirit and character that marked their early successes through the misrepresentation and insincerity of later adherents. Many instances of this failure to maintain the original glow will come readily to mind.

To this common experience Christianity can lay no claim to being an exception. Indeed, some would not hesitate to affirm that it provides the supreme example of a discredited hope. However unwilling we may be to associate ourselves with such a verdict, we have only to contemplate Christianity as it has been exemplified from time to time through the centuries, to realise how far from the intention and example of Jesus it is possible for those who bear His name to stray.

Nor can we claim that any better state of things is to be found to-day. What purports to be Christianity is in large measure little more than a caricature. Can we truthfully say that Christianity according to Christ is the most, or even one of the most, conspicuous features of the present day? What opinion will future generations form regarding our professed allegiance to the teaching of Jesus? Is obedience to the Master's way of life being acknowledged as the final authority, either in the lands that are nominally Christian, or in the conduct of Christians individually? Sadly and with shame it has to be confessed that too often such obedience is conspicuously absent. Instead, there is to be seen in all these spheres a spurious Christianity which is very far removed from the original. How far removed it is from the genuine commodity, perhaps we do not fully realise. It has been said that if Buddha could walk through China and Japan to-day and see the temples built to his glory, the ideas that prevail regarding him, the things done in his name, his comment would be, "If this is Buddhism, then I am not a Buddhist."

Is not the case very much the same with the Christian religion? In many respects its present-day character merits a like condemnation. Were Jesus to appear among us once again in bodily form, what would be His comment? Would He find faith on the earth? Would He recognise as the natural consequence of His teaching and example much that we are well content to pass off under His name? Would He see in the Church's attitude to the contemporary world-situation a spirit and purpose harmonising with His own? Would it surprise us were He to say, "I know you not?"

For this manifest failure to bear a faithful witness to the fundamental spirit of its faith, no small share of blame must be laid at the Church's door. Too long has official Christianity allowed itself to be a tool of the State. The acknowledgment of Christianity as the accepted religion of the Roman Empire by Constantine was by no means the unmixed blessing some have supposed. Ever and again through the centuries, as a consequence of the alliance of Christianity with the temporal power, the Church has found its hands to be tied, and therefore its freedom to speak its own specific message destroyed. The result is that whenever, in the spirit of unusual daring, the Church has attempted to make its voice heard, its appeal has been ignored.

Of this pitiful weakness, the Church's present servitude to the temporal power provides ample evidence. How can it proclaim in all its truth and fulness the message of the Gospel so long as it is committed to a policy of war? Once the Church has taken the perilous step of compromising with this supreme evil, its power and effectiveness in any plans of reconstruction and the building of a new order are to that extent undercut. Nor is its guilt solely a present one. For years the Church has failed to denounce a social and economic system which was all too plainly making war inevitable. By lending its support to the world's standards and methods, it has jeopardised its authority to interpret the spiritual character of the Kingdom of God.

"Come ye out from among them" is an exhortation every bit as imperative to-day as when first spoken. The spirit of the world is as strongly opposed to that of the Master as ever it has been. The Divine will can be done only in the Divine way. Jesus made it quite clear that to follow Him would mean rejection by the world, even as He had been rejected. The Cross is still an offence and a cause of stumbling to those into whose hearts its eternal message of love and forgiveness has never broken. It is those who are prepared to do God's will who shall know the true blessedness that He promises.

Never was there a day when more was known about Jesus than the one in which we live. As far as scholarship can help us, we are in possession of as many facts regarding Him, His teaching, His manner of life, and the conditions amidst which He lived and worked, as possibly we can be at this distance of time from them. Yet it is in this very knowledge that the root of the trouble we are considering is to be found. Religion about Jesus, an intellectual assessment of Him, has been allowed to crowd out the religion of Jesus. In short, greater interest has been awakened in an objective study of Him and certain details of His life than in the desire to live and act according to His teaching. Yet it matters far less whether Jesus wrought certain miracles or not, or that particular views should be held regarding the Atonement, than that His followers should try to act and live in humble obedience to the great ideals He set before them, and put His mind and spirit into practice. It is possible, says Dr. Fosdick, for a man to have a religion about Jesus and harbour bitter racial prejudice; to have a religion about Jesus and be a rampant militarist, a narrow nationalist, a hard-handed industrial autocrat; to have a religion about Jesus and be unfit to live with at home. But no one can have the religion of Jesus and be that. (Adventurous Religion).

Theory seldom carries us very far, especially where religion is concerned. What the world sorely needs just now is a practical demonstration of those basic realities of the Christian faith which are essential to a true unfolding of the power and possibilities of the Gospel. If Christianity is to possess any real value or significance for the future, it must prove itself capable of meeting those varied and complex issues with which men find themselves faced at the present time. All that concerns the social and economic structure of society, as well as the moral and spiritual aspects of its existence, will have to be brought within the range of its transforming influence, if mankind is to be saved from hopeless ruin. Nothing is more urgently necessary than the application of the Christian message of love and goodwill to all that affects the souls and lives of our fellows. For the accomplishment of this great hope nothing less than wholehearted obedience to Jesus Christ will suffice. Those who at present remain unaffected by the Christian appeal will be won to submission to its demands, not by the paying of lip-service to its ethical demands, but as they see its ideals exemplified in the spirit and conduct of men and women who profess to believe in it. Deeds, not words, are best calculated to produce this result. After all, Christlikeness is the criterion of Christianity, and to substitute anything else is not only to make our faith meaningless, but also to prejudice all our expectation of bringing to fulfilment the cause to which we have pledged ourselves as servants of the Master.

WAS JESUS A REBEL?

Many Freethinkers object to our biography of Jesus—The Rebel and His Disciples (64 pages, 4d)—that nothing is known about Jesus, and that, in point of fact, he never existed.

In The Literary Guide for October, 1941, Mr. K. Wilby writes:—

Tacitus tells us in the famous passage in the 'Annals,' xv. 44, that Christ was put to death in the reign of Tiberius. I once asked the late Prof. W. C. Summers, whose knowledge of Silver Latin was probably unrivalled, and who was as thorough an Agnostic as anyone I have ever met, if there was any doubt that Tacitus wrote the passage. 'Only a blockhead could doubt it' was his reply. . . .

J. B. Bury, in his "History of the Roman Empire," 27 B.C.—180 A.D. (p. 302), writes:

"The famous passage in which Tacitus notices the persecution of the Christian sect at Rome after the great fire is remarkable not only as the earliest detailed account of the facts, but also incidentally as containing both the earliest record of the Crucifixion in a classical author and the only mention of Pontius Pilate in a Roman historian."

The letter from Sir James G. Frazer which appeared in the "Literary Guide" for August, 1934, opens with the sentences:

"The doubts which have been case on the historic reality of Jesus are, in my judgment, unworthy of serious attention. Quite apart from the positive evidence of history and tradition, the origin of a great religious and moral reform is inexplicable without the personal existence of a great reformer."

Under these circumstances we have no objection, as a Rationalist and Freethinker, to being ranked, through The Rebel and His Disciples, and our companion pamphlet, Historical and Traditional Christianity, as one of the biographers of Jesus.

In these works, we approach very near to Morrison Davidson's conclusions of Jesus's worth and character, as expressed by him in his Son of Man and Gospel of The Poor. We discard, and indeed resent, the superstitious adulation in what that famous but eccentric Scots scholar and writer indulged. We have much in common with F. J. Gould's The People's Jesus, but we would embody much Freethought criticism with our study of the political and ethical values of the Christian faith. We think the ethical and humanist value of the first Christian teaching cannot be overestimated.

We reject the myth theory advanced by scholars like the late J. M. Robertson but are not opposed greatly to the scholars who advance it as an explanation of the "received" or orthodox story of the "life" of Jesus. We seek to explain the myth school in the terms of the materialist conception of history, whilst gratefully availing ourself of the scholarship of this school.

Renan's Life of Jesus is incompetent and actually unworthy of his scholarship. Renan lacked just that essential touch of social vision necessary to place and to understand Jesus.

Middleton Murry attracted attention in The Life of Jesus. He portrayed Jesus as a mystic but not as the Son of God, save in the sense that all men of vision are the sons of God. Murry explained away the miraculous also. This is an excellent work, although it could have been written with more passion. Twelve years after writing it the author became a Christian Pacifist and a member of the P.P.U. He developed the Anglican Faith and, just before the outbreak of the war, was thinking of becoming a priest of the Church of England.

Herr Ludwig has written The Son of Man, in which he discards boldly the miraculous elements.

Llewelyn Powers has pictured Jesus as a poor, bewildered leader, self-persuaded into dreams of throwing off the Yoke of Rome, in his wonderful work, The Pathetic Fallacy.

In 1938, the sensational press gave prominence to Sir Hall Caine's Life of Christ.

We write a "life" of Jesus, not of Christ. The difference between the use of the name, Jesus, and the office, Christ, marks the difference between reason, paying living reverence and tradition, paying servile tribute.

We are moved to recall these facts by an interesting essay, contributed by the Rev. H. P. Kingdon, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and Editor of The Way, to The Student Movement, Leicester, for April, 1941, under the title: "The Political Circumstances of The Crucifixion."

Mr. Kingdon refers the reader for fuller evidences of the truth of his contention to his article published in The Hibbert Journal, for July, 1937. He opens his article in the Student Movement with these sentences:

"The crucifixion of freemen was the Roman penalty for treason, instigation to revolt, and the kindred crime of robbery with murder. Next to burning alive (crematis), it was regarded as the cruellest form of capital punishment, and it was not inflicted by the Jewish Sanhedrin. Had Jesus been executed by the Jews (who apparently did carry out several capital sentences during the Roman period) He would have been stoned, strangled, burned, or decapitated. Instead of this, He was crucified—presumably as a political rebel—by Pilate."

We object to Mr. Kingdon's capital aitches for the personal pronoun. His article remains interesting and he develops his theme with scholarship, logic, and commonsense. At a later date we hope to reprint the full essay. Meantime, we refer comrades to it and ask them to circulate our Christian studies as contributions to the understanding of the Christian message and the place of Jesus in the social struggle.

IN DEMOCRATIC FELLOWSHIP

This journal publishes no paid advertisements. The announcements made in its columns from time to time of Unitarian Churches, Secular societies, Socialist bodies, are published freely, because we feel that the bodies concerned are doing useful work, and because we believe in a broad democracy of culture. We have exact views, but no sectarianism. Readers are asked to note the announcements, because we object to publishing stereotyped notices, month after month. Organisations are functioning, even though their announcements disappear from our columns for a while. So preserve the references and make enquiries. This puts out columns to a continuous living use. Also, if you belong to a group whose activities have been overlooked, and you feel that the group is doing useful work, drop us a line. The Word is a living organ of democratic thought and activity, and does not propose to give up to party or to sect energy or service which was meant for mankind. We invite you to a feast of thought, truth, and discussion: a world of Free Thought and free gathering of humanity in the spirit of Truth, Fellowship, and Understanding. A great fellowship of seeking and adventure.

ROBERT CAMPBELL

Robert Steven Campbell registered as a conscientious objector on October 21, 1939. The Glasgow Tribunal removed him from the register on December 18. Subsequently, the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal confirmed this decision. He was served in due course with medical papers and was imprisoned from July 9-18 for refusing medical examination. He then made the mistake of submitting to medical examination, as he was advised that his case would be reheard only if he did this.

Campbell received his enlistment papers on August 15, 1940, and returned these with a letter stating his position. He was arrested on August 31st and taken under military escort to his unit at Redcar. Here he refused to obey military orders and received a sentence of 28 days military detention, which he served on the military side of Barlinnie Prison, Glasgow. Released on September 26, he was conveyed to Marske, near Redcar, under military escort. Here he was remanded for Court-Martial.

October 7, 1940. Court-Martialed. Army witnesses expressed opinion that Campbell had disobeyed commands from reason of conscience.

October 10. Sentenced to 1 years hard labour, Durham Civil Prison.

October 29. Transferred to Wakefield Prison.

February 2, 1941. Appeared before the Appellate Tribunal at Edinburgh. Removed to Edinburgh Civil Prison.

February 14. Advised Tribunal decision. Application dismissed.

March 31. Transferred to Perth Prison.

June 7. Completed sentence. Taken back to Marske by military escort.

June 10. Remanded for 3rd Court-Martial.

June 14. 3rd Court-Martial.

June 19. Sentenced to 2 years' military detention. Court-Martial decided that, despite his conscientious objection, as he had his opportunity of appearing before the Appellate Tribunal, there were no grounds for further appeal. Legally, he was a soldier, and must be sent to detention.

June 28. Arrives at Military Detention Barracks, Northallerton.

We ask the Socialist and Pacifist movements to take up Campbell's case. Clearly, the Tribunals in this case, came to an unwise decision. The War Office should be gracious and release Campbell unconditionally.

EDEN, SIMON AND HITLER, MARCH, 1935.

Sir John Simon was Foreign Secretary 1931-35. In September, 193., Japan broke her triple pledge to preserve China (Nine Power Treaty 1922) League Covenant, and Kellogg Pact, by the seizure of Manchuria, China's most Northern province. China appealed to the League of Nations. Lytton Commission appointed February, 1932, to study problem on the spot. Report, published October, 1932, condemned Japan. League accepted Report. Japan replied by seizing province of Jehol. In December, 1932, Sir John Simon made a speech so favourable to Japan, that the Japanese representative thanked him for saying "IN HALF-AN-HOUR, IN A FEW WELL CHOSEN PHRASES, WHAT HE, THE JAPANESE DELEGATE, HAD BEEN TRYING TO SAY IN THE LAST TEN DAYS." Thus Japan triumphed and Manchurio became the puppet "independent Republic of Manchukuo!

On April 28, 1932, Sir John Simon owned 1,512 shares in Imperial Chemical Industries, Britain's largest chemicals and therefore important war combine.

Eden defended the betrayal of the Spanish Government and the Spanish workers by the "Non-Intervention" pact of Britain, France, and Russia, to Franco and Germany and Italy. He claimed in August, 1936, that "non-intervention" (that is, intervention against Spanish democracy) had averted war. Said Eden in the House of Commons: "A WAR POSTPONED MAY BE A WAR AVERTED." In March, 1939, Socialism and democracy were ousted in Spain and Franco and Fascism triumphed.

Simon became a Viscount and Lord Chancellor in 1940. F. W. Jowett indicts one aspect of Simon's criminal apathy in face of the conspiracy of Fascism in his splendid article in this issue.

JAPAN: WHO NURSED THE TIGER?

By F. W. JOWETT

[This essay was published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News," for Friday, December 19, 1941. We reproduce it as a valuable contribution to working class understanding at the present period of crisis.—Ed.]

Our rulers, and the British money lords who, behind the scenes, direct the policy of our rulers on all vital questions, have made a discovery. They have discovered that Japan, the military power they deliberately created to serve as a shield of protection for Imperialist and financial interests, has not only become their enemy, but an enemy that fights with unexpected ferocity. They are alarmed by the creature of their own creation.

The press at last sounds the alarm. "Warships sunk by suicide pilots," screams the Daily Herald headline (December 11, 1941), and under the headline relates of the Japanese pilots at Pearl Harbour that:—

As they released their torpedoes all the airmen flung their machines straight at their objectives thus repeating the famous exploit of the "human torpedoes" which marked the Japanese attack on Shanghai.

Says the Yorkshire Observer (December 11, 1941):—

The human factor has been raised in reports that "suicide pilots" in the Japanese air arm are prepared to sink every consideration of personal safety in order to accomplish their task and so reap their due reward in heavenly exaltation.

Of the desperate character of the Japanese medieval-minded army, trained to use modern machinery of war, the Daily Herald (December 15, 1941) says:—

They hack their way through the jungle behind and between our lines and wade or swim, fully equipped, through crocodile-infested rivers.

And now, having quoted three from a large number of press descriptions showing belated discovery of what really is the effect of training a medieval-minded people for modernised warfare, may I invite attention to a passage in one of my own articles written over 33 years ago. This is what I wrote then:—

It was bad enough when the leading European nations alone were experts in the arts of international destruction but the advent of a nation of the Mongolian race whose warriors DO NOT FEAR DEATH and are less sensitive to pain, BRINGS A NEW ELEMENT OF TERROR INTO THE WORLD.

Why did I give that warning 33 years ago in The Telegraph, The Clarion, The Bradford Pioneer, and from numerous public platforms in England, Wales, and Scotland? Let me explain why, for the story has its lesson to teach us, and it is a lesson the people must learn, if capitalist imperialism (that in the 33 years since I wrote the words I have now quoted has led the British people into two great wars and many minor ones) is to be overthrown and the world of fellowship is to be established.

I was elected to Parliament in 1906. It soon became clear to me that the nation's foreign policy was leading to war. The British Imperialism of Lord Salisbury with its "Concert of Europe" had been substituted by the even worse form of British Imperialism of the Joseph Chamberlain school, which aimed always to maintain for Britain the "balance of power"—a system based on alliances and secret understandings to ensure that Britain would be on the side of the big battalions in case the Imperialist struggle for markets and for investments of capital should lead to war.

In this British "balance of power" policy, British Imperialism hoped to make a tool of Japan. Japan is ruled by a small caste of medieval-minded aristocrats who have copied some of the outward forms of "democratic" government. She was not effectively armed for modern warfare, but British Imperialism could alter that, and was busy doing so 33 years ago, for a well-armed Japan was considered necessary to keep Russia in check—Russia being suspected of desiring expansion in Asia and of threatening to encroach on Britain's Indian Empire.

So it had come to pass at the time I wrote The Telegraph article from which I have quoted we were busy training the Japanese, with whose Government we had established an alliance, to become a formidable military power. We were at that time training their future army officers at the British military training schools, their future naval officers were in our naval training schools, and welcomed for further intensive training on board our warships under the personal direction and tuition of the ships' officers, including captains themselves.

At that time (33 years ago) we were sending expert technicians and organisers to establish in Japan schools for naval and military training, and to organise and establish munition production in Japan. Now another of British Imperialism's chickens has come home to roost and British Imperialism realises that, as I said in my Telegraph article 33 years ago, "a new element of terror" has come into the world.

In pursuit of that "balance of power" to which I have referred, whilst Japan was being nursed and trained to become a formidable military power to keep Russia in check in the Far East, a Liberal Imperialist Foreign Secretary (Sir Edward Grey, who afterwards became Lord Grey) was laying the foundation of the open and secret alliances in preparation for the last Great War.

He had taken over, "lock, stock, and barrel," the balance-of-power policy of his predecessor, Lord Lansdowne, who himself had adopted it not long before under the influence of the first of the Chamberlains (the late Premier Neville's father). Liberal Foreign Secretary Grey had the thoroughly reactionary distinction of bringing openly the active personal intervention of a British King into the conduct of international affairs.

King Edward the Seventh, being a "man of the world" on terms of intimate friendship with the money lords and popular among the right people in France, went, under Grey's advice, to arrange what was politely described in diplomatic language as an "entente" with France, which was in reality the basis of a secret understanding by which the Government bound the British people "behind its back" to go to war against Germany in certain undefined—and therefore all the more dangerous—conditions.

King Edward was commended to the people by all the big noises in British and French politics and the entire British and French press as "The Peacemaker," but his so-called peace-making efforts had no small share of responsibility for the last Great War which cost the peoples concerned no less than 10 millions of their lives.

In that war, Japan was an ally, as also was Czarist Russia, which, already in alliance with France, had been brought into the "entente cordiale." In that war Sir John Simon, now Lord Simon, the Lord Chancellor, was for about a year Home Secretary, but resigned because he disapproved of conscription of which, and all its brood of evils, he is now a fervent and powerful advocate.

In 1931 when Japan was ready, after years of training by older Imperialist Powers (Britain being the first to obligingly serve in that capacity) she invaded the Chinese province of Manchuria. Simon—slim Simon—was at that time Foreign Secretary.

A railway train had been derailed during the night. It was the convenient "incident" giving the excuse for Japan to send its army to invade Manchuria, breaking two international treaties to which Britain was also a party, namely the Kellogg Pact and the Nine Power Treaty.

Colonel Stimson, Secretary of State in the United States Cabinet, requested Simon to join him in a protest to Japan with an intimation that neither the United States nor Britain would recognise Manchuria as a Japanese conquest if Japan proceeded with the campaign.

That was all the United States Secretary Stimson asked of the British Government through its Foreign Minister, Sir John Simon. The request was refused.

British Imperialism didn't like the Russian Government of Soviet Republics, and an armed equally anti-Soviet Power on the Soviet's borders ready to stage another "incident" over the Soviet frontier was much to be desired.

As the crowning infamy of Lord Chancellor Simon's testilential career, when at the League of Nations meeting in 1932, Lord Lytton's officially appointed Commission of Enquiry reported to the League of Nations that Japan had committed an act of aggression, British Imperialist Foreign Secretary Simon took the part of Devil's Advocate, and did his job so damnedly well that the representative of Japan (the culprit state) purred with satisfaction and smilingly observed the Hon. Simon had put Japan's case better than he could himself have put it.

SIMON IS STILL A MEMBER OF THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT!

THOMAS JOHNSTON 1917!

To our exposures of Thomas Johnston, including the powerful indictment published last month from the pen of our comrade, F. W. Jowett, we add the following cutting, culled from the Forward, Glasgow, for July 21, 1917:—

RECEPTION TO JOHN MACLEAN.

On Tuesday, 10th inst., the Glasgow Council of the B.S.P. packed the St. Mungo Hall, Glasgow, at their reception to John Maclean. All sections of the Socialist movement were represented on the platform, and repeated appeals were made for unity in face of the common foe. John Maclean's appearance on the platform was greeted with great cheering and musical honours. The chair was taken by Mr. Thomas Johnston, the Editor of "Forward," and the speakers were James MacDougall, James Maxton, Jack Smith, E. C. Fairchild (of London), John Maclean, David Kirkwood, and Wm. Gallacher. The Chairman said he had never before been on such a jail-bird platform, and men who had been in jail, men who would be in jail, and men who ought to be in jail (laughter). Loud cries of "Shame" greeted his recital of some of the conditions of Maclean's ticket-of-leave, how he was not to habitually consort with thieves and prostitutes—occasionally was inferred, but not habitually.

He paid a high tribute to Maclean, as did every speaker who followed. Mr. E. C. Fairchild made a series of presentations, gold watch and other trinkets to Comrade and Mrs. Maclean and the "wee bairns." John Maclean, in the course of his reply made some severe strictures on the prison system as it had been applied to himself, but he had escaped and after a holiday which George Lansbury had arranged for him, he was coming back to take up economic class work . . .

The military authorities called up John Maclean last week, but when the news got to London the brake was put upon the energies of the local militarists by the Government. The call-up notice had been cancelled.

Thomas Johnston was editor of the Forward and would be directly responsible for their report, which was unsigned.

EXONERATED

The Word for May, 1941, told the story of Ben Greene's career and detention under 18B. Ben was released from Brixton Prison on January 7 last, after having been detained for 19 months. The detention order was made against him on May 24, 1940. A few days after his release, he receive a letter from the Home Office unreservedly withdrawing the charges made against him. He is exonerated completely.

His fight for justice cost Ben Greene £1,000 in lawyers' fees and expenses. He is entitled to compensation for his 19 months' sufferings and this expenditure. His business was ruined and he was unable to support his family.

OIL IMPERIALISM AND WAR

A CAPITALIST SURVEY

By the late

SIR WALTER STRICKLAND, Bt. B.A.

[We published in our columns for May 1940 Sir Walter Strickland's last letter to us from Buitenzorg, dated December 14, 1937. This letter was reprinted and has been circulated widely in pamphlet form. Some copies still remain. In our August and September issues we published his 1934 essay on "IMPERIALISM IN THE ORIENT." This was a study of Buddhism, Fascism and War. Unfortunately, in reprinting this essay in pamphlet form, through an error, only half the essay was included. Although the pamphlet makes good reading, it is incomplete. It is worthy of circulating but the full essay will be reprinted later. Below we publish a letter Strickland addressed to us in 1933. At the present moment readers will find it a vital and interesting document.—Ed.]

Buitenzorg, Java, Asia, Hotel Juliana.
December 23rd, 1933.

Dear Aldred,—It is such a long time since I wrote or heard of you that it is difficult to know where to begin among the tangle of things there is to write about. A few weeks ago I had sent you by Westermann, of New York City, a complete set of press cuttings bearing on the Japanese question, and the prospect of a coming further pig fight between the nations, and also the amazing story of Britain's Imperialist oil intrigue in Persia. The story of how Britain got its oil, in preparation for the Great War, condemns not Britain only but the Capitalist system under which we live. Never was there a greater illustration of the need for Socialism, the Socialisation of all wealth, than in this dastardly record of oil intrigue between the great powers, and the scramble for power and wealth. Unfortunately Socialism will never come so long as you have parliamentary labour leaders anxious for a place in the sun under capitalist society, using every effort to be recognised as junior members of the ruling class, the old firm of Swindle, Badger-em, & Co.

SOCIALISM A CRIME.

Several years ago, if I mistake not, you were one of my trustees, whom I replaced by T. C. R. Pillai. I forget the exact reasons for the change, but certainly there was no intention to blame or to violate in any way our long agreement. For that matter, the whole of your correspondence is preserved in the 7 valises now held or rather withheld by the Berlin bank, with records of my associations with the Chinese revolutionary leaders, my Japanese diaries, and my correspondence with the German Socialists. If, as I trust, these valises are released or recovered some day, and adequate use is made of the documents and correspondence they contain, you will be able to show up, without remorse, the scurvy way I have been misrepresented and more or less libelled by the Imperialists and their adherents, for the offences of believing in freedom and being shrewdly suspicious of war-mongering Imperialism and all its works. My crime has been to believe in humanity and a Commonwealth of the peoples of the earth.

At a time when French and British Tory Press humbugs were crying for the Kaiser's head, and the workers were being gulled into coming starvation by cries for blood and thunder, I mildly suggested, in a critical essay that I had published in Switzerland, that the pig fight was at its shambles work, not for the benefit of the common people, but in the interests of the armament kings and the lords of finance, the profiteers of human misery, the vultures of civilisation, the Church's birds of prey. My treatment after I had published this essay, convinced me that it was a rather interesting achievement, though a good many of points I made have escaped my judgment. I had no need to beware at all of men speaking good of me for, from then on, in all British official circles, wherever I went, I was suspect and barred. I was a Socialist, actually an Anarchist, and an Aristocrat and Cambridge scholar, and I wouldn't play in their nastly little pig-fight, or help with the muck behind the troughs.

I explained in the Spur that "eel" meant originally both "slime" and "glory." The Mohammedan name for God, "Ali," probably springs from the same root as "eel." Perhaps "earl" does also. The excellent moral pointed by this etymological speculation is that the first step in getting rid of a lot of truculent aristocrats and self-constituted governing classes is to strip them of their "eel"—their "slime" and "glory," i.e., their hereditary titles. Unfortunately, whereas the democratic Chinese who discovered gunpowder and would not make "enlightened" use of it until Western Christians forced them to do so, abolished titles long ago, England has tolerated and rejoiced in their retention.

SOCIALISM AND HEREDITARY TITLES.

Hereditary titles exercise an enormous power of suggestion over the somewhat too humble-cum-dumble English proletariat. This is well seen in the somewhat too violent and vulgar denunciation where reaction takes the place of moral prostration and subservience to empty words and heraldic flourishes. Long ago I said that you ought to inaugurate a campaign in favour of the total abolition of every form of hereditary title all over the British Commonwealth. Even if it did not attain its main purpose, it would certainly show up the moral and intellectual poverty of the title-bearers and the title and tuft hunters. I do not positively deny the value of blue blood as a personal asset, though, taken altogether, the proofs in favour thereof are of an extremely shadowy character. Nor is there much blue blood in the veins of a sneaking criminal attorney raised to a peerage for party political services; a brewer floated into the Lords on a flood of barrels; an armament king who owes his elevation to services-at-home, and not arduous at that, but purely organisational, in the unholy cause of exploited nationalism and human murder, which is the true name for war; or a real red-flag waving Socialist sent to the Lords in retreat from the angry and misled proletariat. Genuine old-time aristocrats, their stupidities and ignorance notwithstanding, stand less in the way of abolishing titles than the climbing heroes of democracy, the men of aggression who view the Empire as a corporate pany of fraud, self-seeking, money-making, what-can-be-got-out-it? and hypocrisy. Your Socialist labour leader, the good dear comrade who wouldn't help a beggar, may be more anxious for a title, and stronger bulwark of the peerage than a duke or an earl.

WAR'S DIRTY GAME.

As I have said, I would not play in their dirty, incomplete, little pig-fight. I didn't like their slaughter-house or its culture. I would have none of their slime of scholarship and inherited disdain. From then on I was less than a labourer in the sight of the politicians and profiteers of empire. I was unwelcome on British soil. My correspondence was tampered with. You have known, better than most of your fellow-countrymen, for many years now what this kind of persecution means. Lastly, they took away my passport.

THE ROWLATT LAWS.

Some of the cuttings I have sent to you concern the Rowlatt laws. You will recall that my friendship for you dates from your prosecution for Indian sedition in 1909, when I addressed my first letter to you at Brixton Prison, because I wanted to know you. Englishmen are not devoid of physical courage but it is rare to discover an Anglo-Saxon who possesses moral courage. It is much quieter and much more attractive but so little appreciated. You may remember that the counsel who appeared against you included S. A. T. Rowlatt, who was then junior counsel to the Treasury. Rowlatt was appointed Chairman of the Indian Sedition Committee in 1918 and was responsible for that masterpiese of reaction, the so-called Rowlatt Laws, to which your reactionary fellow-countrymen paid no attention. Their irresponsible non-consideration of the consequences of these laws will form a pretext and precedent, as time goes by, for invading their own liberties at home, a veritable Frankinstein. Their own bondage is merely a matter of time and deserved retribution. I make a summary of the Rowlatt Laws as a compliment to yourself, to show how right you were to be against these people. You have nothing to be ashamed of for taking your stand against the legal bandits and pirates of Empire. Rowlatt has been rewarded for his services—and you have been rewarded also in the only way you could expect, from your knowledge of history, for your services. You have each rendered different services and received different rewards. To each his unequal deserts in a world of inequality such as that in which we live.

The Rowlatt Laws aroused fierce opposition among all sections of the Indian people, and nothing among your servile fellow-countrymen. Your Labour leaders and sycophantic parliamentary Socialists were dead to the meaning of these laws.

These laws meant, as stated in Indian manifestoes and protests I obtained at the time, that the British Government in India was imposing on the natives of India, in the teeth of united popular opposition, and by sheer power of the sword, measures of despotic government only comparable to the acts of the Spanish Inquisition or the Czarist police.

Criminal intention was presumed unless the accused person could disprove it. Previous conviction or association with persons previously convicted was admitted as evidence of guilt. Even after two years of imprisonment, the person so condemned is for a further period of two years in the position of a ticket-of-leave man.

Where certain specified political offences were in the, as we know, arbitrary and irresponsible, because uncontrolled opinion of the Governor-General in Council, prevalent, he could empower Local Governments to proceed against the persons charged by a summary, secret and speedy trial before three specially nominated judges.

The Governor-General in Council could also empower the Local Governments to order anyone whom they reasonably suspected of being concerned in seditious movements to enter into a bond for good behaviour and to live in a specified area. The local governments were permitted to appoint an investigating authority to examine the evidence in a secret trial at which the accused was not to be represented by a pleader. Nor was the accused himself permitted to appear before the authority, except at such stage in its proceedings as the authority elected. This method was provided for cases where there was not sufficient legal evidence to convict or the Government did not desire to prosecute.

There was no right of appeal. Orders could not be questioned in any court; the ordinary rules of evidence and procedure were abolished; the accused was not allowed to bring witnesses in his defence and was often tried unheard.

How much concern did your labour parliamentarians show in these laws. I have mentioned only some of the despotic features. There were other medieval features like arrests without warrant, searches without warrant, imprisonment of 15 days without trial, and power to repeat such imprisonments.

OIL MEANS BLOOD.

The cuttings I have sent you, showing how Britain intrigued for its oil supply, reminds me of your essay on Mexican oil in the Herald of Revolt. I can never forget the title of this essay, "Oil Means Blood." Oil indeed means blood, blood commercialised from the pigsty by false pretences, as this amazing story of Persian oil proves. I tell the story in brief, in case, sooner or later, you come to publish my letter.

Somewhere about 1894, an Australian engineer, named William Knox d'Arcy, entered Persia and commenced a search for oil. Here began a trail of blood of which he was utterly unconscious and of which even those who ridiculed him were completely unsuspicious. They were cynical only because he saw no profit from his beliefs. Knox d'Arcy was a remarkable man and believed that there must have been a sound material reason why the ancient Persians worshipped the God of Fire. His historical reading informed him that powerful white flames used to burn in the ancient Persian temples dedicated to the worship of Ormuzd. From which he formed the theory that the priests of Zoroaster used to ignite naphtha, deposited in the soil. He determined to explore the sacred places with a view to finding oil.

D'Arcy talked the financiers of London into backing his journeys through the deserts of Persia, where he drilled holes in vain, and wasted their thousands of pounds with prophetic enthusiasm. His search yielded no results and they dismissed him as a mixture of lunatic and imposter. In which they were wrong.

Fortunately, at the very moment when the banker failed him, death and politics came to d'Arcy's aid. A new Shah came to the throne and decided to make Persia in every respect a modern country. He was enthusiastic for progress and civilisation and in this enthusiasm paved the way for war and desolation. The Shah's advisers called in d'Arcy, and employed his technical skill in buying machinery and building a railway. In return, the Shah gave him a large monetary reward, and a generous but dangerous document guaranteeing him, and "to all his heirs and assigns," the right for sixty years to drill into the depths of Persia, "in consequence of which all the sub-soil products sought by him without exception will remain his inalienable property."

This concession covered five-sixths of Persia. It was acquired by d'Arcy in 1901. Almost immediately afterwards natives brought him news of the discovery of oil in the Shushtar region, north of the Persian gulf. But d'Arcy had been worn out by his long search for oil, and he sub-let the exploitation to a small company, then recently formed for the purpose of selling oil to India—the Burmah Oil Company. D'Arcy did not tell the Company that his concession covered nearly the whole of Persia, because his idea was to save Persia from speculators and to convert the people to Christianity. His concession was suspected, however, and offers up to £6,000,000 were made to d'Arcy for the document. These he refused. Attempts were made to rob him and to rifle his apartments.

D'Arcy returned to Australia by way of the United States. On the liner to the States he met a missionary returned from South Africa, and a friendship sprang up between them. D'Arcy told the priest of his hopes to convert Persia to Christianity, and of the important document he was trying to keep safe from the hands of speculators. The priest suggested that if this were presented to the Church it would be safe, and would also provide its missioneries with free access to Persia. Despite his concession to d'Arcy, and his gratitude, the Shah, down to this time, had forbidden missionaries to enter the country. D'Arcy was persuaded by the priest that this would overcome the Shah's opposition. Before the ship arrived at New York the document and all the rights it carried with it had been transferred to the priest. From him, the document went direct to the British Intelligence Service. The priest was Sidney Reilly, the famous or notorious British Secret Service Agent!

The Burmah Oil Co. now ceded its land to the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. This was a newly-formed concern with a capital of £2,000,000 and a list of secret shareholders. Their names were not revealed until the War-Year, 1914. It was made known then that 56 per cent. of the shares were held by the British Admiralty! Shades of Disraeli! Naturally, Parliament formally ratified this secret purchase of oil shares which placed the entire oil resources of Persia at the disposal of the British Navy during the Great War. Thus began an international intrigue of blood and oil that would have been impossible had the world abandoned Capitalism and Imperialism for Socialism and world commonwealth.

TRADE AND THE JAPANESE "PERIL."

The Japanese cuttings are interesting. They are from The Osaka Mainichi and The Tokyo Nichi Nichi, the Japanese English paper. These cuttings throw a great light on the Ottawa Agreements of 1932, which so aggravated the unfavourable balance of Japan's trade with Canada, and which, if pursued, must lead to another pig fight between the British Empire and the power she built up for 25 years in opposition to the other Western nations operating in China, not for the good of the Chinese. All the jingo talk about the yellow peril merely conceals a trade struggle, an acute situation that must end in war, unless commonsense overrides commercialism. How many atrocities, themselves due to the principle of exploitation, are made vulgar knowledge by Statesmen and Diplomats, only to conceal other atrocities and the onward march of Christian exploitation. Onward Christian soldiers, marching into war, forward into battle see the masses flow—the masses held in servitude by the money power and the fear of living. My objection to the Imperialist is the greed of his creed—his money-making lust wherever he travels, his want of all philosophy of living. I send three clear instances and other indications of my correspondence being tampered with by the fanatical Calvinist jingo elements. I think, sooner or later, being aware of the fact, you should be able to catch these fellows tripping. Of this, more anon.

I hope, in due course of time, to comment on your voluminous letters that I have left so long unanswered. There are many points in them that ought to be discussed between us, but with the best intentions in the world, I find that they are such a tangle of more or less legal jargon that I admit I do not understand the greater part of them.

Will write more by and by. With best wishes,

Yours Ever,

W. W. STRICKLAND.

P.S.—As to the list of documents, it might be worth while to have a certain number of the lists either copied or printed for purposes of distribution. This I leave to your discretion.

RICHARD CARLILE

The following amazingly outspoken paragraph is culled from the literary review column of the Peebleshire News, for December 26, 1941 :—

No matter how revolutionary a man may be in his lifetime, or how strongly his opinions, political, religious, or social, may be despised or opposed by his contemporaries, the time must come, sooner or later, when he will be, not only understood, but applauded, provided always, of course, that his words and actions have been distinguished by absolute sincerity and true conviction. This fact has been clearly demonstrated in the case of a noted atheist and republican who lived, struggled and suffered on behalf of freedom of thought and reasonable expression thereof during the first half of the nineteenth century. The very fact that Guy A. Aldred's "Richard Carlile: Agitator: His Life and Times," published by the Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1, price 1s. 6d., has appeared in a third revised edition, is a sufficient testimony to my contention. The work is a masterpiece of sound documentation, and the author holds the interest of the reader from start to finish in a way that is not common in biographies of lesser known characters. The illustrations also are of unusual interest and value.

In "Dogmas Discarded," two parts, respectively priced at 4d. and 6d., Mr. Aldred, whose own life has not been altogether dissimilar from that of Richard Carlile, gives us "An Autobiography of Thought," stretching from 1886 to 1908, which in these days of gradual and subtle attempted encroachments upon the hard-won liberties of the people, cannot be too widely read.

WHAT A GAME!

"Old Stager," in his "War News Letter—No. 115," in The Spitere, London, for November 15 last, publishes the following review of the Duke of Bedford's now famous pamphlet :—

WHAT A GAME!

A pamphlet, printed in Glasgow and written by the Duke of Bedford, lies before me. In the first paragraph the Duke sets forth the logic of his creed:

"Only last year the Prime Minister, speaking of the Finns and Russians, said: 'The service rendered by Finland to mankind is magnificent. They have exposed for all the world to see the military incapacity of the Red Army and the Red Air Force. Everyone can see how Communism rots the soul of a nation; how it makes it abject and hungry in peace and proves it base and abominable in war.' What a game! If our people had not lost their sense of humour as well as sense of every other description, surely they would now realise the utter absurdity and immorality of war, and insist on their Government exploring any and every reasonable way of bringing this lunacy to an end."

Let us with courage and coolness examine this sentence, which, with others of the sort, has branded a man of ability, who is no fool and (I am convinced) no traitor, with infamy of late.

1. Let us first frankly admit that, if it had been written in peacetime, its logic would have hit a great number of people, and Mr Churchill himself, a zestful and large-minded and courageous parliamentarian, would probably have chuckled, perhaps ruefully, over "a very palpable hit." Anyway, it would not have branded the writer with infamy, and the proof that it is a logical hit lies in the attitude of the Premier towards Russia. Almost alone among his entourage of Ministers, he does not seek to eat his words. He admits the principle that a life-and-death dire necessity brings strange bedfellows. He exceptionally (unlike the Bishops and the Government and the great bulk of the nation) has not lost his sense of humour and proportion—even when he glorifies the efficiency of the Red Army and Air Force.

2. Why should such an argument propounded in war be received as treachery, when in peace it would be received by many with chuckles, if not with approval? Because in total war for survival, there are (as I have said often) no shades of colour. Everything is either black or white. Yes, but are we not a democracy, flying the banner of freedom—of speech, of action, of opinion, and ready to die for that freedom? If war allows no right of compromise, why does Mr Churchill frankly "compromise" with his bugbear, Communism? If ours is not to reason why, why do Mr Churchill's henchmen and Parliament spend half their days in talk? These are not outrageous, oratorical questions?

3. Where has the Duke gone wrong in setting forth his argument in wartime? It is a fact (which any searcher can verify for himself) that only last year the Premier said what he is quoted as saying concerning Communism. You cannot hang a man for quoting it. It is still true that probably a majority of the nation, while working all out for our war effort, does accept it that war is utterly imbecile and can settle nothing; that war, and night bombing, perhaps, are mass-madness, stark and immeasurable, and that while they last every day brings civilisation nearer to the crater's edge.

ELEMENTS OF TRUTH.

I myself believe these things; and believing them does not, and need not, dilute my will to contribute anything I can to the war effort. I go further. I conceive that it is an article of our policy in fighting this war that we do so believe in the bestial lunacy of war. In my mind, the cardinal, the only, point of criticism in the composition of this sentence (even in wartime) is the assumption that the nation has lost its senses. I should myself plead guilty to the charge, if I followed the Vansittart school. But as I see the impossibility of exterminating 80,000,000 Germans, I hold that in the end, when victory is won, we have no alternative but to try again to educate and civilise those Germans who remain alive when we have destroyed Nazi-ism. That being so, I cannot accept the principle that we could never negotiate with any German, once the Nazi regime has been totally destroyed or else totally rejected by the Reich. It follows that I believe that a patriotic citizen can give his best to our effort to destroy Nazi-ism while holding such views, and that the bulk of our people have not lost all sense and do hold these views. If they hold them, they must see the force of not losing any opportunity to stimulate resistance to Nazi-ism in any elements in Germany not totally soaked in the poison of Nazi-ism, and generally to explore any way of bringing this lunacy and supreme tragedy to a righteous end. Thus (in my view) the Duke's opening paragraph is to be criticised only on the score of tactlessness and immoderation. It is devoid neither of logic, patriotism or sense. It contains elements of all three—if it be unsuitable matter for "total war," then so also is the chronic loquacity of our Ministers of State and religion. If it be inept and dangerous, then so, too, is this insistence on the continuance of the luxuries of democratic freedom of speech in a total war against a totalitarian State. And indeed, we pay a heavy price and handicap by enjoying these luxuries while the war, which we are waging to preserve them, lasts. One word more. I admire moral courage as much as (or more than) I admire physical courage. The former kind is a little nearer to my comprehension. It may be also the harder to display in war. It does not surprise me that one or two men are still found brave enough to defend, or not blindly to brand, the Duke of Bedford, even while admitting that he constantly overstates his case and will not accept the necessity for moderation, tact and compromise in war. I am glad such men are to be found. For if there were found none, I should agree with him that we had as a nation lost all our senses with our sense of humour. Let us live and die like men, not sheep.

We congratulate our distinguished contemporary upon its courageous criticism. It does not follow that everything that the Duke of Bedford thinks, says, or writes is correct. Nor is everything correct that is said on the side of war. The Duke of Bedford does mean all that he says to be true, for he writes according to his beliefs. If we are afraid to listen to a man confessing truthfully his thoughts on a matter of utmost importance to mankind, we are living in servitude, and have sacrificed the traditions and loyalties of our ancestors. It is the business of every decent citizen to think on how to end war and crime, now and forever.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

The New York Times, for November 2, 1941, published a portrait of the Duke of Bedford, with an account of the Duke's opposition to war, under the caption, Derision. We quote in part :

The statue of a nobleman, one hand on the plow, the other holding ears of corn, has adorned London's spacious Russell Square since 1809. During a blackout last week, stealthy visitors daubed the figure with yellow paint, decked it with placards reading: "Grandfather of a Quisling!" and "Down with the Duke!" The derision was aimed at the nobleman's descendant, the twelfth Duke of Bedford, who has championed a negotiated peace with Germany.

The gentleman farmer memorialized by the Russell Square statue—the fifth Duke of Bedford supported peace between Britain and Revolutionary France. He made no more headway than the present titleholder . . .

The ancestral duke mentioned, as stated last month, was a member of The Society of Friends of the People, and actually a defender of the French Revolution against the entrenched reaction of the British aristocracy. Socialists and Radical Libertarians might note this fact.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr Aldred,—Since I began to read The Word last June, I am pleased to say I have enjoyed reading each edition in part, but, speaking candidly, I wish some of the articles were based more on Scripture and were less political.

I admire the stand you have made to denounce war, and the noble work you are helping to do to establish that kingdom—"Peace on earth, goodwill towards men." The teachings of our Saviour clearly show us that we should have many trials and tribulations to pass through in the last days, and everything that is happening to-day clearly shows we are now in those days.

We know that the laws of God and the teachings of our Saviour will triumph in the end, for remember it says the kingdom of righteousness will be established on earth. And it also says, "I shall have a willing people in the day of my power." A people who will obey the commandments of God and the teachings of our Saviour. That day is near.

We are now in the time when Satan has come down in great wrath, "knowing his time is short," and hasn't he abundant workers to help in his mission to destroy? God said he would shorten the time for the elect's sake. The elect are they who obey the law and Gospel—the commands of God.

Look at this apostate Christendom of to-day, a Bible in one hand, a sword in the other, seeking to bring peace by the carnal weapon, a mammon of iniquity. Peace will only be established by obedience to the Word, and God says "He will send His angels to drive out of His Kingdom all that offends." I admire the Duke of Bedford in his earnest effort to proclaim truth and light.

I wish your paper every success, and am thankful to you for the help you have given to the C.O.s.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. BAGULEY.

CONVICT 9653!

AMERICA'S VISION MAKER

Story of Eugene Victor Debs, The United States' Great Socialist Anti-militarist

Ralph Chaplin, serving a twenty-year sentence in one Federal Penitentiary, for daring to express Anti-Militarist opinions during the first world war, addressed a poem to Eugene Victor Debs, serving a ten year sentence in another Federal Penitentiary for an identical offence. Chaplin described Debs as "The Vision Maker."

Addressing the Government that prosecuted and imprisoned Debs, Chaplin wrote:—

Not he, but you are branded deep with guilt;
His cell is holier than your highest shrine.

We recall this poem, and story of Debs, since the United States is involved in the second world war. Socialist readers ought to consider the uncompromising anti-militarist attitude adopted by Debs when the United States entered the first world war, and so ask themselves what stand they think Debs would take to-day, now that the world is rushing to chaos, and the violence of war threatens to be replaced by the plague that follows inevitably in the wake of war. Disease must ever shadow the sword.

Debs was born in Terre Haute, Ind., U.S.A., in 1855, the son of a respectable grocer, who came from Alsace. He died in his home town in 1926. That means he was 71 years of age at the time of his death. Fifty of those years he spent in the struggle of the working class and over thirty in an attempt to create an American Socialist Movement.

Debs was educated in the public schools, including the high school. But he left school before he was fifteen years of age, and commenced working in the Vandalia paint shop in Terre Haute. This was in 1870. The next year he got a position as fireman on a Vandalian locomotive. Three years later he obtained a better position in the wholesale grocery. During these four years he attended a commercial college in the evenings. In 1879 he was elected City Clerk on the Democratic ticket and re-elected in 1881.

Before he was 20, Debs threw himself into the work of organising the railwaymen. As a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, he was elected to office, and at 25, he became secretary of the Union. For 12 years he served the organisation as grand secretary and treasurer. He also edited the Locomotive Firemen's Magazine.

On June 20, 1893, Debs established one Union for all railwaymen, under the name the American Railway Union. As its President, Debs made the A.R.U. one of the strongest labour unions in the United States, and was successful in the strike on the "Great Northern."

May 11, 1894, the operatives at Pullmanville struck, and after futile efforts to gain a settlement by arbitration, joined the American Railway Union. This organisation took up their cause. In June Debs ordered a boycott of Pullman cars. The strike gradually spread.

On July 2 Judges Wood and Grosscup, at Chicago, ordered a sweeping "omnibus" injunction. On the basis of telegrams and advice sent by Debs after this, he and his colleagues were arrested on two indictments for contempt of court, and were tried in September in the Federal Circuit Court sitting at Chicago. Judge Wood did not render a verdict till December, but then condemned Debs to six months' imprisonment, and his companions to three.

Appeal was taken to the Supreme Court for release on habeas corpus, the ground being that an equity court had no right to issue such an injunction, and thus deprive men of trial by jury. The Supreme Court, however, sustained the Circuit Court, and Debs and his companions suffered imprisonment in Woodstock Jail, beginning in May, 1895. Debs was liberated in November, and was given a tremendous ovation in Chicago. Debs told the workers that:

"I went to Woodstock a Union man and I have come back to you a Socialist."

Victor Berger, whose later Socialist record was not remarkable for its worth or its consistency, had visited Debs in Woodstock and had helped to "convert" him.

With Berger and Seymour Stedman Debs set to work to found the Socialist Party of America. Its first convention was held in 1897. Debs was its first presidential candidate in 1900—and again in 1904, 1908, 1912 and 1920.

The last time he fought the campaign as Convict 9653 in Atlanta jail.

At his first contest in 1900 he polled 87,814 votes. In 1920 he polled 819,799 votes. He remained in a hopeless minority.

Debs became Convict 9653 because, when the United States entered the world war, he refused to abate his opposition to it by one jot or one tittle. In a bold speech at Canton, Ohio, he urged the workers to do nothing in support of the war.

President Wilson's Quaker Attorney-General Palmer got him ten years imprisonment for that speech. After a time, he was offered conditional pardon, but refused to accept it. Then, on December 25, 1921, President Harding released him as an "act of grace." Debs left Atlanta on his own terms, having repudiated neither his ideas nor his words.

Debs died at the local hospital from nephritis. He was in the hospital for four weeks and knew that he was dying. His last remark before passing into unconsciousness was a declaration of undiminished faith:—

"I will go to my grave convinced that Socialism, and Socialism alone, offers the only remedy for the political and economic troubles of mankind."

Debs was not a thinker. But he was a man of direct simple appeal. He possessed an unblemished character and he was a tireless worker. Before his death he had become a legend to the working-class throughout the United States of America.

WHEN WAR CAME.

August, 1914, witnessed the commencement of the World War. Although the United States was not involved immediately tension developed throughout America. Anti-war propaganda became perilous and unpopular. Debs squared up to the situation. In The Appeal to Reason, for September 11, 1915, Debs wrote:—

"They are trying to send us to prison for speaking our minds. Very well, let them. I tell you that if it had not been for men and women who in the past have had the moral courage to go to prison, we would still be in the jungles.

"I have been asked if I was opposed to all war and if I would refuse to be a soldier and to fight under any circumstances. . . . No, I am not opposed to all wars under all circumstances, and any declaration to the contrary would disqualify me as a revolutionist. When I say I am opposed to war I mean ruling class war, for the ruling class is the only class that makes war. It matters not to me whether this war be offensive or defensive, or what other lying excuse may be invented for it, I am opposed to it. . . .

"If I were in Congress I would be shot before I would vote a dollar for such a war.

"Capitalist wars for capitalist conquest and capitalist plunder must be fought by the capitalists themselves so far as I am concerned, and upon that question there can be no misunderstanding as to my position.

"I have no country to fight for; my country is the earth; and I am a citizen of the world.

"I would not violate my principles for God, much less for a crazy Kaiser, a savage Czar, a degenerate King, or a band of pot-bellied parasites.

"But while I have not a drop of blood to shed for the oppressors of the working class and the robbers of the poor, the thieves and looters, the brigands and murderers, whose debauched misrule is the crime of the ages, I have a heart-full to shed for their victims when it shall be needed in the war for their liberation.

"I am not a capitalist soldier; I am a proletarian revolutionist. I do not belong to the regular army of the plutocracy, but to the irregular army of the people. . . .

"I am opposed to every war but one; I am for that war with heart and soul, and that is the world-wide war of the social revolution. In that war I am prepared to fight in any way the ruling class may make it necessary, even to the barricades.

"There is where I stand and where I believe the Socialist Party stands, or ought to stand, on the question of war."

CANTON SPEECH.

At last the United States entered the war and Debs had to redefine his position. He did this in the famous speech that he delivered at Canton, Ohio, on June 16, 1918. He denounced in clear, precise terms war, and American participation in the world's blood bath.

Debs was addressing the Ohio State Convention of the Socialist Party. The speech was a report of his visit to a number of comrades who were held in jail for speaking out as he did against the mass slaughter of workers by workers, organised and degraded by mammon to serve the gory glory of profit. Thinking of these comrades, Debs reiterated his opposition to war. He said:—

"I may not be able to say all I think, but I am not going to say anything I do not think. And I would rather a thousand times be a free soul in jail than a sycophant or coward on the streets. They may put those boys in jail and some of the rest of us in jail, but they cannot put the Socialist movement in jail. Those prison bars separate their bodies from ours, but their souls are here this afternoon. They are simply paying the penalty that all men have paid in all the ages of history for standing erect and seeking to pave the way for better conditions for mankind. . . .

They who are animated with the unconquerable spirit of the Social Revolution, they who have the moral courage to stand erect, to assert their convictions, to stand by them, to go to jail or hell for them—they are writing their names in this crucial hour, they are writing their names in fadeless letters in the history of mankind. . . .

In all the history of the world, you, the people have never had a voice in declaring war, and strange as it certainly appears, no war by any nation in any age has ever been declared by the people.

Wars throughout history have been waged for conquest and power. The strong have always tried to rob the weak. The masters have always declared war. They never did any of the fighting; they have always sent the workers to fight for them.

The masters alone declare war and they alone make peace. They have everything to gain and nothing to lose. You, the workers, have nothing to gain and everything to lose—especially your lives. . .

A GREAT TRIAL SPEECH.

For this speech, reiterating his opposition to war, Debs was arrested and charged with treason under the United States Espionage Law of June 15, 1917.

In Cleveland on September 9, 1918, Eugene V. Debs went to trial in the court of Judge D. C. Westenhaver on a charge of treason. The case of the Federal Government was based entirely upon statements made by Debs in his speech at Canton, Ohio, recorded by a government agent stationed in the crowd.

Debs delivered the plea to the jury himself.

Here are excerpts that reveal the tenor of his great speech, his magnificent proletarian libertarian audacity:—

When great changes occur in history, when great principles are involved, as a rule the majority is wrong. The minority is right. In every age there have been a few heroic souls who have been in advance of their time, who have been misunderstood, maligned, persecuted, sometimes put to death. Long after their martyrdom, monuments were erected to them and garlands were woven for their graves.

We hear a great deal about human brotherhood—a beautiful and inspiring theme. It is preached from a countless number of pulpits. It is vain for us to preach of human brotherhood while we tolerate this social system in which we are a mass of warring units, in which millions of workers have to fight one another for jobs, and millions of business men and professional men have to fight one another for trade, for practice—in which we have individual interest and each is striving to care for himself alone without deference to his fellowmen. Human brotherhood is yet to be realised in this world. It can never be under the Capitalist-Competitive system in which we live.

Yes, I was opposed to the war. I am perfectly willing, on that count, to be branded as a disloyalist, and if it is a crime under the American law, punishable by imprisonment, for being opposed to human bloodshed. I am perfectly willing to be clothed in the stripes of a convict and to end my days in a prison cell.

The very first amendment to the Constitution reads:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peacefully to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

That is perfectly plain English. It can be understood by a child. I believe that the revolutionary fathers meant just what is here stated—that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people to peacefully assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

I have told you that I am no lawyer, but it seems to me I know enough to know that if Congress enacts any law that conflicts with this provision in the Constitution, the law is void. If the Espionage Law finally stands, then the Constitution of the United States is dead. If that law is not the negation of every fundamental principle established by the Constitution, then certainly I am unable to read or to understand the English language. . . .

I cannot take back a word I have said. I cannot repudiate a sentence I have uttered. I stand before you guilty of having made this speech. I do not know, I cannot tell, what your verdict may be; nor does it matter much, so far as I am concerned. . . .

I have been accused of obstructing the war. I admit it. Gentlemen, I abhor war. I would oppose the war if I stood alone. When I think of a cold, glittering steel bayonet being plunged into the white quivering flesh of a human being, I recoil with horror. I have often wondered if I could take the life of my fellowman, even to save my own.

Men talk about holy wars. There are none. Let me remind you that it was Benjamin Franklin who said, "There never was a good war or a bad peace."

Napoleon Bonaparte was a high authority upon the subject of war. And when, in his last days, he was chained to the rock of St. Helena, when he felt the skeleton hand of death reaching for him, he cried out in horror, "War is the trade of savages and barbarians."

I have read some history. I know it is the ruling classes that make war upon one another, and not the people. In all the history of this world the people have never yet declared a war. Not one. I do not believe that really civilised nations would murder one another. I would refuse to kill a human being on my own account. Why should I, at the command of anyone else, or at the command of any power on earth?

Twenty centuries ago there was one appeared upon earth we know as the Prince of Peace. He issued a command in which I believe He said, "Love one another." He did not say, "Kill one another," but "Love one another." He espoused the cause of the suffering poor—and the poor heard him gladly. It was not long before he aroused the ill will and hatred of the usurers, the money changers, the profiteers, the high priests, the lawyers, the judges, the merchants, the bankers—in a word, the ruling class. They said of him, "He is preaching dangerous doctrine. He is inciting the common rabble. He is a menace to peace and order." And they had him arraigned, tried, convicted, condemned, and they had his quivering body spiked to the gates of Jerusalem.

This has been the tragic history of the race. In the ancient world Socrates sought to teach some new truths to the people, and they made him drink the fatal hemlock. It has been true all along the track of the ages. The men and women who have been in advance, who have had new ideas, new ideals, who have had the courage to attack the established order of things, have all had to pay the same penalty. . . .

Revolutions have a habit of succeeding, when the time comes for them. . . The most heroic word in all languages is Revolution. I have sympathy with the suffering, struggling people everywhere. It does not make any difference under what flag they were born, or where they live, I have sympathy with them all. I would, if I could, establish a social system that would embrace them all.

Gentlemen, I am the smallest part of this trial. I have lived long enough to appreciate my own personal insignificance in relation to a great issue that involves the welfare of the whole people. What you may choose to do to me will be of small consequence after all. I am not on trial here. There is an infinitely greater issue that is being tried in this Court, though you may not be conscious of it. American institutions are on trial here before a Court of American citizens. The future will tell.

This speech will take its place in history as a classic of oratory and libertarian expression. Never before, in an American Court, had such a speech been delivered to a jury by a defendant. Never once did Debs waver: never once did he attempt to escape from the implications of his life-long principles.

In passages that we have not reproduced, Debs reminded the Court that there had been a time when George Washington was denounced as a disloyalist; when Sam Adams, "the father of the American Revolution," was condemned as an incendiary; when Patrick Henry was condemned as a traitor.

Boldly facing the jury, Debs declared:—

I would not retract a word that I have uttered, that I believe to be true to save myself from going to the penitentiary for the rest of my days.

SENTENCED.

The stupid jury found Debs guilty.

On September 14, he was sentenced to ten years in the Federal penitentiary. Exactly 60 years earlier, in the same State, the immortal John Brown of Harper's ferry, Emerson's "true gentleman," had gone to his martyrdom.

Taking advantage of his right to make a final plea to the Court, our comrade said:—

Years ago I recognised my kinship with all living things, and I made up my mind that I was not one bit better than the meanest of the earth. I said then, and I say now, that while there is a lower class, I am in it; while there is a criminal element, I am of it; while there is a soul in prison, I am not free.

APPEAL DISMISSED.

Debs lawyers immediately appealed to the Supreme Court and he was released on bond, to await the decision of the higher court at his home.

On March 10, 1919, prosecutor Wertz telephoned Debs at his home and informed him that the Supreme Court had upheld the decision of the lower court — with the concurrence of the liberals Holmes and Brandeis. Debs, 65 years old and suffering from heart disease, packed his bag and took the train for Cleveland, to surrender to the Federal police.

LAST WORDS.

To the press representatives, in a last interview, Debs said:—

The decision is perfectly consistent with the character of the Supreme Court as a ruling class tribunal.

Great issues are not decided by the courts, but by the people. I have no concern in what the coterie of begowned corporation lawyers in Washington may decide in my case. The court of final resort is the people, and that court will be heard from in due time.

On April 19, 1919, five months after the World War had ended, Debs entered Moundsville jail in West Virginia, since the Federal jails were too crowded with political prisoners to accommodate him. He was transferred secretly, two months later, to the penitentiary at Atlanta. He remained here, as stated already, until December 25, 1921.

RETURN FROM PRISON.

The following excerpts are from the magnificent fighting speech Debs made in Chicago, in 1922, on his return to the public platform after his long imprisonment.

Undeterred by his weary imprisonment, Debs thundered his message to the common people:—

I am just recovering from the effects of a speech I made almost four years ago. That must have been a very telling speech. It was begun at Canton, Ohio, and completed at Atlanta, Georgia. But there is nothing to regret. I opposed the war. I still oppose war. I said then, I say now, that I would not go to war at the command of any capitalist country on the face of this earth.

Wars have always been declared by the ruling class and the battles have been fought and the victims furnished by the working class.

I would have saved the lives of 60,000 young Americans who perished upon the battlefields of France. Sixty thousand American corpses in France to produce thirty thousand millionaires in the United States.

The politicians at Washington declared the war: the editors of the country yelled for war; the preachers howled for war, but none of them went to the war.

I spoke at that time from a deep sense of conviction and ten years is a very moderate sentence for having an opinion of your own in the United States of America. If you and I believed in war we would have the honesty and courage to go to the front and get our share of it.

Debs saw the true republic of the common people coming all over the world:

War is the negation of civilisation and an outrage upon humanity.

It is coming, coming, coming just as certain as I stand in your presence. You may hasten it, you may retard it, but it is coming as certain as the sun rises on the morrow.

All over the wide world the victims of this system, of the war for which the system is responsible, the toiling and producing masses, the men and women who do the world's work, are lifting their bowed bodies from the earth and beginning to stand erect. Regardless of nationality, or creed, or colour, or sex, they are recognising their common kinship, grasping hands, removing the boundary lines, and calling each other "Comrade." They are beginning to recognise their common identity, to take an inventory of their own resources, to develop their capacity to think clearly. They have struggled through the ages from slavery to serfdom, and through serfdom to wage-slavery, to become freemen and freewomen in Socialism, the next inevitable stage of our advancing civilisation. Millions of them everywhere are beginning to ask why it is that they must press their rags still closer lest they press against the silk garments that their fingers are fashioning, why is it they must offend their hunger with the odour of the banquet they have spread, but may take no part in, why is it they must walk within the shadows of the palaces they have erected, but may not enter. They are beginning to think, they will soon begin to act.

The ruling classes were going to save civilisation and now look abroad at Europe, a vast armed camp, all of these so-called allies now pitted against each other and ready to fly at each other's throat. It is the way in which they have kept faith with the people and made the world safe for democracy.

I believe in the ultimate destiny of mankind. I believe and know that in this struggle, however fiercely it may be waged, whatever changing fortunes may be, that all the latent powers within us are being developed, and we expand to our true proportion: that we discharge our duty even though we do go to prison. Here let me say that I would rather be in jail with my self-respect than be on the street with a gag on my lips. I despise and defy their laws.

While I was born in the State of Indiana, I am not a citizen of the United States. My conscience lost me my citizenship. That is better than if my citizenship cost me my conscience.

The real capital of this nation is in Wall Street. Congress is its standing Committee.

Do not wait until we become popular. We will not need you then and the world will not know that you ever lived. It is the man who has the courage to stand out of the beaten track, to be true to himself and the highest he knows, who may arouse opposition. He may incur hate, but in every hour of trial, he can stand erect for the majesty of his own manhood; he can look himself in the face without blushing; he can go to rest at night with his self-respect, and walk forth in the morning a man.

It was a great and wonderful speech. One that deserved to live. It is the concluding paragraph of a worthy chapter in working-class history: the chapter recording the story of Debs' war resistance. The speech ranks Debs with Karl Liebknecht and John MacLean and unites the world in the glory of Anti-Militarist struggle and defiance. It proves that he kept faith with himself and with the working-class of the world. It immortalises the picture of Debs in his best mood—on trial, facing his profit and blood intoxicated acusers; indicting, from the dock, and later from the silence of the jail, dollar Patriotism.

This great after-prison speech of Eugene Debs reminds us of the vitality of the dock speech that we have recorded. History will not want to know what the judge said, nor the State Attorney. When we read the lives of the martyrs, we recall the questions and comments of their persecutors with scorn. We only honour what the martyrs said. And history will honour what Debs said in an American Court, on the famous day of his 1918 trial.

WHAT ARE THE WORKERS?

At Madison, on April 18, 1923, Debs delivered another great speech, in which he defined the place of the workers in Capitalist class. We excerpt:—

The working classes are HANDS; farm hands, factory hands, mill hands, mind hands—hands, hands, hands. Do you understand that in this system you are merely the hands of your capitalist masters, that you are fit only with your horny hands to produce wealth to enrich them while yourselves remain in poverty and dependence? Hands is what you are and hands is what you will remain in the capitalist system; hands to the capitalist head, hands to be calloused and deformed and to become ugly in the service of the capitalist head that looks down with scorn and contempt; the head that looks from the proud eminence of a palace down into the sodden quarters where the hands rest for a little while to reproduce themselves in the form of fresh hands for other heads that are to be served in poverty and misery and degradation, and so and on forever.

Hits, all palpable hits, magnificent propaganda points, worthy of the fire and burning enthusiasm of Eugene V. Debs, the prison-martyr of his class, the American Socialist deprived of his citizenship by Congress and therefore the outstanding American citizen of his day and generation.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS
IN THE DOCK

II.—GLASGOW SEDITION TRIAL, 1921

XII—ANARCHIST OR COMMUNIST?

The Communist, the then official organ of the recently-formed Communist Party of Great Britain, also commented on the trial in a spirit of comradeship. Stalin was an unknown quantity in those days. Gallacher spoke with awe of the revolutionary understanding and integrity of Lenin and Trotsky. He quoted both as the master minds of Socialist and Communist strategy and working-class struggle. To-day he falls back on Stalin, Beaverbrook, and Churchill. The Communist Party promised a practical solidarity that was never implemented. In view of the illegal nature of our arrest, the promise ought to have been redeemed. According to the laws of Britain, we were never legally before the Glasgow High Court. That fact involved an important principle of constitutional law, which ought to have been upheld jealously.

In The Communist for Saturday, July 2, 1921, under the sub-heading, "The Case of the 'Red Commune,'" the Communist said :—

We would draw the attention of all readers to the unusual savagery, unusual even in these times, with which the Glasgow High Court have dealt with the case of the "Red Commune," in which sentence was passed on the 22nd inst.

Our Comrade Guy A. Aldred has been held in prison since the 2nd March last, and is now sentenced to twelve months imprisonment, the heaviest sentence being served for sedition at the moment. In addition Comrades Jane H. Patrick and Douglas McLeish, Secretary and Chairman of the Glasgow Anti-Parliamentary Communist Group, receives sentences of three months each, and the printer, Andrew Fleming, three months imprisonment plus a £50 fine or a further three months.

The article for which these sentences were imposed, far from being a direct incitement to violence to the masses, was a purely theoretical article elaborating the tactical position of the Glasgow Group, unlikely to appeal to anybody except already converted communists. As a result of this case the Glasgow Group lose at one blow their Group Officers and what is more serious, the movement loses the "Red Commune."

Comrade Aldred has the heaviest record for sedition sentences, dating back from 1909. On this occasion he defended himself with his customary force and courage.

One point of special interest in connection with the case is the ruling of Lord Skerrington in summing up, to the effect that it is sedition to advocate drastic political changes other than through Parliament, but it was not sedition to urge changes, including the abolition of the House of Commons, through the medium of Parliament.

If this ruling is upheld and acted upon the day is not far distant when there will not be sufficient prison cells in the country to accommodate all those whom this definition brands as criminals against the State.

In its issue for Saturday, October 8, 1921, The Communist returned to the question of our imprisonment in the following reference to our prison circumstances :—

TEA AND SUGAR.

Perhaps the meanest action of our rulers that we have had to record for some time is the treatment of Guy Aldred, whose comrades McLeish and Jane Patrick have just been released from jail. He was sentenced to a year's imprisonment—the maximum—and to this the Government has illegally added the 4 months which he was kept in gaol before his trial.

It is a case of sheer spite. Aldred belongs to a very small group of Communist Anarchists. He happened to irritate our rulers. With the natural instinct of cowards, they felt that the very weakness of the Aldred group permitted them to be savage in safety. It would be a sheer scandal if he were left to lie in prison because some doctrinal differences, important enough under other circumstances, separate him from the rest of the Communist movement. Just at the moment he is so friendless that he is unable to afford the tea, sugar and milk which prison regulations permit him to buy outside. If the movement cannot back up its imprisoned members better than that it had better shut up shop.

Just as the Communist Party insisted that we were Anarchist and not Communist, so Freedom, the organ of the Kropotkinist Anarchists, classed us with the Communists as distinct from the Anarchists. Under the caption, "Still Imprisoning Communists," Freedom, in its issue for July, 1921, commented :—

The Government still continues its policy of prosecuting the Communists. . . . A week previously, on June 21, at Glasgow, Guy A. Aldred, Jane H. Patrick, and Douglas McLeish, members of the Glasgow Communist Group, were found guilty of publishing a seditious article in the "Red Commune." Guy Aldred, who had been kept in prison for four months without bail, received a brutal sentence of twelve months' imprisonment, the other two getting a sentence of three months each. We have read the article concerned and we fail to see why the judge should have been so vindictive to Aldred. His punishment is twice as severe as that meted out to any one else found guilty of a similar offence, and we hope a strong protest will be made. We do not agree with the Communists in their advocacy of a Dictatorship, but that does not prevent us protesting against these prosecutions. In fighting for freedom of speech and press, we fight for freedom for all. Free discussion may hurt the capitalist, but it can never hurt Truth.

XIII—WEDGEWOOD QUESTIONS MUNRO.

Colonel Josiah Wedgewood showed much anxiety about our imprisonment. He considered it unjust and said so in bold terms.

We have known Wedgewood for many years, without being intimate, although, under circumstances like those of imprisonment or threatened imprisonment, he wrote us always in terms of close comradeship. We always found his attitude towards war unsatisfactory. The man has a fascination for liberty and allure towards martial glory. He was never afraid to champion the victims of injustice. During his political career, he has seized opportunities to proclaim an almost romantic attachment to Anarchism, which he conceives rightly as the philosophy of liberty, and not as a gospel of violence and chaos. The attachment was academic largely because during the Great War Wedgewood turned militarist. He is very militarist to-day and considers militarism more essential in 1941 than it was in 1914. Yet he defended the conscientious objector boldly in 1916-18 and he has defended conscience to-day. We heard him once, some years after the war, develop the theme of freedom eloquently to a House of Commons that had no interest in such an issue.

We recall Wedgewood's anxious enquiries at the time of our 1921 imprisonment with gratitude. He went to great lengths of protest. Finally, he raised the matter in the House of Commons. We quote from Hansard for March 14, 1922 :—

APPLICATION FOR RELEASE (GUY ALDRED).

...40. Colonel WEDGWOOD asked the Secretary for the Home Department whether Guy Aldred is not to be released till 21st June although, owing to his confinement awaiting trial, his imprisonment will then have lasted 16 months instead of the 12 months to which he was sentenced, the maximum to which he could be sentenced; and whether, seeing that the fear of Communism has declined, Guy Aldred will now be set at liberty?

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Munro): I have been asked to reply to this question. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that 12 months' imprisonment is the maximum sentence for the offence of which Aldred was convicted. I have ascertained that in determining the sentence to be pronounced the judge took into account the time which Aldred had spent in prison before trial. I see no ground on which I would be justified in advising any interference with the sentence.

This was, of course, a callous reply. Also it was untrue. Just verbiage. The same year Munro was elevated to the Scottish Bench, and became Lord Justice Clerk, with the judicial title of Lord Alness. He resigned in 1933, to make way for Craigie Aitkinson, whose elevation was the reward for correct political planning: turning Labour at the right moment: and again, turning National Labour. Munro was elevated to the House of Lords as Baron Alness, in 1934. To-day he is a Lord in waiting, and upholder of the Government in which Thomas Johnston is Secretary of State for Scotland and Herbert Morrison is Home Secretary.

This fact seems strange to-day when one considers the view entertained of Munro on the Clyde in 1921. John S. Clarke voiced that Clydeside opinion of the more virulent sort in his "Cigarette Papers" in The Worker for October 11, 1919, in the following paragraphs :—

MR. MUNRO'S MISHAP.

It is stated, perhaps on doubtful authority, that a certain personage "looks after his own."

Mr. Munro, Secretary for Scotland, hearing of the strike, decided to motor back to London. He motored to Edinburgh on Sunday, and resumed his journey next morning, having with him Sir Donald Maclean, M.P. Darkness set in when they were still some 50 miles north of York, and that city being off the Great North Road, they had some difficulty in finding their way. Reaching a cross-road, and under the impression that the car had stopped, Mr. Munro, in order to read the direction post, alighted, but the vehicle being still in motion, he was thrown violently to the ground, sustaining a severe cut above the left eye, bruising his ribs, and being badly shaken. He was conveyed to York Hotel, "where the staff were on strike," and put to bed.

We were in Court some years ago when Gallacher, Muir and Bell were on trial. We remember Mr. Lord Advocate Munro on that occasion. We remember his zeal, and the little quips with which he ridiculed the witnesses for the defence. We remember the bitterness of his address to the jury; the play upon the prejudices of the smug middle-classy nonentities, and his passionate appeal for a conviction.

We do not wish any particular evil to fall upon Mr. Munro for that; we merely remember it, and we, better than anyone save the victims themselves, remember the horrors they endured for their principles in the Calton Jail of Edinburgh, and we bluntly confess that black ties would most certainly have been absent from our attire had Mr. Munro broken his blasted neck.

Clarke's description of Munro's conduct as advocate is correct. His comment cannot be upheld as an expression of Socialist elegance of thought. Yet he was returned subsequently to Parliament as Labour member for Maryhill, and Johnston supported his campaign in the Forward. To-day his name figures in Who's Who with that of Johnston and Alness. Only recently, under war conditions he has been co-opted on to the Town Council. Yet we suffered 16 months' imprisonment for defining in clear and simple terms devoid of all personal clamour and abuse, a suggested Communist programme of political strategy leading to revolutionary social and political struggle. Either capitalist justice does not work evenly or else the capitalist class take us more seriously than they do John S. Clarke. Parliamentarianism obviously liquidates the realities of the class struggle for the figureheads. For Clarke is in the same party as Johnston, and Johnston is in the same Coalition Government as Alness. And the Clyde workers have been deceived by wild language which possessed no real significance. Clarke tickled their palate and appealed to their worthless sense of the ribald without advancing their cause. The ruling class were not injured. Clarke finally was honoured. The working class was betrayed. No hatred of wrong was expressed, but an illusion of hatred was paraded. What a game!

Further light was thrown on the nature of the game some years ago in the book published by that most orthodox firm of religious publishers, Clarke & Co., Fleet Street, London. It was entitled Church Finance and written by The Lord Sands, a sometime most distinguished Senator of the College of Justice at Edinburgh.

This book declared that the Churches of Christendom were forming an International Group, not for the promotion of Christian principles, but to regulate and capitalise Church finance. The patrons were stated to be H.R.H. Duke of Connaught and The Lord Alness! The vice-president was Sir Herbert Trustam Eve, K.B.E.; and the chairman was Sir Andrew Pettigrew, Glasgow. The Committee included everybody who was anybody and nobody who was willing to witness in the world against the orthodoxy and interests of the world in defence of Christian principles, such as peace and human brotherhood. Our references to the organisation are stated in the past tense because we have not followed its history and know nothing of its developments. The Committee may have collapsed. The formation of it is a study in cant.

This Committee was once simply "The Business Man's Committee on Church Finance."

but at the time Lord Sands wrote, it was international. His book tells all that is worth knowing about getting money. Accounts were to be kept of what everybody gives, and if anybody did not give enough, the local Committee was to be "firm" with the defaulter. Sermons were to be preached periodically about the duty and the privilege of giving money, and occasional conferences were to be held to discuss how to get more money.

Nor was this money to be considered secular in any way; it was to be what the authors call "spiritualised." The process of "spiritualising" it was for the minister to say prayers over it, and forms of prayer for this purpose were given in the book.

Alness participated in all this worthless parade en route to his present position. Parliamentary Socialists pursued another path of cant that they might reach the same goal and enjoy some similar ruling-class status in a world of war, misery, and oppression.

We pleaded the Glasgow Green Free Speech case before Alness in 1924 and the Bill of Advocation, in the Shettleston case, before him in 1929. Our experience of him as a judge is that he was alert, impartial, shrewd, helpful, and penetrating. In the 1924 case his comments indicated how to raise the matter afresh with a view to securing a more helpful legal ruling. This we did with some success in 1931. One's contact with Alness, the judge, is another story from that of the ruling of Munro, the Secretary of State for Scotland. It is related from interest and because progress is aided the less bitterness we treasure from past experience. All men should receive credit for their sound and helpful behaviour and treated to censure only for their errors.

(To be concluded.)

[This trial will conclude in our next instalment. Part III will consist of "Echoes of the Glasgow Trial." This will include "The Case of the Documents," the story of the Nuneaton man who lost his job for writing to us, etc. We would be grateful to any reader who could lend us the "Freethinker" and the "Worker" records of this case.—Ed.]

ME TOO ! ! !

To-day we are suffering from "Me Too." Tory, Liberal, Labour and Communist all say, "Me Too"! Each competes with the other to see who can shout for war the most enthusiastically. This "Me Too" policy was denounced by Lloyd George when he spoke in the Manchester Free Trade Hall, on Friday, October 23, 1936. He recalled the unpopularity of Gladstone and Campbell-Bannerman for their opposition to war. His illustrations were bad for he dealt with politicians and gave instances which brought quick returns. This is the parliamentary method of thinking. After having his windows smashed, Gladstone scored the great victory of 1880. Lloyd George added:

"I served under the leadership of Mr. Gladstone and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. I know how the latter was abused inside and outside the House of Commons with contempt and scurrility and scandal and every form of derogation. In 1906 he had the reward of having the biggest majority any Prime Minister had ever had."

Turning to the Chairman, Lloyd George said:

"you were talking about the Boer War. I took a little part in that. I came here. The only quiet meeting I had the whole of those three years was in Manchester. But there were lots of police outside. Mr. C. P. Scott was in the chair."

This was a reference to a man who refused to define journalism as day-labourism, meaning thereby mental and moral prostitution. Were C. P. Scott alive to-day we do not know what he would do about 18B or the detainees.

Scott died on January 1, 1932, in his eighty-sixth year. He was a journalist, not a politician. He understood his craft and was jealous of its worth. He was a journalist, not a trader, small in soul, vast in ambition. He did not believe in using a newspaper as a means to acquire wealth. He honoured the press and respected its evolution. He believed in its pioneer power, and so added to the glory of the English language. He believed that the newspaper was the instrument of civilisation. Thus inspired, he made the Manchester Guardian the most famous newspaper in the world. He respected the best traditions of the press, in the struggles towards health and liberty, and transcended them. When he died, daily journalism became a phrase in history, and departed the world for an epoch. All his life, Scott remained "Scott of the Manchester Guardian." He asked no higher distinction. Indeed, he could think of none.

Speaking on the duties and task of journalism, and the conduct of a newspaper, Mr. Scott said in one of his speeches:

"Literally, it implies honesty, frankness, courage, and a sense of duty to the reader and to the community. The newspaper is of necessity something of a monopoly, and its first duty is to shun the temptations of a monopoly. Its primary office is the gathering of news. At the peril of its soul it must see that the supply is not tainted. Neither in what it gives, nor in what it does not give, nor in the mode of presentation, must the unclouded face of Truth suffer wrong. Comment is free, but facts are sacred. Propaganda, so called, by this means is hateful. The voice of opponents, no less than that of friends, has a right to be heard. Comment is also justly subject to a self-imposed restraint. It is well to be frank; it is even better to be fair."

This is a splendid statement. How many newspaper proprietors, careerist penny-a-liners, upstart writers and look-out politicians, live up to such principles as Scott so simply defines? How many would suffer to promote them?

Lloyd George must have been reflecting on this fact, when he said, in the Manchester speech quoted already, that it was a mistake to reduce statesmanship to trades, where one must follow the fashion, like haberdashery. Lloyd George may have served under Gladstone and Campbell-Bannerman. But he followed the fashion also. His coupon election was a great and evil fashion campaign, one of the most notorious ramps that Capitalist politics produced.

"The Americans have a great gift of hitting off the situation with a little phrase, and in the Presidential election in America at the present moment there is something they call the 'Me, too' policy. One of the candidates says, 'I am in favour of such and such a thing,' and the other gets up and says 'Me, too.'

"Do not let us start that here.

Lloyd George illustrated how Mr. Baldwin discovered that "collective security was very popular" and said "Me too"! Afterwards, Baldwin discovered Re-armament. Continued Lloyd George:

"Mr. Ernest Bevin and Dr. Dalton say 'Me, too.' Believe me, it is not a game at which they can hope to win. Mr. Baldwin is a far more adroit 'me-tooer' than Mr. Bevin or Dr. Dalton. They had better give it up."

Baldwin has gone. Churchill conducts the band. The theme song continues the same: "Me Too!" It is the theme song of Capitalism, war, and social disaster; but it suits the chorus of political place men. Unfortunately we believe in the dignity of pen and speech. "Me Too" sounds like a foreign idiom: foreign to all traditions of thought and freedom, of the right and liberty of the citizen; foreign to the very constitution of English speech.

CONSTANCE BOLAM

The first woman C.O. to go to gaol in Britain is Constance E. Bolam, aged 21, domestic servant, of Kenton Bank Foot, Newcastle-on-Tyne, who appeared before the Northumberland Petty Sessions at Newcastle-on-Tyne on 7th January, charged with failing to comply with a direction of the Ministry of Labour under Defence Regulation 58A to take up work as a ward maid at the Eye Infirmary, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Percy L. Frankham (prosecuting for the Ministry of Labour) said that from correspondence it appeared that the defendant was a conscientious objector and gave that as her reason for refusing to comply with the order.

Bolam had not exercised her right of appeal against the direction.

The prosecutor added:—

It is a case of complete defiance of the Defence regulations.

Sir Ralph Mortimer (Chairman): But you are not asked to undertake war-wark.

Constance Bolam made it clear that she was unable to accept any work offered to her with a view to her assisting the war effort.

"I disagree with war in any shape or form. If there had been no war I would not have been ordered to do the work, so therefore it must be to help the war effort."

Sir Ralph Mortimer: "This is a war against civilisation, and if the enemy wins neither you nor anyone else would have any opportunity of saying whether they opposed war on conscientious grounds."

Bolam was fined 40/-. This she refused to pay and when about to leave the Court was brought back. The alternative was fixed at one month's imprisonment, and she was taken to the cells.

The Bench seemed reluctant to give an alternative but the Prosecuting Solicitor stated that from what was known of the defendant there seemed no likelihood of her ever paing the fine.

As she was escorted from the dock some people in the public gallery shouted to her: "Good luck, Connie." Others booed her.

At 3.30 p.m. Constance Bolam, being taken to Durham in a Police Car, waved to her friends and seemed in good spirits.

BLAH! BLAH!

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

A friend's unflattering comment immediately after finishing reading the reply of Viscount Cranborne, the Government spokesman, to a speech delivered by Lord Sempill in the House of Lords on November 18th, strikes me as such an adequate description that I do not think it can be improved on as a title for this article.

Lord Sempill asked the Government what steps they proposed to take to give practical effect to the Fifth and Sixth Principles in the Atlantic Charter. The Fifth Principle, as readers will doubtless remember, is "To bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field, with the object of securing for all improved labour standards, economic advancement, and social security"; while the Sixth Principle outlines the main advantages which would accrue and emphasizes a determination to promote the ordering of world affairs in such a way that all "may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want."

Apart from a display of somewhat undue optimism in regard to "victory" and a tendency to envisage one of the most important problems of the day as the solution of unemployment rather than the solution of unempayment related to unemployment, Lord Sempill's speech was of a very enlightened character and contained many excellent points.

He emphasized the absurd paradox of poverty in the midst of potential abundance which in pre-war days existed in so many countries, including our own and the United States. The latter, in spite of being, perhaps, the richest self-contained unit in the world, having within its boundaries nearly all the raw materials essential for providing its citizens with a very high standard of living, had at one time no less than thirteen million unemployed living under conditions of great poverty and hardship.

Lord Sempill drew attention to the mighty propaganda weapon we should have in our hands if we could offer the world an economic system which provided adequately for the needs of men without demanding in return, as the German system in the past has done, any surrender of spiritual and political freedom.

He pointed out the folly of a foreign trade system which consists, not in an exchange between nations of the maximum quantity of goods and services of approximately equal value, but in a senseless struggle to export a greater value of goods than is received back in exchange, the object of one party being to get the other into a position of irrepayable debt in order that its financiers, who, by bank loans, had created new money to finance the export trade, might thereafter be enabled, for an indefinite period, to levy an interest tribute upon the country to which the exports had been sent.

In the world of finance and economics for many years past, instead of theories being made to conform with facts, a strenuous and insane effort has been made to make facts conform with theories, the process often involving the destruction of goods and the wholly unnecessary cutting down of production.

Lord Sempill stressed the point that the real problem in the past has been not over-production but under-consumption related to unemployment, the connection between the two being, in his opinion, inseparable. It would, perhaps, have been more accurate to say that our faulty economic thinking which takes no account of the fact that in a labour-saving and labour-destroying age, you must expect to save labour, has treated them as though they were inseparable, although, in point of actual fact, there is not the slightest reason why they should be so.

After drawing attention to the present unsatisfactory system of endeavouring to prevent breakdown by creations of new money which add fresh burdens of interest or increased taxation, Lord Sempill advised that new money, not in the first instance borrowed, should be "spent" into existence by the Government whenever the need for doing so clearly existed. He instanced reasonable pensions to elderly people as one way in which new money could be spent into existence, these pensions, unlike those paid under the present system, being adequate in amount and not derived from taxation.

He emphasized the very important fact that, in their past search for remedies for the poverty and unemployment problem, those in authority had persistently explored every avenue except the right one, the right one being the financial avenue, and this, Lord Sempill might have added, has been just as true of the United States and of pre-war France as of our own country.

He concluded his speech by stressing the importance of making our plans for post-war economic reform known with the minimum of delay.

Lord Cranborne, replying on behalf of the Government, said that he regretted that Lord Sempill had not given him previous notice of the kind of issues which he was intending to raise, and added that the Fifth Principle of the Atlantic Charter was very widely drawn so that under it almost any subject could be discussed. This was not very far from admission of a fact of which monetary reformers are all too well aware—namely, that the economic clauses of the Atlantic Charter are extremely vague and are probably intended to be so to allow the maximum scope for evasion and delay.

Lord Cranborne went on to display what I am afraid appears to me to be somewhat ill-founded optimism when he spoke of the time at which the German morale would begin to crack and of the ensuing period when the leaders of the Anglo-Saxon nations would play a main part both in making and maintaining peace. He added that the Government would take careful note of what Lord Sempill had said, but as recommendations similar to those of Lord Sempill have been laid before different Governments for many years past, there does not seem much hope that the "careful consideration" of Lord Sempill's ideas will not end in a policy of rejection, following a long-established precedent.

Lord Cranborne went on to say that he did not expect the House to give him a catalogue of the measures which the Government intended, in due course, to pass in order to give effect to Article 5 of the Atlantic Charter. That, he said, would be quite impossible, for the Atlantic Charter was intended to refer entirely to the future and to a post-war era which would only begin "after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny." Another reason why it would be impossible for him to go into what he described as "great" detail was that the final arrangements could only be reached through collaboration with a number of other nations.

By these remarks he emphasized still further the completely unsatisfactory nature of the Government's policy in relation to the Charter, indicating plainly to those who have some past experience of the financial racket what very little hope actually exists of practical effect being given to its high-sounding phrases, either at the present or in the future.

In point of fact there is not the slightest reason why the Government should wait for the end of the war before explaining in greater detail the main features of its economic plans. On the contrary, if these plans had, or were ever likely to have, any merit whatever, there is every reason why they should be made plain to the European nations now, for until a better alternative is presented, Hitler's New Order (which, in spite of propaganda attacks, is likely to possess considerable merit in giving the peoples of Europe the prospect of a higher standard of living than they have ever before enjoyed) will have no serious rival.

It is also nonsense to make out that the agreement of other nations must be secured before any statement can be made. It would be perfectly easy for the British Government to say that it is in favour of certain monetary and foreign trade reforms to which it hoped in due course to secure the adherence of other nations and which, even if such adherence is not secured, it intended to adopt for the better regulation of its own trade and home production. Such reforms might include the adjustment of the money supply to the country's maximum output and import of real wealth in the form of desired goods and services; the creation and issue of a certain percentage of new money in a manner which did not involve any increase either in debt or taxation; the provision of adequate incomes for all deserving persons, whether employed or otherwise; the employment of taxation only for the purpose of preventing inflation, and not for the collection of revenue; the prohibition of all forms of currency speculation and of the purchase and sale of currencies by private persons or organizations; the maintenance of a stable internal price level; the fixing of the exchange values of national currencies by agreement between nations co-operating for trading purposes, regardless of gold; and the payment of international debts solely by the means of goods and services.

Lord Cranborne stressed the tremendous difficulties and complexities of the problems which had to be handled, problems which, he said, had baffled all economists for the past hundred years and needed a great deal of time for further study before they could be overcome. The plain fact is, however, that the solution to most of these problems is already known and has been brought to the notice of British Governments without any avail for a period of upwards of twenty years. It is not further study that is required but a willingness to adopt reforms which run counter to the interests of those who are concerned with deriving power and profit from money-lending and currency speculation. If the economists have been baffled it is only because they have been exploring every avenue except the right and obvious one. This their financier masters forbid them to explore!

It may well be that the Government's economic advisers are strenuously engaged upon a task which they find exceedingly difficult. Anyone, however, who bears in mind the antecedents and past record of Mr Churchill and President Roosevelt and their colleagues will have a strong conviction that the real problem as far as they are concerned is not that of devising a means of securing, for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security, but of seeing what can be done to preserve as much of the old faulty system as possible, while at the same time warding off complete economic collapse and such extreme poverty and suffering among the people as may provoke violent social upheavals, dangerous to their chances of maintaining their political power.

PAPER RESTRICTIONS URGENT

Owing to paper restrictions, we are compelled to reduce our circulation in order to maintain our size. Please see that your copy reaches nine readers besides yourself, if you would help us to double our reading public. Also ensure copy by becoming a personal annual subscriber.

We will report on our fund next month. We are still a very large sum short of £1,971 11s. 3d. for which we appealed in November, 1940. Since we are issuing such a good paper as regards size, at least, and have not increased the cost, perhaps each reader would help this month. Only a slight effort is needed to end this begging. Special thanks to comrades who responded so well last month will appear in our next report. Comrades, it rests with you, collectively and individually.

THE TURNCOATS

By

ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE

At any time a Turncoat is a despicable thing, for a Turncoat always is a dishonest person. The Turncoat is to be distinguished from the honest convert to a change of views, just as it is easy to distinguish a Turncoat when he is met. The present war has unearthed more Turncoats than any previous war, for it is in war-time that Turncoats mostly come to life.

Let readers of The Word witness how hundreds of men and women, if not thousands, in this land of Socialist Democracy, have become Turncoats. Male and female, high and low, rich and poor amongst the working-classes, have gone over en masse to the way of the war-monger. When I say "amongst the working-classes" I mean what is pertly termed "The Labour Movement." For, apart altogether from the clergy and laity of many of our churches who, previous to the war, enthusiastically associated themselves with a Peace Movement of one kind or another, and who now have returned to "their first love," how the outsider who is not a Socialist, such as the present writer, stands aghast at the somersault of "Labour." For indeed this has been a shock to teeming of thousands within and without the Labour Movement.

Previous to the present war, when Hitlerism was running its course and carrying all before it in the Reich, mostly all the present Tory politicians of this country backed up Hitler one way or another. In those days most of our Socialists objected to that, and at the same time they denounced any preparation for war. They denounced war and held that all wars were alike. They were the happy hunting-ground of the Capitalist and Imperialist. Wars never did the working-classes any good, and never would. Conscription was opposed and would be opposed were it actually introduced. Such fellows as Morrison, Attlee, Bevin, and the lesser precessionists such as the Johnstons, Dollans and Woodburns, were all of them conscientiously against war and its evils to the working-classes.

But now! What a change! "What a Game," as the Duke of Bedford would say! The same gentlemen who previously objected to war and denounced war are now at the head of the war-machine. They are now in the Front Line!

What has caused this change? Do these persons think for one moment that honest working-men, no matter how easy it is to dupe the working-man, are totally blind? Can one of these Turncoats fact up to the challenge that faces them? Can they actually tells us that this war is different from all previous wars, and that the result of this war will benefit the working classes? If they cannot tell us that, then why are they with the war-mongers? Is it not just because they are dishonest Turncoats who hope to get out of their present attitude towards the war all there is to get?

Even the so-called Socialist press has altered. It is now as hot for war, conscription of the poor and their money, the suppression of the conscience of the people, as is its master, the millionaire press. Even that great Socialist journal, Forward, has changed its tune! Last war, what a weapon against suppression, war and all its evils Forward was! But now! To-day it carries articles by war-mongers, more articles by war-mongers than by those against war. Issue for 13th December actually contained an article headed "Is This An Imperialist War," by Arthur Woodburn, M.P., one of the Turncoats. Mr. Woodburn would argue "No." This war is different, although, of course, he does nothing to show that this is not another Imperialist war, like all the previous ones.

When I saw that article I had a mind to send in a reply to it. But what is the use? For some months past I have sent in eight or nine articles or letters to the Editor of Forward, and out of that lot there was only space for one little letter. War-mongers such as Dollan and Woodburn have a free field in Forward these days, and they can say what they like and mostly get away wit it. And, be it noted, both of these persons were conscientious objectors at the last war when they were of military age.

Last war Forward, with Tom Johnston in the lead, attacked war for all it was worth. Even Harry Lauder was slaughtered by the pen of Tom Johnston for making money out of entertaining the troops. And now! The great men of the last war: men who have been idolised and accepted as experts on the problems of the working-classes, are now all out for war. For, they say, and this with their tongues in their cheeks, this war is different. Last war we were only fighting against Kaiserism and the Huns. But this war we are fighting against Hitlerism and the Huns. And that's about all the difference there actually is!

"GOWRIE'S" STAND

"GOWRIE," the famous Socialist Cartoonist, and member of the Glasgow "Forward" staff, to-day.

Our comrade, "Gowrie," otherwise J. R. Henderson, was sent to prison on November 24 by the Sheriff at Kilmarnock, for three months for refusal to do fire-watching. "Gowrie" made a splendid stand for conscience during the Great War.

Comrade Henderson, then aged 21, appeared before the Local Tribunal, York, on March 23, 1916. He was granted exemption from combatant duties only. His claim was for absolute and complete exemption. In his statement to the Tribunal, he said:—

"I can undertake no form of service for the direct purpose of prosecuting the war."

The N.C.F. Watchers' Report stated:—

"Claimant gave firm and decisive answers to questions. Said he had the honour of being a member of the No Conscription Fellowship."

Henderson Appealed. His case was heard on April 3, 1916. The decision of the Local Tribunal was upheld and leave to appeal to the Central Tribunal was refused. Henderson's comment on the hearing was:—

"Appeared to be dealt with in summary fashion. I stated that no matter whether their decision was in my favour or not, I should remain loyal to the principles I upheld."

Henderson was arrested on Saturday, May 20, 1916, and kept in the police cell over the week-end. He was tried on Monday, May 22, and handed over to the Military Authorities. No fine was imposed. He made a vigorous speech in defence of Socialist Anti-Militarism and conscientious resistance to war.

Henderson was conveyed, under military escort, to the Infantry Barracks, York. He refused to don Khaki and was court-martialled on May 27, for insubordination. On June 1 he was sentenced to 28 days detention and commenced to serve this sentence in the Barracks, as there was no accommodation in the military prison. On June 17, he was removed to the Isolation Hospital, at Tulford, suffering from skin trouble, through being compelled to use verminous blankets. On June 23, he was removed to Richmond Castle. His subsequent record may be set out in diary form:—

1916, July 8, Court-Martialled at Richmond Castle.
" July 15—Sent to Durham County Prison to serve 112 days' imprisonment.
" October 10—Left Durham Prison under military escort.
" October 26—Court-Martialled at Pontefract.
" November 3—To Wormwood Scrubbs to serve 12 months Hard Labour.
1917, April—Released from Wormwood Scrubbs.
" May 2—Court-Martialled at Leicester. Sentenced to 18 months' Hard Labour.
" May 5—Removed to Leicester Civil Prison.
1918, August 12—Court-Martialled at Leicester Barracks. 2 years without Hard Labour Leicester Prison.
" September 9—Transferred to Wakefield Prison.
" September 24—On failure of internment scheme transferred to Leeds Prison.
1919, April 8—Released from Armley Gaol.

The story of Henderson's first Court-Martial was told in the Yorkshire Gazette for Monday, June 3, 1916, beneath the headings:—

COURT-MARTIAL ON YORK OBJECTORS.
Man Who Kicked His Army Boots Off.

The text of the report read:—

At a District Court Martial, held at the York Fulford Barracks on Saturday, two conscientious objectors, named James Ritchie Henderson, aged 21, of 48 Vyner Street, York, and Harold Deighton, aged 24, of 12 Fenwick Street, York, both of whom were charged with having been absentees from the Army, and were handed over to the military at the York Police Court on the previous Monday, were charged with insubordination to their superior officers. Major Coke presided over the proceedings, and Major Becher prosecuted for the military.

Evidence was given by Corpl. J. Wood, of the depot, West Yorkshire Regiment, stationed at Fulford Barracks, to the effect that he took Henderson to the quartermaster of the regiment to be clothed, and left him in charge of Sergt.-Tailor J. R. Walkeley.

Sergt.-Tailor Walkley said that when he asked the accused to remove his boots he refused to do so. They were forcibly pulled off him, however, but when the Army boots were put on he immediately kicked one of them off.

Corroborative evidence was given by Lance-Corpl. J. W. Smith, who said that the accused, when ordered to take off his boots, replied: "I shall not, and, not being a soldier, if you put them on I shall take them off at every opportunity," or words to that effect.

Henderson: If I did say those words, did I say them in a polite and civil manner?

Lance-Corpl. Smith: Yes.

DECLINED WITH REGRET.

A statement was then made by the accused, during the course of which he said that it was with regret that he felt it incumbent upon him to decline military orders. To do otherwise would be, to him, to trample upon his own honour, and to violate his firmest convictions. The Appeal Tribunal, having confirmed the decision of the local Tribunal, to send him for non-combatant duties, he felt that he had no alternative but to prove the genuineness of his convictions by his refusal of all military orders. To submit to becoming a soldier after the stand he had already taken would be to prove himself a fraud and a coward. He was now fully prepared to take the consequence of his action in the same way as his friends the soldiers had done, by giving up their lives in what they believed to be a righteous cause. The accused admitted to having refused to obey the order to take off his civilian boots, although he denied having been provocative in his manner. He added that he had refused all orders since his incarceration. He was opposed to all forms of warfare, and most certainly was not in favour of the inhuman policy of starving innocent women and children in Germany, and felt convinced that it was this policy of the British Government which was causing the German people to approve of the dastardly air raids which were taking place on this country. Revenge and bitterness were growing on all sides, and the seeds sown could only result in greater conflicts at a later time. He was living and working for the day when the peoples of the nations would understand each other, and when fear and suspicion would be removed and give way to the new order, when sanity and peace should be once more established on earth.

Our contemporary proceeded to report the case of Deighton, who also made a very clear stand.

We do not know what happened to Deighton subsequently. But Comrade Henderson maintains his clear stand for Socialism and Pacifism, as his 1941 imprisonment proves.

ALAN MORLEY

In December, 1941, we published an account of the trial, and sentence of 12 months' imprisonment, passed on Alan Morley, of Westerhope, Newcastle, for refusing to submit to medical examination.

In August, 1941, we told the story of Alan's father, John Morley, who resisted conscription during the last war, and declined to assist fire-watching in this war. John Morley was sentenced to 3 months' imprisonment in May, 1941. We published the picture of John Morley and his wife, and their son, Robert, in our August issue.

In February, 1941, we told the story of Robert Morley, and his sentence for refusing to register.

We now publish a picture of Alan Morley.

On his release from prison John Morley wrote in appreciation of The Word, and our tribute to his integrity and stand for conscience :—

" Please allow me to express my great appreciation for the manner in which you presented my case in the August issue of " The Word." You make an ordinary normal interpretation of Socialist Pacifist principle appear as if it were an event; and my only point of criticism, if any, would be that there are many men and women who live out their principles in life with greater sincerity and courage than I do, and whose deeds go by unhonoured and unsung. Personally, I could do no other than I did without committing moral suicide."

In our view, the stand for conscience ought not to be an event. Unfortunately, it is. The entire movement is indebted to our Comrades Morley for their spendid interpretation of Socialist Pacifist principle.

Since his release from prison, Comrade John Morley has been worried by the authorities over the issue of fire-watching and threatened with further action. But he maintains his uncompromising stand against war.

John Morley and his wife visited their son, Alan, at Wakefield Prison the second week in January. They found him in good spirits and uncompromising in his Anti-Militarism and loyalty to conscience.

Dear Friend,—I am sending along a subscription for your wonderful paper, The Word. Please give us a little more news about Gandhi and India.

Dear Friend,—As a new reader of your publication, I have found the contents most inspiring and have been greatly stimulated by the articles by Mr E. H. Norman and the Duke of Bedford. You are, in my view, performing a great service to mankind by leading the joint Pacifist-Socialist opposition to poverty and militarism.

With best wishes, yours sincerely,

A. ALMOND.

Sunderland, December 4, 1941.

Dear Sir,—I am quite in agreement with Miss Ruth Fry's article regarding the Atlantic Charter and with her revised version of it. The original Charter is too vague and full of loopholes to suit the convenience of wily politicians. Even its good points will be neglected and forgotten unless we—the ordinary citizen, the man in the street—press with sufficient persistence for the fulfilment of those promises. Otherwise they are just so many empty, meaningless phrases, or a theatrical gesture, meant to impress the world for a while and then laid aside and completely ignored.

Yours sincerely,

(Miss) MAISIE HOWARD.

Formby, December 9, 1941.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Though I was in another part of the prison, along with Creech Jones and other old friends, I am proud to remember I met E. D. Morel at Pentonville Prison in 1917-18.

Best wishes. Yours sincerely,

CECIL E. CATFORD.

London, N.10, December 9, 1941.

Dear Mr Aldred,—It is truly a struggle these days for the Pacifists, but the fight is for a new way of life for humanity, and the responsibility for bringing this about rests on us. I feel that we must do all in our power to divert this crushing wheel of history from its present suicidal, insane, inhuman course. It may appear hopeless to many, but, given the determination, and the courage, and the willingness to accept sacrifice if necessary, it is possible.

I was very glad to see the report of Cardinal MacRory's plea for a negotiated peace now. It seemed like a gleam of hope at last, and only wish that it had had more publicity, and that a definite movement could be started to propagate that policy, and make some impression upon the Government. I am convinced that a negotiated peace, on right lines, is the one hope of any settlement of Europe and of any permanent peace in the future, and that the time for this is now.

With the best of wishes for the paper and for the cause for which it stands.

Sincerely yours,

EVELYN DAWSON.

Liverpool, 18, November 26, 1941.

Dear Comrade,—From your account of Richard Carlile's life, he certainly appears to have been a grand fighter for freedom. His attitude of publicly proclaiming his opposition to tyrannous laws and governments is exactly what is desired, or, perhaps I had better say, needed, at the present time in the progressive movements. I have been struck by the contrast between Carlile's resistance and the acquiescent behaviour of the " Daily Worker " and their, compared with Carlile's, large and extensive organisation. If they had carried on publishing the paper, regardless of the Government's orders, what support they would have obtained, but years ago I gave up hope so far as the C.P. is concerned.

ROBERT MORLEY.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, November 25, 1941.

Dear Sir,—As one of the late Rev. H. J. Adlard's listeners at Trim Street Chapel, Bath, for the last four years, I was delighted to read in the Bath and Wilts Chronicle on Saturday last that you intended to publish many of his sermons.

Many years had passed since I had attended any church or chapel regularly till I had the good fortune to stray into Trim Street Chapel one Sunday evening.

To listen to and digest the mental food Mr Adlard offered that night meant my going the next Sunday evening to see if such another mental meal would be given.

It certainly was, and continued throughout the four years I had the great pleasure of listening to him.

I am passionately fond of reading when I can spare time, and it had to be something out of the ordinary to take me from a cheery fire and a cosy chair, with an enjoyable book, to take me out into snow, sleet, or rain through the changing winter weather. Well, to listen to Mr Adlard's discourses was something extraordinary, so it was no sacrifice for me to do this though it meant also a 'bus ride to get to his chapel, because I knew I should be more than repaid. I am sorry I cannot find words of my own to describe Mr Adlard's abilities, but I can truthfully say that we got from no other chapel or church what Mr Adlard gave in his.

I feel that those in Bath who knew his worth will or should forever feel sad at not showing their appreciation of it by going to listen to him in far greater numbers than was the case. You, sir, invited Bathonians to co-operate in paying tribute to "a very great and not much appreciated man."

Can his place be filled? I have my doubts, and can only say he passed away far too soon, for he was in truth one of our fellow-beings who could ill be spared from the very splendid work he was doing.

Yours very truly,

(Mrs) CLARA EVANS.

Oldfield Park, Bath, December 2, 1941.

Dear Guy Aldred,—The November issue of The Word contained a letter from Matt Kavanagh which attributed to me an opinion that "all the Anarchist and Socialist anti-militarists ought to be jailed."

Will you kindly allow me to deny this allegation most positively? It is the opposite to all I have ever believed on the subject of expression of opinion, and which I believe or feel now. The idea was pure imagination on Kavanagh's part. Besides, I have been worried by the thought that comrades to whom I have felt attached by deep respect and esteem may be in danger of imprisonment because of their great sincerity.

The statement that I "was a real colleague of the late John Turner" I take as a compliment. I would like to add that in all the years during which I knew John Turner he never uttered to me an unkind word regarding either Kavanagh or yourself.

As regards the members of the old Freedom Group, I wish that Kavanagh could render a tenth of the good service they gave to Anarchism in their day. They had their faults and shortcomings, maybe; who has not?

I am glad to see above the title of your paper: Liberty! Equality! Fraternity!

The meaning of those inspiring words has yet to be generally realised.

Sincerely and fraternally,

GEO. CORES.

London, N.W.10, December 12, 1941.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I am deeply grateful to you for publishing the articles of my old friend, F. W. Jowett, and review of his life's work.

Amidst all the betrayals and desertions of the past few years, this grand old pioneer and fighter never seems to weary or complain, but writes the truth as he sees it. For the past ten years it has been the wilderness for him.

True, he has continued to write, very faithfully, each week in the Bradford I.L.P. News, but it has a very limited circle of readers, and now you have given him fresh hope.

As one who loves him greatly, I am deeply grateful to you.

With kind regards. Yours in the cause,

ARTHUR L. BROWN.

Bradford, October 8.

[We did not publish this letter from our comrade, Councillor Brown, at the time of receipt. Subsequently we decided that tribute should be paid to Comrade Jowett from every section of the movement as a true and faithful pioneer and leader in the social struggle. If Comrade Jowett's age permits, we would like to see him the centre of the struggle, uniting parliamentarians and anti-parliamentarians alike in the great Socialist struggle against war and militarism en route to a free and sane society of peace, equity, and justice: a worker's republic of virtue.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—With virtually the whole world now in the thrall of militarism, it is more than ever incumbent upon all of us who see the better way to make it clear to the understanding of others. I am happy to send the enclosed.

Yours sincerely,

C. GASKELL.

Littleborough, December 14, 1941.

[Our comrade, the Rev. C. Gaskell, enclosed postal order for 10s. We thank him for his loyal, continuous, and unsectarian solidarity.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—A copy of your November issue chanced to fall into my possession, and I was delighted with it. As a Socialist-Pacifist, I appreciate very sincerely the venture upon which you have embarked, and wish you every success. I feel convinced that The Word is one of the very few publications which are endeavouring to keep alive the rapidly dwindling spark of sanity and decency in a maddened and crazy world. I hope to see you enlarging your list of contributors and persuading such influential thinkers as John Middleton Murry and Wilfred Willock (to name only two) to lend you their assistance. I have great pleasure in enclosing a year's subscription (commencing with your December issue).

Yours sincerely,

DAVID H. BURT.

HYMN No. 643

(Temple Revised Version.)

[The Archbishop of York recommends conscription for two generations after the war.]

Onward conscript soldiers
Marching as to war,
With the plump Archbishop
Going on before.
Mars, the royal master,
Leads against the foe;
Forward into battle
See his banners go!

At this sign of triumph
Great is Satan's glee;
On then, conscript soldiers,
On to victory!
Hell's foundations quiver
With the shout of praise;
Brothers lift your voices,
Loud your war-cry raise!

As a mighty army
Moves our Church so odd,
Brothers we are treading
Where we've always trod.
We are much divided;
Different bodies we;
Different hopes and doctrines;
Little charity.

Wars may teach their lesson
Very, very plain,
But our Church's blindness
Constant does remain.
Gates of hell can often
'Gainst our Church prevail
On the path of progress
Crawling like a snail.

Onward then, ye people,
Join our thoughtless throng;
York has done our thinking
And he's never wrong;
"Glory, laud and honour Unto Mars the king!"
This through countless ages
Men and devils sing.

—BEDFORD.

PAPER RESTRICTIONS
CONCERN YOU AND FREEDOM.

The increased paper restrictions operate as a bar to circulation. They menace the growth of independent and radical thought and without seeming to oppress, successfully strangle all critical development of opinion. We are struggling to maintain our size by reducing circulation. So please become an annual subscriber or place a fixed order with the comrade or firm who acts as your newsagent. Very soon our size may have to be reduced. A great paper supply still exists for rubbishy production and useless official circular printing. Why?

We have decided to make our fund report next month and close this appeal. Some comrades made a good response but we are still short of the £1,971 11s. 3d. for which we appealed in November 1940. Four hundred of our readers —a very small proportion— subscribing between 5/- and 10/- each would enable us to reach the mark almost.

Nearly 7 millions killed and over 12 millions wounded. For what?

The war to "Smash German Militarism" gave us Hitler and Mussolini. Collison Owen is busy writing hysterical articles against these dictators and their hordes to-day. Yet in the Sunday Pictorial for November 15, 1933, this same journalist, hired labourer of the ruling class immediate interest, wrote :—

"One spot of Mussolini, one dash of Hitler, would be very helpful in the British cocktail. You can't make a virile nation entirely on loving kindness.

"One rotten foundation on which we were pretending to build was that the war generation had died to make the world safe and happy for the next one. It can't be done. Each generation must justify its own existence, and though John Brown died at Ypres, John Brown, Jr., may have to do something more than join the League of Nations Union to save the world for democracy and his sports car."

THE STARVATION WEAPON

By F. W. JOWETT.

[This essay was published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News," for Friday, January 30, 1942. We reproduce it as a valuable contribution to working class understanding at the present period of crisis.—Ed.]

Neither we nor the German people whose Governments began this war which now is a world war have suffered from actual starvation yet. There is, however, an unknown number of years before us during which the starvation blockade strategy will be pursued relentlessly, and we here at home may yet have to go through that bitter experience.

But even now in what must be regarded as the EARLY STAGE of a LONG WAR people are DYING FOR WANT OF FOOD at the average rate of 200 a day in Athens and Piraeus.

In Belgium according to a report by the former United States Ambassador to Belgium, quoted by Vera Brittain in her News Letter "two million young Belgians are threatened with stunted physique, degenerated brains and embittered characters unless relief comes soon."

This United States ex-Ambasasdor's report, which has been widely circulated in America has been ignored by the British press, a fact which we may be quite sure Dr. Goebell's has not failed to use effectively in German war propaganda.

Vera Brittain's comment on the tragically misdirected effect of the attempt to put the starvation blockade strangle-hold on Germany puts the position clearly, for it exposes the effort to defeat Germany by starvation as being neither humane nor capable of fulfilling its intention. This is her comment :—

"These friends and allies who shared the misery and terror of our unsuccessful Western and Eastern campaigns are the first to feel the effects of our continental blockade. THE LAST to FEEL IT, as the Minister of Economic Warfare has himself admitted, WILL BE THE GERMAN ARMED FORCES. Never was an appeal so abundantly justified as Dr. Salter's moving and courageous plea in the House of Commons on November 25:—'IS THERE TO BE NO END TO THIS TORTURE OF MILLIONS OF HUMAN BEINGS? IS THERE NO PITY IN THE WHOLE WORLD?'"

Dr. Alex. Wood's comment in the Peace News (January 23rd, 1942) is equally clear and more pointed in relation to present conditions. He says :—

"The weapon of the food blockade does represent war at its very worst. . . . It selects the weak and the innocent as its first victims. A hideous weapon at any time it is particularly hideous when applied to the occupied countries. We STARVE OUR FRIENDS IN THE ATTEMPT TO STARVE OUR ENEMIES.

"No wonder the Belgian Prime Minister hoped that while the blockade is being used to win the war, "some means of coming to the rescue of Belgian youth, which represented the future of the nation, might be found" . . .

What a gift for Dr. Goebbells!" exclaims the P.P.U.'s president, Dr. Alex Wood, very appropriately. "The British Navy blockading the shores of Greece while the Greek Merchant Navy brings food to Britain!".

To give further point to his comment, Dr. Wood informs his readers that in the Daily Express of January 6th there is a reproduction of a cartoon widely published in Germany which makes effective use for propaganda of the British military strategy of starving allies in attempting to starve the enemy. Dr. Wood also calls attention to the weekly journal, Spectator, of June 10th, in which there is a short report by Mr. Harold Nicolson, of German propaganda in Greece showing the thoroughness with which the German Ministry of Information is using the material provided by the British blockade of Britain's own allies.

How anybody who is not in blinkers of war-time prejudice can see in this policy of starving the peoples of allied and neutral nations any useful purpose even as a part of war policy it is difficult to see. Only complete disregard for the effect on public opinion in the neutral and allied nations concerned can possibly account for such serious misapprehension.

The Belgium Prime Minister who mildly expressed his hope "that while the blockade is being used to win the war some means of coming to the rescue of Belgian youth . . . might be found," most certainly failed faithfully to express the opposition of the starving people of Belgium which from the first beginning of the blockade has existed and is sure to increase in intensity as long as the blockade continues.

Belgium, like other European countries in similar situations, depended in peace time on imported products now completely denied to them by a Government that claims to be defending them, forsooth.

Denmark's dairy farming industry has had to slaughter the main part of its cattle for immediate home consumption or for export to Germany because it depended largely on imported cattle food which the British blockade has stopped.

Belgium in peace time IMPORTED 50 PER CENT. OF THE PEOPLE'S FOOD which, also, the British blockade has stopped.

Greece is normally so dependent on imported food that it is estimated that if nothing is done to prevent it AT LEAST ONE-THIRD OF THE WHOLE POPULATION WILL DIE FOR LACK OF FOOD IF THE WAR LASTS ANOTHER YEAR.

It is suggested that the case of Greece should be treated separately, but with an understanding that temporary and partial raising of the blockade for relief to Greece should not be regarded as a precedent for similar concessions to other countries. Other blockaded allied and neutral countries therefore are expected to submit for the duration to a starvation blockade without ill-feeling against the powers responsible for their starvation which will grow increasingly bitter as the war goes on to the bitter end of a military victory, which by no stretch of imagination can be visualised as a possibility in less than another five years.

Some time in 1943 American and British supplies of munitions, ships, airplanes, tanks, guns, and men will be ready for offensive action. Ready, that is to say, for military invasion and occupation of Germany and ready also at the same time to dislodge the Japanese from all the fortified key points—scores of them—spread over the Pacific Ocean.

Is it of no importance to these militarist strategists of ours that the peoples of countries across which they expect to fight the enemy and afterwards march their victorious armies into Germany, should be friendly to them, rather than be bitterly hating them for depriving them of food?

The peoples of these blockaded countries will feel they had the right to expect that food might reach them as relief under Red Cross supervision. All through the last war under the Hoover scheme food was sent into Belgium and Northern France and millions of people were saved from starvation. "The British and French Governments which at first opposed the scheme both afterwards expressed themselves satisfied that the food had gone to the people for whom it was intended." (Peace News, January 23).

It is announced in the Press that Lord Ponsonby is going to ask the Government in the House of Lords for a report on the famine situation in European countries allied to us, and whether any projects for controlled relief are now under consideration.

The reply that must be given to Lord Ponsonby's question is of immediate desperate importance in enemy occupied countries. It is to be hoped the reply will be favourable to permitting emergency food relief to reach the starving peoples without further delay. But relief measures can only partially alleviate the evil which they cannot possibly remove.

The high and mighty military strategists will have to lift entirely the food blockade from Europe's suffering peoples or the Allied armies will start their promised march into Germany (if ever they do) through countries inhabited by peoples not merely unfriendly, but HOSTILE.

WHO HELPED HITLER?

The militarist press has made a great deal of fuss about Mr. C. E. M. Joad having been a pacifist during the last war, and feeling compelled to be a "brains trust" over-age militarist in this. The full story of Professor Joad's evolution is never told.

Mr. C. E. M. Joad was at one time a member of the I.L.P. He left the I.L.P and joined the New Party at its formation.

Why is this fact forgotten, when so many ex-members of the New Party are, or have been, interned for Fascism?

The truth is that, Mr. Joad may have a brilliant mind of parts, although we question its worth and even its brilliance, but he is mentally unstable, and actually devoid of a sound philosophy of life.

As a member of the New Party he wrote a pamphlet, in which he said :—

"Would it not be better to admit honestly that, so far as Utopian Socialism is concerned, the establishment of a new social system and the adoption of a new way of life, it must for the present remain Utopian? The situation is such that our immediate thought must be not how to enter an economic paradise, but how to escape an economic hell. We must plan not to introduce the millennium but to avoid catastrophe."

We do not know if Joad considers the present game of murder between the peoples of the earth a way of escape or distraction. There is no accounting for the reasoning eccentricities of "brilliant" minds eulogised by the capitalist press.

In the same pamphlet, Joad said of Parliament :—

"Everybody agrees that Parliament must be reformed. As at present constituted, it places a premium upon obstruction and a disability upon action. A cabinet composed of Caesars, each of whom was endowed with the energy of Napoleon and the vision of Lenin could not get through the present House of Commons one-tenth of the measures which an adequate treatment of the present crisis demands. Consider, for example, the Parliamentary situation one day last December. Public affairs were admittedly critical. Palestine was suspicious, India in a ferment, the national finances were going from bad to worse, and two and a quarter million Englishmen were unemployed. YET PARLIAMENT SPENT A WHOLE DAY DISCUSSING METHODS OF RABBIT-TRAPPING!"

We are not quarrelling with Joad's indictment of Parliament. We but recall it. Not the indictment as a statement of fact, but the tone of the indictment, calls for comment. It is an expression of hysteria—the hysteria out of which Fascism evolves. But Joad is now one of our patriotic intellectuals. Beaverbrook and Willie Gallacher approve his mental worth? What amazing recommendation.

Another section cites as one of Britain's leading political economists and "Socialist" intellectual, Professor Harold Laski. The worth of such "intellectuals," who write always as though their judgments were final, will be seen from the following statement made by Laski in the columns of the Daily Herald, for November 19, 1932 :—

"Hitler throws a very big shadow, all out of proportion to his importance. To the discerning eye he is of little significance . . . it is a safe prophecy that the Hitlerite movement has passed its apogee."

Hitler's shadow may be out of all proportion to his worth. We think it is. But one can hardly conclude that he has been of little significance, or agree that his movement passed its apogee in 1932. This fact will not interfere with the intellectuals continuing to play the role of prophets. Like astrologers, our intellectuals are never at a loss for a new prophecy. They proceed gaily from error to error and add to their reputation as they pusue their worthless and disastrous course.

How was it that Laski's prophecy about Hitler never came true? For the same reason that similar prophecies about the decline of Winston Churchill never came true—because of Trades Unions, their nationalism, and their leadership.

Writing in the first number of the short-lived but not uninteresting Glasgow I.L.P. weekly, The Socialist Star, Middleton Murry defined, with regret, the attitude adopted by the German Trades Unions towards Hitler on Mayday, 1933 :

"As I write the depressing but inevitable news come that the German trade unions have decided to amalgamate with Hitler's 'corporate state.' In Germany, on May 1, the trade unions will be demonstrating, not against Hitlerism, but for it."

Tom Mann wrote to the same effect in the camouflaged Communist Party product, The Militant Trade Unionist, at that time :—

"Meanwhile, 'at the top,' negotiations are going on. They are between Hitler's representatives and the General Council of the German Trade Union Congress. Hitler has now permitted the reappearance of most of the trade union journals. They are printing articles in favour of Fascist policy. A number of trade union leaders—members of the General Council, are also actively supporting Hitler. A few months ago they were making violent speeches against him."

And so Trades Unionism and the right of Socialist propaganda were betrayed. How wonderfully Socialist Parliamentarianism and industrial reformism inaugurated the reaction!

Two years later, Dr. Schacht, Hitler's finance minister and close colleague and also friend of Mr. Montague Norman, of the Bank of England, told the United States of the close connection between unemployment, finance, and war in Germany in these cold, precise terms :—

"Re-armament and military training have done more than any other factors to reduce unemployment in this country."

That barbarism, and the return to the servitude of militarism, is capitalism's only way of dealing with unemployment is a fact and not an opinion, was evidenced by the World Economic Survey issued by the League of Nation's Secretariat in September, 1935.

Referring to, and summarising this survey, The Times said :—

..." How far the world has yet to travel before it returns to anything like normality may be realised by the fact that world trade last year had fallen by 66 per cent. of its gold and by 45 per cent. of its sterling value in 1929. Unemployment in 1934 was still more than double that in 1929. If the absorption of unemployment should continue during the current year at the same level as in 1934 the amount of unemployment in the world with production back to its 1929 level would still be 75 per cent. greater than it was then. The irresistible conclusion is drawn that until some significant expansion of international trade is achieved, there will remain, despite substantial recoveries in national production, a 'hard core of unemployment' in practically every industrial country."

The absorption of unemployment never occurred until war came.

The Sunday Dispatch, in its leading article for May 13, 1934, said :—

The model for the British Blackshirt Movement is to be found in Italy.

The same issue of our contemporary published an article from the pen of Lord Rothermere on Mosley :—

It is wrong to regard Mosley simply as the greatest platform orator of the day. He is much more than this. He is perhaps the greatest political teacher we have produced in our history.

Parents should take their boys and girls to listen to Mosley, for three or four of his speeches are, to the auditors, a liberal education.

So that in 1934 Mosley was deemed the Harmsworth Educator; and Mussolini was the British model. Now our contemporary has turned to Stalin!. Well! well!!

We do not know what the Rev. S. L. Lane, of Newport, stands for to-day. The South Wales Echo for May 7, 1934, reported his address to the annual May meeting of the Monmouthshire Association of Sunday School Unions. Here is an excerpt:—

"They could think what they like about Hitler, but he had gathered the youth of Germany around him. They saw him a strong man, and until they showed that Jesus was a strong man they would not get youth."

THE POWER OF SOCIAL RESISTANCE

By C. H. NORMAN.

[Many readers have written to us expressing the hope that our comrade, C. H. Norman, would resume his valuable essays in these columns. We have many of his articles in hand, including some specially written for "The Word." This month, however, we select the important essay he contributed to the columns of "The Railway Review" for January 16 of this year. Comrades who do not read our contemporary will be pleased to read it for the first time.—Ed.]

The growth of the coercive power of the State is one of the ugly facts of the time. It is a process which has developed since Napoleon the Third instructed Baron Housmann so to lay out the streets of Paris that no revolutionary mob could repeat the march on the Bastille in 1789. The police of the Russian Czar adopted a similar method in entrapping the revolutionary demonstrators in the open squares of St. Petersburg in 1906. The streets of Berlin have been reconstructed on similar lines: as have those of other turbulent capitals in Europe. London and Madrid were reconstructed to an extent: but they were re-formed from other motives in the last forty years.

The multiplication of deadly weapons makes a paraphrase of Mr. Churchill's much advertised statement really a fact: that never before could so few maltreat and blast so many. Mr. Churchill had that mind when he turned out the tanks on the dockers in the great strike of 1926. In the bombing aeroplane and the tank are more certain protection against revolution in England than even the dope of a borrowed oratory.

The believer in violent revolution, whether resident in Germany, Russia, Britain or France, may well wonder what chance there is for him against the massed tanks and the bombing aeroplane. Men of violence have the advantage over men of peace of appealing to Fear, that transformer of mankind into the universal idiot, who so easily becomes their tool.

ARMCHAIR REVOLUTIONARIES.

It is an easy and odious task for the armchair revolutionaries to appeal to simpletons in various cities to shoot the uninformed A's and B's so that the X, Y and Z civilians may die at the hands of a firing party or under the guillotine. Of course, these revolutionaries of the wireless have no genuine belief in revolution. They only hope to dupe some cretin of the Continent as they have already tricked the cretins of their own land. Their safety is certain; the fate of their murdered victims or executed dupes is a matter of momentary discussion, but nothing more.

So the outlook is black from the point of view of all but the man with faith in the gun. Even collaboration in incitement cannot be trusted after the sad fiasco in the last war. At a certain point in 1914-18 war there was an understanding between the scattered remnants in Britain and Germany who believed in international action against war that the workers on the Clyde and the workers at Krupps should stage a two-days' strike as a protest against the war. The British Government was alarmed at such a prospect, and Mr. Lloyd George induced the late George Lansbury to go to the Clyde with a special edition of "The Herald" to persuade the Clyde men not to carry through their part of the arrangement. Lansbury was successful in this mission and the Clyde men failed to come out on the appointed day. But the Germans kept to their word, and the works at Essen were silent for the agreed two days. It is remmbrance of this incident which has perhaps, more than anything, made the German workers reluctant to respond to British invitations to revolt against Herr Hitler; but it has its lessons in throwing light on the possibilities and chances of demonstrations against war by the factory workers of Europe.

UNDERLYING WEAKNESS.

Powerful as the Moloch of the modern State has become, with its terriffic armed force in the air, on the land, and on and under the sea, there is a weakness in all this organisation which is the more palpable the bigger the organisation tends to become. The strength of these combinations is really only the bluff of the State and its military statesmen. The whole conception of the power of the State rests upon the acceptance by the citizen of the orders and directions of those set in authority. Once reject that conception and the whole scheme would collapse. There is a curious example of this truth given in the memoirs of the Austrian statesman Count Czernon. He recounts how in 1918 the Emperor Charles of Austria described gleefully that the crowd had cheered him lustily in the streets. Within a week, the Count was at the Palace when the same Emperor was sitting alone in his study unable to get anyone to answer the bell or give him any information or even food. The revolution had broken out and the power had passed from the Emperor into other hands. The refusal of service is the great revolutionary weapon of the future. It is a pleasant thought to picture the present rulers of the world sitting in their respective headquarters ringing bells in vain and dancing with impotent fury, because som flash of illumination had withdrawn their dupes from their servile allegiance. The "long nose" might well be the new revolutionary symbol. The forces of reaction depend for their effectiveness on the loyalty of willing and unthinking service. Once that is gone, these "rulers" becom the strutting puppets that to the eye of vision, alone they are. The clerk in the post office, the private in the army, the soldier in the trenches, and the man in the aeroplane or on the railway engine all serve the common purpose of eventually becoming the fodder of the capitalist-military Molochism which controls the State. Never have so many been put to such abominable purposes by so few.

THE NEW PRINCIPLE OF LIFE.

The revolution of the future will deny this rule of obedience, which has been inculcated by that worst civilian lackey of the capitalist system, the teacher.

The new principle of life should be the refusal of service which leads to destruction, and its substitution by the principle of critical assertion of personality against the Moloch of the State. The doctrine of disobedience to those men who abuse their authority and their place should be the doctrine of the future, a more effective doctrine than that of the dagger, the pistol, or the bomb. For without the effort of the common man and woman nothing can continue in society. Those who have usurped the power of direction are destroying society by the aid of the common man or woman. When willing effort is put to criminal purpose by the unscrupulous then those whose efforts are so misused should reflect upon their responsibility, and should remember that, at the last, it is their conscience, not that of their pastors and masters or those set in authority over them. that will bear the stain of their directed crimes.

Blah! Blah! Erratum. In this essay by the Duke of Bedford last month, page 82, the fifth paragraph, opening sentence, ought to have read:

Lord Cranborne went on to say that he did not think the House would expect him to give a catalogue of the measures, etc.

THE BLUNDERS OF BERNARD SHAW

A "Socialist" Who Admires Dictators

By H. W. HENDERSON.

Admitting that he had "blundered badly about Fuhrer Hitler" Mr. Bernard Shaw (in a letter contributed to the New Statesman, of July 5th, 1941) asserted that he is "always making mistakes" by imagining that other people are as "clever" as himself. That Mr. Shaw is always making mistakes is a statement with which anyone familiar with the ridiculous nonsense he has been purveying to the public over a lengthy period of years will readily agree, but many of us must be wishing by this time that the "sage" of Whitehall Court would give a little thought to the effect his reckless assertions may have on weak-minded people who are unable to assess them at their true value. The times in which we live are serious and there is something loathsome and revolting in the spectacle of an octogenarian playwright (claiming to be a Socialist) making humorous and flippant remarks on matters upon which the happiness and often the very life, of millions of human beings may depend.

Mr. Winston Churchill has said of Bernard Shaw that "he indulges in all the liberties of an irresponsible chatterbox, babbling gloriously from dawn to dusk," and that "the world has long watched with tolerance and amusement the nimble antics and gyrations of this unique and double-headed chamelion, while all the time the creature was anxious to be taken seriously. If Mr Shaw is anxious to be taken seriously it is time he gave more careful thought to his public pronouncements instead of coming forward on the slightest provocation with statements that would insult the intelligence of a ten-year-old child.

Space does not permit of a full summary of Bernard Shaw's absurdities during the past few years, but a number of these may be given to show the confusion which he has been causing in the public mind on matters of vital importance to the British people.

Long ago Mr. Shaw delighted the Russian Government by proclaiming himself a believer in the "dictatorship of the proletariat." What he meant by dictatorship of the proletariat was explained in a letter to the London Times of August 30th, 1941, wherein it was pointed out that this was really a system "by which the proletariat is much more effectively dictated for its own good than under our system." His contempt for democracy and admiration of dictatorship have been expressed on many other occasions. In the News Chronicle of May 18th, 1934, Mr. Shaw asserted: "Sir Oswald Mosley is a personal friend of mine and I am very much interested in the whole affair (i.e., Mosley's Fascist Movement). The Parliamentary system is breaking up." "Parliament is hopeless," he reiterated in the News Chronicle of January 6th, 1936.

When Mr. Chamberlain went to Munich in 1938 and, acting with complete contempt for Parliamentary tradition, betrayed the Republic of Czechosolvakia into the hands of Hitler, Bernard Shaw was delighted with the bargain and informed the Sunday Referee of October 2nd, 1938, that Mr. Chamberlain had "scored a triumph."

"Direct negotiation between the men who have actually the power to make or break the peace is the only reasonable businesslike method," said the Great White Beard. What the people thought, either in Britain or Czechoslovakia, apparently did not matter. Fabian intellectuals could hardly be expected to bother about such trifles. A tiny democratic republic was acrificed to suit the plans of two powerful imperialist groups without so much as an invitation to the conference table. And the great George Bernard Shaw approved.

"It was plain that Czechoslovakia was not going to surrender territory unless and until she was forced to do so. I am glad that Prague has agreed to the Munich plan."

Finally, Mr. Shaw gave the interviewer his opinion of the two dictators who had threatened to let loose bloody murder on the world if their demands were not conceded.

"You know what I think of Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini, two highly capable revolutionary and proletarian leaders, who are giving their people as big a dose of Socialism as they can stand."

When Mussolini launched his attack on Abyssinia—an attack as cynical and brutal as anything he had till then attempted—Bernard Shaw was immediately to the fore explaining it as part of the onward march of civilisation.

Typical of the irresponsible character of his utterances was a statement made shortly after the Abyssinian conquest to a reporter of the Daily Express (March 26th, 1938). Asked whether we should return to Germany her former Colonies the Great White Beard asserted—"My slogan is, 'Africa for the Africans.'" But not long before, as a reader of the paper pointed out, he was campaigning under the banner "Abyssinia for the Italians!"

Mr. Shaw's opinion of the major Fascist aggressions and what should or should not have been done to aid the victims was given in an interview with the Daily Herald of March 3rd, 1939. Pooh-poohing the idea that anything might have been done to prevent the martyrdom of China, Abyssinia, or Czechoslovakia, Mr. Shaw asserted:—

"The Manchukuo affair was one of imperial conquest, in which it was the business of the Chinese to defend themselves. The Abyssinian affair was part of the march of civilization, in which at present a savage country, through which no one can travel safely, belongs to the nation that supplies it with roads, police, and a water supply. Czechoslovakia was an artificial contrivance of the victorious Allies to disable their defeated antagonist; and no country in the position to which Herr Hitler had raised Germany could be reasonably expected to accept its frontiers."

[See Communism and Socialism, by Arnold Lunn.]

Especially, we suppose, as Hitler, like Mussolini (who gassed the Abyssinians) was a fine "proletarian" leader giving the people large doses of "Socialism"!

A curious letter from Mr. Shaw appeared in the New York paper, Liberty, in April, 1939, in which, writing in defence of his dear friend Lady Astor and the "Cliveden Set" (which, he asserted, did not exist!) he described himself as "an implacable and vociferous Marxist Communist of nearly sixty years' standing." Replying to this unforgiveable nonsense in the next issue of the paper (April 22nd, 1939), Mr. Upton Sinclair said:

"This is indeed a bewildering display of fireworks. When I first met you, more than twenty-five years ago, you were, and had been for a couple of decades, an active leader of the Fabian Socialist movement and a vehement anti-Marxist."

One can only wonder what possible pleasure Shaw gets out of playing the buffoon in this manner and so confusing thousands of people who are earnestly seeking truth.

Shortly after war began Bernard Shaw wrote a commendatory letter to the editor of the Glasgow Forward, encouraging him in the point of view he was expressing and wishing "more power to your elbow." But the editor of the Forward is a sincere and consistent pacifist abhorring war under all circumstances while Shaw (as we have already seen) supported Mussolini's aggression in Abyssinia and has frequently spoken in praise of the Duce (who believes that fighting is one of the noblest activities of man). Where is the consistency here?

Mr. Shaw, however, is not even consistent in his letters to the Forward, for in the issues of November 30th and December 7th, 1940, he openly advocated seizure by the British Government of the ports of Eire—an act of war which the editor (whose point of view he has commented) would not countenance under any circumstances. As an example of political muddle-headedness this could hardly be improved upon (unless by Bernard Shaw himself).

Some years ago Mr. Shaw paid a visit to the Soviet Union, accompanied by the charming Lady Astor, was wined and dined by leading Soviet officials, and thereafter burst into a paean of praise for everything "Communistic." How completely he was deceived on his visit to the "Socialist fatherland" can be seen by anyone who will take the trouble to read Smith's I Was a Soviet Worker, or Lyon's Assignment in Utopia, where the actual facts of Soviet life are exposed by American Communists who have lived among the Russian workers, and the methods by which the Shaws and other short-time visitors are tricked are ruthlessly laid bare. The opinions of British and American workers who went to Russia on the strength of Shaw's exaggerated testimonial would probably be unprintable!

On May 31st, 1941, Bernard Shaw burst into the columns of the New Statesmen with the information that Stalin is only a servant of the State "and can be sacked at a moment's notice as Neville Chamberlain was. He has no hold except that of being the best man for the job." In addition to this typical piece of Shavian nonsense we are asked to gaze in rapture at the achievements of Soviet collective farming by which the Russian leader has solved the agricultural problems. "What other statesmen now in power has a hundredth part of his achievement to boast of?" asks the babbling Fabian.

Who, on reading this hymn to Stalin, would imagine that in the process of collectivising the farms several million persons were ruthlessly starved to death in the famine of 1932-33? This is not the opinion of any group of Fascists but the considered view of Communist and Soviet sympathisers who have lived in Rusia and seen the results of forcible collectivisation for themselves.

In the man-made famine of 1932-33 Walter Duranty estimated that one and a half million persons died in the Ukraine alone; Maurice Hindus placed the total at not less than three million; and W. H. Chamberlain at four million.

These men spoke from first-hand experience.

Of all this Mr. Shaw says not a word nor does he express a particle of sympathy with the victims. Possibly, of course, he does not know and has never taken the trouble to find out. Starved Russians may be of no more importance to the great G.B.S. than gassed Abyssinians. It may be all part of the onward march of "civilisation."

Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union elicited from Mr. Shaw one of the silliest statements he has made for many a day:—

"To-day, owing to the inconceivable folly of Hitler, we have nothing to do but sit and smile while Stalin smashes Hitler. Now you will see what will happen—Germany has not got a dog's chance."

The suggestion that we have nothing to do but sit and smile is surely the most foolish anyone wishing for a Russian victory could possibly imagine. Conservative and Communist leaders alike have been pointing out that this is the one sure way of letting Russia down. The belief that Russia would easily smash the power of the Nazi war machine and that Germany had not a dog's chance of winning could only have been held by a person utterly ignorant of the subject he professes to discuss. Without the support of British and American industry all the valour of the Soviet troops would hardly be sufficient to smash the Nazi war machine and victory, even with this support, will not be easy.

If the public recognised in Mr. Shaw the public clown he is no damage would be done, but unfortunately there are thousands of simple-minded people who swear by every word he utters, and look upon him as a person of superb and penetrating insight whose most ridiculous utterances are to be regarded as the profoundest wisdom. The foregoing review of some of this man's most recent errors may serve to demonstrate his utter unreliability as a guide in political affairs.

OUR LETTER BOX will appear next month. The correspondence is heavy and interesting.

MORE MORRISON

HOME SECURITY AT HARROGATE.

The Bradford Telegraph & Argus (28th January) told the following remarkable story:—

"The Civil Service Clerical Association . . . have just obtained a written apology (from Herbert Morrison) for the 'inconvenience and distress' caused to a woman typist evacuated to Harrogate and employed at a post office there.

"Shortly after her arrival at Harrowgate she wrote to the 'Labour Monthly' asking to be put in touch with readers so that she might form a discussion group.

"About two weeks later HER LANDLORD was visited by a detective from the SECURITY authorities, who told him all the particulars of her home address, family, and past employers, and ASKED IF HE KNEW SHE ASSOCIATED WITH COMMUNISTS. The landlord was promised further particulars about the girl's activities.

"The girl was informed of this interview and representations were made to Mr. Morrison by the C.S.C.A.

"Mr. Morrison has replied that the landlord was seen by police officers in respect of ROUTINE ENQUIRIES which were made necessary from time to time. He apologised for any inconvenience or distress caused."

The cream of the story for us lies in the expression "the SECURITY authorities." Exactly who or what are they trying to make secure? Or is the name just irony? For this incident is bound to make hundreds of thousands of citizens feel profoundly unsafe.

To begin with; is it either legally or morally wrong to associate with Communists? If so, let's be knowing. Do the security authorities make "routine enquiries" of Churchill's butler, and ask him if he knows his boss associates with Maisky?

Seriously: JUST WHAT KIND OF OBJECTIONABLE ACTIVITY did they suspect this young woman of? They can't have imagined for a moment that she was pro-fascist. It is extremely unlikely that she is anti-Churchill, because before the war the Communist Party itself was crying out to replace Chamberlain by Churchill. Is it possible that Morrison is using his power to intimidate his personal political antagonists? WE MUST AT ALL COSTS FORCE HIM OUT INTO THE OPEN.

And finally, did you ever hear of anything so feckless as the actions of these two police officers, if they really thought they were trailing a spy? They seem to have opened their hearts to the girl's host, who promptly told the girl. If she had really been a dangerous character engaged in underhand work, the great boobies would have put her on her guard and made her move her digs.

But it seems clear that they thought nothing of the sort. Their actions speak for themselves. THAT VISIT WAS NOT MADE TO ENQUIRE, BUT TO INTIMIDATE. Thank heaven, that typist is a lass of spirit. If there are still a few hundred like her, British freedom may yet be saved—but not with Morrison at the Home Office.

THE WAY OUT.

By The Duke of Bedford.

A new pamphlet discussing the horror of war and violence and urging that reason can find a way out agreeable to liberty, justice, democracy, and commonsense. The author states his way out and invites criticism and consideration to ease the agony of mankind and to speed the new social dawn.

THE WAR: A PACIFIST SURVEY

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

The warmongers' chickens seem to be coming home to roost with a vengeance and this is a time for plain speaking. When I and those who think as I do advocated peace by negotiation when the Empire was still intact and even when our principal allies were still undefeated, we were called traitors, Fifth Columnists and pro-Nazis. The Home Office was urged to intern us and, if we expressed any doubts as to the certainty of ultimate victory, we were said to be guilty of the crime of spreading "despondency and alarm." Well, what about it? Who are the real patriots? If our advice had been taken could the position of Britain and her allies conceivably be so grave as it is to-day?. If every pacifist in the country be interned on evidence, false or otherwise, will it restore Singapore? Has anything that critics of the war have ever said or done created despondency and alarm comparable in degree to that produced by the results of Mr. Churchill's strategy? Notwithstanding the recent extraordinary vote of confidence, Mr. Churchill's star appears at last to be on the wane. It is said that in some quarters he has gained the nickname of "the grave-digger"; while certain officers retired from the Services have sent to members of the House of Commons a bold statement declaring that in their belief it is a choice between Churchill and the loss of the Empire. That a Parliament or nation possessing even the rudiments of sanity could ever have reposed confidence at a time of crisis in a man with Mr. Churchill's record is indeed astonishing and is only to be explained by the fact that he represents the embodiment of belief in the wisdom of, and necessity for, the war itself. If people are driven to admit that Churchill has failed, they are likely to come perilously near the necessity of deciding whether, after all, there should have been a war to prevent the German city of Danzig from returning to Germany or to prevent Germany from having a railway across the Polish Corridor. This frightens them for it is never pleasant or easy to admit that one has made a prize ass of oneself, although there are times when courage and honesty allow no alternative course, especially when the lives and happiness of other people are being sacrificed daily as a result of one's mistakes.

What are the facts and possibilities of the present situation? Our hopes of victory rest, presumably, on Russian, American and Chinese help.

The Russian resistance has been stiffer than seemed possible at the end of last autumn but the winter is now far advanced and the Russian armies are still a very long way from Berlin. Thoughtful people who know Russia do not view with any great degree of optimism the capacity of that country to beat back the German attack which presumably will be launched in the spring. In regard to America I would say frankly that it would be very unwise to credit a country so handicapped by graft in high places and by the schemes and policy of Big Business monopolists and financiers with the capacity to achieve the colossal task of conquering Europe and Asia across the barrier of an ocean over which, not only troops, but a vast and incessant stream of war materials would have to be transported in the face of enemy attack by submarine and aircraft. The fact should not be lost sight of that an expeditionary force has not merely to be brought to its destination, it has got to be kept fully supplied with ammunition and equipment all the time that it is fighting and if supplies fail it must suffer defeat.

In regard to Chinese aid one can only say that the cutting off of supplies by way of the Burma road is likely to have very serious consequences indeed.

So much for the darker side of the picture. What chances of achieving a reasonable peace still remain? Hitler, whatever else he may be, is not a fool and in one way this may prove fortunate even for us. He is also not a selfish politician who values war as a means of hanging on to power and office. In his militarist way he is a patriot who demands of his people such fearful sacrifices only because he believes that they are essential to Germany's future safety and prosperity. There is no reasonable doubt that in his heart he is impatient to see the end of the slaughter, by disease and war, of the nation in which he takes so great a pride and, having the necessary financial technique to achieve his ends, he longs for the day when he can begin the post-war reconstruction of Germany. This fact, combined with the circumstance that his enemies, though hard-pressed, are by no means defeated, gives the latter a very useful bargaining power of which they would do well to take prompt and full advantage. The nature of the bargain which could be proposed I have already explained in "The Way Out." We should offer to rid ourselves of the anti-social tyranny and practices of International Finance and Big Business which the Axis Powers declare to be their chief enemy. This might not please Churchill, Roosevelt, Baruch or the financiers of the City and Wall Street but the safety of our country and the deliverance of the world from war matter more than their desires, prejudices and personal gains. We should invite co-operation in the full development of the world's resources for the benefit of all nations and the distribution of goods according to need, stressing the duty of wealthy countries to assist poorer ones, if need be by actual gifts of goods and without any debt entanglements. We should also suggest world disarmament which was real all-round disarmament and not the one-sided hypocrisy that followed Versailles. In return for our contribution towards a world settlement we should direct the attention of the Axis to the duty of restoring freedom to individuals and nations, a duty for the refusal of which no moral justification could be found if the peace settlement left them in no danger either of economic aggression or military attack.

It should by now be obvious to any realist that our military achievements do not place us in a position to lay down the law as to what shall and shall not be done in every part of Europe and Asia. It is also obvious that some concessions will have to be made; that Japan will have to be granted extensive trading and colonizing rights in Asia; and that, for the time being, we shall have to agree to a good many arrangements by no means ideal either for ourselves or for others, trusting that these may be altered when peace has restored a better spirit and more effective international co-operation. We shall also have to overcome our objection to "trusting" Hitler and accepting him as a feature in the post-war world. Now that we have found that we can trust Stalin and forgive the acts of cruelty and aggression committed in the past by the Soviet government, it is no use making a fuss about not being able to live in the same world with other non-democratic statesmen and governments. For reasons I have often given, the personal trustworthiness of this or that political leader is not the matter of great importance it is commonly represented as being. If we cannot trust Hitler we can at least learn to put a bit more trust in God and in the decency of the average citizen of every country if in peace he is given the square deal he has never yet received.

Let us therefore abandon the folly of arguing, "Well, perhaps it was a mistake to start the war over Poland, but as we are now in it we must go through with it." Does a man who finds himself waist-deep in a bog as a result of following a bad guide say, "Well, perhaps it was a mistake to follow this man, but now that I am in so deep, I can see nothing for it but to proceed to the very middle of this morass." If he has any sense does he not turn and find a way out, lest further progress in the same direction should see him engulfed, even over his head?

A cynical modern poet has written:

"We've lost so much, we'd better lose the lot,
Lets throw the rest into the melting pot."

Is this the philosophy of wise men or of foolish gamblers?

One final point: famine and epidemic disease due to war and famine are beginning to rear their ugly heads in Europe. The people of occupied countries and our allies are already suffering. America may be all right in the security of her geographical isolation but the threat draws nearer to Britain and to Germany.

A monstrous crow once, in a classic humourous poem, brought two foolish combatants to their senses. May it not be time that the combatants in this suicidal struggle also heeded the warning of black wings beginning to appear on the horizon?

UNITED STATES ABSOLUTIST

Frederick Richards

—Reproduced from the columns of the "Philadelphia Public Leader."

On Wednesday, November 26, 1941, Frederick Richards, 21, of West Chester, a student at Swarthmore College, was sentenced by Judge Ganey, in the Federal Court, at Philadelphia, to a year and a day in the Federal Prison, because the dictates of his conscience forbade him to register for the draft.

Richards returned voluntarily from Mexico, where he had been engaged in welfare work, to enter his protest against the draft.

Richards said:

The thought of our adoption in this country of conscription—a totalitarian, Nazi, Communist method—runs contrary to all that I have even been taught or have come to believe.

For a man eager to work towards the alleviation of human suffering, conscription leaves no freedom of conscience. Conscription is the legal enforcement of the proposition that human beings exist only for the purpose of doing what the government wills.

As a Quaker I cannot but oppose this war. I do not believe that the butchery of another 20 or 30 millions people will further the Christian religion. I do not believe that destroying billions of dollars worth of property will raise the standards of living for America's or Europe's peoples.

Assistant United States Attorney Kallick said Richards had commited a serious offence and that if others followed his lead it might easily result in civil war.

Dean Everett L. Hunt, of Swarthmore, made a personal appeal on behalf of Richards.

Judge Ganey ruled:

You have admittedly violated the laws of the land, which you could have complied with by registering and then claiming exemption as an objector. That is what you are charged with, failing to register, not failing to bear arms.

THOUGHTS ON BRITISH IMPERIALISM

By RUDOLF ROCKER.

(Translated from the Spanish of "La Protesta," Buenos Aires, for August, 1941, by E. M.)

Rudolf Rocker

[Rudolf Rocker was many years editor of the Jewish Anarchist paper, "The Workers' Friend," published in Jubilee Street, London. We published a full account of Rocker's career in "Hyde Park," September, 1938. Copies of this paper can be obtained still from this office. When Kropotkin went pro-war in 1914, we were the first Anarchist writer to repudiate him. At first his admirers denied the charge and then had to admit its accuracy. Rocker replied to Kropotkin in "The Workers' Friend" and the articles were translated from the Yiddish and published in "The Spur." During the war both Rocker and his companion, Milly Witcop, were interned. Subsequently they returned to Germany and then escaped, going to the United States via Britain. Rocker's Imperialism seems mild but definite. We suspected that this was his present attitude from his writings circulated in America for some time by so-called Anarchists who would have denied the fact.—Ed.]

The spoken word is, of tyrants, the greatest! It is a soulless despot and for this reason it appeals more powerfully to those who live without ideals than to those who nourish themselves upon real thought. Marxist writers have filled entire libraries on the subject of Imperialism as the final phase, historically necessary, of developing Capitalism which leads inevitably to Socialism —just as the Night Scot goes direct from Glasgow to London.

A short time ago, a Swedish friend sent me a pamphlet dealing with English Imperialism as the cause of the present war. The author—a Stalinist, naturally—with the assistance of alleged "facts" tries to prove that England had been preparing for war for a long time and had deprived Germany of all possibility of feeding its excessive population. He asserts that the British Government had only to cede some of its colonies to Hitler and the catastrophe would have been avoided. Since the signing of the Russo-German alliance, the Stalinist press has sung the same old tune. And unfortunately, their tune seems still to influence even those who are not Communists*. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the matter more closely.

First, take the completely false statement that Imperialism is the logical consequence of developing Capitalism. There have been Imperialist States of which it would be impossible to say that they were Capitalist in the true sense of the word. Ancient States, such as those of Persia, Babylon and Rome, were built definitely on the policy of Imperialism. An "Empire" is a State controlling other nations by means of military conquest, political domination and economic exploitation, all from a determined centre or metropolis, the subjected nations having no independence of any kind. In its time, England was an Empire of this class. Its colonies were administered from London and from London were organised economically where they were not ceded as monopolies. It was this that moved the English of North America in 1775 to rebellion against the mother country, and it was from this rebellion that the United States of America were born.

This state of affairs has been modified for some time now but still there are those who can't see the wood for the trees. Undoubtedly Imperialism in Britain has not led logically to Socialism as the materialist conception of history would have it. With the exception of India, all the former colonies have been converted into independent States. But even in India there is a trend in this direction and no doubt it will follow, eventually, the course taken by the others. English Imperialism is not an Empire in the real meaning of the word but a federation of independent States—much more independent in their decisions than any one of the States of North America. Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa have their own governments; their own legislation; their own commercial policies; their own system of taxation; and their own immigration laws according to which, if they so desire, they can expel even the English. Britain cannot force these States to engage in her wars. The best example of this is Ireland which, as a British dominion, has declared herself neutral in the present war and which actualy has a representative in Germany.

That which maintains this league of independent States is not compulsion from London but pacts freely made in the Parliaments of the dominions, pacts by which Great Britain possesses the same rights as any other portion of the British Empire. Fundamentally, there are three causes for this foundation of the federation of British States: (1) The common culture and democratic traditions that link the former colonies with the mother country; (2) the economic advantage resulting to the federated States and regarding this, Britain is, by no means, the sole beneficiary; and (3) The security guaranteed to all sections of the Empire. Without this security, Australia and New Zealand might be open to the attacks of Japanese militarism. The independence of the Union of South Africa is just as determined.

In the course of time, every Imperialist State has succumbed because it would not make concessions to its colonies and so revolt took place against the metropolis. Spain, at one time the greatest colonial country of the world, lost all its possessions for this reason. It cannot be doubted that the same would have happened to Britain if the latter had not, on its own initiative, limited its imperialist aspirations. Britain well understood that the best guarantee of its own existence was a federation of free States as opposed to dominion by military conquest.

The same cannot be said of Germany. For Hitler and his Fascist allies, this war is an imperialist war in the full sense. Mein Kampf is the last word in imperialism. Here in this book he makes a proposal to England for the complete domination of Europe in conjunction with Germany and Italy and the suppression of France as an independent nation. Unable to do this with the consent of Great Britain, Hitler is attempting to achieve his objective against Great Britain and to destroy the communication between the States. Hitler has not renounced any of his aspirations; he has merely given them a theoretical justification by declaring that the German people have a historic mission to dominate all people and all races. The new order he would impose on the world is that of the sovereignty of the German race over all others, these latter united in slavery and suppressed at the point of the bayonet.

Only a few weeks ago, Dr. Funck, the German Minister of Economy, stated: "The future economics of peace must guarantee to Germany the maximum security and maximum of products for the well-being of its people. All European economics must orientate around this proposition."

In other words, the Germans are to be the only people, Berlin is to be the centre of the universe and all other races must bow down to the wishes of the German people and permit themselves to be devoured by an organised band of thieves. A magnificent prospect certainly! Barbarism as a principle! The prison as the symbol of security! The whip the driving force of the new order! The gladiators of ancient Rome when entering the arena shouted: "Hail, Caesar, we who are about to die, salute you!" So why not all Europe proclaiming "Heil Hitler?"

And suddenly we are informed that we know nothing about Imperialism, that we have no conception of economics and history, and the whole world is told that English Imperialism is the cause of the war and that the English Government had only to grant colonies to Germany to have obviated it. My friend must have been asleep for the past fifty years if he does not realise that England is in no position to rule colonies and that she does not and cannot impose taxes, policy or legislation upon the federated states. But it would seem that nothing can penetrate the brain of the Moscow oracle.

This discussion on the development of English Imperialism into a federation of independent States would be incomplete if we ignored the present relations of the British Government with India. It is these relations precisely that gives the Communist Press the material for its attacks on British Imperialism which always end in a comparison of the tyranny of Britain with the perfection of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. Regarding this, we must be careful to distinguish between yesterday's historical facts and the state of affairs that has developed slowly. Should one desire, the history of English domination in India can be studied, but to assert that there has been no progress since the time of Clive is absurd and unforgiveable in face of the march of history.

There can be no doubt that for the past fifty years, India has been following that path of political development that in the case of the former colonies led to them being transferred into independent States of British Imperialism. Due to peculiar circumstances, India has progressed more slowly. Above all we must not forget that the former colonies of Canada, Australia, and the Union of South Africa arose from the metropolis and were united to it by laws, customs, religion and political concepts. Due to this development came more quickly and more spontaneously. But India, a country of 375 million souls and 225 different languages, separated from England not only by race, history, religion and customs but also by the fact that these 375 million souls were composed of distinct tribes and groups, made it impossible to achieve the same result in the same time. In India, there are not only an enormous difference in race, in religion and in social classes, but there is also many distinct races.

When, in 1885, Allan Hume organised the National Congress which to-day is the centre of the movement for national Hindu unity, he attempted to bring together all the Indian people into one nation with the idea of achieving for India the same independence as the other colonies. But he had to give up this attempt very quickly. The new movement quickly developed both a moderate and a radical tendency but its work was obstructed by the religion and social contradictions despite the fact that the propaganda of Gandhi was opening up a new approach to the problem. Apart from the great movement of the National Congress of India there is the Islamic League representing the greater part of the population and which aspires to autonomy. In all probability the problem will be solved by a Federation of the Peoples of India, recognised by Britain as an independent Dominion.

This is inevitable. Already, in 1917, under pressure from the national movement, England drew up a new constitution on the basis of responsible government. Indian reform has been going on now for a long time and the conservatives cannot stop it. On the contrary, the more resistance arises, the more the movement advances and rebellion soon compels the granting of different conditions. India, in her commercial and financial administration, is already independent and has, like the other States of the Empire, the right to fix its own taxation.

* Since the signing of the Anglo-Russian pact on July 12, naturally the record has been changed.

Politically, India never had united administration. One part was directly under British rule, another was governed by Indian princes, dependents on the Central English administration. In the former, that is, in provinces such as Assam, Bengal, Madras, Benares, Orissa, Sind, Jenjabm, Bombay, etc., there is a form of local self government whilst it is being developed in the other provinces. This is especially so since the "Round Table" Conference of 1930-31 in London.

In this sense, despite the fact that India is a "colony of the crown" to the old world she is destined inevitably to take her place as an independent State among the other colonies on a more or less equal plane. The war has interrupted this progress comparatively but it can only be paralysed by the collapse of the British Empire itself.

The present Indian Nationalist movement aspiring to self government and whose organisation is the National Congress of India is composed of a moderate tendency as represented by Gandhi and a more radical tendency represented by Nehru. Both Gandhi and Nehru desire a democratic federation of the Hindu peoples on the basis of independent government and the political equality of all castes, races, religions and classes. Both are the declared enemies of all dictatorship, and even Nehru who is much more hostile to Britain than Gandhi stated not long ago in his journal, The National Herald, that no peace is possible ".until the evil of Hitlerism has been extirpated from the face of humanity."

Both tendencies have accused repeatedly the British Government of having retarded intentionally the process of self-government, and Gandhi, whose influence is always the stronger, is firmly convinced that India will gain its independence within the Empire and he has no wish to see his country fall a victim to the imperialist aspirations of Russia, Japan or Germany. According to Gandhi this is the only way to achieve full and complete economic and social liberation.

Despite present conditions, India, in comparison with the famous U.S.S.R., is a paradise of liberty and independence. Not one of the Russian republics can criticise or change even within its own boundaries the dictatorial regime of Stalin. No other party but the Communist Party can exist. At the least, the Indian movement for independence has the right of free speech and a free press to proclaim its ideas. In Russia, one cannot imagine such a possibility. There is no freedom and all are subjected to the same tyranny. Without full liberty of expression, political liberty is a dead letter, a shameless judgment of facts that have as little connection with reality as the croaking of a frog has affinity with the Ninth Symphony.

ANARCHISTS UPHOLD THE EMPIRE

Owing to the horror felt by Libertarians at the persecution of the Jews and of all cultural thought within the Fascist countries, this war has created more confusion in the minds of the common people than perhaps any previous national struggle. Socialists have forgotten all about the class struggle to become full-time recruiting sergeants and have persuaded their proletarian followers to engage, with will, in the tragic dance of death. Anarchists have overcome their antagonism for authority and the State and turned militarist, if not with glee, at least with ardour. And so one is not surprised to learn that Rudolf Rocker, one-time editor of The Worker's Friend, has joined the ranks of militarists and empire defenders. Those persons who are opposed to war, and yet call themselves Anarchists, and so busily circulate the writings of Rocker and Kropotkin, should take stock of themselves and realise that Kropotkin upheld the last war and at its conclusion, on his return to Russia, actually spoke as a reactionary militarist; and that Rocker upholds this war. We knew that this was Rocker's attitude some time ago, as anyone who read his so-called classic work on Nationalism could see. But his Anarchist admirers refused to face the fact and went on boosting his activity.

In another column we reproduce Rocker's article from the Spanish, which has been translated specially for these columns. The article is critised and replied to in the Italian Anarchist weekly, L'Adunata Dei Refrattarri, published in New York, for November 22, 1941.

Rocker's article has appeared in several Spanish journals, published in various parts of America.

Our Italian contemporary, under the heading The British Empire, writes:

The self-described "anti-totalitarian" journal, "Rumbo," of Havana, publishes an article from the pen of Rudolf Rocker who for many years has styled himself an Anarchist, in which he acquits England of the "fale accusation of being an imperialist country." Rocker writes:

Here follows the first four paragraphs of Rocker's article. There is no point in retranslating from the Italian. Our contemporary comments:

Apparently when Anarchism takes on the garb of the warrior and the defence of the State, there are no half measures! Churchill's authoritarian anti-fascists are not concerning themselves with justifying English Imperialism nor with explaining that the British Empire is not really an Empire in the strict meaning of the word, but something quite different. Such a justification could only arise if he and his colleagues felt any inconvenience in their new positions. Under such circumstances alone is it necessary to "reform" the dictionary and to rewrite history.

The British Empire, we are told, is not an empire but a federation of independent states. This, despite the fact that Englishmen who really ought to know, talk persistently of the British Empire and that George VI still signs himself "Rex Et Imperator."

Let us see, then, just how true and just how false is this statement of Rocker's.

The British Empire has a total population of 485,733,451 million inhabitants. The United Kingdom (England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland) has a population of 46,190,000 million. The population of the six Dominions is 29,800,000 distributed as follows: (1) Australia, 6,700,000; (2) Canada, 10,400,000; (3) Ireland, 2,972,000; (4) Newfoundland 278,000; (5) Union of South Africa, 8,000,000; (6) New Zealand, 1,450,000. Adding the population of the United Kingdom—about 46,190,000 —to that of the Dominions—about 30,000,000—we have a total population of 79,190,000 human beings that are, according to Rocker, citizens of independent states freely federated.

Just how much in those dominions are in reality independent and freely federated is a matter for discussion. Nevertheless, it should be sufficient to consider: (1) the total population of the Dominion is less than the population of the Motherland; (2) Dominion government is presided over by a Governor-General sent from London, who nominally represents the King and, in effect, the government of the United Kingdom; (3) the Dominions' payment of taxes to the motherland; (4) The military defence of the Dominions is dependent on the British Fleet; (5) the capitalist class of the motherland owns and exploits, considerably even if not always preponderantly, the natural wealth and the labour of the people of the Dominions; (6) as in the motherland, the Dominions are ruled by a class, national, British or foreign, who act in accordance with their own interests without bothering about the feelings of the citizen or the aspirations of the majority of the inhabitants.

Truely, one must have lost all conception of liberty and independence if one pretends that the British Dominions are freely federated with the United Kingdom.

But the British Empire is not composed solely of the Metropolis and the Dominions.

Rocker makes one exception to his "federation of British States"—India. And he has said enough! India has a population of 351,400,000 million inhabitants—a population nearly five times that of the federated states and nearly nine times that of the United Kingdom of which it is a dependent. And that is not all. To complete the population of the British Empire there are 59,143,000 million distributed over various colonies and territories. But of these, Rocker says not a word. Even were we to admit that the "Dominions are free and independent countries" there still remains the 410,543,451 millions living under colonial regime. But what will one not do to sustain the impossible!

With these figures before us, with the knowledge that the British Empire has, at this very moment, 37,000 Indian nationals in prison—leaving aside those confined in other countries and all those who are victims of this imperialism, it is absurd to deny that the British Empire is an Empire in the historic meaning of the word. The British Empire is an Empire, as were others, founded by conquest and violence. To deny this is to deny a reality that is as clear as the light of the sun.

In our view, Rocker writes mildly but definitely. His sympathies are Imperialistic, militaristic and evolutionary rather than revolutionary. The attitude is intelligible but a departure from his earlier Anarchist propaganda actually. If he was correct when he opposed Kropotkin for supporting the last war, he is incorrect to-day. If his present position is sound, the Anarchist movement is in error and should transform its propaganda. Rocker now views the Empire as a stepping stone to world commonwealth and so abandons his anti-militarist position as utopian. Under these circumstances the Anarchist movement should drop its association with him or pass out of existence.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

We are unable to make in this issue a selection of many excerpts from the press comments, published in Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the United States, on the pacifist and social credit proposals of the Duke of Bedford.

The News Review, London, for November 20, 1941, recalled a statement made by the Duke, as Marquis of Tavistock, at a meeting in support of the Labour Party. The Duke said of the late James Ramsay Macdonald, then leader of the Labour Party:—

"I feel that here is a man who can save England in her present industrial position."

Replying to the Duke's query as to where he had made this statement, the News Review, in its issue for December 4, 1941, pointed out that the remark was reported in the Daily Herald for October 30, 1924. The then Marquis of Tavistock had chaired a meeting in support of Labour candidate Captain Hall at Central Portsmouth, and, according to the Herald, made the remarks attributed to him in an interview. The Herald called it

"another instance of how Labour is making inroads in the ranks even of the old aristocracy."

Duckboard, the Melbourne, Australia, Service Association journal, in its issue for November, 1941, declares that Sir Oswald Mosley should be released, and the Duke of Bedford executed. We shall reproduce and comment upon this absurd article in an early issue. The article is a scandalous and ill-informed attack, such as Horatio Bottomley made a point of publishing during the last war. It will be recalled that the Nation exposed how Bottomley wanted to shoot a young soldier-idealist who hated war but gave his life. Such is patriotic journalism!

XIV.—THE ILLEGAL ARREST.

Readers will have noticed from the newspaper reports reproduced of the trial that we raised a preliminary plea in bar of trial, or want of jurisdiction. It was our contention that our arrest without a warrant was illegal and therefore that we were never legally before the Glasgow Court. Of the facts there can be no question. Of the law there is no doubt. It was for this reason, hidden behind a smoke-screen of prejudice, that we were denied bail. We were the victim of a pretty conspiracy of injustice on the part of police, bar, and bench. This chapter defines clearly the illegality of our 1921 arrest. It indicts the Labour movement, which, despite its expressions of good nature, never had the sense or courage to expose legally and popularly this question of illegal arrest and detention.

Sedition is not a felony but a misdemeanour at law. In cases of felony a person can be arrested without a warrant. In cases of misdemeanour he must be arrested with a warrant and the person making the arrest must have the warrant on him when he makes the arrest. This principle was established in the famous case of Codd v. Cabe (1876). Those interested will find this case recorded fully in the following reports: 1, Ex.D. 352; 40. J.P. 566; 45 L.J.101; 34 L.T. 433; 13 Cox. 202. The decision is an accepted and governing one. No subsequent legislation has attempted to revise or change its import and consequence. About the time of the 1921 trial, the decision saved from execution an actor, who was pursued somewhere in Marylebone by a policeman, who possessed no warrant. The man was guilty of some dishonesty amounting to less than felony. In other words his crime was a misdemeanour at law. A crowd took up the pursuit and one man, excited by the cries, endeavoured to stop the runaway. Thereupon, the hunted man drew a revolver and shot the person who thought he was aiding justice. He died instantly and when caught, the hunted man was charged with murder. This was reduced to manslaughter and a sentence of penal servitude was passed, on the ground that the police officer had no warrant, and the man who was killed had no legal right to interfere. Whatever the victim's intentions when he interfered so unfortunately, the police officer having no warrant, notwithstanding the fact that the pursued man had a criminal record, the interference was, technically and legally, not in the interests of justice.

This case is recalled as an illustration of our contention. When we were arrested at 17 Richmond Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, in 1921, for alleged sedition in Scotland, the police officers had no warrant and were conniving wilfully, and through sheer power of force, at an illegal arrest. We do not benefit from the exposure of this act of violence, but it is recorded beyond denial and so indicts those responsible for the outrage. Many who were indifferent at wrong then, and have suffered internment since under 18B, will sense the feeling of indignation that possessed us at the time.

The story of this illegal arrest can be told in press cuttings not hitherto produced.

The Daily Herald, in its issue for Thursday, March 3 ,1921, published the following item:—

COMMUNIST RAID

Arrest of Guy Aldred, Editor of the "Spur."

Six plain-clothes policemen in a motor-lorry made a raid on 17, Richard Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, yesterday, searched the premises, and arrested Guy Aldred, the well-known Communist and editor of "The Spur."

The raiders spent four hours examining every nook and corner, and rummaging in every drawer and box, including the child's playboxes. They declined to produce any warrant or to state what charge was to be laid against Mr. Aldred.

Fortunately for his wife, who has scarcely recovered from a painful illness, a friend was with her at the time.

The raiders asked questions about "The Red Commune," a paper published by the Glasgow Communist group. Several copies of this paper were in the house, and these were taken away by the police, along with a quantity of other literature and documents.

The Daily News, London, for the same date, reported the arrest as follows:—

RAID ON A FLAT.

Six Scotland Yard officers yesterday afternoon visited the flat of Mr. Guy Aldred, in Richmond Gardens, Shepherd's bush, and removed a considerable quantity of papers and documents, including copies of the "Spur," a monthly Communist journal, of which Mr. Aldred is the editor.

Afterwards they asked Mr. Aldred to accompany them to Scotland Yard.

At a late hour last night Mrs. Aldred stated that her husband was still detained.

The Star, which was the evening edition of The Daily News, carried the same report beneath the caption: "POLICE AND MR. GUY ALDRED."

The Daily Herald for Friday, March 4, 1921, stated:—

GUY ALDRED'S ARREST

It was reported in London last night that Guy Aldred, editor of the Bakunin Press, who was arrested in London on Wednesday night in connection with the publication of the article in the "Red Commune," was in the hands of the Metropolitan police at the instance of the Glasgow police.

In its issue for Saturday, March 5, 1921, The Daily Herald stated:—

GUY ALDRED'S ARREST.

London Police Awaiting Glasgow Escort.

"The Daily Herald" understands that Guy Aldred was still retained up to a late hour yesterday in Cannon Row Police Station. No information was vouchsafed to inquiries save that the London police were still awaiting his escort from Glasgow.

The actual arrest may have been made by six detectives. Actually the house was surrounded and thirty police officers entered the premises and prevented any communication being made to the outside world. One person who called to see us on business was turned away by a police officer. Complete, violent, illegal occupation of 17 Richmond Gardens was resorted to by the police because they were aware that their actions were illegal. This fact explains why bail was denied to us after our arrival in Scotland. Various excuses were advanced by the authorities to cover the real reason: fear lest we should focus too much public attention on the illegal nature of our arrest.

(Concluded next month).

[Owing to heavy calls on our space we have been compelled to hold over the concluding chapter on "Politics, The Dock, The Bar, and The Bench." Ed.]

WHAT MADE JOWETT A SOCIALIST

What Made Me a Socialist, by F. W. Jowett, formerly M.P. for Bradford West and First Commissioner of Works in the 1924 Labour Government, originally appeared in the columns of the Glasgow Forward. It was issued in pamphlet form by the I.L.P. in 1925, and is reissued to-day by the Strickland Press: Price 2d., post free 3d.

Reviewing the pamphlet when first issued, Forward, in its columns for June 13, 1925, says:

WHAT MADE ME A SOCIALIST . . . is an extremely interesting pamphlet . . . in which Mr. Jowett recounts the causes which led to his conversion to Socialism. . . .

The son of a mother (to whom he pays a fine tribute) who herself was a half timer before him, he commenced work in the mills at the early age of eight. At heart a Democrat, and class conscious by the circumstances of his life, he came under the influence of Carlyle when he was fourteen, and later his reading extended to the writings of Ruskin, William Morris, and Robert Blatchford, so that it is no wonder that he readily accepted the Socialist Faith.

TESTAMENT OF STUPIDITY

AFTER TWENTY YEARS

By

W. A. RATHKEY.

"DISENCHANTMENT" by C. E. Montague. (Evergreen series, Chatto & Windus: One Shilling).

". . . The patriotism of the press was bunkum, screening all sorts of queer games; the eloquence of patriotic orators was just a smoke barrage to cover their little manouvres against one another; the red tabs of the Staff were the 'Red Badge of Funk' . . ."

That quotation is from Montague's "Disenchantment," and the following extract cuts even nearer the bone:

"You knew bitterly what the Australians were saying once more: 'They've let us down again!' . . . "

Our leaders have obviously not progressed one step since C. E. Montague wrote his testament of stupidity. They can neither make peace nor war! And it is because those quotations are so apt to the present conflict, that we write this appreciation of a twenty-year-old masterpiece. Disenchantment is the English J'Accuse. In its pages we see how the evil that men do lives after them, thrives and waxes.

Every Socialist and every Pacifist should read Disenchantment. Far too often, the progressive ignores the human element. Far too often he relies on the theoretical and dialectical aspects of Capitalism, on the Materialistic Conception of History so beloved of Communists. The reformer cannot reform by pamphlets alone. Without the human scene, etched so acidly by Goya and Holbein, by Barbusse and Remarque, Sassoon, Owen and Montague, history would be dry bones. And dry bones are interesting only to the post-mortem students and autopsists. Humanity must take itself in hand, must cure itself of the complex expressed by Yeats:

"The best lack all conviction;
The worst are full of passionate intensity."

C. E. Montague seems to us to be the ideal reformer. He is the upright, aristocratically-minded man gifted with a social conscience. His integrity and his literary stature and creative genius, make him accessible and acceptable to the canny, snobbishly-minded middle-class—the class that most needs social enlightenment. Men like Lord Cecil, Edward Thomas and Bridges (and in our own day, Priestley), have got easily into the barred houses and barred minds of the middle class, where Marx and Engels, Lenin and Trotsky (and even Shaw), are as welcome as burglars. Marx preached only to the converted, and he can rail till doomsday as far as the middle classes are concerned. But when Bridges (Poet Laureate and a gentleman), says:—

"See how cross-eyed the pride of our world-wide crusade against Nigerian slavery, while the London poor in their Victorian slums lodged closer and filthier than the outraged alien; and under liberty's name our Industry is worse fed and shut out from the sun."

"Thus, when in London city a Guild of merchants dine, one diner's cost would ease a whole bye-street of want. . . ."

there must be something wrong. Likewise, the value of Sassoon's and Owen's work is far more universal than the proletarian tracts of writers, condemned without trial as Bolshies and Reds. Lord Cecil's case for peace has been much better and more fundamentally put by Socialist pamphleteers, of whom surburbia and the country house have never heard. Nevertheless, we must thank this inequalitarian system for Lord Cecil's contact with the middle and upper classes. Priestley, because of "The Good Companions" and subsequent dramatic work, has got to a position where (within his limited understanding of the root causes of war) he can get at the middle classes.

We draw these conclusions at some length to stress the inestimable value of such a book as Disenchantment. If this book is Socialist propaganda, then so is the Sermon on the Mount and the Pilgrim's Progress.

Written by a man whose mind was more concerned with literature and drama than with his fellow men, Disenchantment is the protest of one who has seen not the Holy Grail but its very antithesis. As though walking through his beloved literary lanes and Thespian paths, Montague had suddenly seen hell on earth and was forever disquieted. Swinnerton, indeed, speaks of him as "sunk in a mood of restless melancholy." And war and its terrifying aftermath made Disenchantment inevitable.

All sensitive men, says Hazlitt, are Hamlet. There is all of the universal protest, the eternal bitter questioning of Hamlet in Montague's book. Something rotten in the state of England? Read the grimly topical chapter, "Stars in their Courses," and think of Dunkirk, Norway, Crete, Greece and Malaya. Think, too, of the profiteering and the black markets:

"Our men could only draw on such funds of nerve and physique, knowledge and skill, as we had put into the bank for them. Not they, but their rulers and 'betters' had lost their heads in the joy of making money fast out of steam, and so made half of our nation slum-dwellers."

Turn to The Duty of Lying chapter, which concludes:

"They tell me we've pulled through at last all right because our propergander dished out better lies than what the Germans did. So I say to myself 'if tellin' lies is all that bloody good in war, what bloody good is tellin' truth in peace?'"

And think what our rulers, or the German rulers, mean to make of the next peace.

Perhaps the most poignant passages of this book are those where Montague seems to be standing with the bewildered, exhausted combatants, chronicling their scepticism. He saw futile sacrifice after futile sacrifice. He saw how death

"mocked the wonder of endeavour with coward bullet's unanswerable jibe . . ."

He tells you of the soldiers' growing hatred of their pastors and masters, hatred of the politicians and generals who let them down from the word go to the word stop. From the Mons retreat to the "land fit for heroes to live in." And if he had lived he would have chronicled the "ultimate bilking" of the Black Coffin demonstrators.

In the macabre intervals of battering blindly and obediently at each other, these homeric proletarians (German and English), chewed on the bitter cud of lying. The weekly Daily Mail perhaps, or some such pulp of wicked writing, reaches trenches and the heroes read how they captured so and so redoubt and killed so many Germans. Too often the reverse was the truth, and "You can't believe a word" became as well-known as Tipperary. It is as well to remember, in this connection, that our civilian fathers were led to believe that Passchendaele was a victory. Montague continues the drab indictment:

"When civilian morale at home was going through one of its occasional depressions, we gave out that it was higher than ever. . . ."

We cannot too strongly advise our readers to get this book, and take its lessons to the brain and heart. To understand war, to rid the world of its devastating idiocy, we must fully comprehend the nature of the beast. We must see the whole and not just the part, and Disenchantment does this service more than any other book we know.

It bridges the hampering gap twixt soldier and civilian; it makes serviceable the glass through which we have seen too darkly for too long a time; and it immortalises the hopeful decency of the common man. If we must have memorials to our cheated brothers the world over, to the millions of unknown warriors for whom the heart aches and anger boils, this is the memorial we would give them.

SOCIALISM AND MONETARY REFORM

A REPLY TO FENNER BROCKWAY

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

[Following upon an article published by our comrade, F. W. Jowett, in the "Bradford I.L.P. News," and partly reprinted in the "New Leader," the Duke of Bedford has been involved in a discussion on Socialism and Monetary Reform. He has contributed two letters to the "Socialist Standard," to which the Editorial Committee of the S.P.G.B. have replied. In due course we propose to reproduce the whole of this discussion, which goes to the roots of Socialism and Social Reform, in these columns. Meanwhile we reproduce the Duke of Bedford's reply to Fenner Brockway's concluding article on the discussion published in the "New Leader." Our columns are open to discussion on the matter.—Ed.]

The Editor of the New Leader has been generous in allowing me space in which to put forward my views on the question of monetary reform in relation to war and poverty, so I cannot complain that he has now brought the correspondence to a close. He raises, however, some important points in the reply he makes on behalf of Mr. Willie Stewart, who has unfortunately met with an accident, and I think that it may be desirable to deal with them.

Mr. Fenner Brockway insists on crediting me with views which I have again and again repudiated, when he suggests that I consider that monetary reform would by itself establish perfect social justice. I have never, at any time, imitated certain extreme Social Crediters who virtually say to Socialists, "I offer you something much better than Socialism and suggest that you abandon Socialism in favour of my improved remedy." My attitude when appealing to Socialists to take an active interest in monetary reform, has always been: "I do not ask you to give up any of your fundamental beliefs, nor to abandon the pursuit of those aims which you consider essential to the establishing of a just social order. If you feel that it is desirable to do away with all class distinctions; to arrange for the control of industry by the workers; or to abolish profit, by all means continue to pursue these aims. All that I tell you is that the reform of the monetary and foreign trade system is the first and most important step which should be taken in the direction of a better social order. Unless you have national control of the creation and issue of money and adopt sensible methods for its creation and issue, you are bound to be severely handicapped from the start, no matter what drastic changes you introduce into the social and industrial order. For the very reason that financial reform is not a purely socialist measure, you can count on its getting support from an immense number of people who are not Socialists and therefore, if you play your cards wisely, there is a chance of pushing it through without delay due to serious numerical opposition. Directly it is put into operation, even though it will not at once establish perfect social justice or anything like it, it will bring great and welcome relief to the poorest classes who have suffered too long already.

Last but not least, the adoption of monetary and foreign trade reform would provide a bridge on which we could meet those with whom we are now at war and stop the mass slaughter of humanity—a slaughter, incidentally, which includes among its victims a very large number of Socialists."

Mr. Brockway, it seems, thinks that the war must go on until Socialism of the type that he favours becomes the dominant political creed not only in the Democracies but also in the occupied countries and in the Axis States. I myself fear that a much more likely result of a prolongation of the war will be the spread, either of Fascism, or of an objectionable and tyrannical type of Communism. I.L.P. Socialist ideas, in so far as they are sound, are much more likely to make rapid progress towards victory if peace be first restored, than they are if war be continued on the present scale. It would, indeed, be no compliment to I.L.P. Socialism to conclude otherwise, for the war, as it is now being fought, is proving steadily more and more destructive to intellectual and moral standards throughout the world.

I do not pretend that there is absolutely no difference between my outlook and Mr. Fenner Brockway's outlook, but the difference is not of the nature he suggests. It is merely this: that whereas I agree with the Socialists that monetary reform will not, in itself, do all that is needed to establish a just social order, they feel that they already have, absolutely clear-cut in their minds, the other reforms which are necessary; whereas I, when monetary reform had been adopted, would feel that I would need to hear certain issues more fully debated and to observe the new situation created by monetary reform before I could be as confident as they are that all the items in their programme were as sound as they now feel them to be.

Mr. Fenner Brockway criticises my suggestion that peace might be concluded on a basis which starts from an agreement by the Democracies to abandon the anti-social practices of orthodox finance and a reciprocal agreement by the Axis Powers to abandon interference with the reasonable liberties of nations and individuals.

He thinks that I am harbouring idealistic illusions when I accept the contention of Axis propaganda that they are fighting to overthrow international finance and the contention of our own propaganda that we are fighting to restore freedom and democracy. He says that the propaganda of both sides hides the real struggle—the Capitalist rivalry for raw materials and markets. In saying this, Mr. Brockway is stating a half-truth, which is often the most dangerous of all falsehoods.

The Axis powers are undoubtedly fighting to secure raw materials. They are also fighting for markets, but for a reason different to that of the Democracies. The Axis Powers desire markets in order to obtain imports, but the financiers of the Democracies desire them mainly to secure a field for investment. Profit-making still goes on in Axis countries, but I do not think that in them the desire for profits is a major cause of the war. Mr. Brockway, however, overlooks the fact that it is precisely the jealousy and hostility of the international financiers and currency-speculators and of the Big Business monopolists associated with them, that prevents the Axis Powers from getting their fair share of the world's raw materials and export markets and for this reason they can say quite truthfully that international finance is their real enemy. As far as the Democracies are concerned, it is certainly quite correct to say that the real cause for the war, as it affects the men behind the scenes who are primarily responsible for it, is the desire to retain a selfish and undue share of raw materials, markets and profits and to this list Mr. Brockway might have added the immense power that accrues to the moneylender-cum-money-creator and to the Big Business monopolist who controls a great part of the world's supplies of such commodities as oil. What Mr. Brockway fails to take into account, however, is that the propaganda aims of the war—the restoration of liberty and democracy—albeit they are not the real aims of those primarily responsible for the war, are the real aims of those whose continued support is indispensible to the financiers if their war is to be continued. Once it became apparent that the Axis Powers would restore a reasonable measure of liberty as part of the peace settlement, I do not think that even the majority of Members of Parliament would be in favour of continuing the war, for, completely destitute as they are of intelligent imagination and, in certain directions, not over-endowed with principle either, I am willing to credit them with sincerity in the emotional outbursts against Axis tyranny in which, under the inspiration of the Press, they so freely indulge.

Another critic of my views, Mr. Don McGregor, puts forward the curious idea that labour is displaced by the system of private ownership and control motivated by profit and not by the use of machinery and the utilisation of the forces of nature in human service. How any intelligent person can maintain such an opinion in view of labour-destroying inventions such as a huge turbine engine in the United States of such power that, with the addition of three similar engines, it would represent a greater energy capacity than that of the entire working population of the United States, it is difficult to see. Obviously such a piece of machinery cannot, either in its manufacture or its tending, employ anything like the total number of human workers that its labour displaces. Mr. McGregor also takes me up for employing the phrase, "unfair exploitation," and appears to suggest that I believe in an exploitation which is fair. This, however, I have never suggested. If one employs the phrase "an unscrupulous rogue," it does not usually suggest to the impartial mind that one thinks that some rogues can be scrupulous!

"MORE HUMBUG"

By

The Rev. W. GRAINGE WHITE

(Vicar of Haughley.)

[. . . The Rev. Walter Grainge White was ordained at Lincoln, in 1906. In 1908 he became a chaplain at Moulmein, Rangoon, and retained that post until 1913. in that year he became a missionary on the Rapurnium River to Makucki Indians, and continued as missionary till 1915. The next year he became Acting Chaplain to H.M. Penal Settlement, British Guiana. In 1917, he returned to Britain and was appointed Curate at Deddington. In 1922 he became Vicar of St. Mary's, Haughley.—Ed.]

In 1924, the year in which J. Ramsay Macdonald became the first Labour Premier of Great Britain, I was staying, for a few days, with the Vicar of one of our Abbey Churches. We were talking about Macdonald. At first, my host thought that, being an Anglican Priest, I must be a diehard Tory. (As a matter of fact I belong to no Political Party at all, for the honest reason that I can not be loyal to the shibboleths of any of the existing Political Parties.) When my host thought that I was rather more open-minded, he opened out. And this is what he said (referring to Macdonald):

"They will not argue with him. They will not tell him that he is wrong. They will not try to put him right. But . . . . they will invite him to dinner."

They did this, with the results that are, now, matters of Historical Record.

So many men lose their balance when they change their social surroundings. Peter did so once and was rebuked for this lapse by Paul. The late Arthur Henderson and George Lansbury never lapsed. They realised that one never abandons principle. One does abandon professions which one has not regarded as principles, but professions which were mere opportunist, or due to insufficient knowledge.

A few years ago, I was asked by a Day School Teacher to help to convert her sister and brother-in-law to sign the Peace Pledge. As my relationship to her brother-in-law was an official one, I would do nothing of the kind. Coercion, direct, or indirect, will not secure the maintenance of any principle. Since the war has started, I have met this teacher. When I remarked that we were passing through difficult times she blandly replied: "Oh! I have changed my mind."

Then it is clear that she did not sign the Peace Pledge because she was convinced that, as the Lambeth Conference of 1930 declared, "War is contrary to the Will of God."

But those who signed the Peace Pledge and have since "changed their minds" (I wonder if they would be prepared to be examined by a Psycho-analyst?) do not constitute the worst aspect of humbug.

Far worse are those who hurl abusive epithets about and try to make out that folk who, years ago, saw that "War is contrary to the Will of God," and know that God can have no part in helping some of His children to destroy, mutilate and ruin others of His children, and, since war has been declared, have maintained their principles, are "Fifth Columnists," "Pro-Nazis," and (the form of abuse used amongst Clergy) "Heretics." This last term of abuse has appeared in a Church Weekly. Sacred Scripture may not be the vogue. And the Theology of Israel was, until after the Captivity, monolatrist and not monotheist; but, nevertheless, had the King of Judah listened to the political advice of the prophet Jeremiah (vide Chapter xxxviii.) then the History of those days would not have taken the turn recorded in Chapter xxxix. Similarly, had Ahab listened to the political advice of Micah he would not have fallen at Ramoth-Gilead. Both prophets in their days, were regarded as being unpatriotic! A prophet is not necessarily an ordained Preacher. Amos was not.

When, in this Suffolk Parish, I was striving to obtain those decent conditions of living promised so stridently to the men of England during the "War to end war,"—(I came here at the end of 1921)—I was violently opposed. Legal aid was obtained to object to our having proper arrangements for disposal of sewage (bedroom slops and all other slops were piped into the storm-water channels—open channels—on either side of the main street, and the stench was abominable) at the Inquiry held by the Ministry of Health. Similar legal aid was engaged to oppose, at another Inquiry held by The Ministry, our having a deep bore well and a proper water-supply, piped to street standards. (We now have houses served.) What was the abuse then? I was a "Red" and a "Bolshie." This was the common talk of the Village Inn and Reading-room. But History pays no respect to Falsehoods. And, now, even Beaverbrook, whose paper certainly used not to laud the Bolshies, tells us what a pleasant man Stalin is and how capable.

But Beaverbrook is not being put to a concentration camp. And why not? The answer is that the former abuse of Russia was humbug. It was based upon ignorance of the masses and the fear of certain folk who knew, or guessed, that the Soviet System was a menace to their vested interests.

Times have changed.

But what useful deductions can be made?

First of all, the need for a proper knowledge of events preceding any Revolution . . . whether the French, the Italian, the German, or the Russian. We can not condone the methods; but we can understand them. And we must recall the fact that, at one period of our History, we had a Dictator, Oliver Cromwell. His work included many horrible and ugly happenings; but it was not devoid of lasting benefits to this beloved Land of ours. We can hardly affirm that Charles II, who followed on, had a Court of which England should be ever proud!

The second deduction is—and it is essentially a principle of Divine Love—that we need to cultivate a sympathetic understanding of other peoples, their hardships, their outlook, and their aspirations.

The third is: That differences are by no means always antagonistic. More often than not they are complementary. The task before us should be to find the synthesis. Then the good in each will be enjoyed by all.

Some years ago, Mrs. Chandra Sen (whose husband was a Leader in the Brahma Somaj ("Indian Theistic Church" is a convenient explanatory expression), was lecturing in England. She sought to explain India to the women of England. I took the trouble to go to London to have a talk with her. And I recall the words which she uttered at a Public Meeting.

"We want your sympathetic understanding. We do not want your pity. We resent it."

There is no quarrel, when one understands, between the "Personal Idealism and Mysticism" of Inge and the "Pragmatism" of William James. This I have been able publicly to demonstrate.

Those engaged in conducting the war concentrate upon the ways of "winning the war." They feel that they are paid to do this.

But if we are to "win the peace" this time, we must clear our minds of falsehoods, half-truths and humbug, and see the principles which alone can bring peace. How many people know the meaning of the word "Peace?" The Dictionary gives no guide at all. Dictionaries are often wrong. They are in regard to the derivation of the word "Educate."

If, because we seek to think the Truth, and to try to help others to do the same, we are abused, we remind ourselves that their abuse of us is not evidence of the truth of the outlook of the abusers. People who have no case resort to abuse.

Often such people will not allow us even to remind them that if we see our own faults of the past and in the present, we have a right to speak because we are not cuckoos. We are birds of the nest. Parents who care for their children will not fail to help them to see their faults. They wish their children to overcome their faults and to become better and greater.

Herbert Morrison might think of this. During the last war, he spoke vehemently against war. Was he incarcerated? I think not. He will deserve better of his Country if he allows to others the freedom which he enjoyed . . . and became the better citizen for this liberty. But it would appear that his then denunciation of war was not because he regarded it wrong in principle but only in policy.

If we are abused, we recollect that abuse is, simply, "More humbug."

BRIXTON PRISON CONDITIONS.

At West Ham Police Court, London, on Tuesday, January 27 last, three conscientious objectors were each fined £15 or one month's imprisonment. They were: Frederick J. Pimm, 36, of 36 Windermere Gardens, Ilford; Arthur L. Cole, 37, of 122 Wanstead Park Avenue, Wanstead; H. Rainbow, 34, of 233 Wilmington Gardens, Barking.

The magistrate was Mr. S. A. John Morrow.

Rainbow complained that in Brixton prison he had spent three nights lying on a stone floor. He suffered from hemorrhage, and came to court with no breakfast. He had been two days without food. "I have had a week in the company of a vast majority of bugs," he added.

Cole said he had had no sleep at all in seven days. As he seemed on the point of collapse, he was allowed to sit down and drink a glass of water. When he recovered he said "I am not in a fit state to defend myself, due to the conditions of Brixton gaol."

The Magistrate said that these matters had nothing to do with the charge.

But they call for public investigation. What has our ex-conscientious objector Labour Home Secretary to say?

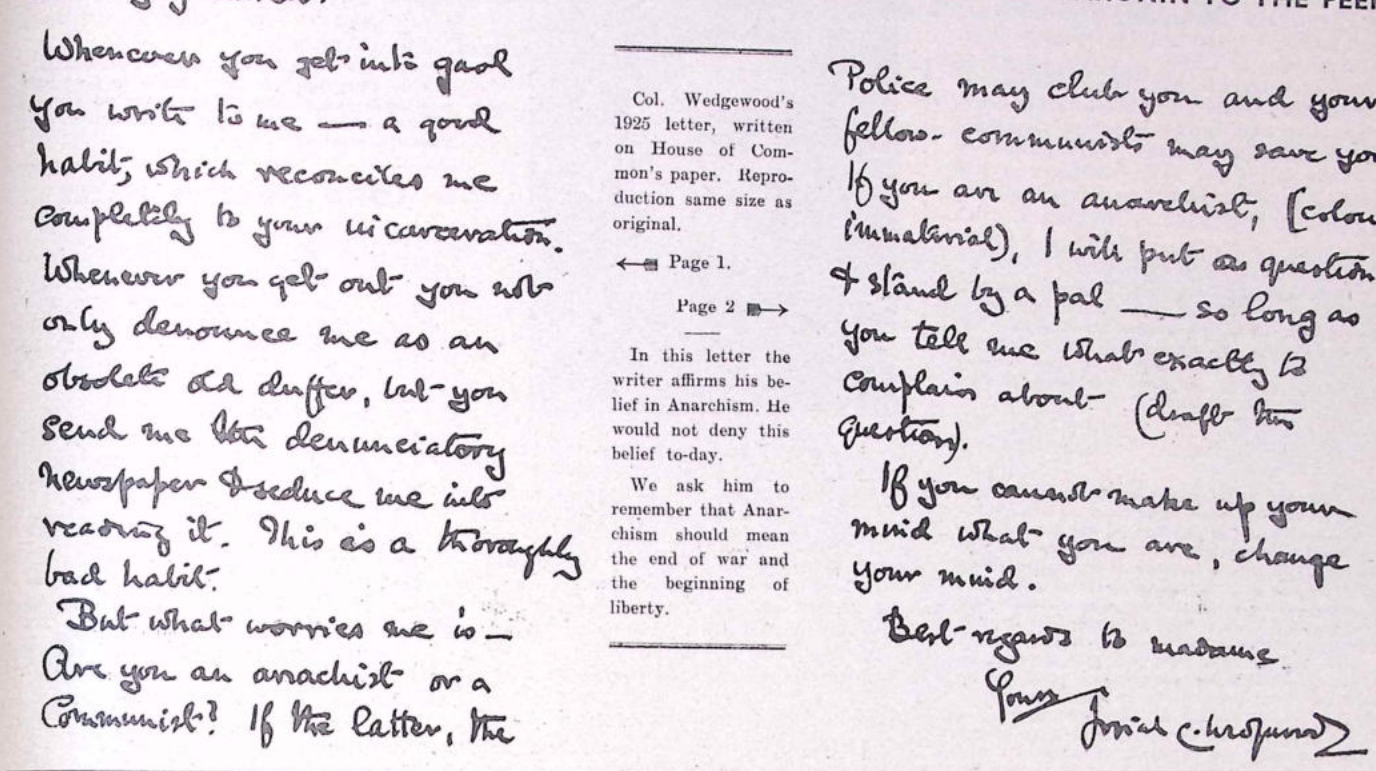
AN ANARCHIST PEER!

WILL LORD WEDGEWOOD READ BAKUNIN TO THE PEERS?



26-2-25.

Dear Guy Aldred.

Whenever you get into gaol you write to me — a good habit, which reconciles me completely to your incarceration. Whenever you get out you not only denounce me as an obsolete old duffer, but you send me the denunciatory newspaper & seduce me into reading it. This is a thoroughly bad habit.

But what worries me is — Are you an anarchist or a Communist? If the latter, the Police may club you and your fellow-communists may save you. If you are an anarchist, [colour immaterial], I will put a question & stand by a pal — so long as you tell me what exactly to complain about — (draft the question).

If you cannot make up your mind what you are, change your mind.

Best regards to Madame

Yours

In this letter the writer affirms his belief in Anarchism. He would not deny this belief to-day.

We ask him to remember that Anarchism should mean the end of war and the beginning of liberty.

THE NEW "SOCIALIST" PEERS

It was announced officially on December 31 last that four members of the Labour Party had been created peers.

(1). Reginald T. H. Fletcher, M.P. for Nuneaton. The peerage followed an announcement that he had resigned his position as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Admiralty and no longer wished to be styled Lieut.-Commander Fletcher. He made his first and last speech in the role of "Mr." at Dagenham on December 21. In that speech he denounced want of pre-war preparation for war, and added :—

The First Lord (Mr. Alexander) has great qualities of energy and determination, but he is Alexander not Aladdin, and he has no magic lamp he can rub to produce new ships for old or cause an aircraft carrier to appear wherever she is wanted.

Fletcher was born on March 27, 1885. He entered the Navy in 1899, served in the world war, and retired in 1921. He contested Basingstoke twice and Tavistock once, as a Liberal. In 1929 he joined the Labour Party. From 1935 to the date of his peerage he was Labour M.P. for Nuneaton. One can hardly refer to his Socialist thought or Labour traditions. Indeed, his status and elevation are a satire on Labour Parliamentary politics and records.

(2). Wedgewood Benn, M.P. for Gorton since 1937. Benn was born on May 10, 1877. He was liberal M.P. for St. George's Division, Tower Hamlets, 1906-1918, and for Leith, 1918-27. In the latter year he joined the Labour Party, and became Labour M.P. for North Aberdeen, 1928-31. From 1929-31 he was Secretary of State for India. Benn has a scholastic record and won much military honour during the Great War. He has rendered no life-long service to Socialism and possesses little real knowledge of Socialist thought and teaching.

Benn took part in the Commons debate on E.P.A. regulations, following the collapse after betrayal of the Miners' Strike, and opposed their renewal on the ground that they were unnecessary. Here is an excerpt from this speech (Official Report, July 5. 1926, Col. 1732) :—

The Common Law and the ordinary procedure is quite sufficient to deal with these cases. If hon. members imagine that people who make foolish or disloyal speeches cannot be dealt with under these Regulations they should read their newspapers more carefully. They will find that almost every week, certainly every month, some person is prosecuted. I give as an example Mr. Guy Aldred, who makes what in my judgment are remarkably foolish speeches but he is summonsed for inciting a breach of the peace.

We wondered why Captain Benn, as he was known then, had to introduce our name so gratuitously into this debate.

(3). Colonel Josiah Clement Wedgewood has been mentioned in our columns in connection with our 1921 Sedition trial. He was M.P. for Newcastle-Under-Lyme, to the date of his peerage, since 1906, first Liberal and then Labour.

Descendant of the celebrated potter, he was born on March 16, 1872. Wedgewood has had a distinguished naval record and served in the first Great War.

Wedgewood was Resident Magistrate at Ermelo, Transvaal, 1902-4.

A disciple of Henry George, he is President of the English League for the Taxation of Land Values.

A militarist in action, he defends anti-militarism and boldly championed conscientious objectors during the years 1916-1918 and has defended their successors since the outbreak of the present war.

Despite his militarism, he is interested in Anarchists and Anarchism.

Wedgewood is one of the few outspoken men in British Parliamentary politics. He is the only really interesting man among the new peers, the only one possessing genuine personality and vigour of expression, even though what he says may seem sometimes to be outrageous and contrary to his actions. He was one of the few M.P.'s who manage to command occasional respect and to cause his audience to suspect that he might possess a little sincerity. With pugnacity he combined wit and charm.

When Emma Goldman came to London in 1926, after her exile from the Soviet Union, and addressed a decidedly Anti-Proletarian audience at South Place Institute, on Thursday, January 29 of that year, on The Bolshevik Myth—a sound enough subject—Wedgewood took the chair. We dealt with this matter in The Commune, Vol. ii. No. 6, p. 59, February, 1926. About this time, Wedgewood also attended the inaugural meeting of an Anti-Fascist movement in London. Goldman has written of Wedgewood at length with a sense of indebtedness to his understanding and consideration.

When we were arrested for speaking in Hyde Park in February, 1925, on a series of counts that combined riot, sedition, and blasphemy, Wedgewood was asked to raise the matter. He addressed to us, from the House of Commons, the following typical letter :—

House of Commons,
26/2/25.

Dear Guy Aldred,

Whenever you get into gaol you write to me—a good habit, which reconciles me completely to your incarceration. Whenever you get out you not only denounce me as an obsolete old duffer, but you send me the denunciatory newspaper and seduce me into reading it. This is a thoroughly bad habit.

But what worries is—Are you an Anarchist or a Communist? If the latter, the Police may club you and your fellow Communists may save you. If you are an Anarchist (colour immaterial), I will put a question and stand by a pal—so long as you tell me exactly what to complain about (draft the question).

If you cannot make up your mind what you are, change your mind.

Best regards to Madame,

Yours,

JOSIAH C. WEDGEWOOD.

When Morel was prosecuted and imprisoned in 1917, Wedgewood defended Morel against his accusers and slanderers, in a powerful speech made in the House of Commons, on October 31, 1917. We excerpt a passage :—

"I am proud of my country and her traditions and history, but the imprisonment of E. D. Morel will go down to succeeding generations as one of the most serious blots on the history of this country."

The Anarchist has reached the House of Lords. We shall read his questions and speeches with interest.

(4). Charles Latham, leader of the London County Council since 1940. Born December 26, 1888. Joined the Labour Party in 1905. At one time a member of, and in 1915, President of the National Union of Clerks. Devoted himself to London Municipal life, and, through his work as an accountant, seems to have become an active business man, and director of several companies and manufacturing concerns. The account of his career in Who's Who displays no real interest in Socialist thought or struggle, despite his proletarian beginnings in Norwich.

The official notice from 10 Downing Street, making known these peerages, said :—

"These creations are not made as political honours or rewards but as a special measure of State policy. They are designed to strengthen the Labour Party in the Upper House where its representation is disproportionate at a time when a coalition Government of three Parties is charged with the direction of affairs."

Commenting on the creations, and this announcement, The Patriot, for January 1, 1942, says :—

In olden and better days peerages were conferred on those who had spent their lives in the service of the country and in building up the Empire. This fine idea of recognition of work well done brought into the Upper House the pick of the nation. Subsequently, and to a disgraceful extent a generation ago, the country witnessed the sales of what were called honours when all idea of honour was lacking. Now we have come to a new reason for the making of peers, and we have been told that the creation of four new Socialist peers was "designed to strengthen the Labour Party in the Upper House, where its representation is disproportionate at a time when a Coalition Government of three parties is charged with the direction of affairs." The excuse seems inadequate, and, it would be thought, would make little appeal to anyone but the cynic. In the first place, we have had Coalition Governments before this, when such creations did not take place, and the present Coalition is temporary, whereas the peerages are as permanent as nature will allow. In the second place, in a crisis like the present there is supposed to be a truce in politics, and the case is not easy to make out for one party to be strengthened when there should be no party, and only men of outstanding ability are required to direct the affairs of the nation. Such men once proved could be given honours at the time when these are usually conferred. In the present case the idea of reward for services has gone, nor is there any suggestion of honour being given where honour is due.

We are not sure about the older and better days. The pick of the nation often rotted in poverty and the jail. We agree, however, that there used to be a pretence of reward for services rendered; and that, in the present case, the pretence is not advanced. Either we are growing more cynical or else more nakedly and unashamedly honest in our political misdeeds.

It is to be noted that when the new "Socialist" peers took their seats in the House of Lords, they did so with the usual ceremony, and each one took the oath. At least Lord Wedgewood should have contented himself with a simple affirmation. As reported in our February issue, the Duke of Bedford, on taking his seat, dispensed with all ceremony and contented himself with a simple affirmation. If the Duke could leave out God's name, why could not the alleged Socialists?

PETER SHAND

Our Comrade Peter Shand appeared before the Glasgow Local Tribunal in June, 1941. In many cases this Tribunal has reached understanding decisions. In Shand's case, although we should have thought that his sincerity was obvious, the Tribunal reached an adverse decision. Shand did not appeal. In due course he was called up for military service. He endeavoured to silence his anti-militarist objections but found that it was impossible to do so. On his last Glasgow leave Comrade Shand visited the Strickland Press and said that he was returning to his regiment to declare his conscientious objection. This was on February 7.

Shand returned to his regiment and refused a command on 10th February. His letters from Gosforth will enable readers to follow his adventures since he took his stand definitely for conscience :—

13/2/1942. 9-30 p.m. I was taken before the Major this morning. I stated that I had disobeyed the command of the officer because I was a C.O. to war, and not through any personal animosity. He remarked that, in this case, he could do nothing but take me before the Commanding Officer. I made a similar statement to the latter, supplementing it by explaining that I registered as a conscientious objector and appeared before the Glasgow Local Tribunal. I was refused exemption. After a talk with my father I decided to submit to militarism. On entry into the army, I tried to adapt myself to army life and to be in harmony with the demands and requirements of militarism and war. Each day I found my surrender of principle growing more and more impossible. Finally, I resolved to disobey military commands.

The Commanding Officer was impatient at my explanation and barked out finally: "Do you realise what is happening at Singapore?" He then asked if I would accept his punishment or did I want a Court-Martial. I replied that I wanted a Court-Martial. I was taken to the Battery Headquarters and now I am in the guard-room.

I get on champion with the lads and I have been very polite in my actions, making clear that my opposition is firm against militarism, but is not personal against anyone. They know that I regard them as my comrades and friends, oppressed under an evil social system. I feel quite at one with myself now I have taken my stand and I am not afraid of any punishment. I have managed to get a book to read, by Raphael Sabatina, "Captain Blood," and I am reading that to pass the time. Cheerio Comrade! Yours in thought!

SATURDAY, 14/2/42. It is now Saturday and I've been inspected by the troop officer to see that I am properly dressed and clean. I was taken before the Major, who is acting for the Colonel. He asked me if I still thought the same. I said: "Yes, and I still want a Court-Martial." I am to be taken to headquarters to hear the evidence read and checked.

17/2/42. I received your letter of the 16th this morning. I was very glad to hear from you. Comrade John Morley visited me yesterday afternoon. We had a chat for a few minutes and I gave him some notes concerning what had happened. I hope he sees me again soon.

The priest visited me this morning. I must say I enjoyed our chat together. As he was leaving, he said that if I wanted anything, I was not to be afraid to ask him. This afternoon I was medically examined. It is now 4 p.m., and rolling on to bed-time.

WEDNESDAY, 18/2/42. I believe Comrade Morley will help all he can. I have refused to have a defending officer, as I believe in relying on the advice and assistance of Comrade Morley. We are better to keep to ourselves.

Our loyal and consistent comrade, John Morley, as soon as he heard of Comrade Shand's situation visited him. He saw Shand. Comrade Morley concludes a long letter, dated February 16, with the promise :—

"We will see that Shand is well looked after and will do everything for him. He is in good health and spirits and seems eager to see the thing through to the end this time. Will write further as the situation develops."

LORD HUGH RUSSELL

Lord Hugh Hastings Russell, the younger son of the Duke of Bedford, may, before long, be coming in for his share of persecution as a C.O.

He appeared before the East Anglian Tribunal at Cambridge on Thursday, February 12. He asked for total exemption but was given whole-time civil defence.

A student of mechanical science at Christ's College, Cambridge, he said he was a Christian Pacifist, and wanted complete exemption. He was prepared to make any sacrifice to help reconstruction after the war, but he would not assist the cause of war in any way at all.

Professor J. H. Clapham, a member of the Tribunal, said :—

Your objection appears to be to fit yourself for a good job after the war!

A wise saying reminds us that people who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. It could have been retorted on the Professor that he was enjoying a good job during the war; a very comfortable by-product of war. For the rest, if the war continues long enough, there may be no job after the war anywhere. Civilisation will be reduced to a desolation, thanks to wisdom like that uttered by the most learned professor.

Naturally, Lord Hugh Russell is appealing against this decision.

Canon C. E. Raven, Master of Christ's College, accompanied Russel and was himself abused for doing so.

Canon Raven said that he was convinced of Russell's sincerity, the genuineness of his Christian belief, and his honesty in trying to face the issue.

Judge Lawson Campbell, the Chairman, commented :

"It seems to me rather nasty and selfish."

One who was present writes :—

"It was a disgraceful performance. Clapham, the University member, shouted and raged at Russell without any sort of provocation—a real attempt to bully and blackguard the boy. He stood up to it very well, quietly and pluckily, but the result was a foregone conclusion. Indeed, I am surprised that he was not struck off the register altogether. Canon Raven spoke in his support and was rather browbeaten."

The Kaiser's Call Against Japan "The Yellow Peril"

In 1908, the Kaiser collaborated in producing—and signed as the reader will see—this drawing called "THE YELLOW PERIL." It is inscribed "NATIONS OF EUROPE! JOIN IN THE DEFENCE OF YOUR FAITH AND YOUR HONOUR!"

The Kaiser protested against British Statesmen and his uncle, Edward VII., signing a treaty with Japan. He declared that the treaty with Japan menaced the British Empire and the White Nations, including the United States of America. He denounced as "A TRAITOR TO THE WHITE MAN'S CAUSE" any European Statesman who made a treaty with Japan against any other white nation.

"A TRAITOR TO THE WHITE MAN'S CAUSE"

Kaiser's View of Man who would Make Japanese Alliance.

HISTORIC INTERVIEW THAT WAS SUPPRESSED

In his drive for power and empire in the name of the so-called Germanic race, Hitler has completed an all-embracing military alliance with the Nipponese of Japan. The menace of this alliance is being discussed now in the United States of America and all parts of the British Empire. At such a time of crisis it is instructive, and of more than academic value, to recall an almost unknown chapter of history which throws considerable light on to-day's events.

The Hitler programme is not new. It embodies the dream, and continues much of the policy, of William II., Emperor of Germany, who, in 1914, protested against "encirclement," proclaimed his faith in power politics, and worshipped the image of the Teuton supreme. The Kaiser scorned the British, but he warned Britain and Europe against the Japanese. He distrusted the Japanese, called them yellow devils, and was obsessed by the "Yellow Peril." And so Britain and Italy combined with America and Japan to destroy the Kaiser. To-day the Kaiser's warning makes interesting reading.

William II. succeeded to the German throne in 1888, at the age of 29. He was ambitious, arrogant, aggressive. He disliked Bismarck, retired him from political life, undid his policy of isolating France, and alienated Britain and Russia. He acquired a naval base and trade centre in China, and threatened the United States' influence in the Philippines. He saw 16 million Germans in middle Europe outside the German Empire and evolved a policy for German dominance in Europe and Asia, extending all the way to the Ottoman Empire. The Berlin-Baghdad railway became the symbol of this policy of development and expansion. Britain checked that programme. The Kaiser protested against "encirclement"! Britain proposed naval limitation, and made a treaty with Japan. Such was the situation in June, 1908.

Theodore Roosevelt was President in the United States. William Bayard Hale was an ordained United States minister who had turned to journalism. He had worked for several magazines and for The New York World; had been managing editor of The Philadelphia Public Ledger four years, and had served as Paris correspondent of the New York Times. He was well acquainted in Europe, and was sent there to write a special series of articles about the Kaiser's daily life. He arrived in Germany early in July, 1908, and learned that the Kaiser was willing to grant him a political interview. He objected to articles on his daily life.

On July 19 the Kaiser was at Bergen, Norway, on the imperial yacht, Hohenzollern. Hale secured an audience, through his friendship with General von Lowenfeld, Commander of the Prussian Guard Corps, and Privy Councillor von Ihne, Court Architect. The audience lasted two hours.

The Kaiser wanted this interview to be published. But it was suppressed on the demand of the German Foreign Office, which overruled the Kaiser's wishes, and of the President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt. Had the responsible editors of The New York Times published that interview the superficial course of history might have been different, and two world wars might have been avoided. The Kaiser's opinions ought to have been published fully and freely, whether they were right or wrong.

Down to the day of his death in 1935, the documents of the Kaiser's interview—letters, notes, and memoranda—rested in the personal files of Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of The New York Times. Four years later they were discovered—in June, 1939—during the process of classifying the contents of these files.

On July 20, 1908, Ochs received a note from William C. Reick, one of The New York Times executives, which said in part :—

Last night I received the following cable (from Hale): "Just had two hours audience with Emperor. Result so startling that I hesitate to report it without censorship of Berlin."

Reick replied that there must not be "even appearance betrayed confidence," and that Hale must consult Lowenfeld and David James Hill, the United States Ambassador to Germany.

While waiting on the cable from Reick, Hale was busy, in his Bergen hotel, making a 5000-word transcript of his conversation with the Kaiser. They had walked the deck of the yacht as the Kaiser talked clearly and definitely in English.

When he had finished his record of the conversation, Hale wrote a letter to Reick, in which he said :—

The Emperor talked to me eagerly for nearly two hours. He is exceedingly bitter against England and full of the Yellow Peril.

Among other things, the Kaiser said to Hale :

KAISER'S STATEMENT.

Everybody understands what must come to pass between Asia and the West, the Yellow race and the White. It is imbecile folly for us to close our eyes to the inevitable. We are unworthy of our fathers if we are negligent of the sacred duty of preserving the civilization which they have achieved for us, and the religion which God has given us.

All the world understands that the gravest crisis in the destiny of the earth's population is at hand. The first battle has been fought. Unfortunately, it was not won. Russia was fighting the White Man's battle. Many did not see it then—all do now. What a pity it was not fought better! What a misfortune! My God! I wish my battalions could have had a chance at them! We would make short work of it.

The danger to us is not Japan, but Japan at the head of a consolidated Asia. The control of China by Japan—which is sharply and bitterly antagonistic to the White Man's civilization—that would be the worst calamity that could threaten the world. We shall be wise if we divide the East against itself. That means, at this stage of the game, that we must not allow China and Japan to get together, either fraternally or one inside the other. The particular duty which the White Man owes himself at this moment is to prevent Japan's swallowing China.

It's no good talking about Great Britain. England is a traitor to the White Man's cause. The ninnies there have got that government in an absolute impossible position. I tell you that empire is going to pieces on this rock. If that alliance of theirs with Japan is persisted in, I don't see how the British Empire can be saved from dismemberment. When self-interest enters the door, sentimental patriotism flies out of the window.

I know that British Columbia has made it plain that it must be handled very tenderly or it will be lost to the empire. . . .

In India conditions at this hour even as they are publicly known are worrying Englishmen. If they knew the whole truth, they would be more than worried. The peculiar danger there springs directly from the fact that the British Government has made an alliance with Japan. It has done this, it has exchanged honours and pledges of friendship, on the basis of equality, with one Asiatic people, whilst it holds another Asiatic people in bondage.

The long slumbering disaffection in India has been fanned to a blazing spirit of rebellion through the use of this humiliating argument.

Now, mind you, I don't believe that public opinion is behind this treaty in England, but the ninnies who run the government are determined to stick to it. So long as they do stick to it, England is in the position of a traitor to the White Man's cause.

This was very effective criticism from the standpoint of Western imperialism. Those who believe in such imperialism, if they were really propagandists, would remind the Fascist peoples of the Kaiser's reasoning to-day.

After pointing out the common interests, largely of race, that linked Germany and the United States of America, the Kaiser continued to expound the white man's philosophy of Imperial domination as well as any British jingo could do it. He said :—

Oh, it will come out all right. The future belongs to the White race. It does not belong to the Yellow nor the Black nor the Olive coloured. It belongs to the Blond Man and it belongs to Christianity and to Protestantism. We are the only people who can save it. There is no power in any other civilization or any other religion that can save humanity, and the future belongs to us—the Anglo—Teuton, the man who comes from Northern Europe.

The Kaiser spoke of his intense admiration for Theodore Roosevelt, the United States President, just as Winston Churchill speaks to-day of his intense admiration for Franklin Roosevelt, the United States President. He defended the idea of a dictator with zeal in the following remarks, often echoed in essence by the enemies of democracy that have risen in different parts of the world since the conclusion of the Great War that deposed the Kaiser and sent him into a long exile, terminated only by death :—

All the big things in the world are always done by just a man—one man—one strong personality. History in its times of crises cries out for a man. Everything waits until a great personality appears—nothing happens until there arises a man with burning convictions in his heart, a man of absolute fearlessness, a man who doesn't mind laughter, derision nor misunderstanding, nor abuse. A man who knows what he wants and goes straight for it. . . . That's the way of history.

That is the law of social progress—a big man has got to do everything. . . . I tell my people that it doesn't matter whether it is an empire or a republic. There has got to be one man to take the responsibility. Parliaments may criticize, Parliaments may hold back, Parliaments may be very wise—but Parliaments do not do things. You may gather all the wisdom in the world in a parliamentary chamber; but you will never get any action out of a parliamentary chamber. One man has got to lead.

The Kaiser spoke strongly against pacifism. He said :—

"In a world of practical facts, we have to fight even for righteousness' sake. The Bible is full of fighting—jolly good fights some of them were. It is a mistaken idea that Christianity has no countenance for war. Christianity inimical to all war! Why, the early Christians had no scruple about propagating the faith of the sword. We are ourselves Christians by reason of forcible conversion.

Mind, I don't advocte that method now, but how can our missionaries reach the barbarians unless we win and keep open a road for our missionaries, by force if necessary? I tell you, our religion wants us to employ in her behalf all the powers and gifts we possess—our knowledge, our science, our military skill.

Might not the result, for the Kaiser himself, for Germany, and for Europe have been better if he had been a little less willing "to fight even for righteousness sake"?

In his letter to Reick, Hale wrote :—

This interview is unquestionably of first importance. I realize it, so much so that I am leaving for Berlin to let the German Foreign Office object, if they want to (and I fear they will) BEFORE publication. No restrictions of any kind were laid on me, except that Baron von der Bussche of the Foreign Office said that I could not be received as a newspaperman. Everybody concerned knows that I am. . . .

I believe the Emperor was eager to talk for publication, and to be talked to. He hears little except through a court circle. The Foreign Office I feel will object, but I'll do the best I can at Berlin.

Hale consulted with the German Foreign Office. Four days later he wrote to The New York Times from Berlin :—

I have just been obliged to cable that the officials here absolutely forbid any publication regarding the audience with the Emperor. They are, in fact, horror-stricken at the idea of what he said to me being repeated even in private, and declare that the worst results would follow. Dr. Hill, to whom I had given a full account of the audience, is of the opinion that the Emperor was perfectly willing to be quoted.

The interview was not published. The Kaiser's warning against the Japanese alliance was buried in the files of the publisher of The New York Times. War came. Revolution followed. Counter-revolution succeeded. Hitler took the Kaiser's place. And Germany made the alliance that the Kaiser condemned Britain for making. In the Kaiser's words, and as a result of the policy of British diplomacy, Hitler is a traitor to the white man's cause. But are not all statesmen, careerists, and diplomats traitors to the white man's cause?

"1,000 AIRCRAFT COULD HAVE SAVED ISLAND"

Express Special Correspondent, RALPH JORDAN
WITH THE ALLIED FORCES,
SOUTH-WEST PACIFIC, Monday.

The above headings are reproduced, half-size, from the Daily Express, Glasgow edition, for March 10, 1942. We daresay that the same article and headings appeared in the London edition. The text explained how fighter aircraft could have saved Java.

In the same issue our contemporary published an interview with Dr. Van Mook, the Governor of the Netherlands East Indies, on his arrival at Adelaide, on Monday, March 9. Dr. Van Mook complained that the Dutch forces had "only five fighters and three bombers." He added :—

It is no use hiding the bitterness felt in Java; we were expecting more help.

The Express featured this interview beneath the heading :—

ONLY 8 PLANES LEFT IN JAVA

How far do the facts revealed in the Truman Report explain this sorry state of affairs? Does not this report call for full and sober discussion throughout Britain?

THE EDITOR REGRETS

Readers are asked to sympathise. Type is not elastic and space is limited. We have had to hold over several important essays, which were set for publication in this issue. These features have been sacrificed to the task of summarising and explaining fully the Truman Report and depicting United States "Big Business" Interests at work, destroying and profiting. Cold, unanswerable facts have been placed before our readers. We regret holding over essays planned for publication this month. But April's loss will be May's gain. We have had to postpone also till May the special November 1940 fund appeal. We asked for £1,971 11s. 3d. We are still short over £270. Perhaps the month will enable us to collect the amount needed.

Paper restrictions still further affect us. We are unwilling to reduce our size. We are using lighter paper. But we must decrease still further our circulation. We can supply only about one in twenty of our regular readers. And yet we must reach other workers and citizens who are thinking also. So perhaps you will lend this issue to your friend. And to your friend's friend. Lend it on—but get it back.

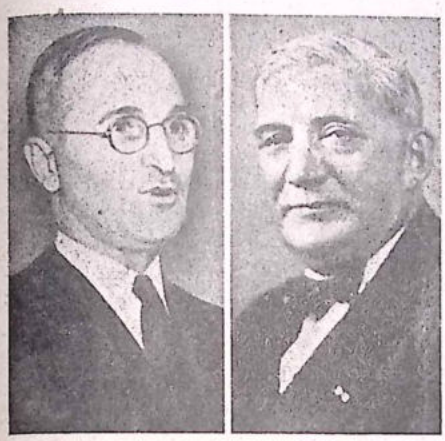
Cost of production has increased. Illustrations make this an expensive paper to produce. We carry no advertising. Losses are heavy in each issue. They are very heavy this month. Will you help? Our desire is to give readers a worthy and thoughtful sheet, to counteract the errors and follies of this period of crisis.

THE TRUMAN REPORT

ALL-OUT WAR PROFITEERING EXPOSED IN U.S. SENATE

"DOLLAR A-YEAR MEN" MENACE VICTORY EFFICIENCY

AUTO BOSSES DEMAND NEW PLANTS AS GIFT



Senator Harry S. Truman William S. Knudsen

Waste, inefficiency, self-interest, corruption, and criminal failure to serve or develop the national defence programme were charged in an interim report filed by the Senate's special investigating Committee of ten members at Washington on Thursday, January 15 last. The indictment was extensive. It criticised persons and conditions both inside and outside the Government. The investigation had extended over a period of nine months.

The Committee consisted of Senators Truman, of Missouri (Chairman, a Democrat), Conally, Wallgren, Mead, Brewster, Hatch, Herring, Kilgore, and Bone.

The Committee was submitted to considerable questioning by the members of the Senate.

The report stated that the O.P.M. (the Office of Production Management) failed to perform the administrative functions for which it was created and became a "rubber stamp" for War and Navy Department procurement policies, involving graft and incompetence.

DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN.

A handful of giant monopoly corporations made tremendous war profits through "outrageous" contracts which they secured with the aid of the O.P.M. The O.P.M. was controlled by persons holding important positions with large companies who were willing and anxious to serve on a dollar per year, or without compensation basis.

On January 5, 1942, there were 255 dollar-a-year men, and 631 "without compensation" men on the O.P.M. dealing with matters involving the welfare of the class of clients by whom they were formerly employed and by whom they naturally expect to be employed in the future."

These men were "loaned" to the Government by the big capitalist corporations. They retained their remunerative business connections. They drew their company pay. In some cases they received substantial pay increases for their services to the companies.

The meaning of the "dollar-a-year man" is evidenced in the following list of some of the biggest companies which secured the lion's share of war contracts, as the Truman report shows, together with the amount of contracts they secured down to June, 1941, and the name of the dollar-a-year man they "loaned" to the United States Government from a sense of patriotism :—

Bethlehem Steel: $71,449,442—George F. Hocker.

Chrysler Corp.: $34,179,529—Edmund S. Chapman.

Crucible Steel: $14,184,481—Frank Spencer.

General Electric: $106,754,743—F. B. Cliffe and Carl Lynge.

General Motors: $324,403,009 — William Knudsen, E. F. Johnson, Frederick Horner, Benson Waderlow, Bayard B. Kunkle, and John Pratt.

Procter & Gamble: $24,720,000—Rich Duepree.

United Aircraft: $186,439,438—George J. Mead.

Westinghouse Electric: $37,747,430—E. C. Brandt.

On July 16, 1941, Bethlehem Steel had Navy contracts totalling $1,060,000,000. It estimated that its net profits, after all deductions, amounted to $59,233,000. This corporation—cited as "typical" in the Truman Report—held up expansion of steel production. In August, 1941, after months of denying the possibility of steel shortages, the O.P.M. admitted reluctantly that expansion of the steel industry was necessary.. At this date, Bethlehem Steel war orders had increased to $1,368,000,000, representing "staggering profits." It refused to invest its own tremendous capital for plant expansion. But it demanded that the U.S. Government build a $55,000,000 plant under contract terms which made the proposed plant a virtual gift to the company.

This "outrageous" demand led the Truman committee to conclude "that Bethlehem was using the defense program to obtain, at Government expense, modern facilities which would have a material value in peace-time operations."

According to the terms of the contract drafted by Bethlehem—and approved by O.P.M. director Knudsen—the plant would be built on Bethlehem Steel land. The Government's lease on the land would end with the expiration or cancellation of Bethlehem's lease on the facilities. Thus, all the Government could do with the plant at the termination of the lease would be to remove it "a right of dubious value, as the cost of removing the facilities might well approximate, if not exceed, the salvage value."

The plant, according to the contract, would be leased for 35 years, a period having "no reasonable relation to the present emergency." The Government could not terminate the lease unless Bethlehem operated the plant at less than 25 per cent. capacity for five successive years and then the Government could remove the plant—at its own expense.

When the word was given out that the Truman committee intended to investigate the Navy contracts, several of the leading companies "voluntarily" hastened to the Navy to ask for a reduction in their contract fees.

The eagerness with which the Naval procurement committee sought to co-operate with the profiteering corporations is indicated by the fact that private companies were given contracts for 70 per cent. of the Navy's new tonnage, while the public yards were producing only 30 per cent. Instead of expanding the Government yards, "the Navy provided the bulk of the funds to expand the (private) shipyards." It costs from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 more to build a battleship in a private than in a government yard.

Like Bethlehem Steel, with its over a billion dollars in war orders, the Aluminium Company of America, a 100 per cent. monopoly, blocked expansion in its industries until it secured from obliging O.P.M. and Defense Plant Corporation officials contracts giving it a huge new plant virtually as a gift at government expense.

Another failure listed against the O.P.M. in the Truman Report was in connection with the automobile industry.

The auto corporations did not turn down any juicy war contracts which were a "very important and profitable sideline of ordinary commercial activity." Nor did they exhibit excessive patriotism until the Government came across with the gift of new plants; however, the industry heads saw no harm in taking advantage of the war boom to concentrate on commercial production.

Between their "profitable sideline" and the expanded consumer market, the big three of the industry, General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler, raked in $430,604,778 profits in the first nine months of 1941 as compared with $408,212,589 for all of 1940 and $296,075,775 in 1939.

The auto industry knew that war was coming. It knew that it would be one of the basic war industries. But the auto barons delayed the job of conversion and waited for the Government to give them new plants. The automobile industry had a lot of idle tool makers and convertible unused facilities, but "announcements were made to the effect that automobile plants could not produce tanks and airplanes, and that it was advisable and necessary to build new plants for that purpose."

The industry heads advised the O.P.M. that only ten per cent. of its tools could be utilized in the production of airplane engines. William Knudsen, former G.M. president and "master of production," as Roosevelt has termed him, accepted the estimates of his former colleagues.

The Truman Committee says that the information furnished to the Under-Secretary of War by the automobile companies and the Office of Production Management was quite inaccurate.

When war compelled the industry to discontinue auto production, the auto manufacturers and O.P.M. took the position that the plants can in fact be convertible in a relatively short time.

Instead of considering the urgency of utilizing its facilities for defence production without waiting on Government aid, the industry concerned itself with the production of cars for private use and pleasure so thoroughly that it attained a peak in 1941 nearly as great as the total of 5,621,040 cars and trucks manufactured in 1929.

"In plain language," adds the report, "the job was not even started well."

The Army in purchasing land for camp sites used agents who were paid a percentage of the purchase price, and who naturally bought land at the highest possible price.

Among the outstanding Army contract cases cited by the report was that of the Wolf Creek and Milan ordnance plants in Tennessee. "Excessive costs" increased the originally estimated $35,741,000 cost of this project to almost $50,000,000.

The report explained these scandals by stating that the "dollar-a-year" men had the power and the tendency to favour big business.

"All important procurement contracts must be approved by these men, which means that contracts must conform to their theories of business. Since they represent the largest companies, this means that the defense program in all its ramifications must obtain the approval of the large companies."

The "dollar-a-year" and "without compensation" men running the war-production programme subconsciously reflect the opinions and conclusions which they formerly reached as managers of large interests with respect to Government competition, with respect to taxation and amortization, with respect to the financing of new plant expansion, and with respect to the margin of profits which should be allowed on war contracts.

Even when they could not pass the contract formally to their companies, they knew what type of contracts the government is about to let and how their companies may best proceed to obtain consideration.

They also are in an excellent position to know what shortages are imminent and to advise their companies on how best to proceed, either to build up inventories against future shortages, or to apply for early consideration of priorities. They can even advise them as to how to phrase their request for priorities. In addition, such men are frequently close personal friends and social intimates of the dollar-a-year and no-compensation men who do pass on the contracts in which their companies are interested.

"FREE SERVICE" PRACTICE CONDEMNED.

The committee declared that it was opposed to the Government taking free services "from persons with axes to grind," and recommended that if the Government retained the services of "dollar-a-year" and "without-compensation" men it paid them salaries and required them to give up their private business and industry salaries.

This was a prelude to charges which startled the Senate.

"FRANTIC" PRODUCTION WITHOUT RESULTS.

After two years of "frantic" production effort, the report asserted, there were too few airplanes "to allow adequate flying time to our own pilots." This situation could not be blamed upon aircraft shipments under the lease-lend programme.

While these shortages persisted there were more than sixty small aircraft manufacturing companies, capable of turning out at least 2000 planes a month, frozen out of the programme.

Since 1939 the aircraft industry in the United States had all the military and naval construction business it could handle, and since May, 1940, when the President requested an air force of 50,000 planes and an industry geared to the production of 50,000 planes annually, the armed services have had more money for airplanes than they could contract to spend. . . .

Apparently, there never has been and is not now any real planned and co-ordinated program for the procurement of aircraft. Our services have merely purchased what the manufacturer had to offer instead of planning to use available facilities to produce what they needed at maximum capacity.

Though it was seemingly created to organize and manage production facilities, it appears that, as far as aircraft production is concerned, the Office of Production Management simply acted as a rubber stamp for the service agencies, allowing them to follow their own policies of procurement.

There is a tendency throughout to place everything on order wherever possible, and put the sole responsibility for delivery on a few large producers. They tend to select a few producers and expand them to the limit without regard to delivery dates, . . . and the possibility of future expansion to meet unforeseen needs.

At the present time, everything is being done that can be done under existing conditions to speed production by nineteen favored manufacturers of military aircraft.

The report added that "the more than sixty aircraft companies in the country" already mentioned were being crushed out of business, their plants wasted, while we are still placing billions of dollars with these nineteen aircraft manufacturers for planes to be delivered in 1944 or after, and have spent almost a billion in financing their plant expansion.

The report turned to the scandal of obsolete planes. The U.S.A. Services had purchased obsolete models, totalling 75 per cent. of war production, from the "favoured" corporations. Recent events and the aviation aspects of its investigation were summarised in this trenchant paragraph :—

Not only has it been shown that we have not had a great "quantity of planes in action," but information made available to the public demonstrates that too many of the ships used were of types long considered by our armed forces to be obsolete.

The plain and distasteful truth of our situation was indicated by Major Gen. Henry H. Arnold in a speech delivered in October and subsequently released to the press. General Arnold said: "A shortage of equipment has been acute and a very dangerous threat to pilot morale. . . ."

Aircraft companies explained that quantity had been sacrificed to quality in plane building. The report denied this excuse, and added :—

In the heavy bomber field production has been standardized on two types which are being manufactured by several companies. These types are generally considered as being equal to or superior to any such plane produced elsewhere. In other bomber types we are producing at least one model of each type which is generally rated above similar types of foreign manufacture.

The report quoted General Arnold—"the highest officer in the air forces"—to the effect that the pursuit ship had been allowed to "drift in the doldrums." Continuing to quote Arnold, the report added :—

We no longer rate the (name deleted) as better than a good pursuit trainer, because of its limitations in speed, ceiling and fire power.

Of the future of this inadequate plane, the report said :—

Unless service procurement policies are changed, this ship will constitute more than half of our total pursuit production until the end of 1942, when the company which builds it is scheduled to begin production on a model which may be equal to present-day fighting needs. . . .

On the drawing boards we have many high performing pursuit ships, but in January, 1942, very few will be produced which can be considered better than mediocre. And there will be no long-range pursuits, a type so vitally needed for our present operations.

Dismissing as excuses the "reasons" given by the Army, Navy, and the O.P.M. for slowness of production at a time of grave crisis, the Committee stated that it was evident, from an examination of all available information, that the production weaknesses were almost entirely the result of the procurement policies of the Service agencies and the O.P.M. The War Department explanation of labour disputes and strikes was untrue.

SPAB.

The day before the Truman report was presented to the Senate, the Supply Priorities and Allocation Board was abolished and the responsibility for all defence production was put into the hands of Donald M. Nelson. He had been the head of the S.P.A.B.

The Truman report stated that the S.P.A.B. lacked "initiative" and "force." It called for its reorganisation under one head.

The report then attacked the "Influence Peddlers" :—

Big business has had its lobbyists in the form of dollar-a-year men and w. o. c. (without compensation) men. Small and intermediate business men have sought to obtain the same benefits by hiring those whom they think have influence.

DIPLOMACY, FASCISM and WAR

DODD'S DIARY

The late William E. Dodd served as United States Ambassador to Germany from June, 1933, to December, 1937. During those fateful years preliminary to the Second World War, Dodd had an unexcelled opportunity to observe the inside workings of capitalist diplomacy. He recorded facts and observations in a daily journal. Under the title, Ambassador Dodd's Diary, 1933-1938, Dodd's intimate private observations were published in 1940 by his son and daughter.

Dodd indicates the part played by the capitalist "democratic" statesmen of Britain, France, and the United States in paving the way for the rise of Fascism, and the coming, in some form, of world war, in the following passages :—

"French politicians have for ten years violated the spirit of the disarmament clauses of the Versailles Treaty. The German Social-Democratic movement was ruined by French policy."

"France played a sad game in 1919 and then continued her mistake under the League from 1930 to 1932. That helped to give Germany Hitler . . . Now, as Sir Eric (Sir Eric Phipps, British Ambassador to Germany, 1933-38) says, all Europe must watch Germany day and night, living under an encirclement system which may even bring economic collapse."

Dodd reports the attitude of Lord Lothian—who died while British Ambassador to the United States—in May, 1935 :—

"Lord Lothian, who as Philip Kerr, was secretary to Lloyd George during the World War, wrote me . . . a letter which I received to-day . . . He indicated clearly that he favours a coalition of the democracies to block any German move in their direction and to turn Germany's course eastwards. That this might lead to a war between Russia and Germany does not seem to disturb him seriously. In fact he seems to feel this would be a good solution of the difficulties imposed on Germany by the Versailles Treaty. THE PROBLEM OF THE DEMOCRACIES, AS HE SEES IT, IS TO FIND FOR JAPAN AND GERMANY A STRONGER PLACE IN WORLD AFFAIRS TO WHICH, IN HIS OPINION, THEY ARE ENTITLED BECAUSE OF THEIR POWER AND TRADITION. He hopes this can be accomplished without any sacrifice to the British Empire and with as little destruction to human liberty as possible."

Dodd accuses William C. Bullitt, American Ambassador to the Soviet Union, of engaging in a similar intrigue, at the same time, with British and French diplomats, to forward an armed attack on the Soviet Union by Germany and Japan.

Bullitt made his reputation at the end of the first Great War as a radical, liberal, and pacifist thinker. His reputation advanced his career, and so he developed his reaction as soon as he was established politically. Dodd points out that Bullitt is the heir to a great fortune, and was a generous contributor to the Roosevelt campaign of 1932.

Dodd writes :—

"Bullitt said Russia had no business trying to hold the peninsula which projects into the Japanese sea at Vladivostok. That is all going to be taken soon by Japan . . . I was amazed at this kind of talk from a responsible diplomat who had done much to get Russia recognised in 1933. The President must know the man's mentality, but if so, how could he have appointed him Ambassador to Soviet Russia?"

Dodd accuses British diplomacy of sabotaging all aid to democracy and loyalism in Spain and aiding Franco. He writes, under date, January 11, 1937 :—

"Sir Eric Phipps was as discreet as ever, but he revealed more sympathy for the Fascist crowd in Spain than I had noted before. I believe now he is almost a Fascist, as I think are Baldwin and Eden."

Dodd denounces British and American capitalism and diplomacy for directly re-arming Germany and Fascism. Here are some excerpts :

"I visited Sir Eric Phipps and repeated in all confidence a report that Armstrong-Vickers, the great British armament concern, had negotiated a sale of war material here (Berlin) last week, just before a British Government commission arrived to negotiate some plan with Schacht for payment of short-term debts . . . due on current deliveries of British cotton yarn from Lancaster. It is impossible, Schacht said to me yesterday, to pay British debts. Yet, last Friday, I reported to Sir Eric, the British arms people were selling for cash enormous quantities of war supplies. And I was frank enough—or indiscreet enough—to add that I understood that representatives of Curtiss-Wright from the United States were here this week to negotiate similar sales. The British Ambassador pretended to be surprised . . ."

"Norman Ebbutt of the London "Times" came in to give me a report on the effects of the London protest to Hitler about rearming—a protest made after England and the United States have sold millions of dollars worth of arms to Germany . . ."

"Ebbutt confirmed the report of mid-October (1934) that a British woman, connected with Hitler's inner group, was here just before the negotiations on Lancaster debts, to sell war equipment for Armstrong-Vickers. The British Ambassador 'had not known about it' according to previous conversations. I am sure now the British staff members did know."

"Colonel Edward A. Deeds of Akron, Ohio, and New York City, president or director of twenty great American industrial concerns came here to lunch to-day . . . Deeds had negotiated a deal with a German corporation for sending over our airplane patents so that the German company could manufacture and sell a hundred planes to Italy, the American company to share the profits . . . This sort of thing is done all the time in this European war atmosphere . . .

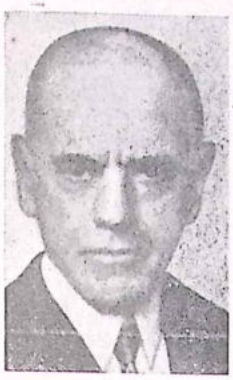
". . . Our Commercial Attache said, 'In two years Germany will be manufacturing oil and gas enough out of soft coal for a long war, the Standard Oil Company of New York furnishing millions of dollars to help.' . . . Mr. Phillips (Under-Secretary of State, 1933-36) was amazed and distressed, although all this information has been going to the Department for two whole years."

These brief extracts from a diary redundant with evidence and indictment gives an idea of the real worth of the capitalist "democratic" leaders who armed Hitler, planned a Russiain war, sacrificed Spain, and now demand the conscription of all youth for the grand carnival of carnage and dance of death, that they might keep their place in the sun.

PETER SHAND.—Our comrade, Peter Shand, has been sentenced to 56 days military detention, and is serving his sentence at Northallerton Detention Barracks. We ask the Labour movement to take up Shand's case and demand that he be sent to civil imprisonment, and that his case may be reviewed. Shand is a genuine and convinced Anti-Militarist and should be treated in the same way as other conscientious objectors.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.—Shortly after his case was reviewed in the February "Word," Campbell's sentence was reviewed, and he was returned to camp. He was sentenced by another Court Martial to two years' imprisonment with hard labour and will have his case reconsidered by a Tribunal.

WAR PROFITEERING AND DISASTER



Eugene G. Grace
From 'The New York Times.'

On another page is discussed the Truman Report, which exposes so completely the scandal of war-profiteering in the United States. The defeats of the Allied Arms in the Pacific and the triumph of the Nazi Powers is due to that profiteering, and to that profiteering alone. The sacrifice of the proletariat on the field of battle is an outrage beyond comment. Not only the public trial of the profiteers but the indictment of the politicians and statesmen who connived with them is demanded by the facts. To indict these financial patriotic masqueraders is to condemn Capitalism and to raise the only conceivable slogan of our time. A Socialist Administration to inaugurate Socialist Society. The war of Capitalism must be liquidated in the industrial, political, and social revolution of Socialism.

How the European war benefited the various American Corporations, without really benefiting thoughtless and exploited John Doe, is shown in the following statement of profits for 1940 and 1939 and the net increase of the second war year over the year that witnessed the declaration of war by Britain on Germany following the invasion of Poland :—

	1940	1939	Increase
Kennecott Copper	$43,837,330	$33,947,443	$9,889,887
General Motors	195,601,721	183,290,222	12,331,499

General Electric	56,242,083	41,235,644	15,095,439

In the case of the following firms the increase is stated in the terms of per cent. so that the reader may better appreciate the tremendous increase :—

	1940	1939	Increase
Babcock & Wilcox	$3,588,199	$1,168,782	206
Bath Iron Works	2,052,180	660,703	400

New York Shipbuilding ...	2,178,748	928,246	135
Vultee Aircraft	374,457	25,488	1370

Scots readers will note that Babcock and Wilcox is also a British firm, and so makes profits out of war on both sides of the Atlantic.

In the case of the following firms we are able only to show the net profits during the first half of 1940, and the increase over the first half of 1939. The full year's comparisons show a much greater indictment of war, from the standpoint of its being a pursuit of murder condoned by profit :

	Net Profits during First Half of 1940	Net Profits during First Half of 1939
United States Steel	$36,315,003	$34,344,692
Remington Arms	1,219,000	1,075,000

Chrysler	30,484,274	5,148,593
E.I. DuPont de Nemours ...	45,853,695	6,982,160

Analysed, these figures mean that, during 1940, the workers engaged in the war industries of the United States of America earned their daily bread by pouring billions of dollars into the banking accounts of idle stockholders and useless coupon-clippers. Of course, the workers themselves were engaged in a senseless and criminal occupation, that of manufacturing the instruments for the death of their class. The famous, or infamous, Sixty Families, the Republican aristocracy of the United States, have found a veritable gold mine in the valley of death.

The total profit for 20 companies for 1940 was $642,559,048. This was an increase of 31 million dollars over their profit for 1939.

In January and February, 1941, 1005 corporations gave the rich "democrats" of United States "Big Business" 625 million dollars in dividends. This was 26 million dollars more than these same people got for January and February, 1940. These payments, of course, did not include the millions of dollars paid to the rich on corporation bonds that are locked away in their safe deposit boxes. The Standard Oil Companies alone gave the Rockefellers and other wealthy oil people over 22 million dollars in dividends.

General Motors made a net profit of $977 on each of its employees! American Telephone and Telegraph (Bell System) gobbled up $528 on each of its workers! General Electric took $826 per employee and U.S. Steel $420. But Standard Oil of N.J. made $2000 on each worker and du Pont gouged $2200 out of each! All of this for 1940 alone.

At the general meeting of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation on Thursday, January 29, 1942, Eugene G. Grace, president of the company, declared that the report for 1941 indicates clearly that Bethlehem cannot be charged with profiteering for war nor with propaganda for war.

The shareholders were feeling good and comfortable and applauded this report. They were feeling good and comfortable precisely because the report did not support this conclusion. The report showed a considerable profit from the organised preparation of death and devastation. Here are some of the figures on which we found this observation supplied by Grace in person to his coupon-clipping admirers.

Sales of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation in 1941 set a new high mark of $961,240,737, nearly 60 per cent. above the previous high sales mark of $602,202,618 in 1940 and more than twice the volume of $448,000,000 reported for 1918, the best sales year of the first World War.

Net profit during 1941 was $34,457,796, or $9.35 a common share. This compared unfavourably with $48,677,524, or $14.04 a share, earned in 1940, for reasons detailed below, which proved that this did not proceed from want of prosperity.

The directors voted a quarterly dividend of $1.50 a share on the common stock, and declared the regular quarterly preferred dividend of $1.75 a share.

Taxes paid by Bethlehem Steel in 1941 were $110,002,700, or about $36 a common share, against $41,345,349 for 1940, a tremendous increase.

In addition, the company charged $12,950,000 to earnings in 1941 for amortization of emergency plant facilities, although only $2,500,000 of this amortization was allowable as a deduction from 1941 income for tax purposes. In 1940 the company provided only $1,500,000 for amortization. Some difference. Further, the company added inventory, contingency, and insurance reserve, $12,630,000, as against $8,070,000 passed to reserve in 1940.

Earnings of the company before taxes were at record levels. Net profit before Federal taxes in 1941 was $119,758,000, against $72,554,000 in 1940 and $47,743,000 in 1929. Profit before all taxes was $144,460,000, against $90,023,000 in 1940 and $54,243,000 in 1929.

Cash expenditure for plant additions and improvements in 1941 were $42,127,091, against $29,994,523 for 1940.

Billings by the company for the fourth quarter of 1941 were $297,900,000, the largest for any three-month period on record, comparing with $260,052,000, the previous highest record in the preceding quarter.

Earnings for the fourth quarter and calendar years compare as follows for two years :—

	1941.	1940.
Fourth Quarter:
Total Income	$62,533,698	$35,208,097
Full Year:
Total Income	$162,778,500	$105,055,228

In Britain, we have heard a lot about American canned food coming to the "rescue" of the British war-workers and slum-dwellers.

The Federal Trade Commission of the United States reports that 10 companies in the vegetable canning industry made 13 per cent. on the stockholders' investment in 1939. The individual companies made all the way from 1½ to 24 per cent. on the capital investment.

American workers may be blamed for being engaged in war industry. They may not deserve the cheers thoughtless British audiences accord their images on the screen. But they cannot be indicted for stealing huge profits.

Senator O'Mahoney, chairman of the United States Monopoly Committee, reported that

ABOUT 35 PER CENT OF THE DIVIDENDS PAID BY AMERICAN CORPORATIONS GO TO ONLY 25,000 INDIVIDUALS. IT IS ESTIMATED THAT BETWEEN 60 and 70 PER CENT OF THE TOTAL GOES TO PERSONS WITH INCOMES OF $50,000 or OVER.

The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics states that the average hourly wages of workers in the industries covered by the firms mentioned increased 2 cents per hour in 1940 over December, 1939. The actual increase of wages was 4 per cent. Yet many of these corporations of death increased their profits over 100 per cent., as the tables show.

TRUMAN REPORT EFFECT

Judge Charles S. Colden suspended sentence yesterday on Harry Goldberg, of 1645 Forty-Seventh Street, Brooklyn, who had pleaded guilty of forgery in the third degree in Queens County Court, in appropriating $3250 he obtained on a check he signed as the representative of a furniture compny.

"To-day we are suffering from the shock of the terrible things that we have discovered in the report of the Senate investigating committee," said Judge Colden. "Men who were supposed to be men of great character and moral integrity and patriotism have been guilty of things displayed by that report. We find men who are gorging themselves with the wealth that is being contributed by patriotic Americans, so that they can enrich themselves like swine in the feeding trough. We read such things as one man saying that the profits of his company were so great that they needed a steam shovel to handle them.

"Until we have a firing squad to take care of people of that kind, we ought not to deal harshly with some foolish individual who has a good record and has been a pretty decent sort of a man and who has made a slip. So to-day I am going to suspend sentence upon you, Henry Goldberg, upon the understanding that henceforth you will never do anything which will cause you to be brought into court."

Goldberg fainted.

PROPAGANDA SUGGESTION

"Our Letter Box" is held over. The following letter from Comrade C. Philip Skilton, of the Fellowship of Conscientious Objectors, merits publication for its propaganda value :—

Dear Guy Aldred—You may be interested to hear that I was reading the February issue on an Underground train in London when the man sitting next to me became very interested in the "Word," engaged me in conversation and offered to buy it. I was of course glad to let him have it.

The March issue I started reading on a bus. The man on my right inquired the name of the editor, said that Socialism must come, that he had had his eyes opened when he went to India, and that he didn't trust the Labour leaders, least of all Herbert Morrison. As he supported the war, however, I thought the "Word" would do him good, so gave it to him.

In view of the obvious magnetism of the "Word," other readers might like to try their hand in vechiles and restaurants!

Yours fraternally,
C. PHILIP SKILTON.

HOW CAPITALISM ORGANISES WAR

TRUMAN REPORT AFERMATH

The following facts will enable the reader to follow easily the details of the Truman Report summarised elsewhere in this issue :—

OPM (Office of Production Management) was created in December, 1940, to co-ordinate United States' defence output. The O.P.M. superceded the NDAC (National Defence Advisory Commission), President Roosevelt's first board in charge of defence production, established in May 1940. In June of that year Donald Marr Nelson had the job of co-ordinating purchasing. On a late May Day in 1940, he was summoned to Washington from Chicago by telephone, to undertake the job of procuring airplanes. He had been called from his office in the Chicago headquarters of Sears, Roebuck & Co., where he had a private job giving him $70,000 a year. He was 54 years of age and had served previously with the NR.A. and the wages and hours administration. He took over a dollar a year desk in the Treasury Department.

SPAB (Supplies, Priorities and Allocations Board) was established in August 1941. The OPM was subordiate to this board immediately. It became known as the " Supreme Court of the American Economy." Nelson became Executive Director of SPAB and OPM Priorities Director. The SPAB was abolished by President Roosevelt on January 13, 1942, and its powers were taken over by the War Production Board, established by the President under the direct supervision of Nelson, who became United States War Production Chief. Three days later he received absolute powers. On January 21, he abolished the OPM. Since August 1941 he has been the chief administrator of United States Production and intimately concerned with the conditions denounced in the Truman Report. Until his appointment as WPB chairman, Nelson was a dollar-a-year man, and retained his annual salary of $70,000 a year from Sears, Roebuck & Co. He then gave up that salary and receives $10,000 from the State instead. Nelson has worked for Sears since he left college in 1912.

On January 21, Nelson sent a request to Senator Harry S. Truman, of Missouri, chairman of the Senate Committee investigating war production. He appeared before the Committee one week later.

Nelson told the Committee that the continued employment of dollar-a-year men was an indispensable adjunct to the war programme. Thereupon the Committee, headed by Truman, went back on its recommendation to the Senate that dollar-a-year and without-compensation men be dispensed with or put on the Government payroll.

Nelson said that the dollar-a-year men were industrialists who could not afford to give up their regular salaries. The Committee's report had " hampered " his efforts to revitalise the defence set-up. These men and their companies were " afraid to come to Washington."

Truman replied :

" If you need dollar-a-year men to win the war, this Committee feels that you should have dollar-a-year men."

The other Committee members agreed.

Nelson explained that only the very wealthy could serve the nation for $8000 a year Government pay. His one test of value was whether the man delivered on the job.

After he had finished his prepared statement in defence of the dollar-a-year man, Nelson was questioned on the high profit-returns and the failure of the O.P.M. and the S:P.A.B. to expand aluminium, magnesium, and steel production at a sufficiently rapid rate. Was the bias of the dollar-a-year man responsible? Nelson sidestepped the question that economic bias developed by a life-time of experience could not be wiped out by a salary of $8000 a year.

U.S. WAR PRODUCTION CHIEF BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

[Associated Press Wirephoto. Reproduced from U.S. newspaper reproduction.

Donald M. Nelson listens to a question, attacking the dollar-a-year men, and then insists that they be re-appointed, at a hearing granted him by the special Truman Investigation Board, Washington, on January 28, 1942.

Then why not abolish capitalism entirely and establish Socialism? Why not follow Debs instead of Wall Street?

Nelson said that " unconscionable profits on war contracts " was wrong, but both capital and labour were entitled to a " fair profit "! What is " a fair profit "? And how can labour, which sells its power to live, and dies in poverty, be said to receive any profit?

The capitalist press congratulated the Truman Committee on its fair-mindedness!

The same day Nelson announced that he had set up an organisation of seven divisions :—

PURCHASES—Douglas MacKeachie, of the Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company. Called to Washington, October, 1940. Assistant Co-ordinator purchasers, N.D.A.C. Deputy Director Purchases, O.P.M.

PRODUCTION—W. H. Harrison, of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. Dollar-a-year appointment. Arrived Washington June, 1940. Director Construction, N.D.A.C. Chief, Shipbuilding, O.P.M., January-September, 1941. Since, O.P.M. Director, Production.

MATERIALS—William L. Batt, of the S.K.F. Industries, Inc. Appointed N.D.A.C., June, 1940. Deputy Director, Production, O.P.M., January-September, 1941. Since, Director, Materials, O.P.M.

INDUSTRY OPERATIONS—J. S. Knowlson, of the Stewart-Warner Corporation. Deputy Director, Priorities, O.P.M., September 16, 1941, at Nelson's request.

LABOUR—Sidney Hillman, of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union. Associate Director-General, O.P.M.

CIVILIAN SUPPLY—Leon Henderson, economist. Formerly N.D.A.C. and O.P.M.

AUTOS. TO PLANES—Ernest C. Kanzler, auto. finance executive, formerly with the Ford Motor Company.

Early in January, 1941, the O.P.M. was boosted in the capitalist press throughout the United States. We have cuttings before us as we write. On January 4 there is a picture of an airplane, with headings about U.S. air supremacy and letterpress stating that such a plane, manufactured at such a place (names given in full) could " out-manoeuvre and out-hit " German planes. A few days later big headings told us that " O.P.M. STARTS MOVES TO AID SMALL FIRMS." All this O.P.M. boosting was exposed as so much window-dressing by the Truman report.

With Nelson's appointment as boss of America's gigantic war production, we were told his WPB chief day began at 8.30 a.m. and ended at 7.30 p.m. His callers, talks, conferences, hasty dinner were listed. For why? He and his associates were not entirely without responsibility for the conditions lamented in the Truman report. That report explains Java and the Pacific, and the growing menace of what the Kaiser termed " The Yellow Peril," Japan in command of a concentrated Orient.

Roosevelt gave more power to Nelson than Wilson gave to Bernard M. Baruch, when the latter became chairman of the War Industries Board in 1918. Baruch was in Washington the day Nelson's appointment was announced. He told the press, that, on the basis of the White House statements, the chairman of the War Production Board enjoyed powers and status which Cabinet rank would only dilute, since that would put the Cabinet members on equal terms with Nelson. Baruch concluded that the individual status was the workable one. This means that capitalism can work only through dictatorship and that the delegation of power to Nelson, the long established dollar-a-year man, is the greatest in the history of the United States.

Nelson was born in Hannibal, Mo., and studied chemistry at the University of Missouri. A professorship was his goal but he became a chemical engineer for Sears Roebuck instead. He gave up his job to become technical adviser, then manager, general manager, vice-president, and finallly chairman of the company. In 1938 he became chairman of the National Industrial Recovery Administration's Industry Committee No. 1. He worked on a Board that included Leon Henderson, Sidney Hillman, and William Knudsen. These men remained his colleagues on the NDAC., the OPM, and the SPAB. These men were attacked in the Truman Report. These men are Nelson's colleagues on the WPB.

William Knudsen was the chief target of the Truman Report. Knudsen was an unpaid member of the NDAC. He drew no salary, not even a dollar-a-year as OPM director general. The Truman Report disqualified Knudsen for a seat on the WPB. Nelson declared that he must remain. On January 19, Knudsen dined with Roosevelt at the White House. The President issued a most eulogistic statement to the press, in the course of which he said that Knudsen was accepting the post of War Department Production Director "at my request." The President said: "Bill Knudsen is one of the great production men of the world." He announced that he had made Knudsen Lieutenant-General in the army, the first civilian Lieutenant-General in United States' history, and that, as such, he would draw a base salary of $8,000 a year, plus subsistence and other allowances. Roosevelt sent the nomination to White House while Knudsen was dining with him. The Senate confirmed the nomination on January 27.

Knudsen was born in Copenhagen over forty years ago and has been in the United States since he was 21 years old. He was the son of K. P. Knudsen, a customs inspector, and was named Signius Wilhelm Poul Knudsen. By trade a bicycle mechanic, he became known as William S. Knudsen in New York. He has been unpaid adviser in Washington since 1939.

"Billions of dollars" were "allocated to the national defence programme." The Truman report showed that these funds were spent, not in the interests of patriotism, but on behalf of the big corporations, which took control through their dollar-a-year men. Nelson's "reorganisation" was an attempt to offset the public reaction to the Truman report. The big business domination of war production remains and is entrenched. A new sign—WPB—has been placed over the entrance. It is the same company, with the same bosses, and the same slogan: "Business as usual." This fact cannot be denied. Even the same old "Labour-Leader" remains—Sidney Hillman, who gave a "Labour" colour to the OPM. He remains head of the WPB "Labour Division"!

On the day that Roosevelt made Knudsen a lieutenant-general, Thurman Arnold, head of the Justice Department's anti-trust division, told the House of Representatives' Small Business Committee that the defence programme had disclosed "a great tendency of established business" to keep competition out of the defence field.

Price-ceiling regulations had developed "many types of conspiracy" to keep up prices of necessary goods, including those of which there was an ample supply.

In answer to a question by Chairman Patman, Arnold said that "monopolies, restraints of trade, and the private seizure of economic power" were the bases of unpreparedness in which the democracies found themselves at the outbreak of war.

His testimony was described as "alarming" by Representative Fitzgerald, who said that "in my opinion what we should buy is about 100 machine-guns and go out and shoot about 1000 of these guys."

Elaborating on his charge that big business has shown a tendency to try to keep out competition, Arnold cited as examples a large shipbuilding company's offer to assist a newcomer in the field prepare bid forms upon promise of payment of "5 per cent. of its earnings for ten years," and of the offer of another large company controlling vital material to allow new companies to use its patent during the war if they agreed to go out of business when the war ended.

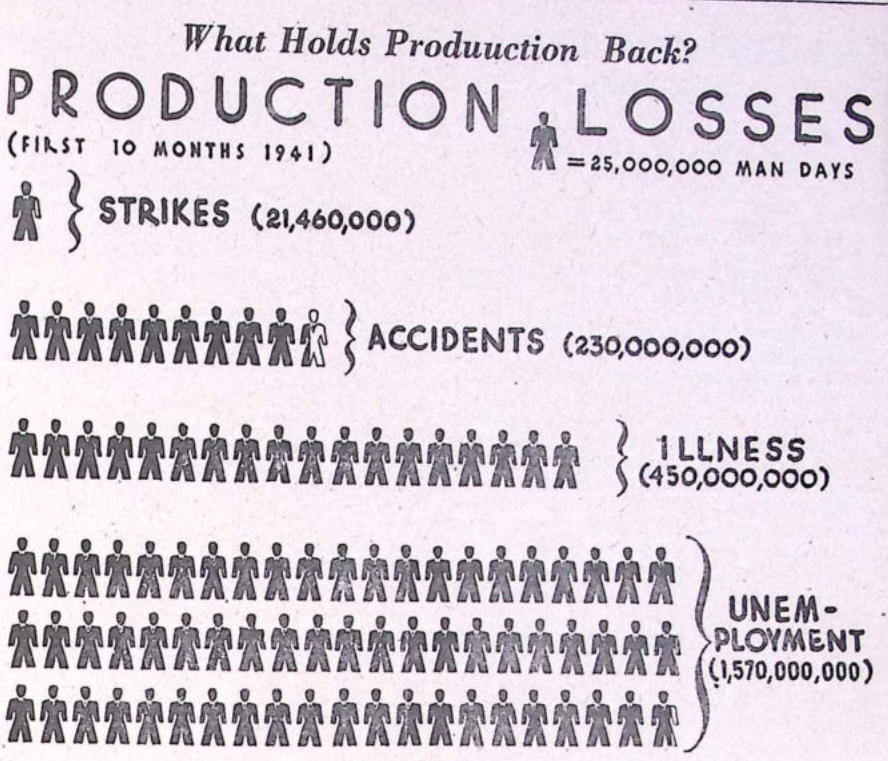
The larger companies, he commented, operate on the theory that "we must dominate after the war."

Arnold spoke of an investigation of corruption in relation to scrap iron, sulphuric acid, etc., which he promised to disclose in executive session later.

He said that there had been "a systematic effort" to retard production of synthetic rubber, but declined to expand on this at an open session.

This statement by Arnold emphasised the

What Holds Produuction Back?



This chart, from the December 1941 issue of American "Economic Outlook" shows the time lost by workers through strikes, illness, accidents and unemployment. The figures must be read in conjunction with the Truman Report, as illustrating that report.

Production has not been held back by the workers but by the profiteering executives of industry. The workers may, and OUGHT, to oppose war. They do NOT sabotage production while pretending to be patriots.

section of the Truman report describing how the copper, zinc and lead monopolies deliberately withheld increases in production because of their desire for bigger prices and hence bigger profits. This resulted in thousands of metal miners being thrown out of work and also created a criminal war-defence shortage. Yet, after exposing the vile rapacity of these capitalists, the Truman Committee meekly proceeded to urge that their demand for higher prices be granted!

The very next day the Government signed new contracts with the metal companies which increased the price of copper by 42 per cent., the price of zinc by 33 per cent.., and the price of lead by 62 per cent. for all quantities of these metals which are produced above the amount mined in 1941! This is expected to yield an additional 30 per cent. of these metals.

Is it not clear from this scandalous arrangement that the United States Government put a premium on the actions of the metal companies for the past 18 months, when they refused to produce at maximum capacity since they could make a higher rate of profit when they produced below maximum.

The figures offered by the Truman report showed tremendous profiteering on the part of the metal monopolies—the average profit of the 51 corporations increased by 30 per cent. during the first nine months of 1941 over the corresponding period of 1940. Despite this, the Government granted these corporations fantastic price increases! This is "equal sacrifice" in practice.

When the Truman report was discussed in the Senate on the day of its publication, one Senator asked a member of the investigating committee what happened to those dollar-a-year men who were responsible for this state of affairs. The reply was: "They are usually promoted."

Actually, this is what has happened.

Having agreed to the happening, on January 23, the Truman Committee was voted an additional $60,000 to continue its investigations! Senator Truman said this would serve its purposes until the end of 1942.

The Committee on Audit and Control, which proposed the amount voted, anticipated a continuance of the committee's life for the duration of the war.

Senator Lucas, the Audit Committee chairman, said:

It is absolutely indispensable that such a committee should function. I think the kind of a report which was made last week by this committee is highly pleasing to the American people. . . .

The report demonstrates inefficiency and laxity and selfishness upon the part of a great many persons who have something to do with attempting to give this country the type of national defence that is so necessary if the American way of life is to continue.

As shown in these columns, the Truman report is comprehensive and important, despite the later public cowardice of its authors in reference to the reappointment of the dollar-a-year men to public position. The report examines the procurement of such strategic metals as lead, copper, zinc, and steel; the production of airplanes, ships, armaments; the excessive cost of armament plants; the function of the dollar-a-year men; the activities of lobbyists for Government contracts, etc. It is for the workers of Britain to discuss this report and insist on its being considered in every factory and household throughout Great Britain.

As an appendix to its own report, the Truman Committee publishes a summary of the report of the Select Committee on National Expenditure of the House of Commons in Britain. This is an excellent example to adopt. Why does not some member of the House of Commons or of the House of Lords demand the official publication in Britain of the Truman report? The matter is an urgent one.

THE EDITOR'S TRIALS
IN THE DOCK

II.—GLASGOW SEDITION TRIAL, 1921

XV.—POLITICS, THE DOCK, THE BAR, AND THE BENCH.

Legal biography constitutes an important and thrilling chapter of the true history of social progress. How men rise to the bench, how they come to condemn their fellow-men, how they play at politics, and murmur platitudes, soberly pretending they are pronouncing wisdom: all this is a valuable study in the vulgar pursuit of power and fame, only that the animal frame of man might luxuriate in a little mortal comfort at the expense of the integrity of his soul, and by the pandering sacrifice of the eternal principle of justice. Verity denied for a parade of ermined fashion that mankind might live as jailed and jailors, to no true purpose and no real or lasting end. Such is the story of legal triumph and advancement from age to age. It was so in the days of Thomas Paine and Richard Carlile. It is so to-day. Nothing brings this out better than our two trials for sedition: 1909 and 1921. In this chapter we will consider the Bench and Sedition in relation to the 1921 trial.

William Campbell, Lord Skerrington, K.C., S. G., of Ayrshire, who presided at our 1921 trial at Glasgow, retired from the Bench in December 1925. He died on July 27, 1927, aged 72 years. We have wondered if he found his life satisfactory. Was it worth while living after all?

William Campbell was the first Catholic Lord of Session since the Reformation. His elevation to the position of a Senator of the College of Justice in 1908 signified the advance of Tolerance, so much progress of thought and democracy in the history of mankind.

Campbell was born in Skerrington, Ayrshire, in 1855. He was educated in Edinburgh and graduated in arts. He was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1878. He was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1898, a year after the order had been instituted. In 1905, he was raised to the Deanship of the Faculty of Advocates. Three years later he was appointed Senator of the College of Justice and a Judge of the Court of Session. In 1919, Pope Benedict XV. conferred on him a Knight Commandership of the Order of St. Gregory for his services to the cause of Catholic Education. To some of us who have studied the religious history of mankind and the teachings of the first Christians that reads more like honour for playing the part of devil's advocate, the propaganda of priestcraft and authority, rather than the promotion of education.

In legal circles, Skerrington was supposed to possess a keen and rapier-like intellect. Legal repute is earned easily and is based on appearance rather than reality. Theologians and judges enjoy reputations in their own craft circles which are not appreciated in the court of worth, and pass all understanding outside of their own narrow professional, pedantic, and actually unscholarly circles of parasitic imposture. Law ought to define human right without regard to power. The profession of law merely asserts human power without regard to right. It ought to be a science and is actually a delusion of sound. The scholarship of a judge, like the apparent learning of a theologian, is the idle pedantry of a reference library loosely linked by a very thin chain of false reasoning. With rare exceptions, and there are such exceptions, the reasoned conclusions of judges lack wisdom and understanding. Their judgements want the essential social character of depth. Sitting with the solemnity of owls, they pronounce with the zest and intelligence of parrots. Thus is humanity and poverty condemned in class society.

That was our conclusion of Skerrington, as we listened to his summing up and ruling in the Anti-Parliamentary Sedition Trial in the Glasgow High Court in 1921. His behaviour throughout the trial was courteous enough, but his summing up was neither law nor common sense. He exhibited no sense of justice nor function. He played an innings, the innings of power, and deemed the panel the other side, to be triumphed over at all costs. That his reasoning was accepted by a shopkeeper jury by a majority of fourteen to one argues nothing at all in Skerrington's favour as a judge. The verdict shows that one intelligent person, able to think for himself, had strayed into a jury box in error.

Skerrington's definition of sedition has been reproduced in the newspaper reports quoted in previous chapters. There was nothing clever nor original, nothing dynamic in it. It was static and oppressive, a definition in bar of progress and equity. Skerrington's definition confirmed the warning uttered by Professor Dicey (1835-1922), the great constitutional student of the relation between law and public opinion, as to the menace to liberty of utterance and opinion that lurks hidden in the utterly unconstitutional law of sedition.

Addressing the jury, awed by his robes, as ignorant men are awed by the robes of a priest or the mumbo jumbo of a fortune teller, Skerrington placed Parliament above the will of the people. If Parliament is an institution of democratic change, it exists by no higher divine right than the will of the democracy, which must, at all times, be supreme even unto the exercise of the critical democratic right of social revolution. What right has Parliament to withhold power from the people once the people have willed, as a democracy, to possess or to use that power? Has Parliament more divine right than a king? We think not. And if Freedom of Speech is right against the monarch, it is no less right against the parliament. It was a strange constitutional doctrine that Skerrington pronounced, that the power of the people exists only by the will of Parliament. In our democratic zeal and love of liberty, we thought that the power of Parliament existed solely and directly as a consequence of the will, and by virtue of the happiness and well-being, of the common people. We thought that the actual Commons was above the mere House of Commons. Maybe our thought was right.

Skerrington's definition of sedition was like the Advocate-Depute's prosecution: not one of law, except in name, but rather one of politics and class, one of social oppression and exploitative necessity. As Advocate-Depute, Mr. A. M. MacRobert, K.C., submitted to the jury that our proposed Shettleston programme, involving the obstructionist tactic, as well as boycotting the ballot-box, was sedition. As though the right to sit does not imply the right to abstain! As though the right to vote does not include the right not to vote; not as an apathy, but as a challenge and a declaration, an evidence of social unbelief in parliamentary careerism.

Subsequently MacRobert made an application to the High Court concerning the Productions. He urged that the Glasgow Communist Group, later the Central Group of the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation, was an illegal organisation. It was an unique attempt, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, which did not apply. It was a smuggling attempt to anticipate the present war-time emergency power legislation of irresponsible government suppression by decree. Finally, although sympathetic to him, the Court refused to entertain his application based on the assumption that Anti-Parliamentary organisation was illegal. Lord Ormadale refused to give expenses against MacRobert with great reluctance; and the then Lord Justice Clerk declared that, had he been deciding the case alone, such expenses would have been given. This attempt, therefore, to have our work and Movement prescribed as illegal failed. This story will be told in the third part of our trials, in the chapter treating of the Case of the Documents. MacRobert died in October 18, 1930, and it would be hard to term his routine career of official legal and political mediocrity a success. He fed and clothed well at the expense of his fellow man and misery was concentrated in Scottish prisons that he might enjoy the freedom of the sun. Is this success or culture?

Was MacRobert, in his proceedings against us, moved by affectionate anxiety for the principles of law; or was he concerned with a private, sectarian, and class prosecution of challenging heretical political opinion?

Formally adopted by the East Renfrewshire Unionists as their candidate on his appointment as Solicitor-General, MacRobert said he would do his best to combat Socialism, whether evolutionary or revolutionary. Thomas Johnston attacked him in the Forward, and exposed him and his party. Johnston denounced MacRobert's reactionary careerism and anti-working class policy and record. The same Thomas Johnston, on another occasion, in the Forward, exposed the Court of Session from the Lord Advocate and the Senators of the College of Justice downwards as an institution of privileged parasitism. In those days he did not expect to become Secretary of State for Scotland and a member of the Churchill Cabinet.

MacRobert, as the new Solicitor-General, presented his commission and was invited to take his seat within the Bar at the left hand of the table, on Tuesday, January 5, 1926. The same day, Mr. D. P. Fleming, K.C., then but recently Solicitor-General, and Mr. Alexander Moncrieff, K.C., were installed as Senators of the College of Justice and Lords of Session. Both are still functioning. Moncrieff was called to the Scottish Bar in 1894 but he did not take silk until 1912. Fleming was called to the Bar in 1902. And there they practised, waiting for Tory and Labour Parliamentarians to unite, whilst class society carried on undisturbed, social misery perpetuating itself the while Labour agitators turned into careerist Tory place-men with the consent of Socialist Parliamentarism and Trade Unionism.

It will be remembered that, in November 1924, Moncrieff appeared against us as counsel for the Glasgow Corporation in the war on the right of public meeting in Glasgow Green and in the public parks of Glasgow. We renewed this struggle with some success in 1931, since we conceived it to be one of the most urgent duties of the citizen to uphold fearlessly the right of public meeting. In consequence the By-Laws were changed and the right publicly accepted and legalised. No attempt was made either by the I.L.P. Councillors or the Labour Party Councillors to implement the By-Law. These men conspired to assassinate, by calculated negligence, a right established by much effort and struggle. Both factions have produced their quota of corruption, bribery being more in line with municipal "Socialism" under capitalism than zeal in the public interest. Which is why more "Socialist" Labour Leaders become magistrates instead of political prisoners. When they enter the jail it is with reluctance, not as Socialists, but as disgraced councillors or magistrates, who have modelled their careers too closely, and with unfortunate personal consequences, on that of their alleged political rivals.

Part I. of these trials, our Indian Sedition (1909) Case, appeared in "The Word" for September 1940. The 1921 Trial commenced in the September 1941 issue. Part III., recording the Case of the Documents and other consequences or surrounding incidents of the 1921 Trial, will be published in these columns soon. Then will follow our Court Martials; Hyde Park Sedition and Blasphemy Case, 1925; Irregular Marriage Trial, 1916; Birth Control Case, 1923; and our 1938 Hyde Park Case, the police court proceedings of which were reported in this paper.

BURNBANK ACTIVITY.—Special propaganda work is being conducted in Burnbank, Blantyre, Hamilton, and Motherwell by our comrades of the Burnbank Group. These comrades have carried on consistent and loyal Socialist, Anti-Militarist, and Anti-Parliamentarian propaganda for years; and during this period of crisis maintain a firm and uncompromising stand. To circulate literature widely, and to rouse discussion, despite the handicap of not holding many meetings, is a great achievement. Our comrades are centre of thought and vital revolutionary understanding in Lanarkshire.

U.S.M. MEETINGS.—Although not advertised, the Sunday meetings of the U.S.M. at 106 George Street have been attended well. They will continue during the summer months. Also the Study Circle, on Thursday. Sundays, 7.15 p.m.; Thursday, 8 p.m. Bigger meetings will be convened later.

ALL WE—

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

There are more ways than one in which sheep can go astray and more ways than one in which human beings can imitate them.

"Of course, I quite admit that war is madness and that it does not get you anywhere, but"—and then our non-pacifist friend proceeds to put forward one of the too-familiar and of necessity wholely inadequate excuses for going on with that which, on his own admission, is madness and does not get us anywhere.

Some years ago I and two friends were walking through a pasture containing a number of black-faced rams. As we passed them, two of the rams started a quarrel and began, after the manner of their kind, to back and charge at one another. A third ram immediately joined in and a few minutes later about half-a-dozen others. They formed themselves into a kind of football scrum and every now and then one of the combatants would deliver a violent butt at someone near him, upon which the injured party promptly passed it on, more often than not to a different sheep to the one that had attacked him. After indulging for a while in this free-for-all the rams stopped fighting for a few moments and galloped round in order to rope in such of their companions as hitherto had been peacefully feeding. After that they recommenced operations on an even larger scale. We were unable to wait to see how it all ended but there must have been a good many bruised ribs and lame shoulders by the finish and I am quite sure that no issue of any importance was settled.

It may be that during the course of the battle some of the rams said to themselves "Of course this is madness and will not get us anywhere—butt!" If only they had been able to stop at "anywhere" and act in conformity with the sensible ideas contained in the sentence which that word concluded, all would have been well: it was their fatal inability to withhold the following butt that kept the thing going! So with our militarist friends—must they always proceed to add that most unnecessary "but"? Surely if a thing is madness and will not get you anywhere, nothing can justify you in going on with it, and if you possess the rudiments of intelligence, you will decide to stop and try an alternative course of action, for it cannot be worse and may well be better?

THE WAY OUT.

By The Duke of Bedford.

A new pamphlet discussing the horror of war and violence and urging that reason can find a way out agreeable to liberty, justice, democracy, and commonsense. The author states his way out and invites criticism and consideration to ease the agony of mankind and to speed the new social dawn.

CAPITALISM & THE FAR EAST

By

LORD WEDGWOOD

[The following essay was published as a preface to a pamphlet issued by the I.L.P. in 1921. The pamphlet was written by George Horwill and preface by Col. J. C. Wedgwood, D.S.O., now Lord Wedgwood. To-day, Wedgwood's essay makes most interesting reading.—Ed.]

It is high time that the attention of Socialists was drawn to the "penetration of the Far East by international capitalism." This pamphlet exposes the seeds of war which are being sown there and which may bear fruit at any moment.

China, with its vast undeveloped resources of coal and metals, is being parcelled up and "developed" by the Great Powers, in accordance with the traditional attitude of West to East. The Chinese have an ancient civilisation; they still retain the philosophy of gentleness and Anarchism taught them by Lao-Tsze and Confucius five hundred years before Christ. But their philosophy is not Western philosophy; and the Great Powers have taken upon themselves the task of teaching them Western business methods.

The newly-Westernised Japan has come out of the last war with the lion's share in the East. At Versailles, in accordance with the principle of self-determination, control of Shantung was taken away from Germany and given to the Japanese, whom the Chinese have learned to hate even more than their Western exploiters. Shantung's contentment at being controlled by Japan "as a sacred trust for civilisation" is shown by an anti-Japanese boycott movement. Japan's policy is based on the well-known Prussian principles of enforcing culture at the point of the bayonet, and it is carried out with a more than Prussian thoroughness. As a civilising agent, she has already achieved wonders in the Korea. It must be remembered that while China was producing philosophers, Japan was producing jiu-jitsu and a military caste. To-day the philosopher is bottom dog.

Japan is undergoing a rapid industrial revolution. Her industrial conditions are at least as bad as those in Britain a hundred years ago, though no worse perhaps than those in the Bombay cotton mills to-day. In the chief industry in Japan, the textile industry, twelve hours a day is the rule. About seven-eighths of the textile workers are females, particularly between the ages of sixteen and twenty. These girls are usually housed in the factories; the human tools eat and sleep with the machines. The provisions of the recent factory law are eloquent of the degraded condition of the Japanese workers. Meanwhile, the Japanese capitalist has grown richer than ever as the result of three successful wars in the last generation. He finds himself with splendid markets for his goods in China and Siberia.

The growing power of Japan has attracted the envy and fear of capitalism on the other side of the Pacific. Consequently there is taking place a race for armaments between America and Japan. Japan builds twelve big ships, and America goes one better with sixteen. Canada and Australia, who fear the emigration tendencies of Japan's sixty millions, side with America. British interests favour Japan, and British diplomacy has hitherto backed Japan as the winner; but the attitude of the Dominions means that Britain must adopt a more neutral position. Another bad omen is that the big munition firms have, since the war, been going East. War between America and Japan, with peace-loving China as the prize, is at least a probability. At any rate, it will not be the fault of the international pack of financiers and concession hunters if it does not occur. The gods make mad those whom they wish to destroy!

TRIUMPH & DISASTER

AN INCIDENT OF WAR

By

JOHN TAYLOR CALDWELL

The little engine chuffed and chugged itself into motion. Its carriages jerked like smart soldiers numbering off from the right. With quickening puffs it gathered speed. Soon the last carriage was receding into the gathering shadows, and the little arm with the waving handkerchief could no longer be seen. Mrs. Golspie took her son by the hand.

"Come on, Robin," she said; "it's getting dark."

They descended the wooden stairs to the deserted country road and walked in the direction of the village. For a time the boy trotted at her side, then he disengaged his hand and went running on in front. He climbed the grassy embankment at the roadside and ran along its steep slope. He pretended that he was mounted on a big fiery horse. He clutched imaginary reins with his left hand, and beat the prancing animal's flanks with a non-existent whip. When he looked back his mother was some distance behind. He waited till she caught up on him, then he asked: "Mummy, why don't you walk up here? It's softer."

She smiled. None who saw that smile could fail to notice its wealth of affection. His lively, capering little body filled her with delight.

"Watch you don't fall," she said.

As they approached the village they came to a place where the hedge had been torn down, and the embankment flattened. This opening led into a field which had been churned into mud by the wheels of heavy lorries. In the centre of the field stood a brick building. It had sprung up during the past six weeks. Part of it was still in scaffolding; and heaps of bricks, planks, and cement showed that it was unfinished. Despite the lateness of the afternoon the field was alive with workmen, and a soldier stood guard by the torn hedgerow. A huge steam pile-driver steadily drove great posts into the ground.

Mrs. Golspie took her little son's hand as they carefully picked their steps past the muddy entrance to the field.

Before they reached the village proper they came to a row of little semi-detached houses of red brick; each had a tiny front garden. They had just been built when Mrs. Golspie, newly married, had gone to live there twenty-five years ago. In the village they were still referred to as "the new houses."

As usual, like a permanent part of the landscape, Mrs. Ferris stood outside a garden gate, talking rapidly. With a twinge of annoyance Mrs. Golspie noticed that she must pass the gossip to get to her own house. She quickened her step, hoping to get by with a smile and a reference to the lovely evening. But it was no use.

"Oh, there you are! We were beginning to think that you'd gone on the train yourself. Did they get away all right?"

Mrs. Golspie smiled and answered, "Yes."

"You know," said Mrs. Ferris, in her faintly Irish accent— and Mrs. Golspie had to stop to listen—"I think it was wise of Sarah to evacuate herself and her children. You never know, do you? They say there were invasion barges off the coast last night, and Peter says there were guns firing this morning. They're not building that place over there in the field for nothing. Peter's got a job there, you know. If I could only tell you the things he tells me—but then, of course, I daren't." She noticed Robin and paused, but only for a moment.

"Don't you think it would be better to send the boy away, Mrs. Golspie? Now that you're working all day it's too much for you, you know. And it would be much safer."

The mother looked down at her little son, and smiled.

"Robin and I are pals," she said. "We can't desert each other."

"Of course"—Mrs. Ferris felt herself being "broadminded"—"he's company, that's right enough."

The long evening was ending, and the deep mauve sky sent down a violet haze of dust. The last tip of the dying sun lay on the horizon like a far-off golden island in a sea of rippling flame. The western rim was streaked with pink and green, and the darkening continents of cloud had southern coastlines of glowing red. The hush of the sea, breaking on the rocks of the little bay made a back-ground for all the other sounds that seemed to project themselves on the still evening air. The wheeling gulls cried hoarsely. The little engine shrieked from a distant valley. A flock of birds hurried across the sky. The monotonous thud of the pile-driver could be heard from the near-by field. Robin clung to his mother's skirts, his large eyes staring dreamily on the ground.

"Yes, he is company," Mrs. Golspie agreed.

"Especially now that his father's—gone." Mrs. Ferris made a slight reverent pause before the "gone." "It's hard to be all alone. And none of us are getting any younger."

The last remark rattled the widow. At forty-seven she was at least fifteen years younger than the grey-haired gossip. She knew the observation had a bearing on her chances of ending her state of widowhood; and, as her husband had been dead less than twelve months, she felt indignant.

"It's getting late, Mrs. Ferris," she said shortly; "and Robin wants his bed."

A few minutes later when she closed the front door and stood in the tiny hall she was quite surprised to find herself still angry. Why couldn't the woman mind her own business? Not getting any younger—as if that mattered. All alone. She'd never be alone as long as she had Robin. There had really always been just two of them. During the long years before the boy had been born she and Bob had been company enough for each other. Then Robin came and claimed something from each of them. Now he had his father's share of affection as well as his own. There were still two of them.

"Mummy," complained the object of her thoughts, "I'm hungry."

Hastily she stuck her hat and coat on the hall-stand, and picked up Robin's scarf from the floor.

"Well, we'll soon fix that," she said cheerily and strode through the living-room into the kitchenette. Two minutes later the kettle was on the gas stove; and while she laid the cloth Robin, standing on his tip-toes, got the knives and spoons out of the sideboard drawer.

The table spread, she stirred the dying fire into life and sank into the armchair. She held out a hand to Robin and he came and stood beside her.

"Mummy," he said, before she had time to say anything, "when's Daddy coming home?"

She made no reply. Some day she would tell him. Just now she wanted to forget. She wanted to forget a picture of a water-logged boat, rising and falling on the long swell of the Atlantic, with a single passenger: a man with staring sightless eyes, and a swollen tongue protruding from his blackened lips. For she knew that was how they had found him.

"What will you do now, without Ronald and Jim to play with?" she asked.

"Oh, I don't care," he said. Then after a pause he asked, "Why did Ronald and Jim have to be—'vacuated?"

"Well," she began, "Ronnie's mother thinks it's not safe—" He interrupted her.

"I would like to be 'vacuated."

Somehow it shocked her to hear him say so. She put her hands on his shoulders and looked into his face.

"What!" she exclaimed, "and leave me alone?"

"Oh, no, Mummy," he hastily assured her. He struggled to her knee and laid his sleepy head against her breast. She put her arms around him and placed her cheek on his hair.

"You and I are pals," she said. "Aren't we?" He nodded assent. For a few minutes they sat quietly, then she cried suddenly: "Up, quick; the kettle's boiling."

In the west the sky darkened. The sun had gone, and bars of mauve and burning gold traversed the deepening red. The thin haze spread over the sea, and in the east dark clouds gathered. Out of the black, pewter-like water stood a rugged headland, alone and strong in the hush of the breaking waters that gathered in foam around its base. The complaining gulls still circled and swooped over the surface of the sea.

As the last gleam of reflected light died on the restless water, a gentle droning sound filled the air. Out of a wisp of low-hanging cloud a black shape appeared. It seemed to pause for a moment, like a huge hovering bird, then it vanished into another bank of cloud.

Herman Gotz was well aware of the clouds. The darkness of the night and the broken mists were ideal conditions for his work. He noted the jagged headland and increased his altitude. There was need for caution. They had told him this job was important and dangerous.

He wished it were over. Any night but this. Elsi would be sitting up to-night again. She had scarcely left Han's bedside for a week. Last night he had managed to be there too. Together they had watched his little chest rise and fall spasmodically, as he struggled for breath; and they had wiped the beads of perspiration that had kept gathering on his brow. He was their only child; and there would be no more. If he should die! The airman's lean, sad face paled, and he bit his lip as though in pain. Never! Never! That must never happen. He would get well. The doctor said the crisis would be passed to-night. Elsi would phone the airfield, and he would know as soon as he got back.

Below him he saw a little bay with a fringe of white curling foam.

Mrs. Golspie was just spreading a last slice of bread and jam for Robin when a knock sounded on the door. It was Mrs. Ferris. Peter had phoned from the office of the new building. He had forgotten his spectacles, and must get them at once. He wasn't allowed to leave the place, and there was nobody he could send. Would Mrs. Golspie please let Robin run over with them? It was very urgent.

Mrs. Golspie was very reluctant to let Robin out so late, but Mrs. Ferris really was upset; and, after all it was only a ten minute journey: a little boy could find his way across the muddy field better than an adult. With a large screened torch in one hand and the spectacles in the other, he set off.

He had been away about three minutes when the sirens went.

Mrs. Golspie rushed into the street and called after him. She began to run. A warden sprang from nowhere. She must take shelter, he said. She tried to get past him. He caught her arm. A police whistle sounded, and the warden relaxed his grip. She struggled free and ran on. When she reached the entrance to the field a soldier stopped her.

"Did you see a little boy—did you see a little boy?" she panted.

Then came a great flash, and a tremendous crash; then another; and a third; and half a dozen minor crashes joined with the greater ones. The whole earth shook. Then there was silence; except for the drone of a departing plane. But the silence was only comparative, for the air was filled with shouts and screams and the sound of men squelching through the mud. From somewhere came a swish of escaping steam, and from a great pile of refuse a tongue of flame spouted.

Mrs. Golspie tried to rise; the soldier lay heavily on top of her. She felt a dampness on her hair, and a warm stream trickled down her cheek. With an effort she rolled the man aside. Thick blood ran from his mouth. Suddenly his whole body jerked convulsively; then he lay still. Mrs. Golspie set out across the mud-churned field.

When he landed on the air-field, Gotz ignoring those who tried to speak to him, made straight for the Intelligence Room. They were delighted with his report, and his own pleasure was clouded only by thoughts of his son. He succeeded in answering all their questions without any show of irritation. At the conclusion of his report the Wing Commander grasped his hand.

"Great work," he said. "You know what this will mean for you——"

"Thanks," said Gotz. "Has there been a phone call for me?"

"A phone call? Oh, yes—you were expecting—no, there hasn't—as a matter of fact the wires are down. There's been a raid."

"What, a raid?" For a moment he hesitated; then he ran to the shed where he kept his motor cycle.

Soon he was speeding through the country road in the direction of Hapszig. As he neared the city the roads were thick with all sorts of army vehicles and relief vans.

The red glow in the sky was brightening, and sometimes a collapsing roof sent up a shower of sparks. His heart sank as he realised that the district he lived in had been the centre of attack.

As he approached his own street he felt himself go sick with apprehension. The place was littered with debris; and at one point he had to make a detour to avoid a stream of seething flame. He was held up while a whole kindergarten of small half-dressed children were hurried to safety. At last he reached his street; it was an inch thick in broken glass, and without any windows—but intact.

In the hallway his wife rushed to meet him.

"It was awful—awful," she said. "All night long."

He tried to calm her. "But you're safe," he said. "I'm glad you're safe; how is he?"

"He's going to be all right. The doctor said so; he's just left."

Gotz felt as though a heavy shadow had passed from over him. Together, he and Elsi went to the boy's room and stood looking at the little sleeping figure.

"Did the raid not disturb him?" asked Herman.

"No," said Elsi. "Even the guns didn't seem to annoy him. Once he heard a diving plane. He thought it was you. 'That's daddy,' he said."

Gently Herman bent and kissed the little brow and needlessly tucked in the bed clothes. Then he turned to Elsi. He saw the tears shining in her eyes and with a smile he kissed her too.

"Go to bed now," he said tenderly. "You're tired."

Left alone, Herman went over to the broken window. The night was almost over, and the eastern sky showed the first pale light of the approaching dawn.

A great exilaration filled his tired limbs. Hans was well, Elsi safe; and he was due for promotion and more pay.

A few minutes later sitting on the chair by his son's bed he was dozing peacefully.

Down on her knees in the mud a woman tore with her fingers at a heap of shattered bricks. Suddenly she touched a little lifeless hand.

PACIFISM IN THE CHURCH

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND SOCIETY REPORT

The Conference held in Glasgow on the 20th and 21st of February to study the relation of the Society's message to the social and economic order proved to be an important event in the life of the Society, not because of any resolution passed or decisions taken by the Conference but because of the new awareness that was aroused of the need for Christian pacifists to relate their faith to the underlying economic causes of war.

The first lecture was given by Mr. W. H. Marwick of Edinburgh who traced the origins of modern economic thought back through the nineteenth century to the Industrial Revolution. The philosophy underlying the economics of this period conveniently identified self-love with social well-being. Its weakness was its neglect of the fact of conflicting interests within the industrial order. A particular example, recognised by Marx, was that between worker and capitalist; but another was the conflict between the interests of agriculture and those of other industries, and another the divergence of interests between industry and finance. Forces in society such as the lust for power had also been underestimated.

An important feature of the mid nineteenth century was the freeing of economic life from State control, a development which never occurred in Germany. During the war of 1914-1918 however the State resumed control of economic life. The failure of Versailles was due largely to its economic inefficacy. The multiplication of political boundaries set up new economic sovereignties. The whole idea of reparations was absurd. Exchange was dislocated and the gold standard virtually destroyed.

A wave of reactionary feeling arose in the later twenties. By this time Europe was again as prosperous as in 1913 and indulged an illusionary desire to return to "the good old days." A deflation policy was launched. The workers were defeated in the General Strike of 1926. Then came the Crisis. The mechanism of international trade broke down. Dictatorships sprang up all over the world and in Britain a National Government was formed. In a crisis of plenty the discrepancy between production and consumption was eliminated by the wrong method—production, which had been enormously increased by scientific progress was artificially reduced. The Ottawa agreement was typical. The unemployment problem was solved at last by re-armament of which Germany was the most thoroughgoing example.

While the economic factors were important they must not be confused with economic motives. Men did not stir up war for personal gain. It was impossible that war could produce economic profit. It does utilise planned economy. In passing it was observed that in war the ascetic ideal of sacrifice is given an enhanced value.

Turning to current schemes of reform the speaker dismissed Right Wing proposals with little comment. On the Left were the Communists who exploit war conditions in the cause of social revolution holding that the end justifies the means. Then there is what Mr. Marwick called "the New Statesman" school of thought, to which Tawney and Laski, though not identical in outlook, both belong. This school is inclined to overestimate the regenerating power of the economic factor, assuming that a new economic order will change character and mould behaviour.

Mr. Marwick criticised the methods of the U.S.S.R. as based on force, emphasising the importance of collective Man rather than the worth of the individual, and thereby denying the sacredness of personality and trusting too much to elaborate mechanisms.

This country, said Mr. Marwick, had lost initiative and independence, and was now adopting from abroad institutions and devices which formerly we had scorned. After 1918 we had had to face seriously problems of dislocation. These would be with us again, and, unless the war were not protracted as long as seemed likely, they would be much more serious than before. Material damage would require repair. We had lost and were still losing markets, mainly to the U.S.A. Foreign investments, a very valuable source of imports, were depreciating. A lower standard of living was inevitable. Production was seriously upset by redirection to war purposes, and much compensatory production had been established abroad. We were now aware of the poverty of our internal resources. Coal, which had been the foundation of our industrial prosperity, could not be replaced.

There were, however, palliatives. Stock rearing and market gardening could be expanded. We could make good our dwindling stocks of coal by hydro-electricity. Light industries could be set up and de-urbanisation encouraged. The recent appointment of Professor Keynes to the Bank of England might indicate a movement towards an expansionist credit policy.

While planned economy is essential it must be such as to safeguard personal liberty which can best be done by decentralising power and working through voluntary co-operative groups.

In the second session of the Conference the Rev. Dr. George Macleod said it was necessary to recognise the essentially religious nature of the world crisis. It followed a familiar pattern-thesis, antithesis, synthesis. In the individual life there was first of all the simple unquestioning faith of childhood. That was followed by the sceptical adolescent stage. Those who grew up came to the stage of permanent, settled, adult conviction. On the larger scale the pre-Reformation age represented the stage of thesis. The Renaissance brought the antithesis with its spirit of rebellious adventure. It flowered in the nineteenth century, but it was the sickly flower of individualism. To-day individualism was worked out. Russia offered the thrill of a planned society, yet she had four million of her people in concentration camps. Democracy preserved a surprising measure of individual freedom, but it had no plan.

Christianity could supply the synthesis. The value of the individual, denied in Germany and Russia was declared in the sacrament of Baptism which also laid emphasis upon the community. Christians must plan how to share their daily bread. Dissatisfaction with the Church arose largely from the fact that it was still too individualist as it had been in the Victorian age.

There was a popular fallacy that Christianity and Communism had similar plans for society, the communist method being harsh and quick while the Christian method was nice and slow. The real difference between Communism and Christianity was that the Communist had formed a plan into which society had to be made to fit, whereas the Christian was in a community already made by Christ.

Dr. Macleod made a plea for more sacramental worship. The consecration of bread and wine in the sacrament was a demonstration that there was no ultimate division between the spiritual and the material. The economic, social and industrial order was all part of the world which Christ came to redeem.

In the third session of the Conference the Rev. Stewart Mechie of Edinburgh declared that the true order of values, God—man—things—money, had been inverted. Man under our present economic system lives not for the Glory of God but for the production of things. The unemployed had been described as "surplus population" because they were not required for the production of things. Things on the other hand

MISDIRECTED TALENT

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Very pathetic figures in the present-day political world are those men of the Left who, while possessing more courage, principle, and independence of mind than the majority of their fellows, have yet allowed personal ambition or a mistaken ideology to lead them to give their support to the mass-murder of war. Fearless in their criticism of the blunders of our present rulers, they demand drastic changes and greater sacrifices, not, however, for any useful or constructive purpose, but only for a bigger and better slaughter.

The task they have set themselves is a hopeless one, for they are trying to build a house of granite with materials which, to an increasing degree, must crumble in the hand the more firmly the hand attempts to grasp them.

Before these men can come prominently on the scene as leaders, the pitch will already have been badly queered by the mistakes of their predecessors and their predecessors' allies. Churchillian strategy has gone far towards losing the war. Roosevelt's ill-advised quarrelsomeness has produced in the East a new enemy, with whom neither he nor we seem able to cope successfully and graft handicaps the war-effort of his country. The Soviet's record in the matter of cruelty, tyranny, and aggression does not inspire with wild enthusiasm people whose faculty for remembering past events has not been put to sleep.

If, at a time like this, the nation is to welcome drastic changes and be willing to endure greater sacrifices, it must be united in the profound conviction that it is engaged on a great crusade and that, at the end of the crusade, dies a bright and worth-while future. That conviction is lacking in the minds of very many of our people, nor will these politicians of the Left be able to establish it. War, as the last war proved, is not a crusade but a piece of futile bestiality which defeats its own ends. Men and women are beginning to realise that the attempt to save, by war, freedom and democracy in remote parts of Europe has merely resulted in the loss of freedom and democracy in our own country, and they do not place over-much confidence in the Government's promises of a post-war restoration of those liberties which have been sacrificed in wholesale fashion.

A friend tells me that he finds that sixty per cent. of the working-class people of a poor district in London declare the war to be a "capitalist ramp" — an opinion doubtless strengthened by the fact that everywhere they keep seeing, or hearing of, graft and corruption on a scale so widespread that the authorities are often powerless to interfere.

The fact is that, war being an evil thing and the propaganda methods used to promote war being often false and evil also, the net result on the nation's character is to degrade rather than to uplift. This we can see in the increase of juvenile crime and in the racketeering that goes on throughout the economic life of the country, from black markets to Government war ministries.

The British people, like the people of other nations, are doubtless united in their desire to avoid defeat. They are not, however, in any true sense united behind the war. In many cases they merely tolerate it because, with what I can only describe as criminally short-sighted foolishness, they derive a certain amount of contentment from war jobs and war wages and fear post-war unemployment. They do not see that if only they will demand monetary reform, then, war or no war, they can always have incomes proportionate to the supply of goods which the country can produce and import; but if, by prolongation of the war, they allow the rest of our trade to be lost, it will be no use their having large incomes, for there will be little for their incomes to buy. The luxury (?) of another year or two of war-employment may therefore be bought by heedless people at all too terrible a price in future privation which even the most extreme form of Socialism or Communism would not be able to prevent by reason of the size of the population of our crowded islands which are largely dependent on imports for many of the necessaries of life.

Not only is war in general futile, but many people realise—and indeed have always realised—that the Polish issue was as rotten an excuse for war as could well have been discovered, and this feeling does not help the "crusade" spirit. They have never wanted to "die for Danzig," and the Government's vague and belated statement of war aims, dragged out of them at last in the form of the Atlantic Charter, is not encouraging and gives little promise of a brighter future. The same old gang of politicians, completely under the control of the same old gang of financiers, would never give the country prosperity, even if the physical resources for producing real wealth were still there; and as I have already pointed out, if the chance of obtaining essential imports is allowed to slip still further from our grasp, even the physical possibilities of obtaining real wealth—possibilities which were once so great—may, in their turn, vanish. This unpleasant fact I would recommend very particularly to the consideration of those Social Credit militarists who still prattle about the age of potential abundance, blind to the sinister changes in the economic situation which are being produced by the war of which they are such ardent supporters.

Some of our war-mongering independents of the Left hope to strengthen the war effort by measures restricting still further facilities for public amusement and by distributing more equally the burden of war privation. They may succeed in getting their measures passed, but only, I think, at the price of increasing discontent and diminishing still further the amount of energy which will be put into war production. They will, in fact, be likely to lose more on the swings than they are able to gain on the roundabouts, because they persist in trying to create enthusiasm for a venture in which the wise and good can put no faith and in which the selfish can no longer find profit and enjoyment.

They would therefore do well to stop flogging a moribund charger and put their money on a different animal. They may feel that peace, in these days, rides on an ass, but they should remember that the Son of God, at any rate, desired no better mount.

PONSONBY AND MOREL

Interesting Items.

The following item is culled from the Glasgow Forward for Saturday, April 20, 1918 :—

Mr. E. D. Morel Joins the I.L.P.

Last Saturday the Bradford I.L.P. had as principal guest at its Annual Reunion, Mr. E. D. Morel, in addition to Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., and Mr. Charles Roden Buxton.

On rising to deliver a short speech to a crowded audience of members of the I.L.P. and the Union of Democratic Control, Mr. Morel received a remarkable ovation, and was not allowed to speak for some minutes whilst the members indulged their need to give him round after round of cheers.

At the conclusion of his speech Mr. Morel notified his intention of joining the I.L.P., and he has now selected the Bradford Branch and handed in his membership.

The Labour Leader for December 19, 1918, published an account of Arthur, now Lord Ponsonby's joining the Dunfermline branch of the I.L.P. :—

Mr. A. Ponsonby Joins the I.L.P.

On Sunday, December 15, at a meeting of the Dunfermline Branch of the Independent Labour Party, Mr. J. Mitchell presiding, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby was enrolled as a member. Mr. Ponsonby said it was a very natural step for him to take, as he had been constantly working in conjunction with members of the party for some years past, both inside and outside the House of Commons. His reasons for not taking the step sooner were that the Labour Party was till recently part of the Coalition Government, and that even after it had withdrawn he was most anxious to test the opinion of the constituency at the election solely on his policy and principles, and did not want to adopt what might have been interpreted as an electoral device for inducing members of the Labour Party to vote for him merely because he was a Labour candidate. We can assure Mr. Ponsonby of his hearty welcome into the I.L.P.

existed for the accumulation of money. "A favourable balance of trade" meant an excess of exports over imports, an impoverishment of ourselves in return for a money, or credit, income. Food had been destroyed while people went hungry for "food is not stuff to feed, but stuff to sell." The Christian purpose must be to put God first and to put money back in its place.

Mr. Mechie advocated economic reconstruction by means of monetary reform. He was followed by Mr. A. B. Mackay who advocated economic reconstruction by means of a planned economy. The exploitation of man, he said, started before money became a god, and the solution cannot therefore be found simply through reform of the use of money. The trouble is that our distribution is planned for an age of poverty, while we have passed into an age of plenty. The competitive system reduces buying power by keeping wages low, while the owning class is accumulating wealth which ceases to be purchasing power, for the millionaire has not needs enough to use his wealth. A million pounds actually distributed among a million people would actually increase buying power, but concentrated in the hands of one person only a small part of it is used as purchasing power. The rest has to be used otherwise, chiefly in investment to produce more goods for which there will be no effective demand because of the absence of purchasing power.

The competitive system in danger of collapse has had recourse to palliatives, chiefly the arms traffic. The real solution lay in planning. If we can plan for war why not for peace? Money should be equated to producing power, and distribution planned according to needs.

At the closing session, Professor G. H. C. Macgregor gave a summary of the foregoing lectures and the Conference proceeded to group discussion.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD and "THE WORD"

House of Lords Discussion Reviewed

An Open Letter to

THE RT. HON. VISCOUNT SIMON
LORD CHANCELLOR OF GREAT BRITAIN

Requesting to be heard at the Bar of the House of Lords in Defence of the Truth

My Lord,

Following upon the question that was initiated in the House of Lords on Thursday, 26th March, last, by Lord Nathan, on the question of

FREEDOM OF PRESS

I venture to address a public letter of complaint to you, alleging that:

(1) A member of your House who participated in that debate was guilty of an abuse of function whereby grave injustice was done to me as a citizen of these realms.

(2) Another member of your House, reporting the remarks of the said member in the columns of the press, aggravated the misdemeanour.

(3) Where the remarks of said member were reported soberly and without comment in the press, they broadcasted as fact that which was untrue, and that which must have been known to be untrue by the spokesman in question.

(4) The statement, having been made in the House of Lords, encouraged the established but irresponsible press to comment and enlarge upon that which was not true as though it were true.

Whereby a grave injustice has been done to me as a citizen. I ask that reparation shall be made for that injustice.

The member of whom I complain in the first instance is Lord Vansittart of Denham.

VANSITTART INDICTS "THE WORD"

My Lord, I draw your attention to the House of Lords Official Report, vol. 122, No. 39, Thursday, 26th March 1942, columns 499-500. Lord Vansittart's speech is being reported. He says:

In the March issue of the Duke of Bedford's organ—I am using too sonorous an expression—"The Word," there is an article which goes far beyond anything attributed to the "Daily Mirror." On page 89, your Lordships will find an article, etc.

Lord Vansittart's summary of the article is unfair and is of no consequence. He makes the Duke of Bedford make a reference to the Prime Minister, as being his own opinion, whereas the Duke is quoting another person's view. It may be said that this is but the Duke's method of approach. Even so, if one is quoting a declaration for the purpose of censure, one ought to quote scrupulously and exactly. Any departure ought to be on the side of allowance and generous understanding. Such an approach but strengthens the condemnation. Lord Vansittart preferred to secure his condemnation by enhancing the complexion of the facts.

After suggesting that the Duke of Bedford "is perhaps concerned to defend himself from such a charge" as that of possessing a low intelligence, Lord Vansittart adds: "But I am afraid that charity is not one of His Grace's long suits."

Which is charming.

Vansittart complains next about the Duke of Bedford's views as to the continued success or otherwise of the struggle in Russia, and his references to graft and corruption in the United States. The Russian view is but an opinion. It is one to be considered, without alarm or despondency, but as a matter for discussion. The question of American graft is one of fact, calling for most serious discussion, without heat or partisanship, but as a matter of cold fact and enquiry.

THE WIDOW OF HOVE

Lord Vansittart refers to the case of the Hove widow who, on March 23, "very properly received one month's imprisonment for saying precisely that about Russia" that the Duke said.

Very properly! As a matter of fact, the sentence was an outrage. What did it matter what a widow of 63 years of age said to two officers in a cafe! Do we not ridicule this carry-on in Germany and Italy? Have we not ridiculed it in Russia? Why tolerate it here?

The widow was expressing a private opinion that may not even have been an opinion. Her expression may have been thoughtless. But it did no harm and carried no weight. The woman may have been worried and tired. The sentence was cruel and stupid. The report of the prosecution and sentence did all the harm that the original offence failed to achieve. The prosecution and sentence broadcasted as something urgent, a careless utterance, probably made, as stated above, under strain. Who is not living under strain these days? The prosecution gave that statement a grave and sober setting and suggested that the country was alarmed whereas no one was alarmed, not even the magistrates responsible.

The Bench was irritated, shocked and disturbed. It exercised its pompous brief authority most unwisely. If the casual remark uttered by an old woman, wearied of her daily round, could disturb the magistracy, it must be wanting in the courage and audacity possessed by our forefathers.

Lord Vansittart comments:

. . . and it goes without saying that there is not one law for a widow and another for a Duke.

Naturally the Duke is free and the widow ought to be free. But Vansittart does not want the Duke of Bedford prosecuted before his peers. Vansittart wants the Duke interned without prosecution. Which is not the same law for the widow as for the Duke!

MISQUOTING THE DUKE

Lord Vansittart then "quotes" the following sentence from the Duke of Bedford's article:

"We shall have to overcome our objection to trusting Hitler and accept him as a feature of the post-war world."

My Lord, that sentence is not to be found in the Duke of Bedford's article on page 89 of The Word for March 1942. It is not to be found in any other part of the paper. Lord Vansittart has omitted an adverb and has altered the verb. He has torn a sentence from its context and has made the Duke of Bedford utter as prophetic fact, that Hitler must survive the war, whereas in the original the Duke of Bedford is arguing that democracies and dictatorships may have to exist side by side. An entirely different sentiment. On the ground of this travesty, your House was asked to consider the suppression of The Word. The author of this travesty lectured your House on the responsibility of the Duke of Bedford!

Having misquoted so ably, and with obvious deliberation, Lord Vansittart continues:

One cannot measure sin by circulation. The Home Secretary once said that he had his eye on the Duke. Why has he taken it off? Is it on the ground that the Duke has never grown up? And I think there is some justification for that view, because this same issue begins with a parody of "Onward Christian Soldiers," a piece of grubby doggerel that any third-form boy would disown, but which His Grace proudly signs. But in any case that line will not do, because if the Duke is dismissed on those lines why does he get paper? On the other hand, if he is to be ranked as a witting advocate of Hitler, why has he not been suppressed long ago?

I pause, my Lord, to consider the reference to "grubby doggerel." His Grace of Bedford is a member of your House and can make his own comment or explanation in due course. It is not my function to defend his thought or writing. Yet I cannot resist the temptation to comment. Venomous Vansittart incites comment even if he fails to inspire thought.

To parody "Onward Christian Soldiers" may be in good taste or in bad. That is a matter for discussion. I am an Atheist and would not like to decide. The Duke of Bedford is a Christian and can understand the Christian reaction much better than I will be expected to do. Since the original hymn is written in doggerel, the parody must be doggerel. The parody, to be a parody, must be as "grubby" as the original. Vansittart's comment of animus is absurd. The offence is committed not by the parodist but by his critic. The original hymn ought not to have been written in "grubby doggerel"!

PAPER RATION SUGGESTION

I pass now to Lord Vansittart's most honourable suggestion that the Duke of Bedford ought not to get paper. But the Duke of Bedford is not a printer. He is not a publisher. He is not an editor. He is not the proprietor of a paper. So far as I know he does not get paper. To whom then is Lord Vansittart referring. The reference is to The Word. Since I am the editor, publisher, and proprietor of The Word, the reference is to me. Then why not say so and why not state the charge against me? Why this underhand approach of bias and mean persecution?

When addressing your House, Lord Vansittart referred to the actual page of the March issue on which the Duke of Bedford's article appeared. Page 89. The Duke's essay does not take up the full page. It occupies less than a page of a 12 paged paper, that carries no advertisements. The alleged offending article was one of twelve articles. True, Lord Vansittart summarises two or three part paragraphs of that article, without venturing to give its purport. He "quotes," however, but one short sentence—a sentence that, as worded in the alleged quotation, is not to be found in the original. The discrepancy is calculated and not accidental as is proven by the effect of the change.

Lord Vansittart described The Word as the Duke's paper. He emphasised this description by asking the Ministry of Supply to stop paper supplies—an unconstitutional and illegitimate use of the principle of rationing. He gives force to the suggestion that The Word is the Duke of Bedford's paper, edited as well as owned by him, by drawing special attention to the fact that "His grace proudly signs" the parody. Why should the Duke of Bedford not sign it if he wrote it? It is not a question of pride. Nor of modesty. It is a question of truth. The Duke of Bedford wrote the parody. The Duke of Bedford signed the parody. To suggest that he ought not to have done so is to suggest that he was in a position to publish unsigned matter in the paper. In other words, the suggestion impressed on the House was that the Duke of Bedford was and is the editor, publisher, and owner of The Word. If Lord Vansittart had seen The Word, as his speech implies, he knew that that suggestion was false.

From its very first issue, The Word has carried at the top of its front page the same statement as to editorship, responsibility, and unsigned matter, as appears on the front page of the present issue. A similar statement appeared at the head of my previous papers: The Council, The Commune, The New Spur, The Spur, and The Herald of Revolt. This takes us right back to 1910, which is a very long time before I became associated with the present Duke of Bedford. Even The Word was being published before I met the Duke of Bedford. Nothing in our association has changed the status of The Word. As many members of both Houses of Parliament know, and some of them have been intimate with me for years, The Word is edited, owned, and controlled by me.

Elsewhere I have remarked that contact with the Duke of Bedford has convinced me of his honour and integrity. I have great respect for his sincerity and ability. I avow that respect merely because it is the custom to abuse him. My sympathies are with heresy. The English blood in my veins moves me in that direction. Attribute the fact to my Puritan and Freethought ancestors. I would have no objection to editing a paper under the ownership of the Duke of Bedford. If I did so, the fact would be declared. In matters of publishing I believe in clear, responsible avowal and declaration. I do not believe in conspiracy and concealment.

Lord Vansittart represents The Word as an organ edited and controlled by the Duke of Bedford, and, therefore, an organ given to the defence and eulogy of Hitlerism. Yet the issue quoted contained an essay from the pen of the Rt. Hon. F. W. Jowett, formerly a Cabinet Minister, a man noted for his long service to the workers of Britain, and one whom no one will accuse of being pro-Hitler. Jowett is probably the outstanding Socialist and democrat in Great Britain to-day, a veteran in the Labour struggle. Another article, from the pen of Rudolf Rocker, defended the British Empire and defined its place in social progress. It was translated specially from the Spanish for The Word by a comrade who had served in Spain in the struggle against Franco and Fascism.

True, there is another article—sober and mild—replying to Rocker. But the reply is not a defence of Fascism. The reply indicts Fascism equally with Imperialism. The reply is unsigned, because its arrangement is by me. This is in accordance with the declaration on the front page.

If I wished to condemn a paper I would find out all about it. If that paper had been running for some time, I would not judge its tone and style by one issue. If Lord Vansittart had acted in this way what would he have discovered?

He would have discovered critical, but not positively unfriendly references to Lord Wedgwood, who is a militarist as well as a libertarian, an enthusiastic enemy of Fascism, a man who was opposing Fascism when Vansittart was dining with the "butcher-bird." In January, The Word published a speech made by Lord Snell, who supports the Government. That speech was published by permission of the author. Likewise, we have reproduced regularly in these columns speeches and articles by A. Creech Jones, M.P., one of the few really able and sincere men who support, somewhat critically, the Government in the House of Commons. I admire the integrity of Creech Jones and I publish his articles on that account. For the same reason, I publish the Duke of Bedford's essays. It cannot be said that I endorse, at the same time, the views of the Duke of Bedford, Lord Snell, Lord Wedgwood and A. Creech Jones, M.P. I do not worry whether I share their views or otherwise. I simply say to myself: Is this a truthful man? Does he write sincerely? Has he a message? Will his views bear discussion and help mankind? If the reply is "Yes," I publish the article. I am not a censor but a defender and advocate of freedom of speech, thought, and writing. My ancestors stood for such freedom. So do I! That fact may leave me open to prosecution. Such treatment I have experienced. It ought to protect me against misrepresentation and abuse such as that of which I complain. For protection against such abuse, committed in your House, under your presidency, I turn to you, my Lord. I once respected and defended you for your loyalty to conscience. I would not like to think that I addressed myself to you in vain.

VANSITTART AND HITLER

Lord Vansittart accuses the Duke of Bedford of giving comfort in The Word to Goebbels. It is doubtful if any man has helped Goebbels so much as Lord Vansittart, the ex-Chief Diplomatic Adviser to the Foreign Office, who now poses as the fiercest Anti-German that the war has produced. It is a pity that Ward Price, of the Daily Mail, did not take a photograph of the Vansittarts at the Hitler dinner, which he describes in his book "I Know These Dictators." Such a photograph would have made an excellent illustration for this article of protest. Let it be remembered that the Duke of Bedford never attended a Hitler dinner.

In February last, Lord Vansittart delivered a speech to the Never Again Association at Grosvenor House, London. The speech was reported widely in the British Press. Berlin promptly broadcasted extracts. Goebbels felt that this kind of propaganda would stiffen German morale. Dr. Goebbles did to Vansittart's speech exactly what Vansittart did to Bedford's article. He extracted a sentence and took liberties with the text. Vansittart advocated "the complete destruction of the German Army." Goebbels propaganda machine broadcasted to the listening Germans the statement that Vansittart had talked about "a complete occupation of Germany after the war and the complete destruction of Germany."

The Black Record, Lord Vansittart's much boosted Anti-German propaganda pamphlet has had a huge circulation in Britain and the United States. Lord Kemsley's Sunday Times advocated its reactionary news with fervour.

Commander Stephen King-Hall, M.P., in his News Letter said of Lord Vansittart:

"Sir Robert Vansittart produces a pamphlet which is calculated to do everything possible to weld the German people into a homogeneous mass of Nazis!

"It is also calculated to cause all those Germans who are active or potentially active opponents of the Nazis to despair. One man will be glad. His name is Dr. Goebbels. No need for him to exclaim: 'Would that mine adversary had written a book.' Sir Robert has written Goebbels' book for him and it will be surprising if it is not at once translated into German and given away to every German with the compliments of the Fuhrer and without comment."

Backed up by such papers as the Sunday Times, this man claims the right to misrepresent The Word and the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords. Here are five quotations from Sunday Times, the paper that slandered the Duke of Bedford, in an editorial, demanded his internment, and then refuses to publish his reply of fact, on the ground that he was friendly to Hitler:

"Herr Hitler is an honest man—a very honest man."

—June 25th, 1933.

"Herr Hitler in particular deserves congratulations on this agreement with Austria, and we are not disposed to look behind and around to find hidden and sinister motives."

—July 12th, 1936.

"He (Hitler) is not arrogant."

—Feb. 13th, 1938.

"Herr Ribbentrop has won the liking and respect of everybody who has met him and, better still, he has won the liking of the great public."

—August 16th, 1936.

"To deny all sincerity to Hitler and to represent him to the ruthless enemy of the causes that he professes to believe in is natural and easy, but not perhaps entirely just, judgment.'

—March 19th, 1939.

VANSITTART AND RUSSIA

In his speech attacking The Word, Lord Vansittart denounced any utterance that might suggest that all was not well with Russia. What hypocrisy! Lord Vansittart was Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 1930-38; and Chief Diplomatic Adviser to the Foreign Secretary, 1938-41. That is to say he played his part in Foreign Affairs, a not unimportant part, at a time when the British Government was assisting Finland to defend the Mannerheim Line against Soviet Russia. The Russia-Finnish War was a tragedy in which the British Foreign Office played an important part. When Soviet Russia became Britain's ally, the Finnish armies attacked Leningrad with planes, guns, hand grenades and bombs manufactured in Britain. Premier Neville Chamberlain read out the list of supplies sent to Finland, in the House of Commons, on March 19, 1940, when defending himself against the Anti-Socialist critics who accused the Government of not sending enough aid to Finland.

Aeroplanes—101.
Guns of all kinds—114.
Shells—185,000
Vickers Guns—100.
Marine Mines—400.
Hand-grenades—50,000.
Aircraft Bombs—15,700.
Signalling Equipment—800.
Anti-Tank Rifles.
Respirators—60,000.
Greatcoats—100,000.
Battle Dress Suits—100,000.
Anti-Tank Mines—10,000.
Ambulances—48.

So that in the Battle of Leningrad many mines and tanks on both sides came from Britain.

Mr. Chamberlain proceeded to tell the House about the plans made by the Supreme War Council on February 5, 1940, to send an Expeditionary Force to aid the Finns against Russia. Vansittart was the Chief Diplomatic Adviser to the Foreign Secretary during that period!

VANSITTART AND LAVAL

In Forward, for January 8, 1938, the late L. MacNeill Weir, M.P., wrote an open letter to Anthony Eden, in which he describes the part played by Vansittart in Foreign Affairs:

From 1931-1935 the late Ramsay MacDonald insisted on sharing whatever publicity was going with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The MacDonald-Simon comic combination had disastrous results.

When Sir Samuel Hoare became Foreign Secretary in mid-summer, 1935, you were associated with him as a Cabinet Minister without portfolio to deal with League of Nations' affairs. . . . I have always thought that to describe the treacherous betrayal that followed as the Hoare-Laval scandal does not do justice nor fairness to the present Home Secretary. . . . It should rightly be called the Vansittart plan, for it was the joint product of the permanent officials of Downing Street and Quai d'Orsay.

It is hard to conceive of anything more discreditable than your replies to questions in the House on Spain. Your interpetation of the phrase "Both Sides" in every answer on intervention in Spain was always eagerly awaited. It became the joke of the day.

It has always appeared to me as particularly discreditable that you should have made yourself the champion of what was to the eyes of all the world a shameful fraud—the Non-Intervention Committee. . . .

But you have not done enough. Sir Robert Vansittart takes up your executive duties. I see it is said that he is to have direct access to the Prime Minister. . . .

Now I happen to know Sir Robert Vansittart. . . . I believe his being in control of foreign affairs at this time is calamity. . . .

Sir Robert Vansittart's policy was at first a close association with Mussolini in the hope of drawing Italy away from Germany.

Now his policy is the same as the Prime Minister's. . . . Now the policy is Western European Pact, the overthrow of the Popular Front Government of France and an end to the Franco-Soviet Pact.

Nor is it possible to conceal any longer the shameful policy of the Government with regard to China. There is no doubt that the Government is more hopeful of advantage from a victorious Japan than of any gain from an unconquered China.

Any question of Justice or national honour simply does not emerge.

This was the considered opinion of L. MacNeill Weir, for so long private secretary to the late Ramsay MacDonald, when the latter was Prime Minister. It was published in the columns of the Forward, when that journal was edited by the present Secretary of State for Scotland. It must be presumed to be a responsible opinion. It is factual and indicts the Fascist alliances and tendencies of Lord Vansittart, the very alliances and tendencies that made European and World War inevitable and have taken, therefore, such a toll of poor, oppressed humanity.

ARMED JAPAN

Lord Vansittart made a false statement as to the ownership and editorship of The Word. He made a false quotation from the Duke of Bedford's article. He demanded that no paper be supplied on the strength of that quotation. This ruthless present-day enemy of the Fascist powers was responsible for the policy that sent arms against Leningrad and gave arms to Japan against China, our present ally.

Japan, my Lord, would never have been able to capture Malaya or Singapore or to have sunk the "Prince of Wales" or the "Repulse" but for the policy of Lord Vansittart. He has attacked the Duke of Bedford for attacking American graft. The Truman Report is the Duke of Bedford's official answer. Pearl Harbour could not have been attacked if the U.S.A. had not supplied war materials to Japan. Singapore would not have fallen if Britain had not supplied war materials to Japan. The press and the statesmen who upheld these supplies being sent denounce The Word. We were opposed to arming Finland and Japan.

My Lord, consider the figures. In 1939, Japan imported 70.9 per cent of aluminium for aeroplanes, from the British Empire and 7.29 per cent. from the U.S.A. and 92.19 per cent. of her copper from U.S.A. and 7.5 per cent. from the British Empire. Of the iron and steel scrap which supplied the guns which were used against Singapore 91.01 per cent. came from U.S.A. and 6.2 per cent from the British Empire.

Lord Vansittart's policy armed the enemy.

PRESS REPORTS

In the press reports that I have seen Lord Vansittart's speech is reported fairly and without comment in the following journals: Times; Daily Telegraph; Daily Express; Daily Sketch; all of London; Manchester Guardian; Yorkshire Evening Post, Leeds; Scotsman, Edinburgh; Glasgow Herald; The Belfast News Letter. All refer to The Word as the Duke of Bedford's organ and some state that "Lord Vansittart launched an attack," etc.

The Eastern Daily Press, Norwich, heads the reference to The Word: "CASE OF THE DUKE OF BEDFORD."

The Wolverhampton Express carried the ominous and suggestive sub-heading: "WIDOW SENTENCED."

The Nottingham Guardian has the sub-heading: "WIDOW AND DUKE."

The Belfast News-Letter carried these headings:—

HOUSE OF LORDS
Reference to Duke of Bedford's Paper

The Glasgow Herald heads its report: "DUKE'S PUBLICATION," meaning The Word.

The Nottingham Journal reported the debate beneath the heading:—

LORD VANSITTART AND DUKE OF BEDFORD

The Western Mail, Cardiff, March 27, carries a two column heading: "LAW FOR WIDOW AND DUKE—VANSITTART."

The Newcastle Daily Journal, for the same date, states:—

DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PAPER ATTACKED

The Sheffield Telegraph has a sub-heading: "DUKE'S NEWSPAPER."

The West Lancashire Evening Gazette, Blackpool, for March 27, devotes a leading article to the debate, from which I excerpt:—

THAT MAN AGAIN

We commend once more the words of Lord Vansittart in the House of Lords respecting the Duke of Bedford, who is still at large to write pernicious nonsense.

In the March issue of the Duke's organ, "The Word," the Duke (according to Lord Vansittart) has the effrontery to call the Prime Minister a "grave-digger." . . .

If Mr. Morrison gets tough with the virile "Daily Mirror," he should not be tender with the Bedfordian "Word."

But the worse offender in the press was the Marquess of Donegall, who sits in the House of Lords as Baron Fisherwick.

The reader of these paragraphs will conclude that the Marquis of Donegall has read The Word, whereas he is serving up second-hand Lord Vansittart's assertions.

Under the heading "Trust Hitler?" he "requotes" Vansittart's Hitler and the future "quotation" which does not appear in the Duke of Bedford's article: and quotes it as though the article is really in front of him.

He passes on to the "Widow's Case" and gives it a special sub-heading. He concludes, repeating without acknowledgment Lord Vansittart's request for withdrawing paper supplies:—

Personally, I think that because he is a duke it is all the more reason to lock him up. It is his job to set an example.

Anyway, if the Government is chary, for one reason or another, of locking him up, it might at least take away his paper ration.

Since The Marquess of Donegall is, equally with Lord Vansittart, a member of your House, I ask to be heard at the bar of the House to protest against such grave abuse and misrepresentation.

I am aware that speeches in the House of Lords are privileged. But that ought not to be screen for irresponsible declamation. Does privilege means licence?

I have the honour to be, my Lord, your fellow citizen.

CIVIL LIBERTIES IN THE COLONIES

By

A. CREECH JONES, M.P.

(Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of Labour; Chairman, Fabian Colonial Bureau.)

[Reproduced from 1935 Election Address.

[This important essay from the pen of our comrade was published in "Civil Liberty," the quarterly journal of the National Council for Civil Liberties, for Spring 1938. As our readers know, no one has asserted more strenuously the right of civil liberty in the Colonies than Creech Jones. Our columns have not done justice to his splendid stand but we hope to make amends at an early date. This essay makes better reading to-day than it did in 1938 and vindicates the soundness of the reasoning advanced by Creech Jones—Ed.]

Enshrined in the declarations of British Colonial policy are great liberal principles. The Colonies have been acquired in different ways for different purposes, and policy has been in the main empirical, determined less by liberating ideas than by the purposes of the settlers and the possibilities of the exploitation of native and natural resources. To these motives the native people have had to bend.

AUTOCRACY OR DEMOCRACY?

The Colonial Empire is extraordinarily complex. There are nearly 60 million people in forty non-self-governing colonies, protectorates, and mandated territories. Local circumstances are a vital consideration in discussing the degree of personal liberty and social responsibility in the respective territories.

At the one extreme, the native systems of Government have been replaced by autocratic control — benevolent autocracy — under the Governor. Higher in the scale of development are the bureaucracies in which devices have been adopted for obtaining the views of merchants, planters, investors, capitalists, and other interests in the Executive or Legislative Councils set up to assist the Governors. Sometimes these tend to become qualified autonomies in which increasing powers are delegated to purely native governing bodies. But in most Colonies, the Secretary of State for the Colonies retains the power to override legislatures by Order in Council. In the Gold Coast, for instance, the natives take some limited part in the Legislative and Executive Councils, while in Nigeria and Uganda native parliaments for peoples numbering millions have considerable powers for regulating native affairs. Sometimes, as in the Sudan, civil administration is carried out through native sheiks and chiefs administrating tribal law according to tribal custom.

TRUSTEESHIP.

The principles of British colonial policy are based on the great liberal tradition. How they have actually been interpreted and applied is another matter. As far back as 1833 we declared in the South Africa Charter "there shall be no discrimination on account of colour and race," and when, subsequently, we granted the demands of the white colonists for self-government we retained in London powers of reservation and disallowance in respect to discriminatory legislation. It is true that in the Union of South Africa the Statute of Westminster has obliterated these powers, and London has had to watch the destruction of the Cape native franchise and see a mass of repressive legislation enacted against the black people, but in the case of Southern Rhodesia such powers still exist and will continue until Rhodesia's demand for Dominion status is recognised. Then she will be free to enact what is already her social habit, discrimination.

In the liberal tradition also we have declared for the paramountcy of native interest: "if and when native interest and the interests of the immigrant races should conflict, the former should prevail." We have described ourselves as trustees and subscribed to the principles of the Mandates of the League: "the material and moral well-being, the social progress, respect of the rights and safeguarding of the interests of these native societies form a sacred trust of civilisation."

INDIRECT RULE.

In some of our colonies, under the influence of Lord Lugard, government through native institutions has been made a working principle. This is usually known as Indirect Rule and, at its best, it is based on an understanding and wise use of the capacity of deliberation and self-government which exists in the natives concerned. Mr. Ormsby-Gore said a few months ago that its object was "to give Africans a real share in their own government and to train them in the art and practice of civilised administration." But the administrative and practical difficulties of applying the principles of Indirect Rule are enormous. Different cultures are in contact. In this connection, Lugard recently said that in the administration of justice "we continue to apply rules of evidence and judicial formalities which, to the bulk of the African population, are wholly mysterious and meaningless, and to the sophisticated offer opportunity for malpractice."

Indirect rule as inspired by some administrators spells repression and stagnation; obviously it can prove rigid, conservative, and inflexible before the new forces at work on native society. What needs to be emphasised is that in view of the rapid changes going on in the world, indirect rule must imply patient and slow adjustment to western conceptions because, sooner or later, the native people have to be made at home in a capitalist and imperialist world.

But it is none the less true that in certain colonies, where the settled European population is negigible, substantial progress in the policy of Indirect Rule can be recorded, chiefly because the interests of the European merchant are not antagonistic at present to native political evolution. But where a local population of white investors desires to exploit native labour or to establish its own considerable farms, native development is not encouraged and efforts are made to obtain for the white people major control in the Government. The paramountcy of native interests is then subject to great strain, and justification is sought in a new theory of the dual mandate as if the rights of native and immigrant populations can be readily reconciled. But it should be said that there is a marked difference in policy as between West and East Africa.

THE NATIVE PROLETARIAT.

Already in Africa there is growing in size a native proletariat without land or tools and seeking to sell its labour power. It is estimated that there are one and a half million natives engaged in mining, in industries, and away from their own villages partly because of their poverty, their inability to pay taxes or to work their land profitably, or to find a place in the reserves. The old tribal customs are undermined: the old authority of the chiefs passes; the old social organisation no longer fits nor can be made to apply to the new conditions. It is in these circumstances that many of the restrictive regulations on movement, trade, activity, and ownership have been made and colour bars imposed. There is little industrial protection for the natives, and punishments of varying severity can be imposed. As to the right of combination, for industrial or political purposes, except in a few colonies, there has been increasing restriction. In Kenya and Southern Rhodesia any assembly or gathering together of the natives may be summarily dispersed or prohibited, and this is used to prevent the ventilation of grievances or the organising of industrial union. Combination among natives exposes them to legal penalties, and no strike can be organised without similar penalties.

It must be recognised, therefore, that new forces are operating among the native people and western influences are disturbing most of them in a profound way. The factors I have mentioned have a deep significance in respect to the status and responsibilities of the native, and, as someone recently remarked, it is not now in fact an adjustment in native social development between communism and individualism that is actually going on but a conflict as between increasing slavery and increasing freedom. Restriction of land, crowding of natives out of reserves, setting them wandering to sell their labour power, imposition of taxes in their extreme poverty are among the factors produced by white settlement and industrialism, which make for their servitude.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION.

In British colonies undoubtedly the liberal principles in law may be observed in the courts, but there is a widespread belief among many white people that discrimination and segregation are sound principles. The colour bar is even stronger among white labour than among the professions. Segregation is aimed at in colonies like Kenya and Southern Rhodesia, Kenya continues to destroy the right of natives to their ancestral lands in the European Highlands, though an Italian or Portuguese may be free to buy land and settle. It is assumed that the black man (whether as an individual or as a group) is unequal or inferior or less civilised or less intelligent or less capable or less disciplined than the meanest of white men. In any case, the white settler is often in a superior and privileged position in the colony, and his economic position and resources, his powers of control and planning give him authority which magnifies his position in relation to the native.

Great Britain ratified the Slavery Convention of 1926 and in 1930 the Convention of Forced Labour, but in certain parts of the Empire we will have some way to go before we can feel content that every native is a free man, that there is no slavery, no forced labour, and no pressure on him to work for settlers. Among the natives themselves in Bechuanaland there is still servitude of one tribe to another; forced labour is still resorted to on occasion in one or other of our African colonies, and contract labour still calls for more careful regulation in the mines of Rhodesia, while native servitude with penal sanctions in Kenya should long have passed out of the code of colonial administration.

"EQUAL RIGHTS."

The conflict of principles in Colonial policy in Africa is well illustrated in Southern Rhodesia, where the white population to-day are demanding the fullest control of the government of that territory without the possibility of legislation of a discriminatory character being referred to Great Britain.

Discrimination is already abundantly manifest in the general policy of segregation which is typified in the land laws, trade restrictions, mining rights discrimination and pass laws already operating in the colony. But before the law black and white man both possess equal common rights in citizenship and franchise. Theoretically the dictum of Rhodes, "equal rights for all civilised men south of the Zambesi," is accepted, but it is not made working practice. The Transvaal Constitution was more blatant: "there can be no equality between white and black in the church or state." Where law does not discriminate, the results are achieved by administrative action, trade restriction, and social opinion.

SEDITION.

Until recent years it was assumed that the inherent power of the Government to deal with seditious or riotous assembly was not strained against the holding of political and independent meetings. As a result, however, of the gradual enlightenment of the native and the effect of Western influences, authority felt it incumbent to retreat from the liberal principles it once professed. But the multiplication of sedition ordinances has gone on. In almost all territories there has been a new or amending enactment in the past ten years. The effect is to tighten up the law by imposing more severe penalties, by creating additional offences, and by granting despotic powers in certain circumstances to executive authorities. In the case of the Gold Coast in 1934, the ordinance put upon the accused person the onus of proving his own innocence instead of requiring the Crown to prove his guilt to the satisfaction of the court. Likewise there has been a considerable extension of press censorship, and extensive powers have been secured, and by proclamation the importation into the colony of literature is carefully controlled. In Gambia such a publication as Nancy Cunard's "Negro Anthology" and in Tanganyika and Trinidad the "Daily Worker" and "Labour Monthly" came under the ban. The extent to which these laws operate is difficult to discover, but from time to time we learn of prosecutions in cases which obviously indicate how severe are the restrictions imposed on the right of criticism and free expression in respect of public policy.

NEGLECT OF NATIVE AFFAIRS

This article can be no more than a cursory statement without any indication or detailed consideration of the numerous matters affecting civil liberty in the colonies. I cannot discuss the limited political rights in the West Indies and how events in Trinidad and Barbadoes have emphasised again the urgency of big constitutional changes. So far as this country is concerned, control by Parliament in these matters is negligible; our sources of information are inadequate; Parliament has no claim to see draft ordinances or to pass judgment on Orders in Council; there is little or no time for discussion. And frankly the British press are indifferent and the public not interested. Nevertheless, we have a very real responsibility to the millions of people whose destinies we have taken control of, and if these people are to grow in freedom and responsibility, and if they are to maintain their rights and liberty against the more aggressive and ruthless alien communities, an active interest and lively public opinion must exist in this country.

THE MARTYRDOM OF THE PEOPLE

By F. W. JOWETT

[The following essay was published by our Comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, December 5, 1941. This moving appeal will be appreciated by all thoughtful readers.—Ed.]

Will this war be fought to a finish? I mean the finish predicted with such appearance of confidence by the Prime Minister, the President of the United States, and all who speak as leaders of Parties and as Ministers on behalf of the British and United States Government. Namely, a military finish to exterminate the German Nazi Government and totally destroy its military forces.

What is the ordeal of blood and sweat and tears through which all the peoples concerned will need to pass to the officially promised finish? And for how long will the peoples have to endure it?

These are questions that may well be asked with sad experience of the last two years behind us and the spreading, seemingly endless time prospect of martyrdom of peoples before us.

Let us—we who are readers of this little paper—think again about these questions. Think about them from the point of view of our own people, and of our own country which we love and wish to serve as ardently and faithfully as others do, but always realising THAT ALL PEOPLES OF THE WORLD ARE KIN, that the ordeal of war is the same for all of us, and the way to shorten and end it is THE SAME FOR THE COMMON PEOPLE EVERYWHERE.

Two things stand out clearly in relation to these questions I have stated. One is that both our own Government and the United States Government confidently expect the war to be a very LONG WAR with many more years to go before it ends in the military victory to which they are pledged.

The other is that the political approach to peace either by negotiations or by declaration of peace aims in fulfilment of the implication conveyed in point six of the eight-point statement issued to the world by agreement between President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill (namely "that men in all lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear of want") is NEITHER INTENDED NOR DESIRED by the Government supported by its three-headed party caucus Parliament.

To impose defeat of Germany by military armed force, the German army with its auxiliary allies must first be driven out of Russia, and the German Army itself be defeated on Germany's own soil—for it is there alone that Hitler's Nazi Army and his Nazi Government will accept defeat.

Campaigns, however long is needed to carry them through, will be required to end the war IN GERMANY if the German people are allowed to remain in fear of another Versailles Peace, or worse (as they surely will unless all the British propaganda of the Vansittart "Butcher-bird" class is officially repudiated). If this colossal military task is to be avoided, then British Foreign Secretary's threat of controlled disarmament of Germany for twenty years by armed Foreign Powers must be withdrawn, and definite peace aims stated, and supported by example, to enable "men of all lands to live out their lives in freedom from fear and want." In short a SOCIALIST PEACE.

What does it involve: this plan to overthrow Hitlerism by military victory alone? Russia must clear the Nazi Army and its auxiliary Fascist forces by counter-attack on the vast scale required for such a task. This means driving back hostile armies some 400 miles on a nearly 2000-miles-wide front. Brave and well-led as are the Russian armed forces and wonderful in their self-sacrificing heroism as the Russian people have proved themselves to be in defending their homeland and their Socialist achievements, counter attack on this vast scale cannot begin until Soviet Russia is re-armed to make good the loss of its own munitions and works. This cannot be done from the U.S.A., from Britain and from Soviet Russia's own production in less than, say, eighteen months or two years.

The final campaign, the decisive campaign, the biggest ever—will then, and not until then, be DUE TO BEGIN.

In the meantime the war is extending. We have a large army fighting a large-scale war in North Africa. We are preparing for another in the Far East. THERE IS NO FORESEEABLE LIMIT TO THIS MADNESS, either in point of time or space, now that our rulers have declared for a fighting finish.

Up to the present the war has SCARCELY TOUCHED the vast majority of our own people. It is coming more nearly to concern us all now. London, Coventry, Hull, Liverpool, Bristol, Newcastle, Yarmouth and other blitzed towns had had sad experience, but for more than six months THE PEOPLE OF RUSSIA HAVE BEEN SHOCK ABSORBERS FOR US.

We have been thinking little of late of the starvation blockade which our rulers neglected to prepare for, or of the intensive bombing operations which is part of the blockade strategy. But these are to become more real to us.

The evidence of scarcity is becoming manifest and undeniable. Soon so many of our adult and juvenile population will either be in uniformed service or on war work that there will be few left to produce necessary things. The streaks of shortage which Minister of Economic Warfare Hugh Dalton said were already being spread by our blockade "like weals" over the people of Germany, we shall be feeling ourselves. True, large quantities of food are coming across the Atlantic from the United States, but blitzing of our ports, internal supply and transport centres and industrial towns is sure to begin again, and be carried on with as much or even greater severity than our own attacks on German ports and towns since the Russian peoples' defence of their Socialist achievements and their homeland gave us temporary respite.

However well protected convoys of ships bringing food across the Atlantic may be, if a very large portion of their cargoes cannot be docked and transported, the blockade will be proportionately effective.

Is there no possible escape from the disastrous experience of a fight to a finish of this second world war without going through with it to the bitter end? Can the peoples concerned be expected to endure to the end the martyrdom their Governments have imposed on them?

I do not believe they will. Russia's defence of its Socialist State and exposure of the real truth about its achievements after more than twenty years of world-wide circulation of lies and misrepresentation is giving hope and encouragement for the ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SOCIALIST WAY OF LIFE IN OTHER LANDS and as the torment of the ordeal by battle grows, with the casualty lists, the CALL OF FELLOWSHIP AND PEACE will be STRONGER THAN THE WILL TO FIGHT, whatever Governments may say or do.

HENRY COOKE.

Henry Norman Cooke (27), of 60 Bryn Street, Ashton-in-Makerfield, is a member of the Ashton-in-Makerfield Pacifist Group, and a member of the local group of the United Socialist Movement. He is now serving a sentence of six months' imprisonment for refusing medical examination.

Comrade Cooke had made a firm stand as a Christian obsolutist as well as a Socialist Pacifist. He appeared in the dock at Wigan Borough Police Court first in January, 1941, for refusing to register on absolutist grounds. On March 15, 1942, he was sentenced, for a second time, for refusing medical examination. His statements in court will appear in an early issue.

Cooke declares that the ethics of the teachings of Jesus Christ cut across and go beyond the law of any country engaged in war, and must be obeyed by a Christian in opposition to the call of war, which is inhuman, anti-social, and anti-Christian.

THE INEQUALITY OF CONSCRIPTION

By C. H. NORMAN.

[This article appeared in "The Railway Review" for December 5, 1941.—Ed.]

One of the strange features of the time is the tendency for persons professing faith in democracy to lend support to every device for spreading the evil features of militant capitalism throughout the community, on the pretence that there is some virtue in putting everyone under the heel of misgovernment in its worst form, namely, Conscription.

The usual excuse is that conscription extends liabilities to service on an equal basis. In fact this is quite untrue. The inequalities of non-conscription may be great, but the inequalities and injustices of conscription far exceed them.

The citizens of Britain have allowed themselves to be jockeyed into a remarkable and terrible situation, in which a number of persons, elected on quite different issues, are asserting control over the lives of everyone in the community, themselves remaining outside the net of these laws by virtue of their positions as members of the Legislature and members of the governing clique which now includes a large proportion of members of Parliament. The bewilderment of the electors at the existing state of affairs is well shown by the figures of the Hampstead by-election, announced on 28th ult., when Mr. Challen, the Government candidate, received 7,630 votes, whereas his Conservative predecessor elected in 1935, obtained 28,334 votes. Yet one is asked to believe that the Government candidate represented the true feeling of the electors!

Why can it be said that conscription does not affect the people who pass it into law? Conscription compels one to perform certain duties: but does the House of Commons even compel its members to attend their duties there for which they receive the not inadequate payment of £600 a year?

A member of Parliament is not liable to be sent to a detention barrack for overstaying his leave. The Press recorded that when Sir Roger Keyes recently made an important statement on the military conduct of the war only fifty members were present at the debate! Where were the rest of them?

These gentlemen have exercised their authority recently by extending the life of the House of Commons contrary to the Statute which declared the life of Parliament should not extend beyond five years! The effect of that vote was that these gentlemen have installed themselves in a position of dictators against whom neither wisdom nor good sense can prevail.

Consider, also, the advantageous position in which some M.P.s have been placed by the changes of Government arising from the war. In August, 1939, Mr. Winston Churchill was drawing from public funds £600 a year as a member of Parliament. He is now drawing £10,000 a year as Prime Minister for the duration of the war or the duration of his life apparently; plus the increased emoluments arising from the greater sales of his books through his prestige as Prime Minister. Mr. Attlee moved up from £2,000 a year as Leader of the Opposition to £5,000 a year. Mr. Greenwood moved up from £600 a year as a member of the House to £5,000 a year as member of the Cabinet. Mr. Ernest Bevin moved up from his trade union salary to £5,000 a year as a Cabinet Minister. The minor Labour Ministers had advances less in proportion but also substantial—except Mr. Thomas Johnston, who is reported to be taking no salary.

On the point of equality, compare those facts with the ordinary citizen, who is dragged away from his ordinary occupation and placed in the army on a pittance of a few shillings a week.

There is no reason in equity why the members of Parliament and the Cabinet Ministers should not place themselves on soldiers' pay plus a subsistence allowance.

These gentlemen are glib about the beauties of sacrifice, but where is the evidence that they believe in practising what they preach and enforce by law on others.

It is interesting to observe, in passing, that the combined effect of the new income tax on wages and the purchase tax has been to reduce the actual spending income of the working classes by 30 per cent. and the middle classes by 40 per cent. That is another contribution of the Government towards the principle of the equality of sacrifice; but the profiteers pursue their nefarious methods.

A pear purchasable in 1938 at 6d. is to-day sold at 2s. A pound of grapes purchasable in 1938 at 5s. 6d. a pound is to-day selling at 15s. 6d. Scarlet runners were being sold last week at 2s. 6d. a pound. That is what the Government calls protecting the public from exploitation!

In the last war the financial and political class fastened upon the community a debt of £7,000,000,000. Between 1919 and the outbreak of the war of 1939 the community had paid over £6,000,000,000 in interest to that same political and financial class, without reducing to any substantial degree the capital liability. The same process is going on in this war, only on a more colossal scale. The financial and political class who, generally speaking, take no share in the inconveniences of the war compared to the humble citizen, is reaping a huge profit by the financing of the war. The National Debt must now be close upon £12,000,000,000, which means a doubling of the capital liability on the community compared with the position before the war began. Unless there is a repudiation or writing down of this capital liability—which did not take place at the end of the last war—the citizens of Britain will be economic slaves to the British and American financial and political class, which is to-day controlling their lives and property.

The conscription of women is an even greater abomination than the conscription of men. The function of women in the community is to maintain the domestic harmony of the home on a good economic basis. That is not a part-time job, especially in these times, if done well. The running of even a small home requires the expenditure of a great amount of time and energy. To compel the young women of the community to enter into the Army or into industrial conscription is a sin against society. The House of Commons has no mandate and no authority to place such legislation on the Statute Book, when it is quite possible to take a referendum on such a proposal.

The present position of the House of Commons under the law of England raises grave reflections. It is the general law that persons are not supposed to vote on matters in which they have a financial interest.

GRAVE REFLECTIONS.

Payment of members has never been passed by Act of Parliament, but only by financial resolutions. When the House of Commons voted the Act extending its own life, it would seem to have infringed the general law of the land, which, properly, checks human weakness by providing that persons should not vote in their own financial interest except under the most rigid safeguards, with opportunity of appeal to the Courts if abuse has taken place. It is doubtful, however, whether any appeal to the Courts can be made against abuses of the authority of the House of Commons. In the past, the writer has indicated that there is some ground for questioning the legality of Parliament in authorising the declaration of war against Germany on Sunday, 3rd September, 1939. That doubt was based on the words of an unrepealed Statute, 21 George III, chapter 49, which is a statute to "prevent profanation of the Lord's Day" which specifically forbids "public debating on any subject whatsoever upon any part of the Lord's Day, called Sunday," which was the Statute which was believed to be the bar to Parliament sitting at all upon Sunday for any kind of business. If this contention is sound, then the results of it on the present Government and House of Commons can well be left to imagination.

It is a very bad thing for the community to be divided into two unequal sections: one tiny section of which, being endowed with power, spends its time haranguing the other section (which has unwisely abdicated its power) on its duties, while taking care to slip away from any responsibility itself.

A final and curious example is given in the restrictions on railway travel. The Minister, in making the announcement in the House of Commons on the 26th ult., coolly added "that a certain number of sleepers would be reserved for Government traffic and members of Parliament." Why? The Government and the members of Parliament only talk; the rest of the community does the productive work, which is more exhausting than talking at luncheon parties or at works on the duty of everybody (except the speaker, otherwise he would not be there talking) to do something different from what they think they are naturally equipped to do.

Which is one reason why it takes four people to do in the army what one person could easily do and willingly do in civil life. Conscription is the acme of inequality and the pinnacle of inefficiency: it is only the operation of military law and the Official Secrets Acts which hides the monstrous abuses which arise in a conscripted country, without economic equality. It is a system which corrodes the morale of society as a vast racket of manipulated exemptions grows up in the interest of those who have a "pull" over the humble in an unequal and class-ridden society. How on earth a movement which professes a belief in real equality can lend its support to the sham equality of industrial and military conscription is beyond comprehension.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY

By Rev. H. J. DALE

(Assistant Minister, Baptist Church, Kings Rd., Reading).

In his book, The Prophets of Israel, the late Dr. Robertson Smith reminds us that "the basis of the prophetic religion of Israel was the conception of a unique relation between Jehovah and His people; not, be it observed, individuals, but Israel as a national unity. Simple as the idea is, it requires an effort to fix it in our minds. We are accustomed to think of religion as a thing between individual men and God, and we can hardly conceive of a religion in which a whole nation in its national organisation appears as the religious unit; in which we have to deal, not with the faith and obedience of individual persons, but with the faith and obedience of a nation as expressed in the functions of a national life."

This insistence upon national responsibility is of the greatest importance for the present time, and cannot be too strongly emphasised. The value which is rightly set upon the individual must in no way be allowed to detract from the equally essential fact that each individual is an integral part of a common national life, and has a definite concern in its conduct.

For this reason the large dimensions that national self-interest and self-righteousness have assumed are not only to be deeply deplored, but must be viewed as constituting a grave danger. By means of a sustained propaganda of falsehood and calculated distortion of facts, people are kept ignorant of the momentous issues at stake. Through lack of vision and a tragic inability to see beyond the happenings of the moment, both moral and spiritual judgment are ceasing to have any meaning.

How true this is can be seen in the general attitude that is adopted towards those against whom we are fighting. Of the countless evils of which war is the fruitful seed, not the least is that of trying to paint our enemies in the blackest possible colours, and to make everything they say and do appear altogether reprehensible and devoid of decency, while our own actions and designs are acclaimed as being prompted by nothing but the highest intentions and an unquestionable sense of honour. That this is entirely contrary to the facts needs little showing, but unfortunately loose thinking is all too common and people accept what is told them without troubling to test either its true character or its trustworthiness. Were access to the documents that relate to our national and international policies easier than it is, a very different face would be put on affairs. But every government knows how to take advantage of public gullibility. How long this ability to deceive can continue remains to be seen. Already enough has happened in the present war to shake people's confidence in the "truth" of what they hear and read.

From the standpoint of religion one of the most mischievous effects of this subjugation of the mind to mass suggestion is the encouragement it gives to the idea that the divine approval and favour must of necessity be on one side, while the nations that happen to be on the other are for that reason God's enemies. The appeal to religious feeling is one that can usually be exploited with reasonable hope of success and seldom fails to prove itself a useful ally.

To imagine that God takes sides in human conflicts, as many appear to think, is both unjustified and un-Christian and in direct contrast to what we know of Him and His working in history. Certainly the Old Testament prophets give no sanction to the idea. Rather is their emphasis in the opposite direction. For the most part it is upon their own nation's sins that they dwell; the Hebrew people, not their neighbours, are condemned and urged to repentance.

There is no escaping the fact that in time of war the whole sin of mankind is seen in all its stark ugliness and horror, and nothing is easier than to put the blame for it elsewhere than upon ourselves. Yet surely the wiser and more desirable course is to examine our own conduct and try to discover to what extent we are responsible for the disasters that have come upon the world. True, there are gross injustice and tyranny to be found, and man's cry under the cruel hand of oppression goes up to heaven for deliverance. But this is not the guilt of one nation or race. Those who entertain such an idea display a complete misunderstanding of the situation. It is a guilt in which all have a share, and it behoves each nation to give heed to the beam in its own eye before attempting to remove the mote that is in another's. Indeed, as Christ tells us, we cannot clearly see the faults in others until our own eyes are free from obstruction.

To this task of self-examination the great prophet of social righteousness, Amos, challenges us with a directness from which there is no escape. "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will visit upon you all your iniquities," he declares, speaking in God's name. Would that there were more of his type to-day. The extent to which the prophetic voice is silent at the present time constitutes one of the major misfortunes of this tragic hour in human history. Even those who have the vision and courage to sound a different note from the jargon with which we are all too familiar in broadcast and press, are accorded scant attention for their pains, and not infrequently receive the prophet's reward of being looked upon as potential enemies of their country.

Responsibility is always in proportion to privilege and opportunity, with nations as with individuals. "To whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required." Beyond all question Britain has been a favoured land. To us as a people have come blessings far in excess of those enjoyed by many. Why this should be, it is not easy to say, except that throughout history God has seen fit from time to time to advance His purpose by a process of selection. There are, undoubtedly, in our national constitution qualities which, when consecrated to the highest ends, may well serve the good of mankind. The crucial question is whether we have discharged those responsible tasks our favoured position has imposed upon us in a way and to the extent we might have done. In some respects possibly we have. It would be unfair as well as untrue to deny that our influence has very often had a determining effect for good in world affairs. Others have looked to us for a lead and it has not been wanting. But so often there has been such an admixture of selfish intention and seeking for political power in our conduct of affairs, that we have failed to achieve the good it was within our reach to do. The nation whose motives are not wholely unselfish and sincere can promote the real well-being of its neighbours; no amount of casuistry can make what is morally wrong to be politically right, as we are discovering to our cost. "Some of the criticisms made by Fascists and Nazis," says a recent writer, "have been all too true. Our democracies have tended to be masses of easy-going, selfish and complacent people, stressing their rights to pleasure, scornful of plain living and high thinking, avoiding responsibility except when they fought for their own private interests and throwing up leaders who were timid and indecisive and often loved political power more than their country." That is a severe indictment, but certainly justified. The writer might even have gone further and referred to the political oppression and economic exploitation that are such conspicuous features of world policy to-day. Though those guilty of these practices try to hide their real character under the pretence of conferring benefits on weak and less fortunate populations, the fact remains that their real object is to further the scope of power politics and increase the profits of big business and international finance.

If truth has any meaning at all, there can be no gainsaying the fact that as a nation we have been in the very forefront of this scramble for material advantage. In no small measure we are responsible for the tragedy that has come upon us and our fellows. It is no use our trying to deceive ourselves by employing pious phrases; God is not mocked; whatsoever we sow we must reap. When it was in our power to turn the issues in a course that might have changed the ship could have won the ready co-operation of most, if not all of the other nations in a great crusade of international reconstruction, we allowed temporal interests and all the reactionary influences attaching to monetary and class privilege to block the path. We ought to have known from the experiences of the last war that those who plunge a nation into bloodshed can always put forward sufficient reasons to "justify" their action. In 1914 people had little conception of what modern war meant and the intrigues by which those who plan for it attain their ends. Many at that time honestly thought they were engaged in a final struggle to banish war for ever from the earth. How mistaken they were all the world knows. But to-day no such excuse holds. By now it should be perfectly evident that all the specious arguments whereby peoples are drawn into conflict have very little, if any, foundation in fact and the high ideals by which they are deceived into lending their support to it are no more than dust cast in their eyes to hide the truth. Governments know full well that to disclose the real causes of war would make it impossible.

Though men may allow themselves to be misguided, the law of cause and effect is not thereby made inoperative. Moral judgment is as active in the earth in the twentieth century A.D. as in the eighth B.C. There is nothing sacrosanct about the British people that entitles them to immunity from the consequences of their wrongdoing. Except we repent we shall perish in the way that earlier nations and empires have done. Judgment is not necessarily a "far-off divine event" that will come upon us at some future time. It is already making its presence felt, in our slums, our unemployed, the under-nourished masses up and down the country, the starving peasantry in India, the huge profits that are made out of human degradation. "On the Gold Coast and in Nigeria," says Vegley Farson in Behind God's Back, "practically all the cultivation is in the hands of natives and the white men are merely Government officials or employees of the big trading companies, mines, or plantations—nearly all of whose capital is held by a few financiers in London. This, in the right sense of the word is not civilisation; it is exploitation." The Zulus have a saying something like this: "You had the Bible and we had the land; now we have the Bible and you have the land." If only we could see ourselves as others see us! Not by some sudden and startling calamity does retributive judgment come. It is in what, viewed from one standpoint, appears to be the normal interplay of events, we see, when looked at from a wider angle, its inescapable outworking. Wherever human rights and personality are despised and men are made to suffer and endure unnecessary hardship, judgment will inevitably result.

Opponents of war are frequently ridiculed as being idealists. It is a jibe against which they need not complain. The world is going to pieces for want of idealism. But actually pacifists are the most realistic of people, because they will not allow themselves to be deceived by propaganda and the claims of national self-interest. Had the nation as a whole possessed a clearer outlook and given greater heed to the trend of events when it had the opportunity, how much of tragedy and destruction could have been avoided! Now that disaster has overtaken the whole of mankind, we see where our folly has led us. To reiterate the guilt of others will carry us nowhere. It is with ourselves we have to be concerned. To thank God that we are not as other men will but add to our already heavy burden of failure, and intensify the bitterness that exists between ourselves and others. Only by the emergence of a new spirit shall we prove adequate to our task. If we would be truly great, we must first learn the meaning of humility and service. What this may involve in terms of personal and national renunciation, it is impossible to say. Possibly a great deal. Yet one thing stands out crystal clear amidst the surrounding gloom—by this way of renunciation and self-giving alone can we and our fellows be delivered from the bondage to fear that holds us, and made to enjoy the glorious liberty we hear so much about, but at the present time seems so far beyond our reach.

MORRISON AND THE TRIBUNAL

WHEN HOME SECRETARY WAS CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

Emrys Hughes is to be congratulated for having looked up the files of Forward and reprinting from its volume for 1916, a report of Herbert Morrison's appearance before the Tribunal as a conscientious objector. We make no apology for further reprinting this interesting account and adding it to the exposures already made in these columns of the present Home Secretary.

Forward, for April 22, 1916, published the following report:—

Mr. Herbert Morrison, Chairman of No. 6 Divisional Council of the I.L.P., appeared before the Wandsworth Tribunal under the Military Service Act. He appealed for total exemption on conscientious grounds and based his claim as a Socialist and Internationalist. After his claim had been read, the following dialogue took place:—

Question: How long have you had conscientious objections to warfare?

Answer: I have been opposed to war for six or seven years.

Q. Do you belong to any religious denomination?

A. I belong to the I.L.P. and Socialism is my religion.

Q. Have you anything further to advance?

A. I would like to advance in respect of my conscientious objection extracts from articles I have written. I do not concede that the duration of one's objections to war is a necessary test, but I am submitting this evidence in order that the tribunal may know that I have consistently held these views. I regard modern war as a product of Capitalism. It is to the Capitalist system that I ascribe war, and as a Socialist I have a deep conscientious objection to taking part in war.

Q. Would you take part in anything which would not be combatant? Suppose you were asked to take a clerkship under the military authorities,

A. No. I cannot take part in the military organisation for war.

Q. Anything connected with war itself you object to? You will take no part in the support of the country in which you live?

A. I repeat that I have a conscientious objection to taking part in the military organisation for war.

Q. There are plenty of positions which would not necessitate that.

A. I object to taking part in any non-combatant military service. The Chairman has asked me to give evidence—

Q. We grasp your views entirely. We take it that your main objection is on the conscientious side?

A. Yes.

Q. The others we need not trouble about?

A. I put the conscientious objection as fundamental.

Q. You have no religious objection?

A. My religion is Socialism.

After some further questions on the use of violence and wars in ancient times, the Chairman said: "Personally, I am satisfied. I do not want any evidence. We accept your statement and will not trouble your friends.'

On the suggestion of one of the members, Harry Dubery and James Mylles were allowed to give evidence. The Court was cleared while the Tribunal considered their decision, and after some delay and the readmittance of the public the Chairman announced that exemption would be granted, conditional upon taking up work of national importance. "You can apply to the Board of Trade. The Government have every desire to meet gentlemen of your conscientious objections, but at the same time you enjoy the freedom of the country, and we assume that you are perfectly willing to do something towards the maintenance of the country. Suppose you were asked to take work at farming or some similar occupation, would you be willing to do that?"

A. Yes, I would do that under civil control. I would take a job as a dustman if I thought it would be of service. You need some in this borough.

A Member: You apply to the Council and we shall be glad to have you up. We need men badly.

Forward, for April 4, 1942, in which this account is reproduced, adds:

Mr. Morrison subsequently obtained employment as a market gardener.

The Board allowed the appeal of Douglas William Chisholm, subject to obligation for non-military service at the discretion of the Minister of National Service. Chisholm stated that he was a member of the Christian Pacifist Society and had been discharged from the Post Office because he refused to do war work.

Questioned by Mr. Bell, Chisholm said that the beliefs of his society were against militarism and he was trying to spread Anti-Militarist thought.

Bell: Is that not a form of fifth-column activity?

Chisholm: I do not think so, but you can call it that if you wish.

On Monday, February 10, thirteen cases were heard. All were dismissed. Only four cases were interesting: Boyes; Bowyer; Burnett; and Barnes.

Rex Verdun Boyes said that the Versailles treaty, and reparations, compelled Germany to have recourse to force. The British people did not mean harm to Germany but they never realised the wrong that the Allied statesmen were doing.

Boyes read a statement of 12 typed foolscap pages. His religion was the non-resistance taught by Jesus. It was not confined to the creeds of any one church. He had been connected with two Presbyterian and two Methodist Churches, and also the Salvation Army. He had ceased to go to church on Sundays because "one does not get up on a Sunday morning and have a set hour for religious observance like a piano exercise."

Henry George Bowyer, analytical chemist, submitted a 17 paged statement. He said that he had been preparing himself for Holy Orders, for several years, with a view to missionary work. Bowyer was called up for 3 months' territorial service.

Bowyer had been a regular communicant at St. Mary's Anglican Church, Karori, for six years; Sunday School teacher, for five years; Bible Class leader for three years; and also Sunday School Superintendent at Makara for three years. He had been secretary to the local Bible Reading Fellowship for four years. He was B.Sc. In 1940 he was President of the Student Christian Movement, Victoria College branch.

When he passed his N.C.O. examination in the college cadets, his father gave him two military manuals in which were illustrations of bayonet fighting. This made him realise that if he participated in war it would mean willingness to thrust a bayonet into someone he had never seen before, against whom he had no grudge and who was personally probably a likeable individual.

By 1936, his first year at university, he decided to become a foreign missionary and communicated with the Board of Missions with this in view. In 1937 he took the pacifist view in Bible class discussion. Next year he became a pacifist.

He was willing to work with the ambulance corps of the army if he did not have to subscribe to that part of the oath requiring him to resist the King's enemies. He would also want a guarantee of non-combatan service at all times.

He had been offered a theological scholarship at Selwyn College, Dunedin.

Owen H. Burnett said that he would be prepared to fight in a war of labour against Capital. He saw in the present war the clash of Capitalistic interest, and the same envious glances of one nation at the trade of another. The only freedom to strive for was that of the masses from the economic oppression of Capitalism. He refused to be the cause of making German or Italian wives widows and their children fatherless. He would not do anything to kill an enemy worker with perhaps the same hopes and ideals as himself.

Appellant said he could not recognise the right of the board to judge his conscience.

The Chairman: If it was a war of labour against Capital would you fight?—Definitely.

Harold Barnes, labourer, Petone, is a returned soldier, called on in a home service ballot for three months' territorial service.

Barnes said he saw considerable service in the Great War after enlisting at 18. What he saw there—the waste of war, its futility and its aftermath—determined him never again to take part in war. He had since studied the causes, effects, and results of the Great War, and similar wars, and his view was unchanged.

Barnes said he had no religious objection; he objected to war because he saw its absolute futility. His view of the war was of one class of world dominators against another. The way to stop war was by not taking part. He would not give his life to aid any dominant class.

The chairman: What were you in the last war?—Just a common private in the infantry.

It is your view that the present war is a class struggle?—It is a struggle between the dominant people of other countries and those who dominate us in England.

On Tuesday, February 11, thirteen appeals were heard. Nine were dismissed. One was withdrawn. Three were allowed conditionally. The dismissed appeals included those of Raymond Lewis Weeber, house decorator, and Ronald Claverley Megget, wool clerk, both Jehovah Witnesses.

Weeber said that the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish religions were the religions of the scribes and pharisees. Jehovah was against them. The British Empire and the United States were Satanic organisations. Weeber added that he was strictly neutral in the war between Fascism and Democracy.

Megget said that he was prepared to do nothing whatever to assist war.

On Wednesday, February 12, the Board heard 11 appeals. It dismissed 8 and granted conditional exemption in the other 3 cases.

On Monday, February 17, James Thomas Majurk, clerk and draughtsman, asked for exemption from military service on the grounds of conscientious objection. He described himself as an International Socialist. He did not consider the board could judge his conscience but had appeared before it out of courtesy. When asked what he would do to protect the liberties he enjoyed he replied "just nothing."

The appellant, replying to Mr. C. O. Bell, said that he would not fight under any circumstances. He was a Catholic, but even if the Bishops of the Church proclaimed the war was a just one or even if the Pope did so he would not fight. He believed fighting was contrary to the law of God, and it was not necessary for him to consult his spiritual adviser on the matter.

Mr. Bell: Are you a Communist?—No.

Are you a Socialist?—Yes, I believe I am an International Socialist.

Can you be a Socialist and still be a Catholic?—Yes, I think so. I am still a Catholic.

Appellant said he would not help the wounded because to help the wounded would help to prolong the war.

The appeal was dismissed.

(To be concluded.)

C.O.'s IN TOTAL WAR.

They hold ajar the doors of hope and glory,
Their spirits bearing ostracism's scar.
To tired tribunals they recite their story,
Its truths to holden ears so faint and far.
They toil and pray, unmentioned, unanointed;
From many a happy junketing withdrawn;
But by the closing doors, the high, appointed,
Bright doors of hope they watch and wait—the dawn.

WAR-TIME MENTALITY!

By ALEXANDER RATCLIFFE

I do not claim originality for this article, for the reader is bound to know that what I submit is common knowledge. At the same time, I feel it is necessary that we all should be reminded that this disease, "War-Time Mentality," is a deadly thing: that its ravages are detrimental to the spiritual and moral welfare of free Peoples.

War-Time Mentality is the Thing that reigns supreme in this Year of Grace 1942. Its victims are found in every land. It drives all before it, and as the drive continues more and more people fall victims to the Disease. For this Thing is a Plague if ever there was one, and few escape its sweep. Readers of such journals as The Word mostly escape the violences of this Plague, and this simply because they have taken certain precautions against it. But the vast majority of the citizens of this and of every other country engaged in war, have very naturally succumbed to its devastations. What this Disease, "War-Time Mentality," is, all very well know, but it is only on examining the results of the Disease that one can clearly observe its pitiful reactions.

The victims of "War-time Mentality" are many and varied. For this Disease is no respecter of persons! It claims its victims from all classes and conditions of people; rich or poor, high or low, learned or illiterate. One and all they lie down under this dreadful Scourge which robs them of the very reason and senses which a merciful Providence has given them! And how willingly they succumb to the Scourge! For does it not send them to sleep? Does it not give them peace of mind? Does it not build up their hopes?

The victim of this Disease, Plague, Scourge, "War-Time Mentality" sees things thus. We put the Picture before the reader as it is seen by the British victim of "War-Time Mentality." We leave it to the reader to guess how the German, Italian, Japanese victims of this Disease picture the view.

To begin with, there is the War. Who was solely responsible for this War? Hitler and his Gangsters! This German and his fellows are the Curse of the Universe! Away with the idea that Britain could possibly be responsible for the outbreak of the present War. Away with it! Our hands are clean: they are absolutely spotless. They are as white as the driven snow. We wage a righteous war against the "evil things," and all evil comes from . . . Germany! What evil there is in this country is merely domestic. But the Great and Grand Evils always emanate from Germany. For are not the Germans Huns? And what is a Hun? It matters not what a Hun is, has not our Government, God-blessed and the Chosen of the Lord, said that the Germans are Huns? And so, we serve God: we serve mankind: we serve Democracy: we serve even the poor, down-trodden Germans themselves, as we array our arms and call upon God to bless the great slaughter which we intend to make against the Huns!

And so, we are at War. Thank God for that! The Churches say with one united voice that God is on our side! Protestants of all denominations (and there are hundreds of them), Roman Catholics of One Denomination (for there is only One of them), and all other Religionists who believe in God, be they "Christian" or "Pagan," who are on the side of Britain, acclaim the bloody slaughter, and they praise God for every murder committed!

Ministers, Priests and the common fry who go to Church, give of their substance to make destruction! Destroy! Destroy! Destroy! That is their eternal cry. Leave the building up till after the War! Meantime, subscribe to this and that War Fund. Give your hard-earned money for the purchase of guns, tanks, airplanes, bullets, etc. The more the merrier. The more production of that kind will please the ever-loving God of the Heavens. Never mind the Bible or the Catechism or the Creed! These are just playthings for a time of Peace. And this is not the time for Peace! We cannot have Peace till millions of human beings have been sacrificed upon the altars of the war-gods: mostly human beings themselves whose purpose in life is to plunder and steal and destroy.

The War is on! See how they run? Who? The Germans, the Italians, the Japanese! When the Germans invaded Russia and were on the Offensive, their losses were "terrible," "enormous," "huge." The Russians hardly lost a man! And when the Germans were on the Defensive, and retreating, their losses were ditto! The Russians again and once more, fighting Offensive or Defensive battles, got away with it. The losses to the enemy always have been greater than ours! Why not? Why believe anything else?

And the air-raids. What are the German airmen when they drop their bombs on British soil in the dark? They are Huns, Baby-killers, Murderers. But what are the R.A.F. boys when they drop bombs on German soil in the dark? They are heroes, patriots, the very servants of God! And what does it matter even if it is true that Britain started the night-bombing? What does that matter? Does that not show how we were there first? How ready we were to kill German civilians in the dark? And what does it matter although the R.A.F. have never bombed Berlin in the day-time? Have they not dropped bombs on Berlin in the dark on over sixty occasions, and thus effected death and destruction to the Berliners and their property?

Then there are the politicians. It matters not what Mr. Churchill said about Hitler before the War started. No doubt Mr. Churchill's words of approbation for Hitler were justifiable. It matters not if Mr. Churchill before the War, and after, referred to Stalin and Co. as a set of "Bloody Baboons." Circumstances change with the times! And the end justifies the means! This is Catholic theology, and why not? And the poor, misguided Socialists, as some call them. Why, these men have found their souls! They have joined the Tory Party, and are getting a fair share of the spoils, of which there is always a superabundance in war-time.

Witness again the attitude of the Churches! The Ministers and laymen are all out for a British Victory. They are arguing along the line that Christianity is confined to Britain and the countries of Britain's Allies. That so soon as a Country ceases to be an Ally of Britain, it ceases being a "Christian" Country! For God is only and at all times with the British. The clergy are not the least concerned about liberty, equity and justice to the slaves at present under British administration in India and elsewhere: what troubles them is that a Hitlerite victory might mean an end to their petty denominational life! They dread that the time may come when they may be ordered to work for their living. Many ministers do work for their living: but many more do not. Canterbury has £5000 per year, a Mansion rent free, and the Moderator of the Church of Scotland also has a hefty salary with free accommodation, light and coal. Is it any wonder, then, that the clergy are all out to beat Hitler: even they are prepared, as they have already done, to surrender every principle of the teaching of Jesus Christ to save them from the dread of Hitlerism! They prefer the present position.

And the press! What a press! The organ of this Disease, "War-Time Mentality." One thing one day, another thing the next day. Contradictions, falsehoods, inventions, dope. The Poison Press is the forerunner of this Plague which we are at present considering. For it is by the press that "War-Time Mentality" procures its many victims!

And so, we are certain of victory! We are not going to make the mistake of the last war and let the Huns off easy! We are going to finish them this time! It matters not how we are going to do it! It matters not although we feel that the German people will not rebel against Hitler, for is not Hitler their god? Nothing matters except that we are right, and our enemies are all wrong. How could it be otherwise? How could we possibly be in the wrong. Might as well say that God is in the wrong, for is not God for us? Are we not fighting His battles? How, then, can we do anything else but finish this War with a complete and total Victory for ourselves and our Allies?

Our main duty to-day is to win the war! By fair means or foul we must win the war! It is not true to say that we are fighting for Capitalism, the Financial Racketeers, etc. We are fighting for the right to live, and the only way by which we can live ourselves, is to kill others!

CIVIL DEFENCE

Forward, Glasgow, for Saturday, April 11, contains the following report:—

FIRE WATCHING CHARGE

Guy Aldred's Six Points.

On Wednesday last, Guy Aldred, the well-known anti-Parliamentary Communist and Editor of "The Word," appeared at the Glasgow Sheriff Court charged with having failed to register under the Civil Defence Act for fire watching, and to furnish particulars about himself required in the said Act, a charge for which the penalty is imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to a fine not exceeding £100, or both.

The accused objected to the competency and relevancy of the charge on the following six grounds:—

(1) The species facti libelled do not amount to a refusal on the part of the accused to furnish particulars about himself, and do not constitute a contravention of the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order, 1941.

(2) The species facti libelled do not constitute an offence under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939.

(3) The Notice, dated September 6th, 1941, is repugnant to the law of Scotland and ultra vires of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow and the Minister of Home Security.

(4) The Notice, dated September 6th, 1941, and the Regulations under which it is made, are ultra vires of the Corporation of the City of Glasgow and of the Minister of Home Security under Section 4, of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939.

(5) The complaint involves questions of civil liberty which cannot be disposed of in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

(6) The accused having furnished, and having been willing at all times to furnish, full particulars concerning himself to the Ministry of Labour, the Corporation of the City of Glasgow and the Ministry of Home Security, the authorities responsible for the prosecution ought to have considered his case in terms of Paragraph 8A of Article 4, of the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order 1941, before proceeding to prosecution.

The case was adjourned for a week.

The case has been further adjourned till May 6.

RICHARD CARLILE.

The Arbitrator, our humanist contemporary, published at 114 East 31st Street, New York City, quotes Norman E. Himes' tribute to Richard Carlile:—

Carlile became perhaps the most daring of Francis Place's disciples in the British birth control agitation of 1825-30. His chief work is probably the pamphlet, Every Woman's Book; or, What is Love? (London, 1826), the first tract in the English language devoted exclusively to the medical as well as to the social and economic aspects of contraception. Although short-lived, it was widely distributed; its influence upon Robert Dale Owen and, through him, upon the founding of the American birth control movement was not inconsiderable.

Carlile's efforts in behalf of the liberation of the English press, which began in 1817 with the attempt to revive the influence of Thomas Paine, were, if not unique, enduring, and many have thought that he suffered more for this cause than any other Englishman of the nineteenth century. He was imprisoned more than nine years for publishing his republican-political and deistic-religious opinions. . . . His spirit remained to the last unbroken.

Richard Carlile, Agitator, by Guy A. Aldred, can be obtained from the Strickland Press, post-free, for 1s. 9d. This work has had a wide circulation in the United States.

"DAILY WORKER" BAN

HOUSE OF LORDS DEBATE

On Tuesday, April 14 last, an interesting debate on the Daily Worker was initiated in the House of Lords by the Marquess of Crewe, who moved to ask His Majesty's Government whether it was still necessary to prevent the publication of the Daily Worker. The debate is reported in Parliamentary Debates, House of Lords, Official Reports, vol. 122, No. 41, cols. 572-588. We advise our readers to obtain a copy from H.M. Stationery Office, York House, Kingsway, London, W.C. 2.

The Marquess of Crewe stated that he had never seen a copy of the Daily Worker. He continued:

The country is going through the most severe test that it has ever had to face, and we are engaged in a war which we are determined will not end until the Axis Powers are prostrate in the dust. Therefore any person or persons who fetter the desire of nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths of the people of this country to carry this war to an end, those who hamper or interfere with the efforts of war, have to be silenced. And that is true whatever their object may be.

There are some, fortunately not very many (and Ihope that most of them are safely under lock and key) who are definitely in favour of the theories of National Socialism and Fascism. That is at one end of the scale. At the other end of the scale there are those who object to this war, and indeed object to any kind of war between nations, because they wish to institute a class war which would be at least as sanguinary as the present contest. We shall all agree that in both those cases most drastic measures, in the present crisis, may be necessary. I, for one, have never made any protest against the Regulation 2D, under which, after full debate in another place, this newspaper was, so far as we can see, most properly suspended rather by the alternative regulation 2C, which would involve recourse to a Court of Law and very possibly lead to an amount of publicity which would be positively welcome to the offenders. That is the position. Now it is said—I take no responsibility whatever for the statement because I have not attempted to verify it—that this newspaper has changed its point of view, and that if it were permitted to reappear it would definitely support the war.

If it were permitted to reappear, and if its contents again proved to be unwelcome, owing to the fact that, for one reason or another, it was not loyally supporting the war, it could, of course, immediately be stopped again. But in the meantime I put it to His Majesty's Government that, if a newspaper which presumably has a certain popularity in certain circles of working people can be of assistance in the present state of affairs, it might properly and reasonably be allowed to reappear.

Lord Wedgwood paid a tribute to the Marquis of Crewe as being the representative of Liberalism. Such tribute, to our mind, the foregoing speech did not merit. He proceeded to state the facts simply and clearly. We quote cols. 575-6 of the report:

I think that your Lordships must realize that the whole position, so far as the "Daily Worker" is concerned, has been completely changed by Russia joining in the war. I was one of those who voted for the suppression of the "Daily Worker." I thought that it was then dangerous to our country's war effort, and in wartime the safety of the State has to come before even justice or freedom. Now, however, the situation is entirely different. The "Daily Worker" and the Communist Party here and in Russia are the most enthusiastic supporters of our cause, and they have every reason to be so. I want this paper to come out so that that support of our cause may be published and read in the workshops of this country. It is urgently necessary that the working classes of this country should realize that this is their fight; and, as long as the "Daily Worker" is not allowed to be published, a great many people will not feel that this is a war for the freedom of the working classes. We are depriving ourselves of one of the best propaganda agents in the workshops which can be imagined. . . .

There is one further reason which I should like to put to your Lordships. Do you not think that, if these people were co-operating with us in this fight, they might learn something of this fight for freedom which might affect them as well, and which might ultimately have its effect upon the Soviet Government? Freedom may be in just the same danger under any dictatorship of the proletariat as under Nazi rule. We believe that if we can win the fight for freedom, we can establish a unity between freedom and government in a safe world. I hope that by the end of this war we may have learnt something from Russia and Russia may have learnt something from us.

Lord Rankeillour followed Wedgwood. He favoured the legislative strengthening of the law of libel in order to avoid procedure under special war Regulations.

The Earl of Huntingdon spoke next. He stated:

I am speaking on behalf of a considerable body, both of trade union and Labour opinion, which is getting more and more worried about the ban on this paper. In spite of what has been said, I submit that this is fundamentally the issue of the liberty of the Press. After all, that is one of the things which the Allied Nations are fighting. It is a fundamental right in this country. I know it will be said that the Press is free but that that freedom imposes an obligation on the Press not to abuse it—in other words, not to say anything which the Government particularly do not wish to be said. But that is not freedom. . . .

It has been alleged against the "Daily Worker" that it is unreliably inconsistent; at one moment it was not in whole-hearted support of the war, and at another moment it was. But in the events which are happening in Europe to-day it is difficult to see how anybody can remain consistent. A war which began with England and France against Germany in defence of Poland has turned into a war of innumerable nations—all the peace-loving nations, all the democratic nations of the world fighting against one of the worst tyrannies we have ever seen. Our own Government at one moment were considering helping Finland against the Soviet Union and are now allied with the Soviet Union and at war with Finland. I do not see how inconsistency can be used as an argument for the continued suppression of this paper.

The Lord Chancellor stated that neither the Marquess of Crewe nor Lord Wedgwood objected to 2D, but recognised that it was a necessary Regulation. He continued:

If it is a necessary Regulation I suppose it is a Regulation made with some idea that it might be applied. What does Regulation 2D provide? It provides that if the Secretary of State is satisfied that there is the systematic publication in any newspaper of matter calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution to a successful issue of the war, then that newspaper may, by order, be suppressed. Your Lordships observe that the publication has to be systematic. There is also a provision that there must be a previous warning given. . . .

What happened? On January 17, 1941, following a warning by the Secretary of State, this paper was suppressed. Very shortly afterwards there was a debate in the House of Commons, the debate to which my noble friend Lord Wedgwood alluded, in which after full discussion the suppression of this newspaper was supported by a vote of 323 to 6.

The fact is the "Daily Worker," from very early in the war, consistently pursued a policy of opposition to the war. It fomented opposition to the prosecution of the war and it did not conceal its grounds. Its grounds were that according to it the war was a war between Imperialistic powers fighting for world domination and profits. That was what we were doing against Germany; that was what Germany was doing against us. From beginning to end it jeered at the idea that this was Democracy fighting against Fascism or Nazism. Alike in the selection of the news which it printed (and it was very careful in its selection) and in the comments which it made, it set itself out to belittle and to misrepresent the war effort, and in particular it did all it could to create prejudice against United States assistance. According to this print, that assistance was nothing other than a capitalistic plot against the workers in various parts of the world.

I promised to make an observation on the reference made by my noble friend Lord Wedgwood to the entry of Russia. . . .

...If the conductors of a paper at a time when the country is involved in a fearful war, facing frightful dangers, are capable of ridiculing the whole effort of the war and telling lies as to the purpose behind every honest man in the country, how does it become any better to say that circumstances have now changed and this mendacious and wicked sheet may be counted upon now, like Balaam, to change its bray? It does not make any difference at all. . . . and it is just because you cannot do that you have to have a Regulation 2D. It is just because you have a Regulation 2D that the conductors of this sheet had to be suppressed and it is no argument whatever to say "Observe the different complexion of affairs; who knows but that these people who so grossly misused the power of the Press at the beginning of the war may now do something to assist the war, and may even provide us with good propaganda." These are not reasons of high principle to be applied in deciding when a paper should return to publication. . . .

The attitude of the "Daily Worker" to the war in the light of changed events is of course a matter on which we can all reflect. I make these observations about the paper. I agree that it has changed surprisingly from time to time. Very early in the war, Mr. Harry Pollitt came out with a vigorous declaration in support of the war, but he spoke without first ascertaining the views of his masters, and within a week or two he had to eat his words in a white sheet in the columns of this paper and proceeded to make an announcement in an entirely opposite sense. At every point this newspaper has simply used the language that occurs to it for the purpose in hand.

I have here two extracts which may be of some interests to your Lordships, and possibly add to your stock of information. On November 8, 1940, the "Daily Worker" said:

"The bosses of Washington and Wall Street, allied with the bosses of Whitehall and the City, will together attack the workers of both Britain and the United States in the interests of their war."

There is propaganda for you. If I may take one other example, I find that on 1st February, 1940, the "Daily Worker" said:

"Hitler represented once again his claim that the war was thrust upon him by Britain. Against this historical fact there is no reply."

Are we to understand that some people now think that if this paper resumes publication it would begin by withdrawing all that? . . .

On April 8th, 1940, the "Daily Worker" said there was no evidence available of German preparation for the invasion of Holland. It was jeering at the fears that invasion would be attempted. It was the Allies, this newspaper said, who were spreading such baseless rumours. And why? Because they were "trying to prepare the atmosphere for an invasion of Holland by themselves." That might have been written by Dr. Goebbels. The amazing thing is that after the "Daily Worker" had published this on April 8, the next day, on April 9, Hitler invaded Norway and Denmark. Yet there was never the slightest protest, nor even a report of that outrage in the columns of the "Daily Worker."

These illustrations will at any rate show that we are dealing with a very irresponsible sheet, but I had intended to say, when I was led off by my quotations, that there are two things which can be confidently asserted about it. The first is that this is a newspaper which has never based its case on the justice of our cause or shown loyalty to this country—never. There, at least, it has always been consistent. The second is that even if for a moment it was not ostensibly against our war effort, it has always shown itself liable at any moment to strike at our national purpose for its own ends.

FABIAN COLONIAL BUREAU.

The Fabian Colonial Bureau was formed in October, 1940, to act as a clearing-house for information and research on colonial affairs.

The Bureau has filled an urgent need. The material collected on current events in the colonies is daily proving of great value to a variety of individuals and organisations, who would otherwise have no regular access to detailed information about the Colonies.

The Bureau also acts as a meeting-ground for those interested in the Colonial questions by organising conferences and setting up committees to study specific problems. On the publication side the Bureau's journal, "Empire," and its pamphlets are discharging an important task.

A. Creech Jones, M.P., is chairman of the Bureau, and Dr. Rita Hinden is secretary.

The Advisory Committee includes Lord Faringdon, J. F. Horrabin, Sir T. Drummond Shiels, etc.

Readers of "The Word" are invited to become members of the Bureau. The secretary's address is: 11 Dartmouth Street, London, S.W.1. Members have the right to use the library and information available in the office.

THE VANSITTARTS DINED WITH HITLER

Mr. G. Ward Price is described in Who's Who as Director, Associated Press. It is explained further that he is Special Foreign Correspondent of the Daily Mail and served that journal as war correspondent, beginning with the First Balkan War.

In October, 1937, he published through Messrs. George G. Harrap & Co., Ltd., his book defending and eulogising Hitler and Mussolini, entitled I Know These Dictators. A second edition of this work appeared after the first month of printing and a third edition of November, 1937. It was a best seller. In view of the attitude of the Daily Mail and the Associated Press allied newspapers towards Socialists and Pacifists since the outbreak of war we have no hesitation in directing attention to Ward Price's eulogy of the dictators, which exposes so completely the part played by the reactionary —and so-called patriotic—press in foisting these dictators on Europe and the world.

Ward Price divided his book into two parts, Hitler and Mussolini. Each part is divided into 9 chapters.

Chapter I. of the Hitler section (page 7) says:

The Fascist and Nazi revolutions are too momentous to be judged with personal bias. Outside their countries the men at the head of these regimes are called "dictators." That term is accurate in the sense that their authority is supreme and overruling, but it does not mean that Hitler and Mussolini have subjected reluctant and resentful people to their will. . . . Their functions are defined by the titles of Fuhrer and Duce that they bear. Both of them have the support and approval of a much greater proportion of their fellow -countrymen than has ever voted for the Government of any democratic state. They came to power by constitutional methods.

The work consists of 250 pages of eulogy of the dictators.

Facing page 208 is reproduced a Mussolini letter in three languages—English, French, and Italian—addressed to Ward Price. Beneath is given the following English translation:

Head of the Government. Personal.
My dear Price,

I am very glad that you have become a director of the Daily Mail, and I am sure that your very popular and widely-circulated newspaper will continue to be a sincere friend of Fascist Italy.

With best wishes and greetings,

(Signed) Mussolini.

Rome, 11th November, 1926.

In this work (pages 218-221), Ward Price describes Mussolini as he saw him in September 1923. He reproduces from the Daily Mail of that time the impressions he formed of Mussolini as a patriot, a man of character, an Italian Raleigh and Drake. Fourteen years later he repeats this eulogistic description as being sound. The Daily Mail eulogy of Hitler and Mussolini was not so much casual tribute as a studied and consistent policy.

Ward Price describes Hitler's first formal dinner party in 1934 (page 29):

. . . I was one of four foreign guests at the first dinner-party which the Chancellor gave on December 19, 1934. The others were Viscount Rothermere; his son, Mr. Esmond Harmsworth; and a well-known member of the Anglo-German fellowship, Mr. E. W. D. Tennant.

Ward Price describes the dinner and continues (pages 30-31):

When dinner was over, Hitler rose, saying: "Will those who don't want to smoke come with me into the room on the right, and the rest go into the room on the left?" Lord Rothermere, who is also a non-smoker, with Herr von Ribbentrop and some of the ladies, accompanied the Chancellor. I went with the smokers, and was soon in conversation with General Goering, who wore his blue Air Force uniform with white lapels and a cross-hilted sword which he has specially designed for that service.

On pages 152-153, Ward Price quotes at length and approvingly, parts of a letter Hitler addressed to Viscount Rothermere on May 3, 1935, denouncing war as an instrument of national policy, and pointing out that the blood poured out on battlefields is wasted. On pages 158 and 159, the author depicts Lord Rothermere in Venice anxiously waiting for news of the German elections, and rejoicing at the increased poll of the National Socialists—Hitler's Party!

On pages 32 and 33, Ward Price describes the Vansittarts.

During the Olympic games, Ward Price attended a large State banquet at which above a hundred were present. He describes all the ridiculous ceremony with gusto, and continues (page 32):

The meal was served at a huge horse-shoe table. On the Chancellor's right sat Lady Vansittart, the wife of the British Permanent Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who was then visiting Berlin, . . .

On page 33, we read:

As Sir Robert Vansittart stood in the middle of the room after dinner, laughing and joking with Herr Hess, the Chancellor's deputy, there was a noticeable contrast between the glittering splendour of the star and cordon of the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George worn by the one and the field-service-like simplicity of the khaki uniform of the other.

UNITARIAN PACIFIST PROTEST

We have received the following vigorous protest against war-time misuse of "The Inquirer," from our comrade, the Rev. W. Bottomley, minister of the Unitarian Church, Cathedral Place, Melbourne:—

Sir,—Is it not time that some vigorous protest protest were made respecting the editorial policy of "The Inquirer?"

The purpose of the paper is clearly stated week by week as being the "Organ of Unitarian Christianity and Free Religious Fellowship; instead of which its editorial pages—"Week by Week"—are devoted to a war commentary whish, I submit, is entirely out of line with the spirit and purpose of our movement. The editor, and others, have an equal right to their opinions about the war, opinions which are by no means uniform, but should the pages of our religious journal be taken uup with a form of war propaganda which is thoroughly distasteful to a large number of Unitarian readers?

Reading "The Inquirer," as we in Australia do, six or eight weeks after it is published, we see perhaps more clearly than those who read it immediately after publication how nonsensical these "Week by Week" notes often are. By the time we read the sage (?) comments they are not only out of date, but have often been falsified by events. Personally, I cannot recommend "The Inquirer" these days to anyone of any intelligence. I am ashamed of it, and would rather see it go out of publication than have the present policy continued.

This is not a question as to whether we think our part in the war is justifiable or otherwise—it is a question as to whether "The Inquirier" is fulfilling its purpose as a Unitarian journal.

If space permitted, it would be easy to demonstrate the nonsense, written with ridiculous gravity, which from time to time appears in the weekly notes. But to quote only one instance—in the issue of January 3: "For the first time, perhaps, we feel on top of our job; the end can be seen." Since then, Singapore has fallen, and to-day Darwin has been bombed twice! In the name of all that is sane and decent, let us have a change for the better; it could not, in my judgment, be worse.

Yours, etc.,

W. BOTTOMLEY.

By a change in the policy of religious broadcasting, the A.B.C. eliminated the Melbourne Unitarian Church from its programme of church services in March. The reason given was that, the Unitarians, being a small body, had no right to figure in the religious broadcasts.

Lord Mamhead's speech, reported on page 120, was delivered before the members of the Torquay Debating Society, at Addison's Cafe. The subject was "The Dangers to Faith and Freedom after the War." The "Torquay Times" headed its report: "Commons A 'Yes House.'" A sub-heading read: "Lord Mamhead Hits Out For Freedom."

DUKE OF BEDFORD

We were expecting to publish the Duke of Bedford's maiden speech in the House of Lords in this issue. The debate in which he had intended to participate did not take place. It is hoped that the Duke will take an early opportunity of raising the entire issue of war and peace, and all that is involved for future civilization, at an early date, on his own motion.

In a very vigorous private letter, addressed to us from London, the Duke says:—

"The Government must know perfectly well by this time that I have no use for the tyrannies and violence of Nazism or Fascism, and that, if there were an invasion, I would do nothing to assist the Germans. . . ."

We quote this passage merely in passing reply to the attacks made on him in the "Sunday Express" and the "Overseas Daily Mail," and such like journals of the press magnates whose hirelings used to boost the dictators.

SIDNEY SPENCER'S STAND

The Rev. Sidney Spencer, aged 53, 40 Sydenham Avenue, Sefton Park, Liverpool, minister of Hope Street Unitarian Church, was one of eight conscientious objectors who were fined £5 each at Liverpool Police Court, on Tuesday, for failing to apply for registration under the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order, 1941.

Mr. Spencer pleaded guilty. He said he was already a voluntary fire-watcher at his church, but he conscientiously objected to compulsion as he believed that to-day the danger of regimentation was very serious indeed and must be resisted.

He added:—

"It is important from the point of view of preserving liberty in this country, that some of us should take a stand."

The chairman of the Bench (Mr. D. Mooney) remarked that it was extraordinary that the bulk of the defendants had made voluntary statements. Mr. C. Samuel, who prosecuted, suggested that the defendants were probably not unknown to each other.

Mr. Spencer said there was not the slightest foundation for the suggestion of collaboration.

When Mr. Spencer asked what was the alternative to the £5 fine imposed on him, the Clerk (Mr. C. T. Barton) replied: "That is left to another court."

Albert Ernest Helsby, aged 26, soap maker, 30 Windbourne Road, Aigburth, affirmed instead of taking the oath, but said he wished to make it clear that he was a Christian. The C.O. tribunal, he added, had exempted him unconditionally as an objector, and when he found that no provision was made for objectors on the registration form he refused to register.

Kenneth Bainbridge Riley, aged 28, Orrell Lane, "pleaded guilty by the law of England but not guilty under the law of God."

"I have no option but to refuse to serve mammon," he said.

Registration was described as an "evil thing" by Evan John Alun Williams, aged 28, teacher, 29 Catharine Street, Liverpool.

John Watson, aged 39, 22 Windbourne Road, Aigburth, said that when the Ministry of Labour informed him there was no conscience clause he refused to register.

LORD PORTSEA'S PLEA.

In the House of Lords on Wednesday, April 22, Lord Portsea made a moving plea that steps be taken to feed the few remaining people in Jersey and Guernsey before it is too late to save them from starvation. He pleaded for the children of the island who are condemned to starvation. He wanted to divide the House but could find no teller. He pleaded to a silent House: "WILL ANY NOBLE LORD TELL WITH ME AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT?" No one stirred. In a gestare of despair, Lord Portsea murmured: "On your head be it."

IMPERIAL OUTLOOK MUST GO

"ODIOUS TIMES"

LORD MAMHEAD'S BOLD SPEECH

Lord Mamhead is better known as Sir R. H. Newman, Bt., M.P. He was Unionist M.P. for Exeter, 1918-1929, and Independent from 1929-1931. He is the 4th Baronet and was made a peer in 1931.

The Torquay Times for April 3 reports a speech made by Lord Mamhead in that town the previous night.

We cull the following report from our contemporary :—

Lord Mamhead said at the present moment we were face to face with a most serious position.

A great many people said once we beat Hitler all would be well. He did not believe it. If we beat Hitler to-morrow and allowed Satan to rule we should be no better off than before. He believed Hitlerism was the growth of a pernicious past, on which we built our so-called civilization, and this country had a great deal to answer for.

Only Christianity could save the world. The great question we had to decide in the future was whether the country was to be pagan or Christian.

A lot of people thought they could bring about a better state of affairs by fighting for the Democracies.

He had stood all his life for liberty and freedom, and he did not think any more of democracy than autocracy. The liberty of every man and woman should be respected. A man should not be put into prison because he said something which somebody else did not approve.

PLEA FOR FREEDOM

There must be freedom of thought, freedom of action, and freedom of speech. We must get rid of dictators. He would like to see dictators like Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin put away. If they were put in a box he did not know what would come out first.

Lord Mamhead added:

"I never thought I should live to see the day when there is only one assembly that is really free, and that is the House of Lords. The House of Commons is muzzled. It is a 'Yes' house."

If one expressed many views outside, one is liable to be imprisoned. The only House that did not care anything for the Home Secretary was the House of Lords, because he could not touch it.

If he felt we were to live in the future in this country under the conditions under which we were living now, he would say we were living in odious times. If we were told what we had to eat and drink, and whom we were to employ, he would say it was most odious.

The world must be built up on Christian foundation. He did not believe in secular education. He was told there were children who had hardly heard the name of Christ mentioned, and he had also heard of cases where boys did not know what Christmas stood for.

AGAINST CONSCRIPTION

"In this country," Lord Mamhead continued, "we are now reaping what we have sown."

It was all very well to condemn Hitlerism, Mussolinism, and Stalinism, but we had to go further than that. We had to do away with what used to be the great imperial outlook: "My country right or wrong."

Lord Mamhead expressed himself as being dead against conscription, which (he said) meant putting into the hands of the Government powers they could exercise at any time for any purpose.

"One day you will wake up and find you have a weight round your necks, and you won't get it off," he ended.

CEYLON, AUSTRALIA, and SOUTH INDIA.—The late Sir Walter Strickland sent us, on June 5, 1934, from the Hotel Juliana, Buitenzorg, Java, his "journal" of impressions and reflections concerning the conditions prevailing in these lands, and their political and social future. We shall endeavour to publish this interesting contribution to the living issues of to-day and to-morrow in our next issue.

CONSCRIPTION OF WOMEN

In every office and mill in Bradford this week (ending December 6, 1941) there's been one main topic of conversation, and Our Ethel has been It. Everyone wants Our Ethel.

We pointed out recently that unmarried women of the working class are in fact the least mobile and conscriptable of any. Not only does the Bradford trade depend on them, but there would be widespread chaos in working-class homes, especially in winter, if they were withdrawn.

Why are married women to be exempt from conscription? Those with children obviously shouldn't be disturbed, but young married women without children have usually less responsibility than the unmarried. This applies especially in the upper classes, where officers' wives can follow their husbands around leading a completely idle life at great charge to the community. Also obviously there should be a thorough comb-out of domestic servants and ladies registered as "chauffeurs," before the young women who are working hard at honest jobs are messed about.

But above all, the rates of pay for munition workers must be revised. In Parliament on Tuesday Mrs. Mavis Tate, M.P., told of her visit to a war factory :—

"I saw large luxury coaches which drove the men to work in the morning from 15 miles away. The men who drive the coaches are paid £7 a week for that, and THEY HAVE NO WORK WHATSOEVER between the time they drive the men to work in the morning and the time they drive them back at night."

But the WOMEN'S average earnings on munitions are less than £2 10s. a week! Labourers in engineering shops doing the poorest jobs get about £4 a week, but hardly a woman anywhere, however skilful, unless she is a forewoman, gets as much as that.

"The rate for the job" which women were promised in many trades, turns out in practice to be all boloney. The bosses dodge the premise by splitting the job and pretending that part of it is "too heavy" for women. As a matter of fact in most modern industries (certain branches of aircraft work particularly) it is an advantage to have light, strong, deft hands which have not been spoiled by heavy labour. Manual dexterity is of a much higher value than mere lugging power. In man's trades (lino-operating for example) it commands good wages. In women's trades it is still in the bargain basement.

£2 10s. a week is not a living wage in these days. Anyone getting as little as that has to make out in other ways. She has to make an arrangement for board and lodging, either with her family or a landlady, which involves her doing all her own mending and washing and usually a good deal of housework as well.

If working-class girls are taken away from home, their wages will have to be increased so that they can afford to pay properly for board and lodging and meals, and live as independent citizens. It will require a complete change of social and economic outlook.

STRICKLAND'S PASSPORT

In 1920, the British Foreign Office withdrew the late Sir Walter Strickland's passport and refused to issue him another. The following year he published the correspondence with comments, in the form of a small pamphlet issued for private circulation. This was headed "The Passport Menace." A man without a passport was, for practical purposes, a man without a country. This fact explains Strickland's erroneous assumption of Czech nationality, as much as his interest in Czech literature and Czech traditions and politics. It had other consequences that were not foreseen at the time. Sir Walter Strickland, feeling that he had been deprived of his British nationality, withdrew all his personal deposits from his English Bankers and scattered them abroad. The war has made havoc of his estate in consequence.

Before the war, Strickland's semi-adopted Indian son deposited his MSS. and some Bearer Bonds and investment receipts in a Berlin bank. These were lost.

When the German Government took possession of Prague, securities Strickland had deposited in the bank there were lost.

Dispute about Strickland's nationality held up the probate of his will for a year. Thereafter, the Credit Lyonnais, Paris, where he had deposited his strong box, a number of securities, and had a current account, denied his British nationality up to the moment that the Germans occupied Paris. Just as this Bank was seeing reason, the occupation took place and everything in Paris was lost.

Part of his life Strickland had lived in Japan and held various Japanese investments. These declined and are worthless.

The war, and various disputes connected with it, has held up the settlement of Strickland's United States deposits. The extension of the war to the United States has wasted to zero many of his holdings, which were of great value at the time of his death. Like the British Government, the United States Government has taxed them at their then value, which is now quite fictitious.

Altogether, most disastrous consequences to his estate, and to his revolutionary wishes in handling and administering it, proceeded from his passport dispute. This dispute arose from his deep interest in Indian nationalism and, despite his Japanese investments, his strong sympathies with China and Chinese Republicanism. Strickland actually had strong sympathies with the oppressed everywhere.

In England, the entailed estate has passed into the hands of the Master of Lunacy and, in due course, will probably return to the Crown. The existence of this estate added heavily to the taxation of the personal estate.

We do not expect working-class readers to be much troubled about these facts, since, obviously, property society ought not to exist. Nevertheless the circumstances described have deprived the Strickland Press of large sums that would have been used in the pursuit of its revolutionary, and anti-militarist activity, in accordance with Strickland's wishes. This fact has held up the publication of his descriptions of life in the Far East—in all those places that he knew so well, and that from being at one time so outlandish, are now becoming household words—and of his pioneer thoughts in the subjects of China; a common nationality understanding between Britain and America not for war purposes but for peace and cultural purposes, and a world commonwealth.

Despite these difficulties, we hope to be able to collect, edit and publish Strickland essays, in suitable popular form, at an early date; and also to resume our accounts of his career.

In an early issue, we will publish a record of his unfortunate passport struggle with the Foreign Officer, with his comments made at the time.

(1855-1926)

Convict 9653, the United States' Prison Martyr for Anti-War Socialism. Debs' biography, and famous speech from the dock in 1918, were published in our February issue. Britain's veteran Socialist agitator, F. W. Jowett, approaches war to-day as Debs did, and as Jowett himself did, during the first Great War, 1914-1918. Debs was nine years old when Jowett was born. These two great comrades have built up true Socialist traditions on both sides of the Atlantic and throughout the English speaking world.

SOCIALISM & PEACE

THE BOMBING CONTEST

By

The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT

(FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS, 1924 LABOUR GOVERNMENT).

[The following essays were published, respectively, by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, April 3 and May 1, 1942. They answer Vansittart and Donegall and the present reactionary critics of Herbert Morrison, who is to be hounded for having made a speech replete with commonsense at a trade union conference at Blackpool. Jowett is a veteran anti-militarist and the standard bearer of Anti-war Socialism.—Ed.]

(I). A SOCIALIST STRATEGY FOR PEACE

The Daily Herald's Military Correspondent (Major E. W. Shepherd), in a careful estimate of German casualties in Russia, gives it as his considered opinion that Germany started the Russian war with forces of about three and a half million Germans, and about half a million allied forces. It is almost certain, he says, that:

"The total German losses in Russia have already roughly equalled the whole of the forces, her own and auxiliary, with which she invaded Russia in June.

"AND OF THESE PROBABLY ABOUT A MILLION AND A THIRD WILL NEVER FIGHT AGAIN."

Yet the German people are still supporting Hitler and his Nazi Government in this war which must continue for an unimaginable number of years, to accomplish a complete military victory for either side, as we, the British people, are still supporting Churchill and his fight-to-a-finish Government.

The Angel of Death, which has already clutched at the heart-strings of German people in millions of German homes, is coming more ominously near to us for as the dribble of reported casualties carry the sad message into an ever-increasing number of British homes, we can "almost hear the beating of its wings" as John Bright said, in the relatively trifling calamity of the War in the Crimea.

And so I say again that it is of vital importance now more than ever, to deprive Hitler and his Nazi Government of support which fear of another dictated imperialist peace has induced.

But what hope is there of this vitally important object being attained whilst it is possible for Lord Vansittart (who until quite recently was the Government's Chief Diplomatic Advisor) with the approval of many influential colleagues, and without a word of protest or rebuke from the Government to charge the German people with being a nation of murderers whose present generation at least must pass away before foreign military occupation can be withdrawn? What a welcome gift this was to Dr. Goebbels for his war propaganda! Of course it was used. This was what the Berlin radio said of it one day last week.

"Vansittart's speech shows" said the Berlin radio, "that the allies are fighting against the whole of the German people.

"This admission reveals the true intentions of the British.

"THE ALLIES NEVER THOUGHT OF FIGHTING NATIONAL SOCIALISM. Their true aim is to fight this war of annihilation against the whole German people."

(Birmingham Town Crier, March 28, 1942).

In the war of unimaginable duration to which Churchill and his Government are calling us, and Hitler is calling the German people, there is hope only that common cause in common suffering may bring the people of both these nations into the mind for peace.

And the first step to this indispensable approach to peace born of belief in a common cause that we who are anti-war British socialists can, and must, take, if we do not belie our faith, is to get a Government that will CHALLENGE THE WORLD to a new Social Order by its own example.

A government willing voluntarily at long last to ACCEPT LIQUIDATION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE AND TO ISSUE A CALL FOR PEACE recognising the right, and agree to distribution of the world's resources for the mutual benefit of all peoples.

But if we get a government that will challenge the world to a New Social Order by British example, and issue such a call for peace under promise to agree to distribution of the world's resources for the mutual benefit of all peoples, AND THE CALL IS IGNORED OR REJECTED, what then? This is a question to which readers of the I.L.P. News may wish for a reply from me.

F. W. JOWETT TODAY

The above photograph of our veteran comrade was published in our contemporary on November 10, 1941. Jowett has been an untiring Socialist propagandist for over fifty years. To-day his weekly causerie ought to be circulated and read by workers throughout the country, in field, factory and workshop.

To this pre-supposition, that such a British call for peace would be ignored or rejected, the use which Hitler's war propagandist, Dr. Goebbells, is making of the Vansittart hate-provoking campaign against the German people and of the "fight to a finish" and "beautiful bombs" speeches of Churchill, Beaverbrook and others, is, in part, an answer.

Nazi war propaganda would not so persistently exploit the threats of British bludgeon-man politicians if it were not the case that MASSES OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE COULD ONLY BE HELD IN SUPPORT OF THE WAR BY FEAR.

Millions of Germans, Italians, French and Spaniards are oppressed. All have suffered. Millions of Greeks, Belgians, French, Danish, Norwegians and Dutch are starving—victims of the British blockade. Some of these countries have been battle grounds over which the mechanised might of the German army has passed in devastating destruction. Is it conceivable that all these millions of martyred people would not respond to a call for peace. WILL THEY COUNT FOR NOTHING IF SUCH A CALL IS MADE? Will they not hail such a call as a message of deliverance that will not, must not, be ignored?

Especially is it to be expected that in Germany, where the terrible cost of war in terms of mutilation and death is being increasingly felt by all, and where there is even now an underground anti-war socialist movement in spite of all the Gestapo's efforts to suppress it, THERE WILL BE RESPONSE.

So it is to say the least highly probable that the German people's response to a British call for peace that will challenge the world to a New Social Order by example would deprive Hitler and his Nazi Government of the support necessary to carry on the war.

But what if the call failed? What if, by methods of terror, Hitler and his Nazi Government carry on with the war—which is doubtful, for by force alone peoples cannot be made to fight a war successfully. Even tyrants must get the support of their peoples for war by means of war propaganda and German war propaganda would be killed stone dead by a British challenge to the world for peace and the New Social Order by example.

IF THE BRITISH CALL FOR PEACE FAILS CAN BRITAIN WITHDRAW FROM THE WAR?

Unfortunately, nations which have entangled themselves in war obligations with half-a-dozen or more other nations as we have done, have no such ready way of escape from their obligations.

We have, say, for want of any reliable information of the actual number 750,000 British on active service in the Near and Middle East. We have shipping to convoy and protect across the long and increasingly dangerous ocean life lines, bringing food and munitions for defence. We have our obligations to the Russian people, who for the last nine months have given us practically an unmolested peace in our own homeland. China, Greece, Czecho-Slovakia, Holland, Belgium and Norway, to all of these we are tied by obligations to which the overwhelming mass of the British people have given their assent. EVEN AN ANTI-WAR SOCIALIST GOVERNMENT COULD NOT IGNORE THESE OBLIGATIONS NOR FAIL TO MEET THEM TO THE UTMOST EXTENT IN ITS POWER.

Would not this simply mean carrying on the war under new management I may be asked? To this question, the answer is NO, for the British challenge to the world for peace and the New Social Order proved by example of a British Government willing voluntarily to accept liquidation of the British Empire and recognising the right, and agreeing to distribution of the world's resources for the benefit of all peoples, would still stand.

And the challenge would be backed by the mighty federation of peoples of Soviet Russia. It involves no menacing threat of military interference with the liberty of other peoples to live under governments and systems of their own.

Stalin's world-stirring message in his Order of the Day to the Russian armies makes this non-intervention purpose of Russian policy quite clear. That ringing message of Stalin, repeated unceasingly in wireless messages to the German people from Russia and in the Russian press, is a veritable pain in the neck for Hitler and his war-propagandists. THEY PREFER VANSITTART.

If Stalin's Order of the Day was not specially directed to contradict—so far as Soviet Russia is concerned—the whole Anglo-American policy of military control of Germany after a fight to a finish, then it reads uncommonly like it.

"The (Soviet army's) object is to DRIVE THE GERMAN INVADER FROM OUR SHORES. Probably that will result in expelling and destroying Hitler's clique.

"We should welcome such a result. But it would be ridiculous to identify Hitler's clique with the German people."

With the principle here laid down by Stalin, I, as an anti-war socialist agree as a policy of assistance to all Nazi invaded countries in the event of a real British peace offer proved by example being ignored or rejected. I do not myself believe it would be either ignored or rejected.

(2) THE BOMBING COMPETITION RENEWED.

A. B. Austin, the Daily Herald's Air Correspondent has given a vivid description of damage done to the ancient German city of Lubeck by R.A.F. night bombers. Under the expressive title of "A Roofless City" he tells what photographs taken from the air a fortnight later have revealed of the effect of the R.A.F.'s attack on the night of March 28. Here is a quotation showing what the photographs revealed of the after-blitz condition of Lubeck:

"Think of a strip of close-packed city three-quarters of a mile long and from 200 to 600 yards wide, think of London from the Marble Arch to Oxford Circus, Manchester from the Corn Exchange to London Road Station, Glasgow, from the Broomielaw to the Cowcaddens, the whole length of Edinburgh's Princes Street.

"That is what you are seeing in this picture, the dead heart of a town of 150,000 people. Forty per cent of Lubeck's inner town has been devastated; 2000 of its houses have been destroyed.

"One heavy bomb alone has smashed seven or eight blocks of flats. What bombs have not flattened, fire has gutted. The Town Hall, the central electric station, the market hall, the Reichsbank, the railway repair shops, the port warehouses, the canning factory, the iron works; all are gone."

—("Daily Herald," April 25).

It seems now likely that the unrestricted bombing competition to which Churchill has challenged Hitler has begun. Speaking of last Saturday's night bombing attacks at Bath and elsewhere, the London Correspondent of the Yorkshire Observer said on Monday:

"Since Hitler has promised blow for blow in the new air-warfare, we must steel ourselves to the sort of thing that happened last night in different parts of the country."

But the Yorkshire Observer's London Correspondent thinks it is a mistake to give realistic descriptions of the devastation of German towns by British bombs:

"When the enemy does vent his venom on some British town which hitherto has been spared the ordeal of other places which are contributing heavily to the war effort we shall have little ground of complaint if the Air Ministry is to continue describing the devastation of our own raids in the language it has used during the last few days."

—("Yorkshire Observer," April 27).

The only conclusion which can be drawn from this line of reasoning is that if the British public are not told of the devastating effect of British bombs on German towns, the Germans may not think of reprisals. I do not believe, however, that the Yorkshire Observer's London Correspondent is foolish enough to believe in the validity of his own argument.

It may seem uncharitable on my part to say so, but nevertheless I must honestly say that I think what the Observer's London Correspondent had in mind was not that descriptions of the effect of British bombing on Germany's towns lead to German reprisals, but that such realistic descriptions are bad war propaganda.

To make good war propaganda, bombs should always be represented as falling mainly on enemy military targets, whilst enemy bombs should be represented as falling mainly on non-military objectives, especially on hospitals, schools, working-class dwellings and the like.

As a matter of fact I do not feel it can be unfair to the Observer's London Correspondent to suggest that he had some thing else in mind when he wrote his protest against publication of true descriptions of the devastating effect of British bombing of German towns, for it is on record that he does not regard telling the truth in war time as important.

The record is to be found in his own comment on Russia's protest against Finnish war propaganda during the Russo-Finnish war. Finnish war propaganda was making exaggerated statements about the loss of civilian life, to make it appear that the targets aimed at by the Russian air force were open towns, women and children especially, not military objects. Maisky, Russia's Ambassador, protested against this malignant misrepresentation. This was the Observer's London Correspondent's comment on Russia's protest:

"But the effrontery of M. Maisky and his friends in thinking that the people of this country are neutral in their sympathies, judging equally between the veracity of Finnish and Soviet communiques, is just too ludicrous. We don't care if the Finns are over optimistic or even inaccurate. It only shows their courage and their confidence."

—("Yorkshire Observer," Jan. 4/40).

Not many months later Finland had come out openly on the side of Germany and was attacking Russia, Britain's ally!

Thereupon, the Observer's London Correspondent began to see that good sound orthodox reasons could be cited for Russia's invasion of Finland, and said so.

And this is what it said of the Finnish General, Marshal Mannerheim (who, until Finland became Germany's ally in this second world war, was British imperialism's white-headed boy, honoured, if I recollect rightly, with at least one British military decoration):

"Marshal Mannerheim and a proportion of high Finnish officers were always Nazi at heart, and the temptation to pay off old scores against Russia will be too great. Nevertheless we (the British Government) have felt it advisable to point out through the Norwegian Minister at Helsinki what happens to a country (at the peace conference presumably) which allows itself to be dominated by the Germans and what will happen to it when the Germans have been defeated."

—("Yorkshire Observer," Sept. 25/41).

At the peace conference when the Germans have been defeated! And we are only really at the beginning of the murderous bombing competition which Prime Minister Churchill so rashly and wantonly challenged. Possibly it may not be really the beginning but only an instalment, a foretaste of what is to come, so far as we are concerned for Hitler may not be able to spare enough planes from Russia to do his worst yet, but doubtless the full force of the attack will come later.

Meanwhile the blockade is tightening against us and yet in this desperate situation pre-war party leaders, Chief Tory Churchill to the Labour Party's tin-trumpet fugleman, Pat Dollan, talk of the military struggle showing signs of success!

Where is there any such sign of success? What prospect is there, but of years of devastation and starvation, blood, toil, tears and sweat? Governments do not surrender when working-class houses are bombed or ancient churches are shattered.

Governments are destroyed when the people rise up against them. In wartime when a people is suffering, it will rise up against its own government only when it fears the enemy less than it fears it own government. There are rumours—let us hope they are true—of some such upheaval in Italy; and moreover it appears from Hitler's speech that he had reason to fear some elements in his own country.

Now of all times is not the time for a bombing competition as part of war strategy. Now is the time for the strategy the I.L.P. has always stood for: the appeal to the suffering peoples over the heads of their governments. Let the common people of Italy and of Germany know in clear terms that they have nothing to fear and everything to gain by throwing over their War Lords.

For this demand we find support in an unexpected quarter (Sunday Observer, April 19, quoted by the Peace News):

"The moral offensive lies with us. Are we yet equipped to take it? From the Arctic Circle to the Mediterranean, men and women are listening. They are listening in in Germany. And what do they hear? That we have created a Political Warfare Executive; that we are confident of victory, that the Four Freedoms are better than the New Order. They are listening also to Moscow. They listen perhaps to Washington. But have they yet heard one clear word of what the victors mean to do or hope to do for the nations to whose deliverance they are pledged?"

WHY BLUNDER ON?

"Observer" in the "Peace News" for May 8 says:

There has been a number of interesting pacifist pamphlets and books of late. I record them in the order in which they made their appearance on my desk. First, "Why Blunder On?" by the Duke of Bedford (104 George Street, Glasgow, 6d.) . . .

So far, I have been able to read only the Duke of Bedford's. It impresses me as a reasonable, lucid, and persuasive statement of a minimum programme of social, economic, and political reform on which men who are not ashamed to demand peace can agree. It is an effective counterblast to the folly of those who pretend to persuade themselves that a new and better social order can emerge after this war has been prosecuted to "victory."

A Request to Fleet St.

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Recently I had an opportunity of a talk with the Editor of a well-known paper who happens to be more in sympathy than the majority of editors with my outlook and some of my ideas.

I asked him what Fleet Street really thought of me. His answer, which did not surprise me as it confirmed what I had already heard from other sources, was to the effect that Fleet Street believed me to be a Fascist; were puzzled by my Christianity; and were rather inclined to admire my "guts."

Now what exactly do Fleet Street mean when they say that I am a "Fascist," and what is their definition of "Fascism"? Perhaps some editor who sees a copy of The Word would tell me, for I should really be very interested to know. To me, the essential (and evil) features of Fascism are the denial of reasonable liberty to the citizen and the sacrifice of the individual to the State; the ruthless persecution of critics of the established government by the methods of the Gestapo and the concentration camp; and inadequate machinery to enable the people to control, or remove, the head of the State. If Fleet Street agree with this definition, seeing that I have always condemned these features of Fascism, it seems to follow that they are convinced that my condemnation is insincere. May I ask why?

Can it be, however, that Fleet Street consider me a Fascist merely because I have sometimes put in a plea for fair play for Hitler? Surely you do not necessary approve of a man's faults and mistakes because you suggest that he should be judged in accordance with facts and with due consideration for any provocation he may have received and for any handicaps under which he may labour? Would Fleet Street editors themselves like to be judged differently? Would not some of them need the help of every extenuating circumstance that could . . . But perhaps I am getting too personal!

Am I, perhaps, assumed to be a Fascist because, as my critics and even some of my friends tell me I always seem to be finding excuses for Germany but never finding excuses for, or praising, our own Government? Well, even if I plead guilty to this charge, I do not quite see that it proves me to be an advocate of State tyranny; and if I had been remiss in finding excuses for, or praising, our own Government, will Fleet Street please help me with facts? Will they tell me of the great strategic and financial exploits of the Prime Minister which I have overlooked both before, and during, the present war? Will they point out to me the proofs of unswerving loyalty to early convictions displayed by Mr. Morrison and Mr. Bevin? Will they indicate how Sir Kingsley Wood has brought prosperity to the country, or will do so directly the war ends? Will they show me how Mr. Brendan Bracken, by his enlightened propaganda has won the support of every thinking man and woman in Europe? And if the Prime Minister has not been very successful as a strategist or as Chancellor of the Exchequer; and if Mr. Morrison and Mr. Bevin have changed their outlook quite a lot for no obvious reason; and if Sir Kingsley Wood has not done anything very striking to secure prosperity after the war or discourage such financial rackets as Warships Week during it; and if Mr. Brendan Bracken does not always convince or convert his audiences at home and abroad, will they tell me why these poor dear Ministers could not reasonably have been expected to do any better?

With regard to Fleet Street being puzzled by my religious ideas, well perhaps Christianity does rather seem to be outside their line of country, judging by some of the things they write and do! Joking apart, however, it might not be a bad idea if Fleet Street did give this strange and unfamiliar faith a trial. Suppose the newspapers, for a change, vied with each other in leading public opinion along the path of truth to nobler ideals; fairer judgments; cleaner humour; and healthier interests; giving genuine news and facts instead of lies, half-truths and dope.

It would be a change and no mistake and the change might demand a good many martyrs at the start; yet for all that I think it would be a change worth while. An unpractical dream? Perhaps. But aren't we living in a nightmare already?

THE DUKE'S LETTER: WHY PUBLICITY?

On November 3, 1941, the press throughout Great Britain and Ireland carried a sensational story beneath the headings:—

Duke of Bedford's Letter SENT TO HOME OFFICE

The text explained:

A letter written by the Duke of Bedford to a Government official in Liverpool has been sent to Mr. Herbert Morrison (Home Secretary).

The letter was shown to Councillor George Reakes, a former Mayor of Wallasey, who considered it advisable to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to its contents. . . .

It is understood that the letter has been referred to the legal experts of the Crown, who will advise Mr. Morrison as to what action, if any, should be taken on it.

Councillor George Reakes told a reporter on Monday that the letter came into his hands through a friend, and as the matter was sub-judice he could not disclose its contents.

The Duke of Bedford, interviewed, said that he could not quite identify the letter "they are making such a fuss about" but thought that it was one that he had written to a Federal Union enthusiast in Liverpool. The reason of the "fuss" was not quite clear at the time but it secured to Councillor Reakes a nation-wide free advertisement in the press as an ardent patriot and a great political enemy of Fascism, by the very cheap method of denouncing the Duke of Bedford. Councillor Reakes not only sent the Duke's letter, which was not addressed to him, to the Home Secretary. He advised the press he had done so, otherwise the fact would have been unknown. He not only wanted to inform but he wanted the reputation of having informed. Why? From pure patriotism?

On March 23 and 24, 1942, the press of Great Britain and Ireland published the Home Office view of the Duke's letter. This "view," apparently, was released to the press by Mr. Reakes, who made an adverse comment on Home Office evasion. The reply was summarised under appropriate headings, with, of course, references to Mr. Reakes, and summaries of the letter sent.

The headings were variations, as follows:

HOME OFFICE REPLY ON DUKE'S LETTER
HOME OFFICE ON DUKE'S PEACE LETTER
HOME OFFICE AND DUKE'S LETTER
HOME OFFICE "EVASION" OF PEACE LETTER

The text, beneath these various headings, read:

A reply from the Home Office concerning a "peace by negotiation" letter written by the Duke of Bedford to a Government official in Liverpool is described as "a priceless example of evasion" by Councillor G. Reakes, a former Mayor of Wallasey, Cheshire, who sent the letter to the Home Secretary. . . .

Councillor Reakes said yesterday that the Home Office reply is signed by a private secretary and says: "Mr. Herbert Morrison can only say in connection with the matter which you mention that he is administering a Regulation drafted in certain terms and upon him rests the responsibility for deciding whether or not to take action under that Regulation in any particular case."

Morrison's reply was correct. Reake's comment increased his reputation as a "super-patriot." It was a further comfortable, inexpensive advertisement. Again, why all this fuss? Had Herbert Morrison demonstrated his need for a self-elected assistant at the Home Office?

In April, 1942, Mr. George L. Reakes stood as Independent Candidate for Wallasley. The result was declared on April 30:

GEORGE L. REAKES (Ind.)	12,596
Ald. John Pennington (Nat. Gov.)	6,584
Major L. H. Cripps	1,597
Independent majority	6,012

Major Cripps, shipowner, brother of Sir Stafford Cripps, lost his deposit.

At the General Election in 1935 the figures were:

Col. J. T. C. Moore-Brabazon (U)	27,949
J. Airey (Lab.)	13,491
Unionist majority	14,458

The by-election was occasioned by the elevation to the peerage of Colonel Moore-Brabazon.

Announcing the result, the press said that the successful candidate at Wallasley, Mr. Reakes, is a journalist and was a member of the Labour Party until a difference of opinion over Munich. He was Labour's nominee when elected Mayor for Coronation Year.

When the result of the by-election was announced Mr. Reakes said:-

"It is a victory for Churchill, and our enemies will now know that Wallasey wants a vigorous prosecution of the war with a fight to the finish."

Was it a victory for Mr. Churchill to oppose his chosen candidate and supporter, Alderman Pennington? Was not the idea rather that Reakes should be M.P., than Mr. Pennington, even though Pennington would have supported Churchill as well as Reakes? Does not a journalist, who sends another man's private letter to the Home Secretary, and advises the press of the fact, make himself an object of political suspicion? It was good publicity to be known as an enemy of the Duke of Bedford.

Outside of "ginger" politics, speeches in the House of Commons, and much patriotic shouting, exactly what service does Mr. Reakes propose to render personally to effect the defeat of Nazism and Fascism in the world? What dangers does he propose to face?

Working class readers will not forget that the war of 1914-1918 had its "ginger" victors; e.g., one, Stanton, in Wales. What became of this man afterwards? What service did he render the workers in their post-war struggles? But what services will Mr. Reakes render to the working class? We wonder.

We wonder because, having won his seat on a rabid militarist appeal, Mr. Reakes explained, in the "Sunday Pictorial" for May 3rd, the causes of war. He said:

The first is the control of the nation's finances by the Bank of England.

Does Mr. Churchill propose to overcome this cause? Did Mr. Reakes ask the electors for a mandate to overcome this cause? If this is the first cause why was the attack on the Bank of England not the main plank in the election? Was Mr. Reakes afraid of not becoming M.P.?

A reader has sent us "The Datchelor School Magazine" for March. Also the Diamond Jubilee number and Short History, issued in 1937. The March, 1942, issue has a reference to Lady Wedgwood who was a student named Florence Ethel Willett.

Lady Wedgwood maintains her association with the school and mentions Miss Rigg, the founder of the Mary Datchelor's School. Lady Wedgwood is congratulated on her title. We cannot understand why the editor of the school magazine should omit to mention that Lady Wedgwood is a keen defender of conscience and civil liberty, definitely in sympathy with the women conscientious objectors, and herself a conchie!

Much has been said recently about letters being opened in the post. Our letters have been opened in transit since 1906 equally under Liberal, Tory and Labour Governments. In 1922 Lord Wedgwood, then M.P., raised the matter in the House of Commons. Lord Wedgwood has never received the credit due him for his protests against invasions of liberty.

UNITARIAN PACIFISM

Last month we published the protest of the Rev. William Bottomley, minister of the Unitarian Church, Melbourne, against the pro-war propaganda of the London Unitarian organ, The Inquirer. To its credit, our contemporary published the same letter in its columns for May 2. It appended the following comment:

"If Mr. Bottomley regards the notes as 'War Propaganda' then he is welcome to his chosen epithets of 'nonsense' and 'ridiculous gravity.' Even so, the Notes usually occupy about one-eighth of the paper, and it does not say much for the 'spirit and purpose of our movement' if he cannot show the rest to 'anyone of any intelligence'. Mr. Bottomley knows perfectly well the kind of comment that he would like to see, and he would not turn a hair if it were 'secular' or 'religious'. In the March number of his paper, the 'Beacon,' with the Japs knocking at the doors of Australia, he still asserts his faith that 'war is wrong in any circumstance'. He, too, is entitled to his faith, but we cannot help thinking that it has something to do with the reaction in the above letter, and, we hope, nothing to do with its tone. As to time-lag, some of our most heartening tributes come from overseas; only a proportion see the light of day. As to the prime example of nonsense, we appreciate Mr. Bottomley's feelings at the time, but for ourselves time has only proved its truth.—Ed."

This comment is peevish. Mr. Bottomley is indicted for the offence of being consistent in his opposition to war. Behind "the Japs knocking at the door of Australia" is much more than the question of immediate militarism. Who westernised the Japs? Who armed them in recent years? Who created a "yellow" problem in the Pacific? Our contemporary approaches the entire question of peace and war, and world politic, in a most superficial and stupid way. Whereas, in his various sermons and essays, Mr. Bottomley brings courage, thought, and powers of factual discussion to bear upon it. Many of our readers, including Unitarian Ministers, in various parts of Britain, have written to us protesting against the tone of The Inquirer, its want of Christian ethic and understanding, its rabid militarism and war mongering, its total worthlessness as an organ of spiritual dynamic and thought. The situation is lamentable because there is much useful heresy in Unitarian traditions.

Mr. Bottomley was formerly Unitarian minister at Taunton, but left there for Melbourne in 1926.

In its issue for May 9, "The Inquirer" published a letter from Major Sir W. P. Colfox, ex-M.P., defending its "Week by Week" notes against Mr Bottomley's accusation of war-propaganda. Sir W. P. Colfox concludes his letter:

For my own part I consider that "The Inquirer" of to-day is doing a magnificent service to Unitarianism. But it is doing much more than that, because it is quite definitely helping the advancement and understanding of Christianity. In this work the most important (though certainly not the only) part is being played by "Week by Week," which provides its readers with hope and vision, and combines a steadfast reliance on God with a reasoned optimism as to the eventual outcome of man's efforts to work out God's will.

Mr. Bottomley is ashamed of "The Inquirer." I wonder if it ever occurs to Mr. Bottomley what feelings of shame are aroused in the hearts of the vast majority of Unitarians by the fact that he claims to be one with us.

How can a weekly war commentary inspire people with hope and vision? Why should Christians be ashamed of Mr. Bottomley for maintaining his pacifism? Were not the early Christians pacifists?

The editor of our contemporary comments on Sir W. P. Colfox's letter:—

We have been much touched by other letters and messages we have received upon the same subject, and will eventually thank all our correspondents by letter. There we would choose to leave it. We think however it should be known that without informing us Mr. Bottomley sent a copy of his letter—addressed to the editor of this paper, and concerning him only—to another paper. Our contemporary printed it in conspicuous fashion. Our only comment is that Mr. Bottomley can take pleasure in seeing his letter in the only paper in Britain that would probably stoop to such an act.—Ed.

Why does not our editorial critic assume an upright position himself? Why does he not explain that Sir W. P. Colfox is a Tory Imperialist politician and has been a Government whip? What has Jesus to do with Tory whips and since when has Unitarianism been synonymous with Toryism?

REV. WILLIAM BOTTOMLEY

Mr. Bottomley sent his criticism of "The Inquirer" to "The Word" for publication. What is there dishonourable in that? Where is "the stooping"? Is a Unitarian minister denied the right to criticise "The Inquirer" in the columns of "The Word"? What nonsense! Does the editor of our contemporary wish to establish a new papal chair? or is his desire to emulate Hitler or Stalin? It is a pity he must not be criticised. Perhaps he feels like Calvin felt when Servetus, in his easy fashion of simple boldness, dared to believe in Truth.

We tell the Unitarian world and our Unitarian editor that there is no Christianity in "The Inquirer's" war notes, for the simple reason, that no disciple of Jesus is entitled to employ the sword. The idea of Christians, whether they speak German or English, bombing cities, raining death and destruction on men, women and children alike. It may be daring. It may be war. It may demonstrate a fearless recklessness, a disregard for one's own life as well as for one's neighbours. It may be audacity. But it is not courage, not true courage. It is neither Christianity nor humanity.

Unitarians have no reason to be ashamed of Mr. Bottomley or his work in Melbourne. He took charge of the Melbourne Unitarian Church in 1926, as the nominee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The membership of the Church at that time was small and its influence in the community of little account. A great change has been effected during the sixteen years of Mr. Bottomley's ministry.

He was instrumental in having Unitarian services put on the air for the first time in Australia; he engaged in debates with the leader of the Rationalist Association; he entered into the life of the community; associating himself with all radical, humanitarian and forward movements in the State. He edits a monthly paper called "The Beacon" which is read by people in every State of the Commonwealth and beyond.

During the peace which was but an armistice, Mr. Bottomley became a Vice-President of the Christian Pacifist Movement. When war came he maintained his pacifism.

Mr. Bottomley was responsible for the establishment of the Melbourne Forum and Literary Circle which meets during the winter months in the Church on Sunday afternoons and which is addressed by various speakers on matters political, economic, as well as religious.

Unitarianism is definitely on the map in Victoria and is identified with the people's struggle towards peace and social justice. It is interesting to note that, notwithstanding his bold anti-war attitude, Mr. Bottomley has increased his congregation which has grown through his definite advocacy of principles of World Brotherhood. It was no surprise to his supporters when, at the outbreak of war, Mr. Bottomley declared himself irrecoverably committed to a peace programme.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD'S PROGRAMME

By Rev. CHARLES RAVEN, D.D.

[In the following article contributed to the "Christian Pacifist" for June, Professor Raven, who is Master of Christ's College, Cambridge, and Chairman of the British Fellowship of Reconciliation, reviews the pamphlet in which the Duke of Bedford has presented a programme for immediate political action. The Editor of our contemporary says: "We are glad to offer our readers an important opinion on what we consider to be an important publication." We are indebted to the courtesy of the Rev. L. MacLachlan, M.A., who sent us an advance proof of the article.—Ed.]

Since the outbreak of the present war and indeed during the whole period since 1914 few men have shown greater courage and consistency, and few have been more scandalously traduced, than the present Duke of Bedford. Having resigned his commission in the Middlesex Regiment some time prior to the war, feeling the call to service of a non-military nature, he gave himself to work for the Y.M.C.A. in August 1914 and, some years later, he became a visitor at Portsmouth prison. Taking an active part in the S.C.M. and in C.O.P.E.C., and more recently doing everything in his power to advocate financial and political changes of a drastic but realistic character, he has gained a wide experience of life in all grades of society, has explored at close quarters the data on which economic and social policies must be based, and has developed natural gifts of intellectual consistency, clarity of thought and lucidity of speech through contact with men and things and the hard discipline of misrepresentation and suffering. In consequence he is a man of marked independence, disinterested, fearless, unembittered, a Christian pacifist who far more than most of us has made his principles and practice all of a piece. Any programme put out by him deserves and should receive the closest attention. His pamphlet Why Blunder on? which contains such a programme may well be the very statement for which we have all been waiting.

It is certainly timely in spite of, or indeed because of, the multitude of other plans and proposals and protests with which we are on all sides assailed. Naturally we are all passionately eager to see some issue out of our present distresses. We want to know how war, disease and poverty can be overcome. We cry out "What shall we do to be saved?" And from press and platform comes a multitude of answers. Most of these (it must be said at once) give more evidence of emotional upheaval than of intelligence or practicality: if they do credit to the heart of their authors, they are in other respects merely the crying of children for the moon. At recent pacifist conferences we have had far too much of these airy exhortations and vague revolutionary demands; and the religious world is full of them. Defeatism masquerading as "Christian doctrine of Man," utopianism disguised as "the theology of revolution," superstition calling itself orthodoxy—these things undermine the very principles upon which sane developments can be planned. In consequence the opportunity for Christian leadership is being postponed if not lost; and the masses of folk who are ready for any sacrifice if they can see and believe, are bewildered and estranged.

The value of the Duke of Bedford's proposals is that they are concrete and particular. He cannot be labelled as an advocate of any "ism" or "ology": he does not set out the sort of scheme which our socialist, communist, liberal and radical reformers have made suspect. He does not demand apocalyptic revolutions or promise transformations that recall the closing scenes of pantomimes. He takes certain specific problems — freedom, war, internationalism, finance, trade, government, industry and education—and puts forward definite criticisms of our present system and definite proposals for its amendment. It is not possible here to condense and describe these proposals; in the first pages of his pamphlet he has done so: the whole is clearly and briefly stated, with sufficient illustrations and simple examples to make the argument plain, and with continual evidence of humanity and candid commonsense. Even in matters like monetary reform in which many of us are almost wholly unable to follow a discussion or visualise a project he makes his own position as an advocate of Social Credit luminously simple. Even if we disagree with his proposals—and to me at least certain of them, for example that a Government should be forbidden to declare war without first holding a referendum, seem impracticable—at least we are compelled to re-examine the basis of our own convictions; and in many cases we shall (I believe) find that prejudice, ignorance of essential factors or failure to "strip our minds of cant", have distorted our judgment.

It is in this power to treat political and economic problems in terms of their human significance, to challenge the assumptions and expose the insecurities of our orthodoxies, and to criticise modern practice by reference to its failure to reflect sound principles and to meet elemental needs that the Duke of Bedford's work is invaluable. We may not be ready to accept his advice: we may, legitimately perhaps, disagree with details of his plan: but if we are honest with it we shall learn far more from it than from seemingly larger but really vaguer and more emotion-rousing propagandas. Here is a man of large experience and deep insight who has thought and read and written largely on these matters, and who puts forward the results as "first steps in an emergency programme". The whole Christian Pacifist movement should obtain, study and discuss his work. It is published price 6d. by the Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

THE WAY OUT.

By The Duke of Bedford.

A new pamphlet discussing the horror of war and violence and urging that reason can find a way out agreeable to liberty, justice, democracy, and commonsense. The author states his way out and invites criticism and consideration to ease the agony of mankind and to speed the new social dawn.

PAX CHRISTI

(THE PEACE OF CHRIST)

(A new policy for Christendom To-day)

By Rev. Albert D. Belden, B.D., D.D.

The Church is in a tragic dilemma about Modern War. She appears to be its reluctant but hopeless victim, its fierce but helpless antagonist. Both within the Church and outside it there is widespread distress of Conscience over the Church's support of War. The fact that this support is given in different lands to opposing forces means that Her sons and daughters are busy destroying one another. Where is the Sacred Body of Christ, the Holy Catholic Church, in this intolerable situation?

This book proposes a bold solution of the dilemma at once Christian, statesmanlike, practicable and irrefutable.

DON'T BLUNDER ON

F. W. JOWETT'S LETTER

We have received the following powerful letter from our comrade, F. W. Jowett:

Bradford, May 1, 1942.

My Dear Aldred,

May issue of "The Word" is excellent. Your "Open Letter" to Lord Simon is just right. You will, I feel sure, now that you have seen it in print, see no reason to change a word of it, if you had to write it again.

I received also the copy of Bedford's "Why Blunder On."

This I have now read and am able to say that I agree with a great part of it but not with the whole of it. His chapters on finance and foreign trade are clear and good and much of the rest of his opinions I agree with. I am not quite in accord with him in his line of approach for a negotiated peace with Hitler, which presupposes possibility of a peace with Hitler's Germany on the basis of mutual concessions—we to abandon our system of financing foreign trade IF HITLER WILL WITHDRAW FROM GERMAN OCCUPIED FOREIGN TERRITORY. This I regard as a fanciful suggestion, unlikely ever to take form and substance. My own line of approach is stated briefly, but I trust clearly, in my articles, "A Socialist Strategy for Peace" and "The Bombing Competition Renewed."

The parts of "Why Blunder On" which relate to Parliament and Government I disagree with. As you remarked in one of your previous letters to me Bedford's proposal practically means an industrial parliament—elected, as he explains, on an occupational franchise. I regard this plan as positively dangerous especially in an old industrial country such as ours where trade unions are ossified in sections some of them strongly entrenched with little regard to the welfare of large unorganised masses of workers they are unwilling to absorb. What it seems to me should be aimed at for attainment of a properly functioning democracy is community consciousness. This, I believe, can better be obtained by means of geographically based franchise than by an occupational one. Soviet Russia has, for the last seven years or so, had a geographically based franchise and since June of last year it has stood a test more severe than any nation, or federation of nations, has had to stand up against in all the world's experience.

I am sorry that neither Bedford nor yourself appear to have examined my own proposals for destroying the present system of party government and converting parliament into a really democratic institution.

Except for its fatal error of operating the system of "democratic centralism" (i.e., when the party says "turn" we all turn) there is nothing in the Soviet system that would be inconsistent with, and could not be operated under the system of committee government which I have advocated for very many years. (The word "Soviet" is, of course as you know, but another name for "committee").

I think I can truly say that, fundamentally, I have attacked the present system of parliamentary government as destructively as you have attacked that same system (and no other) in "Socialism and Parliament." But not by the same method, for whereas in "Socialism and Parliament" you do the very necessary job of exposing the demoralising effect of the system on parties and politicians by citing an abundance of proofs from records of their contortions, my method has been to attack the system itself, by showing it is obsolete and exposing its defects in actual practice.

Now and always—Yours fraternally,

F. W. JOWETT.

P.S.—You have a copy of my draft report to the I.L.P. Conference on "Reform of Parliament." There is also a pamphlet I wrote for the "Clarion" about 1908 entitled "What is the Use of Parliament."

WHEN GERMANY IS DEFEATED—?

VANSITTART ANSWERED

DUKE OF BEDFORD'S MAIDEN SPEECH

[In the House of Lords on Tuesday, May 19, Lord Vansittart moved for papers to call attention to Herbert Morrison's speech at Blackpool relating to post-war policy towards Germany. The debate was continued on Thursday, May 21, when LORD NATHAN spoke for Herbert Morrison and the Government; the DUKE OF BEDFORD made his maiden speech; LORD RANKEILLOUR followed the Duke and expressed his opposition to both the Duke and Lord Ponsonby; LORD PONSONBY followed Rankkeillour and had a clash of arms with Lord Vansittart; THE MARQUESS OF DONEGALL, after being seventeen years a silent member of the House, made his maiden speech in support of Lord Vansittart; LORD WEDGWOOD made a powerful speech, replying to Vansittart, and ending on a vigorous note of revolution; VISCOUNT CRANBORNE replied for the Government; EARL MANSFIELD spoke of dismembering the German Empire; and LORD VANSITTART closed the debate with the gibe that he most certainly did not wish to involve the Home Secretary in being defended by the Duke of Bedford.

Our June issue was printed when this debate took place and we have had to disturb our pages to include this report of the Duke's maiden speech. The full debate will be discussed in our next issue.—Ed.]

HOUSE OF LORDS, THURSDAY, MAY 22

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD: My Lords, I little thought that on the first occasion on which I should have the privilege of addressing you, I should speak in some measure in support of the present Home Secretary. Mr Morrison and I have had some fairly sharp differences of opinion with regard to the internment of some of my friends and other perfectly innocent and patriotic people under the iniquitous regulation 18B. The Home Secretary, on account of my advocacy of a negotiated peace, appeared, at times, to have some desire to add my name to the list of victims. However, if a man is criticized for talking sense I am prepared to defend him even though that man should be my potential gaoler. It is indeed, as I see it, only in keeping with the increasingly crazy character of the whole war that I should find myself to-day in some measure supporting Mr Morrison. In this war friends have become enemies and enemies have become friends with a rapidity which should teach thoughtful people the mad and futile nature of the whole business and the impossibility of attaining the lofty aims we have set ourselves to achieve by the methods which apparently we are often obliged to follow.

Early in this war we were preparing to help the Finns to kill the Russians, and now we are helping the Russians to kill the Finns, although there has not been the slightest change in the character of the two nations or even in the character of their leaders. Earlier in this war, again, we were helping the French to kill the Germans, and now by our recent operations in Madagascar we have been helping to make the defeat of the French more thorough. When the Home Secretary said that he was in favour of treating the German people with justice, and that he was opposed to the harsh treatment of Germany after the last war, he was merely giving expressions to opinions which are in conformity with the principles of Christianity and common sense, and he was showing that he has some capacity at any rate to profit by the lessons of recent history.

I listened with great interest to the noble Lord, Lord Vansittart, presenting his point of view on Tuesday. I could not help feeling that, in spite of his eloquence, he was reminding us of the familiar saying that there are two sides to every question. Indeed, I would go further and say that as I listened to him I was inclined to think that there were three sides to the question—the side which he stated and at least two others. The noble Lord once more repeated what I should have thought was the somewhat discredited idea of Germany's sole responsibility for the last war. I cannot possibly go over the whole ground he traversed, but I should like, if I may, to bring to your Lordships' notice certain points on the other side. You may say that the last war is now ancient history, but the points which I submit to you are not ancient history because they affect the whole psychology of the present war, our attitude towards Germany and our attitude towards peace, for in one sense it has been truly said that the present war is only a continuation of the last one. I do not intend to quote anything from German propaganda. The sources from which I quote are British, French, Russian or neutral sources, and I may refer to information obtained from trustworthy friends who were eye witnesses of what they reported to me.

Professor Prokrovsky, the recorder of the Soviet Government, has written that the responsibility for the war of 1914 rested not with this Imperialism or that but with Imperialism in general—the French, the British, the Russian not less than the German and the Austrian. In my opinion the Soviet professor was right. If you know where to look there is not a little evidence of some share of responsibility even on the side of Britain. There were influential people in Britain long before 1914 animated by trade rivalry and jealousy of what they believed to be Germany's challenge to British sea power, and for a long time the Daily Mail was conducting a venomous hatred campaign against Germany. Mr Wilfred Scawen Blunt, in his book My Diaries, relates how the present Prime Minister, when speaking to him in 1912, referred to "the coming war with Germany." He relates how the late Lord Fisher made vain efforts to ensure the "Copenhagening" of the German Fleet. I am open to correction, but I understand that term to mean the annihilation of the German Fleet by a sudden attack before there had been a formal declaration of war. If I am correct in this interpretation, I cannot help wondering whether the Japanese have studied the methods of strategy recommended by the late Lord Fisher. When Lord Fisher failed to get approval for this idea, he complied with the request of Mr Churchill to help him to proceed with the great task which he, Lord Fisher, had been engaged in for six years, as First Sea Lord—namely, preparation for a German war. Mr Blunt, who had been entertaining the present Prime Minister, further records that the First Lord of the Admiralty had become most truculent about international affairs, being engrossed in preparation for war with Germany.

In regard to the French share of responsibility for the war, the Serbian Chargé d'Affaires said in September, 1911, that he had been informed from the most trustworthy source that M. Cambon had stated that the Morocco trouble would not end in war, but that > "France, together with her Allies, is of opinion that the war, even at the cost of a greater sacrifice, must be postponed to a later time, that is, to 1914-1915. The necessiy for this postponement is required less by France's preparedness for war, which is complete, than by the organization of the upper command, which is not yet finished. The delay is wanted also by Russia.

And I have no hesitation in saying that if one country more than another was responsible for the outbreak of war in 1914, it was Tsarist Russia, the first country to mobilise; for Russia mobilised before Germany. Russia was determined to get Constantinople and the control of the Straits, and foresaw that this might be secured during the European war.

On February 21, 1914, a War Council was held at Petrograd to elaborate—I quote the words of the Council—

> "a general programme of action in order to secure for us a favourable solution of the historical question of the Straits. There exists much likelihood that we shall be able to solve the question of the Straits during the European war."

Further reference was made to the "expected crisis" and there was a statement that "Russia's historical task in reference to the Straits consists in the extension of her dominion over the same."

On March 13, 1914, a Russian newspaper published an article declaring that Russia's strategy would be no longer defensive but active. Miss M. E. Durham, in her book "Twenty Years of Balkan Tangle," relates how she was told in October, 1912, by the Russian Military Instructor in Montenegro attached to the Russian Legation, that "in two years from now we should be absolutely ready for our great war." The Serbian Minister at Petrograd, on September 27, 1912, quoted the Russian Foreign Minister as stating that in view of Serbia's great successes in the Balkan War he had confidence in Serbia's strength, and believed that she would be able to deliver a blow at Austria. For that reason the Serbs should feel satisfied with what they were to receive, and consider it merely as a temporary halting-place on the road to further gains, for the future belonged to them. The Russian Ambassador in Paris wrote to his Government in March, 1913, that no matter how terrible might be the consequences of a general conflict, the advantage in his opinion would be on the Russian side. In view of the warlike intrigues of the Tsarist Government, it is interesting to quote the opinion of Colonel Boucher, a popular French military critic, who early in 1914 said:

> "Germany is threatened to-day on all her frontiers. To be in a position to resist the attacks which menace her on all sides, Germany is compelled to develop her military power to a supreme degree."

The noble Lord, Lord Vansittart, said that in his opinion the treatment of Germany after the last war was by no means unnecessarily harsh or unfair. He suggested that, if there was any difficulty with regard to food, this was due to quite unavoidable circumstances, and to the obstinacy of certain German Ministers with regard to the question of shipping. This view, however, does not altogether coincide with what the present Prime Minister said five months after the Armistice, when he stated that we were holding all our means of coercion in full operation and were enforcing the blockade with vigour, adding that all the evidence he had received from officers sent by the War Office showed the great privations from which

DUKE OF BEDFORD.

The Duke of Bedford's maiden speech in the House of Lords was clear and direct. The speaker exposed the crime and folly of Lord Vansittart's present policy and indicted his pre-war diplomacy. The Duke concluded a powerful speech by reminding the Labour Movement of its pioneer ideas and ideals. From the House of Lords platform he addressed himself to the common people of Britain and the world.

the German people were suffering, and led him to conclude that this was the right moment at which to settle. I have reliable friends who visited Germnay about that time, and they tell me very ugly stories indeed of what they saw in the way of starvation among German and Austrian women and children, starvation caused by our blockade. They also had very ugly stories about the occupation of German territories by French coloured troops for whose use German women were requisitioned.

The Commission of Doctors appointed by the medical faculties of Holland, Sweden and Norway to examine the conditions in Germany reported in the Swedish Press in April, 1919:

"Tuberculosis, especially in children, is increasing in an appalling way and, generally speaking, is malignant. It is impossible to do anything for these diseases. There is no milk for the tuberculous and no cod liver oil for those suffering from rickets. Tuberculosis . . . is the cause of 90 per cent. of the hospital cases. Nothing can be done against it owing to lack of foodstuffs."

An observer who accompanied the Hoover Mission wrote:

"I visited large country districts where 90 per cent. of all the children were rickety and where children of three years were only beginning to walk. Accompany me to school in Erzgebirge. You think it is a kindergarten for the little ones. No, these are children of seven and eight years—tiny faces with large dull eyes, overshadowed by puffed, rickety foreheads. Their small arms just skin and bone and above the crooked legs, with their dislocated joints, the swollen, pointed stomachs of hunger oedema. 'You see this child here,' the physician in charge explained. 'It consumed an incredible amount of bread yet it did not get any stronger. I found out that it hid all the bread it received underneath its straw mattress. The fear of hunger was so deeply rooted in the child that it collected stores instead of eating the food.'"

I take it that the majority of your Lordships have never seen starving children on a large scale, and certainly, I am glad to say, you have never seen the children of your own country starving. Hitler has seen the children of his country starving. I suggest to your Lordships that, if you had shared his experience, while certainly you would not agree with the ruthlessness which he displayed towards the people of neutral countries, you would at least begin to understand why he was ruthless when protecting his country from a repetition of that starvation by reason of blockade or defeat. Do not forget that when our national safety or victory is at stake we are perfectly prepared to kill the French.

Then the noble Lord criticised Germany very severely for secret rearmament. Possibly Germany might not have rearmed secretly if we had kept our pledges in regard to disarmament. There is, I know, a popular superstition that we did disarm, but that popular superstition is not based on fact. The truth is that when the rearmament race started we were slower at the beginning to rearm—a very different thing. Mr Lloyd George, speaking at the Aldwych Club on November 8, 1927, said that the first blame he imputed was that the nations who had pledged themselves to disarmament, following the German example, had taken no steps to disarm. The conquering nations had at present in the aggregate, he said, over ten millions of trained men, better equipped for war than in 1914, against 200,000 to 300,000 possessed by Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria. They had not reduced these millions by a single division, flight of aeroplanes or battery of guns. Mr. Lloyd George said that was dishonouring the solemn pledge which we gave before the Germans signed the Treaty of Versailles. It can also be seen from the figures published with regard to our military expenditure in 1930 that, even twelve years after the Treaty in which we promised to disarm in two years, and some time before the Nazi Government took power in Germany, we had not decreased our armament by as much as ten per cent. on war-time figures.

The noble Lord also said that we were very wise not to return her Colonies to Germany, because, if we had done so, these Colonies might have been of great strategic value to the enemy in the present war. I would, however, suggest as an alternative that, if we had shown economic justice to the German people after the last war, and returned their Colonies, the present war might not have happened at all. The noble Lord went on to criticise very severely the attitude of the Germans with regard to Reparation payments. He said that the sums asked of Germany were really quite moderate, because they were less than the total war bill of the Allies. He went on to admit, however, that the sums asked were so large that it was physically impossible for Germany to pay them, which seemed to me rather to destroy the point of his first argument. He also said that, as the climax of their iniquity in this particular matter, the Germans had actually borrowed money with which to pay off Reparations and had then defaulted on the loan. If I make out that, by reason of wrongs committed, a man owes me money, and then proceed to lend him money to enable him to pay off his debt, it may be that that man is a rogue, but I think unquestionably I am a fool.

What really happened was just this. Our City Banks, not out of humanity or love for Germany, but as a commercial speculation to bring themselves profit, and also as an insurance against Bolshevism—for at that time they had as big a complex against our Soviet Ally as the noble Lord has against Germany—by a stroke of the pen created new English money to be paid to English people in England for making goods to send to Germany. When goods were sent over here from Germany, those goods were sold in this country for English money, and that money was used to pay off some of the loan. One of the most important reasons why more of it was not paid off was that the British Government, fearing unemployment, put up enormous tariff barriers against the entry of German goods. They lacked the wisdom to see that goods coming into a country are an asset to that country's weath. They failed to create new money to enable their citizens to buy those goods, whether they were employed or unemployed, and thereby to make it easier for Germany to pay off the debt within a reasonable time.

There are two fundamental issues, however, on which I differ most sharply from the noble Lord. First he claimed that the German people were responsible for the war policy of their Government, and he went on to say that for that reason they should be punished for the war and made to pay for the war. Now I submit that no people in any real sense are responsible for the war policy of their Government. It may be an unpopular thing to say, but I am not out for popularity. I would say that the British people are in no sense responsible for the Polish war, the most disastrous and unnecessary war which irresponsible politicians ever landed a country in. The Polish Treaty was arranged, I believe, by a week-end meeting of Cabinet Ministers. The Polish war was arranged by Parliament, and the country was presented with an accomplished fact. Had it been told all the truth about the whole position, and had it been consulted, it would never have consented either to the Polish alliance or the Polish war.

Moreover, the people of a country, this country or Germany or anywhere else, are fed with propaganda continually through the Press and over the radio; they are given propaganda books like Black Record to read, important facts are kept from their knowledge until after the war is over, and their patriotism is appealed to in a hundred different ways. They are called up for military service, and if they refuse they are liable to be imprisoned and perhaps, on the Continent, even to be shot, and families suffer all the hardships that the families of some conscientious objectors have suffered in this country when the husbands have been unjustly imprisoned. Only a very tiny percentage of the people of any country can stand up to that persecution when fighting their Government. Only a very tiny percentage of our own people can do it, and therefore it is most unreasonable to expect the Germans to do it.

And then with regard to this question of punishing people for a war for which they are supposed to have been responsible, there is only one practical way in which a people can be made to pay for a war, or can be punished for a war, and that is by imposing upon them a tribute of goods. And if that tribute of goods is imposed upon a country impoverished by war, who are the greatest sufferers? As I have already pointed out, it is the little children the babies—they are the chief sufferers, they pay most highly. And that is what the noble Lord calls justice! It is rank injustice and stupid cruelty. There is only one sane policy after a great world war, and that is for all nations to abandon this ridiculous idea of reparations and punishments, and to get together, letting bygones be bygones, co-operating with one another to do all they can to rebuild the shattered world. The wealthier nations should help the poorer ones, regardless of race or colour or political opinions, regardless of whether in the past they have been friends or enemies. I hope to God that when this war ends some statesman will arise somewhere in the world great enough and strong enough to insist that peace should be made on those terms.

I felt also that the noble Lord, Lord Vansittart, has shown singularly poor judgment with regard to the time he selects for threatening the German people with vengeance disguised as justice. Will he never learn, I wonder, that it is not exactly a good plan to inform the bear you have not yet killed what you mean to do with his skin? It is particularly inadvisable when there is at least a possibility that, if you insist on continuing the conflict to the bitter end, at the finish he may be in a position to make some disposal of your skin, for then perhaps he may be tempted to give you a double dose of the medicine you prescribed for him. If this is the noble Lord's idea of diplomacy and the intelligent handling of human beings, I am not surprised that during the many years in which he held an influential position in the Foreign Office British diplomacy did not conspicuously promote the peace of Europe, and still less promoted the ultimate safety and welfare of the British Empire. Many people have pointed out already that these threats of the noble Lord and other people simply serve to unite the German nation behind Hitler and behind the war. They serve no other purpose at all; and that is only another way of saying that they prolong the slaughter and suffering of our own people in the war. Therefore I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that if this conflict should end disastrously for our nation there is no single Englishman who will have a graver share of responsibility than the noble Lord who sets his face so sternly against any idea of a negotiated peace.

I said earlier in my speech that the Home Secretary, in expressing himself in favour of treating the German people with fairness, was only expressing opinions which are in conformity with Christianity and common sense. I might also add that they were in conformity with the ideas, the ideals and the methods of those fine men who were the original founders of the Labour Movement. Unfortunately the majority of the Labour Party to-day seem to be largely unfaithful to many of those ideals and methods, particularly with regard to human brotherhood. I foresee that the time is coming when people, not only in the Labour Party but elsewhere, may bitterly regret that infidelity. If the members of the Labour Party of to-day had been true to the noble ideals and sensible methods of the founders of their Movement, and if they had taken an intelligent interest in financial reform, Britain to-day might have been leading the world along the paths of prosperity, peace and good fellowship, instead of plunging further and further along the road to chaos, urged on by the instigators of hatred and revenge, masquerading as justice, and by the purveyors of mental and spiritual dope.

THE CAPITALIST PRESS & THE SOVIET UNION

A PLEA FOR SANITY

By H. W. HENDERSON

During the past few months—ever since Germany attacked the Soviet Union—more nonsense has been written about the U.S.S.R. than ever appeared in print before. It is not sufficient to praise the heroism of the Russian workers and peasants (who, incidentally, were brave stubborn fighters even under the tyrant Ivan the Terrible). It is not enough to admire their heroic defence of their Fatherland against the mechanised hordes of Hitler. Indeed the Soviet Union is transformed into a land of ideal things worthy of our emulation in every way. Newspapers which a few short months ago were pouring abuse on everything Socialistic and representing the U.S.S.R. as the world's worst example of tyranny are now tumbling over each other in their admiration of the Stalinist regime. And there is little doubt that when the Soviet Union has served their purpose most of them will turn with increased fury upon the Soviet Fatherland and all its works.

Typical of the nonsense being written about the U.S.S.R. is an article in the "Leader" of January 10, 1942, about the Soviet press. The writer of this article tells us that the Soviet press has a circulation of 7,000,000 copies and that "Pravda" and "Izvestia" have circulations of two and one-and-a-half million respectively. A peasant paper has a circulation of "three million copies."

The papers, we are told, publish no paid advertisements, prize competitions, police court news, or divorce reports. There is nothing about "fashion, sex, murder, suicide, or accidents, or about the private life of royalties, millionaires, or national celebrities." Now, all this is very interesting and a considerable part of it may be true. But what are we to make of the following, which immediately succeeds it—"No one is sacred from open criticism, and a great deal of newspaper space is devoted to the forthright opinions of readers. The Soviet Press is a living force among the people."

A few months ago Prof. Haldane, one of those scientific men who occasionally get mixed up with the most unscientific thinkers in politics to-day, made the remark that the Soviet press was much more free than the press of Britain to-day. He was immediately challenged by Mr. Emerys Hughes, editor of the "Forward," to produce a single direct critism of Stalin from any Soviet newspaper. Mr. Hughes courteously offered to reprint this quotation in the "Forward."

What happened? Prof. Haldane replied but was utterly unable to produce a single quotation such as Mr. Hughes desired. Mr. Hughes repeated his request and several months have passed without a reply from Prof. Haldane. Why? Because no such item could be found in any Soviet newspaper! Freedom of expression is confined to the Communist Party and its affiliated bodies. Opposition to the official policy is not allowed. So much for the "Leader's" foolish assertion that "No one is sacred from open criticism."

In the same issue of the paper—and I select both items as being typical of what it appearing in the press to-day—Mr. Hannen Swaffer laments that, almost without exception, our "National newspapers are controlled by a handful of men most of whom bought them with money brought out of industrial enterprise." But—"There is spreading right across the country a new-born admiration for the Russian system of national control. Hundreds of speeches are made advocating the end of profit-making. How long, in such a mood (asks Swaffer) will the nation tolerate its newspaper opinion being controlled for a few men who are the enemies of national ownership?"

Now what is any sane person to make of this jumble of words? If it is wrong for a few rich men to own and control organs of the press influencing, for their own purposes, the thoughts of millions of lesser mortals, how is the problem to be solved by handing over control of our newspapers to the Government on the Soviet model?

For the Soviet Government is itself composed of a handful of rich men (Stalin alone has three palaces on the Black Sea) and those men not only use the press to suit their own political purposes but forbid any rivalry from opposing parties. Under Capitalist Democracy, with all its faults, and admitting the justice of Hannen Swaffer's protest against the use which unscrupulous proprietors make of their power to influence public opinion, the writer of this protest is at liberty to voice his opinion against the prevailing evil and demand a change of policy. But in the Soviet Union, which Mr. Swaffer holds up for our admiration no such protest is permissable, and the memory of Trotsky, whose services to the Russian Revolution were at one time publicly acknowledged by Stalin himself, may be subjected to every vile infamous slander without anyone being allowed to reply. If Mr. Swaffer thinks the Soviet system the better of the two he has a peculiar sense of values!

These are but two out of many thoughtless eulogies of the Soviet Union which are to-day appearing everywhere in the press. Mr. Quentin Reynolds, the American journalist, has spoken on the wireless of the wisdom of Stalin in getting rid of his "fifth-columnists" before they had time to strike. The "Sunday Express" has opened its columns to four Ambassadors and similar gentry to tell the multitudes how Stalin smashed the Trotskyists before they had time to carry out the orders of the German General Staff. Story after story, telling of the far-seeing policy of Stalin, appears in print.

How are the public to know that the Dewey Committee, after a most careful analysis of the evidence, pronounced the Moscow trials a "frame-up" and Trotsky and his associates innocent? The public know nothing of the Dewey Committee and its findings and would readily believe in Jack and the Beanstalk if someone printed it with appropriate headlines! How are the public to know that men confessed to doing things they could not possibly have done, to holding conferences in hotels that had been demolished twenty years before and to landing at aerodromes where no aeroplane could possibly have landed at the time of their conspiracies? What does the man-in-the-street know of the earlier "confessions" of the Mensheviks and of the amazing adventures of Abremovitch—the man who was in two places at the one time? It is safe to say he knows little or nothing and readiiy swallows all the absurdities that are piled upon his breakfast table by a press determined to cash in on the temporary popularity of the Soviet Union which at the appropriate time will again become "the enemy of civilisation."

But there is one point which our converts to Stalinism never deal with—and one can understand their reluctance to do so. Stalin, we are told, is to be congratulated on his astuteness in polishing off the wreckers acting under German orders. Their confessions prove their guilt. Very well. But do these apologists forget the earlier confessions of the Vickers engineers which implicated the British Government? Will they now assert that, since Stalin now is vindicated, these confessions were genuine and the British Government was a wrecker? Or will the appalling implications of their acceptance of such a thesis cause them to reconsider their condemnation of the Trotskyists? For they cannot have it both ways!

F. W. JOWETT

From a portrait published when Jowett was a Cabinet Minister. He used his office to immortalise the glorious last words of Edith Cavell:—Patriotism is not enough; there must be no bitterness or hatred in my heart against anyone.

Under the sub-heading, Pioneer in Politics, the Bradford Telegraph and Argus "Town Topics" paragraphist, on January 29 last, published a portrait of our comrade, F. W. Jowett, and the following interesting notes concerning his coming biography:

An interesting movement is now on foot to prepare and preserve a record of the services rendered to Bradford and to the country at large by the Right Hon. F. W. Jowett, P.C., J.P., the famous Bradfordian who rose from being a half-timer in a Bradford textile factory to become a Cabinet Minister in the first Labour Government. During the next six months a voluntary Research Committee, with headquarters at Victoria Chambers, 17 Little Horton Lane, Bradford, will be sorting, indexing filing, and copying from over 5cwt. of material. Mr. Jowett has placed the whole of his large collection of books, pamphlets, speeches, letters, official records, and newspaper cuttings at their disposal, and it is intended to arrange these documents for the purpose of preparing Mr. Jowett's biography at a later date.

Much of Mr. Jowett's correspondence was conducted before typewriters came into general use, and there is no copies of the letters written by Mr. Jowett himself. These would, of course, be of great assistance to the biographer, and the committee will be grateful if anyone possessing such letters will send them to the secretary, Mr. Glyn Thomas, Hirst House, Saltaire.

The committee realise the dimensions of the task they have undertaken, and will welcome any assistance. Particularly urgent is the need to borrow further trestle tables or desks, and an additional typewriter, for the next six months. The work is being done voluntary in spare time, and the office will not be open during the day.

The material to be examined by the committee includes many rare documents dating from the earliest appearance of Socialism in England, and much of it relates to the life and industry of Bradford as far back as the 'eighties.

SIDNEY SPENCER

Our comrade, the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., publishes the following letter to his congregation in the Hope Street Monthly Calendar for for May:

Dear Friends,—I have no doubt that most of you are aware of the circumstances which led to my appearance in Court, along with seven others, including two of our own members and a well-known Quaker, on April 21. I have received many expressions of sympathy and good-will in the stand which I have taken on behalf of personal freedom. As I write, the upshot is uncertain. Refusal to pay the fine may result in a short prison sentence or in distraint of one's goods. Whatever happens, I am glad to have been able to take my stand along with so many who are suffering for conscience' sake at the present time. My one anxiety is in regard to the church services. I do very earnestly ask all of you to give the services your utmost support, so that they may not suffer should I be away for a few Sundays.

Very sincerely yours,

SIDNEY SPENCER.

CIVIL DEFENCE.—Last month we detailed the editor's six objections to competency and relevancy in the Fire Watching charge. When the case was called in the Glasgow Sheriff Court on May 6, the Procurator Fiscal intimated that the Crown had instructed that the proceedings be withdrawn. The Sheriff made an order accordingly.

A POSITIVE PACIFIST WITNESS

By the Rev. R. H. Le MESSURIER, B.A.
(Vicar of the Church of the Holy Cross, St. Pancras, London)

[The Rev. Ralph Hill Le Messurier graduated B.A. at McGill University, Montreal, in 1922. He became a priest in 1925, and has been Vicar of Holy Cross, St. Pancras, since 1935. He is an elector of the University and the author of a number of religious works.—Ed.]

During the time of actual war, it is difficult to avoid giving the impression that the pacifist attitude is a purely negative one, namely a refusal to take part in the actual use of lethal weapons. To some extent, when very often a man's service to his country is measured in terms of his ability to kill, or even of the numbers of the enemy he has actually slain, this negative impression is unavoidable. Yet, in order to avoid perpetuating this false idea of pacifism as a negative way of life, much more is needed.

Pacifists, having renounced participation in the war, cannot rest there. They should move forward to renounce participation in the conditions which make for war. No doubt—so much is a modern, warring nation organised into a unity—they will experience the same difficulty in separating themselves from the conditions which make for war, as they do from participation in the support of the war. Nevertheless, I feel that the effort should be made. Protest should be registered. Opportunities to break away from evil conditions seized. And a positive way of life proclaimed and lived.

In particular, I believe, two of the predisposing causes of war in the economic field should be noticed and attacked.

First, the fact that "the ultimate ownership of the principle industrial resources of the community can be vested in the hands of private ownership"—(to quote Resolution 6 of the Malvern Conference)—is seen more and more clearly to be a vicious system which has at least two unchristian results. "On the one hand it may (and does) deprive the poorest members of the community of the essentials of life. On the other, while these resources can be so owned, men will strive for their ownership for themselves. As a consequence, a way of life founded on the supremacy of the economic motive will remain, which is contrary to God's plan for mankind." Furthermore, this system has its ultimate development in Nazi-ism (whether German or English), which Christian pacifists, as well as militarists, are pledged to destroy. For the logical outcome of such a system is the domination of the entire industrial and economic resources of the world by the private owners of one nation.

Secondly, and in close connection with this, is the widespread use of money as a commodity which, by itself, and without any effort on the part of the person possessing it, can be invested so as to make more money. The investment of money for the earning of perpetual interest seems to fall under the twofold condemnation of the Malvern Conference quoted above, and, as such, should be eschewed by the Christian pacifist. Money should be restored to its true position as a medium of exchange between those producing and those needing certain goods and commodities. Its creation and destruction (as in book-keeping credits) by private concerns should be abolished. And the gambling on the stock exchanges of the world should be prohibited.

No doubt the Christian pacifist who accepts these two contentions, may find himself unable to carry them out in his own life at present, just as he is unable to escape (through, for example, taxes on his food, etc.) from some support of the war-effort. Nevertheless, it is essential in the one case as in the other, that he protests against such things now, and regulate his life so as to participate in them as little as possible. In some cases this protest is already being made in the "community" way of life. In other cases this way may be impossible, so that some other must be employed. What is essential is that the protest should be made now, in every way that is possible to the individual Christian pacifist. And, I believe, he should do all in his power to support and co-operate with those who are aiming at the reformation of such abuses as have been mentioned above, in our national and international life.

To an Anglican pacifist, these reforms have a special urgency in connection with the Church of England, considered as an institution in this country. And without waiting for reformation in the nation or in the world at large, he should strive now for the purification of the Church in these respects. The ownership by the Church of industrial resources, the total investment of her money in the economic market, represents an enormous sum. In the diocese of London, for example, £8¼ million are invested to provide the stipends of the incumbents alone. The working capital of the diocesan fund amounts to another half-million. And sums invested to produce the stipends of assistant priests and other "church expenses," adds greatly to this prodigious total.

Thus the Church's witness is frustrated. She is bound to be strongly tempted to fight for her vested interests, whether against Hitlerism or Russian Communism which might be expected to threaten her ownership of such vast sums and industrial resources. Thus the hands which should offer the book of the pure Gospel of Christ are soiled. The lips which should preach true brotherhood are stammering. The heart which should be free to love God is divided by its love for mammon.

The individual Anglican pacifist can no more contract out from the sin of the Church than he can from the sin of his country, except by the equally sinful method of suicide. Rather he must remain, in Church and in country alike, under protest, striving to reform them both, and working so that his individual protest may link up with the protests of others, until a great corporate protest makes its voice heard in the affairs of Church and nation alike.

Is the time not ripe for the Angican pacifist to attack the system which, probably more than anything else, is responsible for the contempt in which the Church is held by thoughtful people outside her ranks to-day? Should he not attack this system inside the Church first, and thus make it possible for her to face the world again with clean hands and a pure heart? Possibly the pacifist may fail to persuade his fellow Anglicans, even as he has already failed to convince them of the incompatibility between her Christian profession and their support of war. Nevertheless, the witness should be made, and made at once.

We are faced with two, and only two, possibilities "after the war." The post-war world will tend to be organised on one of two patterns. One is some form of Nazi-ism; the other some form of Communism. In neither of these in its extreme form will the Church—as we know it—be permitted to exist. And it will be no credit to the Church if either of these new orders of political and economic life strike her down because of her sin and her identifiaction with an outworn order which is hastening to its end.

Rather, let the pacifist invite his spiritual Mother to set her own house in order, that she may face the new world which is being forged to-day, and once more have a Gospel to proclaim. Let the Anglican pacifist say to the Church "Sell that thou hast." Let him urge upon her to give up her powerful and usurious position in society. Let her live on her capital, not by her capital. She will, even then, have enough money for twenty-five years or so, and will be compelled to adopt such sweeping internal reforms as will give the Spirit of God the chance of sweeping through her to cleanse and reinvigorate her. Let her face the world as a body dying to the world, in the world but not of it, ministering to the world instead of being a parasite on the world's evil system. Such a step would convince the world, as nothing else could, of her repentance and her sincerity. And who can estimate the results of such a dedication.

Of course, the world may not listen to her. She may be laughed to scorn for her idealism. She may be hated by some whom are fighting to preserve the principle of private vested interests. She may even be persecuted. She will certainly be poor. Her clergy may have to minister to their necessities with their own hands, and to the faithful only when the day's work is done. And her sphere of influence, for what it is worth at present, may be considerably contracted.

But she will once again be in an atmosphere congenial to her. She will resemble the Church as portrayed in the New Testament. Nay, more, she will, as the Body of Christ, be a body more congruous with her head—with JESUS Who hung naked on the Cross because He outraged the standards of the world of His day. She will be called mad, even as His own brethren called Him mad. She will perhaps be crucified for her madness, and so fill up in herself that which is lacking in His afflictions. But only through some such crucifixion can she rise from the deadness of her present stupor and preach eternal life once more to a world which has lost sight of it.

The pacifist may fail in his endeavour to persuade his fellow-Christians to rise to such a vocation. But can he do less than proclaim this truth, that whosoever would save his life—be it individual, Church or country—will lose it? Can he rest in a negative refusal to take part in war? Can he not, by the power of the Holy Spirit, bring such a positive and ultimately corporate witness to bear on the life of the Church—and of the world—that all men will at least take knowledge of him that he has been with JESUS.

JOHN MORLEY

Dear Mr. Aldred,—You will regret to hear that our friend John Morley has been imprisoned for the second time for failing to comply with the Business Premises (Firewatching) Order. Early this year he was compelled to change his place of business and on Friday last (May 1st) he was sentenced by the Newcastle Magistrates to one month's imprisonment for failing to notify the authorities of a re-arrangement of fife-watching duties, and three months for failing to arrange such fire-watching duties (sentences to run concurrently). John is now at Durham, where he met his second son Alan, who is there serving a twelve months sentence for refusing medical examination. When father and son met at Durham, they shook hands, but were shouted at by a warder, who cried for "less brotherly affection." Bob Morley, the eldest son, was put out of Court for attempting to ask a question of the magistrates. John scarcely got two days' notice of the charge. He and Mrs. Morley were at the P.P.U.-A.G.M. the week-end previously, and although John is ever ready to meet persecution, he did not expect to get back to Durham so soon. I have been requested by the War-Resisters to give you the above information.

Fraternally,

FRANK MAITLAND.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne, May 3.

In "The Vanguard" for May its vigorous Anti-militarist and Anti-war Editor published a striking article on James Dick and reproduced his speech from the dock under the heading: Atheist Preaches Gospel Truth to Christians. Alexander Ratcliffe's opposition to war has caused so much comment that it calls for understanding and analysis. His tribute to Dick a bold challenge to all Christians who support war.

OUR LETTER-BOX

[Many of our readers appreciate "Our Letter Box." It has accumulated since February, when it appeared last and we are able to publish only a small selection.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—I have read Miss A. Ruth Fry's essay on The Atlantic Charter, and I have great sympathy with the suggestions made in it for bringing in a better world. I send this card as a response to your invitation. Yours truly, (Miss) RACHEL M. IRWIN.

Beldworth, Surrey, Jan. 19.

Dear Sir,—I am sure that there is really a vast body of opinion in the country that would rally gladly to the Duke of Bedford's support, if they could only get in touch with it. All petty differences must be laid aside for the time in the struggle towards the attainment of Peace, before everything that makes life beautiful is destroyed in one of the most senseless and unnecessary wars that this country has ever indulged in!

A Chief Warden, who has known me only by sight and to whom I had never spoken before, said to me the other day, "Mr. Walker, this War should never have been," to which I replied: "should never have been, and need never have been!"

With kind regards, Yours sincerely,

FRANCIS H. WALKER.

Ealing, London W.3.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I have not the pleasure of being personally acquainted with you, but your name was familiar to me during the years 1916-1918. On several occasions since I have seen your name in print and for the last few months I have been an appreciative reader of "The Word."

In the February issue I notice my name is mentioned in connection with your report on "Gowrie" (James Ritchie Henderson) of Glasgow "Forward." The newspaper extract which you printed had reference to the court-martial (in May 1916) of James Henderson and myself. After giving details of my friend's case you state that it is not known what happened to me subsequently.

My object in writing is to assure you that the events of recent years and more especially the state of the world at the present time have only strenthened my conviction of the wrongness and imbecility of war. I still remain convinced that war is the greatest enemy of mankind and that no permanent good can be achieved by such methods.

It may interest you to know that during the greater part of 1916 I shared the experiences of "Gowrie." We appeared before tribunals together and had the distinction of being the first two C.O.'s to be arrested in York. We were handed over "by the court on the same day, appeared before three courts martial together and were together in two civil prisons. In the January of 1917 we at last became separated. No one could have had a truer friend or more loyal comrade than James Henderson and it has always been a particular pleasure to me that since those days I have been able to keep in touch with him. The stand recently taken by "Gowrie" in Kilmarnock is typical of his strong views, which those acquainted with him know are held with the utmost sincerity.

Periodicals like "The Word" serve as a link between those who hold similar views on capitalism, imperialism and war. The few pacifist and socialist journals give readers hope and encouragement both of which are sorely needed in these dark days.

With comradely greetings and best wishes for the continued success and usefulness of the Strickland Press in general and "The Word" in particular.

Yours fraternally,

HAROLD DEIGHTON.

York, February 12.

Dear Mr. Aldred, —I am glad that "The Literary Guide" and "The Freethinker" speak so well of your "Richard Carlile." I agree with Cohen that "it is a cowardly and contemptible policy" this burying of great men and women. I have read "The Freethinker" nearly 53 years. I have no atheistic friends here in Hucknall, except, perhaps Lord Byron, who lies buried in church here. Our worthy vicar, Canon Barber, thinks that the poet was a believer, very little short of a perfect believer! He explains that Byron was fond of reading the Bible. So was Charles Bradlaugh.

In my youth, I heard Bradlaugh, Holyoake, Charles Watts, Foote, Annie Besant state the Freethought case. I heard Bradlaugh's debates with Father Ignatus, W. T. Lee, Robert Roberts, and David King. I remember "Saladin," Robert Forder, and Miss Vance. I was a miner in those days and worked in the coal pits all my working life. I first worked in them in 1884 and I continued to work in them till I was 68. Now wife and I exist on the old age pension.

I often visit Newstead Abbey. It is only a few miles distant. Such a lovely place. I met Chapman Cohen at Newstead Abbey a few years ago.

With Regards and Best Wishes,

Sincerely yours,

E. SMEDLEY.

Hucknall.

Dear Sir,—As a young conscientious objector engaged in civilian relief work in the East End of London, I cannot fail to be interested in the contents of "The Word."

Yours sincerely,

JOHN SUTHREN.

Harrow, October 20.

Dear Sir,—I am so pleased you are able to carry on these difficult days. "The Word" is one of the very few papers who have the courage to tell the truth.

With all best wishes.

Yours very sincerely,

(Mrs.) DOROTHY HOBSON.

Stockport.

Dear Sir,—You may count upon my being with you and Miss Ruth Fry in a campaign to bring to a just end the mutual barbarity in which we are all involved.

"The Word" comes to me as a breath of sanity in "Insanity Fair." The existence of a forum on which Pacifists of all shades of religious belief—and unbelief—can show their unity and compose their differences in order to combat this greatest of scourges which civilisation (!) is ready to inflict upon itself is an inestimable boon in these times.

The ideas of the Duke of Bedford as expressed so lucidly in his articles and pamphlets make me eager to add my request to the many others that he should represent Pacifist opinion in the House of Lords.

He would not be alone, for there are others—yes, even there—whose thoughts are their own and not those of the unthinking or propaganda nourished majority.

Yours faithfully,

C. W. BARTRAM.

Wanstead, London, E.11.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—How very true are your remarks about the Labour Party's Conference at Brighton, in October 1935!

I well remember reading of the stand taken by George Lansbury and Lord Ponsonby against War, and of the cruel remarks directed against them by the Labour Party opportunists, especially a speech by James Walker, M.P. As time went on the impression became a certainty: that these opportunists were out to get positions of power, even if it meant climbing over the dead and wounded bodies of their fellow-men in war.

My husband served nearly four years and a half in the last great war; we have both turned anti-militarist since then.

This war has brought us bereavement as did the last. Such needless anguish and waste of life! How much better to live nobly for one's country, than be slaughtered in the manner of the surplus coffee and wheat.

Yours sincerely,

ALICE GOODRICK.

Clifton, October 10, 1941.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I thank you very much for your paper which I find very stimulating, also the account of your fine stand for Freedom of Speech and your opposition to all forms of slavery including the worst, Military Slavery. It is very encouraging to read a paper full of reason these times of stark raving insanity. You have my very best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

OSWALD E. FOX.

Birkenhead, February 9.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have pleasure in enclosing a year's subscription to "The Word."

I should just like to say that the contents of "The Word" makes the same enjoyable reading as ever.

With Best Wishes, Yours sincerely,

H. J. DIGMAN.

Wisley, Cheshire.

Dear Comrade,—Yes, I think I may call you comrade now—because no one but a comrade would have supplied me with a meal of such good things. To one who has been hungering for such fare for so long, you can imagine my feelings. I wish to tender you my sincere thanks full measure, pressed down and running over, for your amazing generosity, to me, a stranger on the outskirts of a crowd.

Am I interested? I have starved for such nutrition for years and if only I had known where such viands were to have been obtained, I would have stinted myself of material comfort (such as it was) to have procured them. Better late than never.

In the old days I used to take in the "Agnostic Journal." I enjoyed "Saladin" immensely and I possess a well-worn copy of "God and His Book."

I have noticed, so far as I have read, of "R. Carlile" how deep and wide must have been your reading of the records prior to and during the period of his life. His was a most remarkable one and would that there were more of his understanding and strength of character in England to-day. I am more glad than I can tell that you are carrying on the good work in these days. Ignorance, "the curse of God" is far too rampant after all the years of so-called education. I still think that religion should be thoroughly eliminated from the schools of our land —but what a task for the pioneers and reformers, bearing in mind the huge vested interests that are in control everywhere.—Yours,

T. H. PERKINS.

Cullompton, Devon.

Dear Sir,—Please forward as many back numbers in consecutive order as possible of the paper "The Word," seen by me last week for the first time. Same brought back memories of that great little paper, "The Spur." I have enclosed 24 year old cutting from same. It caused a stir at that time.

Yours fraternally,

J. W. WILLMOTH.

Greenford, Midd.

Our comrade enclosed the following Nursery Rhyme which was published in "The Spur" for August, 1916:—

NURSERY RHYME.

(From "The Masses").

Sing a song of Europe,
Highly civilized:
Four and twenty nations
Wholly hypnotized.
When the battles open
The bullets start to sing;
Isn't that a silly way
To act for any King?
The Kings are in the background,
Issuing commands;
The Queens are in the parlor,
Per etiquette's demands,
The bankers in the counting-house,
Are busy multiplying;
The common people at the front
Are doing all the dying.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—It is an encouragement for me to know of your work for peace; only pacifism can bring ultimate peace. "The means determine the end."

Wishing you the joy of success.

Yours faithfully,

(Rev.) JAMES SMALLWOOD.

Dukinfield, Cheshire.

Dear Sir,—I have now received a copy of both the November and December, 1941, issue of "The Word" and think them excellent.

I am an Anglican parson member of F.O.R. and P.P.U. and thoroughly disgusted with the attitude of the Established Church on the war question. I find myself ostracised by my fellow clergy on account of my views, but daresay I shall survive this! I am an admirer of the Duke of Bedford and hope that he will continue his stand for the Christian way in international affairs.

I enclose 3d. in stamps for "The Crisis of Modern Civilisation," Rev. W. H. Bottomley. The Rev. W. G. White, Vicar of Haughley, Suffolk, who contributed to your November issue knows me well.

Yours fraternally,

(Rev.) CAMERON P. NEWELL.

Ipswich.

Dear Sir,—I am grateful for helpful material in issues of "The Word" I have seen, contributed by thinkers of independence and vision. About eight years ago I heard the Duke of Bedford—then Marquis of Tavistock—speak in support of Social Credit. I hope and believe that we have arrived at a far more mature stage of understanding now of all the deeper issues of a better way of life, lived in goodwill with all everywhere.

Yours sincerely,

S. SUNDERLAND.

Christchurch, Hants.

Dear Guy,—Many thanks for "The Word." I am glad to hear that Rev. William Bottomley has heard from you. He has your letter in "The Beacon."

With kind regards,

WM. E. COSTAR.

Melbourne, Victoria, December 16.

Dear Sir,—Thanks for sending me "The Word." I am in agreement with your policy as I wrote and told the Duke of Bedford.

I have said always that the war could have been averted with wise and disinterested statesmanship. Now it has begun, and is being waged, it must be fought to a finish.

Yours truly,

ALBERT LIST.

Colchester.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—What troublous times. I feel amazed at your determination and efforts, but there is only one who can bring peace. Soon he will come. May you share in the joys of that time!

D. MORRISON.

Bristol.

Dear Sir,—Although I have had your paper regularly for some time, I have not hitherto expressed my appreciation of it, though my sending for it, I suppose, speaks for itself. I like its courageous tone and greatly admire the Duke of Bedford's stand for pacifism and a new social order.

Best wishes for its continuance.

Yours truly,

G. M. BUTLER (Mrs.).

Petersfield.

Dear Sir,—Please find enclosed my subscription for "The Word." I know who forwarded my name on to you and would like to add that he did me a very good turn in so doing. My best wishes to your enlightening "paper," and by paper, I mean the staff and editor who manage to edit so useful a journal.

Yours sincerely,

E. W. HADDOCK.

Shepherd's Bush, W. 12.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Copies of "The Word" have, from time to time, been passed on to me by Lady Clare Annesley and my very great friend Richard Lee. My object in writing to you is to express my appreciation of the grand work you are doing and also to offer a little practical help in the form of a donation.

Yours fraternally,

FRANK KAYO.

Sutton Coldfield.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Thank you for "The Word" which I read with great interest, especially that issue with reference to the clergy and Pacifism. I am disgusted and ashamed of the attitude of both the leader of the Church and the "rank and file" of the clergy. The great testing time for the Church of Christ has come, and the judgment of God will surely be passed on one institution that has become corrupt and un-Christlike in its outlook and action.

I do hope the Duke of Bedford will voice the thoughts of very man of us now that he has taken his place in the House of Lords.

Apart from the articles, the quality of the paper and the bold type are a pleasure to handle and read.

Wishing you and you enterprise every success.

(Rev.) CAMERON P. SITWELL.

Ipswich.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—As I was in Wandsworth in the winter of 1917-18, I think I was your fellow prisoner, though you may have been somewhat later than I.

Although an anarchist (pacifist, non-communist) I strongly approve of the Duke of Bedford's conditional offer to take his seat in the Upper House being urged on him, that a voice for pacifism shall gain an additional and valuable platform.

Yours fraternally,

C. V. S. PAYNE.

Lingfield.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I take a particular interest in your references to the Unitarian denomination, as I was brought up a Unitarian, and was until the war a member of The Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle. The minister of this Church is the Rev. Herbert Barnes, who is a preacher of no mean ability. In his early days he was a pacifist, but he is one no longer.

Many of your readers will recall how the Unitarians were once hailed as pioneers and progressives. Now I am afraid that some of them go out of their way to be respectable and to fit in with the crowd.

I no longer feel that I can attend Church. I find a greater spirituality in the War Resisters, under the leadership of that fine man, John Morley, who is no atheist (as he was once described in your paper) but is, on the other hand, more "God-conscious" than many popular preachers.

One of our members, Constance Bolam, can claim the distinction of being the first woman C.O. in the history of the world, to go to prison for her beliefs.

Best wishes, yours sincerely,

FRANK MAITLAND.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Dear Sirs,—Please send me extra copies of the March issue of "The Word." An admirable number! The exposure of that superannuated Pantaloon, Bernard Shaw, with its debunking of the Proletarian Paradise alias Russia under Tsar Stalin (your contributor omits to mention the weightest and most shatteringly documented book of Boris Souvarine "Stalin" which is indispensable to anyone who needs an antidote—as what intelligent person does not?—to the floods of Stalinist propaganda pumped over us). Mr. Jowett's splendid article on the Food Blockade, and last but by very far from the least the Duke of Bedford's superbly temperate reasoned and fundamentally humane exposition of Monetary Reform.

Yours very faithfully,

K. S. SORABJI.

London, N.W.1.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I am writing you the the results of the police court proceedings in connection with my failure to register for civil defence duties.

The case came up at Newton-le-Willows Police Court on Thursday, 12th March, 1942. I entered a plea of not guilty and allowed the prosecuting solicitor who was also the Clerk to the Council to almost complete his evidence when I withdrew the plea and substituted one of guilty.

I spent twenty minutes making submissions in mitigation. I used extracts from Churchill's speech to the House on January 27, 1942, and then another speech he made at Harrow to the Boys, the purport of both speeches being a plea to respect conscience and not to yield to force.

I was very surprised when the bench without leaving and almost apologetically said I would be fined 40/-. The case was closed and then an amazing thing took place. The prosecuting solicitor jumped up and asked that an order be attached to the fine that I be also ordered to register. Against my protest this was done.

I immediately consulted a local solicitor as I felt certain that the Court had no power to make such an order and this proved to be correct. The result was that the order was amended from the word "Order" to the word "recommend"—really meaning of course nothing.

Yours fraternally in the Struggle,

J. ANDREWS.

Newton-le-Williws.

Dear Comrade,—I read your paper regularly and appreciate its contents. I procure my copy through the Newcastle Group of War Resisters, of which I am a member.

Yours fraternally,

H. KNAPMAN.

Dear Editor,—May I compliment you on the interesting, intelligent, much-needed points of view you have presented in "The Word." Good wishes!

Thanking you, yours faithfully,

A. G. BARNES.

Keswick.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I like the articles written by the Duke of Bedford in your journal very much.

I thank God that there is still an Englishman who has the courage and the wisdom to speak the Truth. It would seem that in the Duke's leadership, lies the only chance of salvation for the youth of Europe, who have not been crucified already, through the mistakes of politicians—"irresponsible people with bad records"!

So cunningly is attention focussed on Hitler and his misdeeds by those who do not themselves appear to be "without sin" and therefore privileged "to cast stones," that the mass of people have lost all sense of proportion and fail to appreciate the condition of slavery and loss of personal freedom.

Bedford will be a leader worth the following because one can feel his sincerity. Knowledge alone will not do, man must be converted to the cause.

I have come to the conclusion that we must have better men first, and then all things will be added unto us. I find great pleasure in reading "The Word"; there is much food for thought and inspiration within its pages.

I am a C.O. and was given conditional exemption by my Tribunal which of course is agricultural work. I close with wishing you best results for your journal.

Yours sincerely,

A. G. LEWIS.

Exeter.

Dear Guy,—May I take this opportunity of congratulating you on the high standard of interesting articles in "The Word."

I feel certain that the anti-militarist principle is the only way to freedom, and in these dark days, "The Word" gives me encouragement in my opposition to war.

Yours sincerely,

DENIS J. BRIAN.

London, S.E. 4.

Dear Editor,—Many thanks for "The Word." I am doing with it what we all should do, "Pass 'The Word' along." I recommend this as a useful slogan.

It seems to me that the time has come to officially regard the Duke of Bedford as the leader in struggle towards a Christian Commonwealth, the Prime Minister of Peace. His supporters include ex-Conservatives, ex-Labourites, ex-Liberals. It is quite obvious that the old system of party politics is obsolete. It always was a cumbersome arrangement. Bad clauses and unapproved party planks had to be supported against the conscience of individuals by order of party whips. I was brought up in a die-hard conservative atmosphere. During my apprenticeship I learned something of the Labour side. Neither party satisfies the seeker after Christian ideals. To-day, the official Labour Party is supporting the Armaments Gang and the Militarists, the Psalmist's company of Spearmen, and "them that delight in war." A few stand out in valiant opposition: R. R. Stokes, Rhys Davies, etc., and, among peers, the Duke and Lord Ponsonby.

I must say that I shy at the fact that "The Word" is an organ of The United Socialist Movement. This savours strangely of more party politics. Maybe the conservative inculcation dies hard.

In conclusion may I suggest the formation of a library whereby those interested in the abolition of war may read the books available on the subject. I take it these books are not written for personal gain but the enlightenment of the people. Thus would the object of their production be best achieved.

Yours faithfully,

E. VINCENT DAVIES.

Cwnbran, Mon.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been a member of the P.P.U. since it was founded. A month or two ago a C.O., on forestry work in the Lake district was advertising in "Peace News" for books. I have been in correspondence with him quite a lot since then. He asked me if I knew of "The Word" and sent me the December 1941 issue. The Duke of Bedford had sent him this copy and now I possess it, and hope to pass it along to someone else.

Do you mind me suggesting that you keep well to the fore the ethical side of articles in "The Word." I am a Christian Pacifist. I yet believe in the importance of the "Political" and "Economic" aspects of the issue between war and peace. We must combat the spirit of hate and revengefulness, however, that is being so continuously and unfortunately, so successfully put over to the public. We must be ready for Peace Terms, otherwise—1918 repeated! How impotent one feels at times and yet history so often can inform us that our ideals are not in vain.

Keep smiling! Each victory we win is a certain victory.

H. C. MARSHALL.

Bradford, Yorks.

Dear Sirs,—When I was in Glasgow, unfortunately, I did not see you personally. I saw your window displays outside your meeting hall. E. Armand has written me then (Summer 1939) and discussed you. Have you ever since heard of him? Do you know anything about the fate of Pierre Ramus? I come from the same town. I fear for both Armand and Ramus.

Sincerely yours,

L. SCHWARZ.

Christchurch, N.Z.

Sir,— "The Word" has to be admired and congratulated for the outspokenness of its policy, and because of the fact that it is one of the very few journals in this country in which freedom of expression is permitted. This fair minded view is a good thing for the people, and if the same facilities were offered by other publications it would lead to a better understanding among nations, and would tend to abolish "notions."

By allowing the publication of opposition as well as agreement, it has the advantage of removing any element of one-sidedness, and helps to satisfy our sense of all round fairplay. "Whit's guid tae gie isna ill tae tak," is an old Scots saying which still holds good to-day. The "Letters to the Editor" column where one may have his say, is really the Poor Man's Parliament.

There is no doubt that a continuously increasing number of readers follow up the controversies with keen interest, acquiring much knowledge, and what is of more importance is that they are helped to rid themselves of their "beliefs," which is very good, apart from the fun, excitement, and stimulation that argument provides.

Few resist the inclination to argue—sometimes with inexact or wrong information, and often with no acquaintance with the art of reasoning; it is therefore useful to have some knowledge of the rules of argument, and for that reason we welcome all forms of freedom: freedom of thought, freedom of speech; freedom of publication. We welcome everything and anything that will help to spread knowledge and kill superstition and ignorance—the latter being the cause of disease, poverty and war. As John Bright says—"Ignorance is the mother of prejudice, whether among nations or individuals."

With all best wishes to "The Word."

Faithfully yours,

J. HUMPHREY.

[Our comrade has sent us another letter, a vigorous but lengthy Freethought one, which will appear soon.—Ed.]

Dear Sir,—The undersigned, members of "Christianity Calling," desire to urge their fellow-Christians everywhere throughout the country and commonwealth to support the proposals now being pressed upon His Majesty's Government for mitigating our blockade of Europe, so as to permit a degree of controlled relief to the starving populations of the occupied countries. Whilst realising all the difficulties involved, we believe that the proposals can be so framed as to incur only a very small risk of such relief being abused.

We are convinced that a candid study of the matter will reveal the urgent moral obligation of Christian people to secure such an attempt. Delay will mean the sacrifice, among many others, of the lives of many thousands of innocent children.

Yours truly,

DOROTHEA GIBB (Lady GIBB).

REFLECTING ON THE EAST

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The war in the East continues to follow its unfortunate course, one of the worst features being our obvious failure, after years of occupation of our Asiatic possessions, to win the genuine regard of the native inhabitants. The latter resemble the donkey in the La Fontaine fable, who, when urged by his master to flee from some approaching robbers, replied, "Why should I flee? Will their burdens be heavier than yours? My master is my only foe." Although I was well aware of some of the shortcomings of British rule, I must say that the extent of our failure has caused even me some sadness and surprise. I thought that, in spite of the mistakes of their superiors, the good work done by minor officials would have gained for the British a warmer place in the hearts of a larger number of natives. That this has not been the case I attribute largely to the rotten financial system which we not only retained at home but introduced as far as possible into our Colonies and Dominions. This financial system, making it impossible to develop all available resources owing to lack of money, has prevented men of goodwill both at home and abroad from doing all that they desired to do to raise the standard of living of the poor and equip adequately the social services. It has also made taxation needlessly burdensome.

Mr. John McGovern, M.P., whose criticisms of the Government and the war sometimes exceed even my own in frankness, said in a recent speech that we have not the slightest chance of defeating both Germany and Japan by military methods alone and went on to add that only by a world Socialist revolution could Axis tyranny be overthrown. I do not share Mr. McGovern's optimism as to the chances of a world Socialist revolution while the war is still in progress, but I think he is quite right about the military situation and therefore favour negotiation on the basis of a fair sharing of the world's economic resources by all countries; abandonment of orthodox financial policy by the Democracies; and abandonment of interference with the political freedom of foreign countries by the Axis.

That we cannot defeat both Germany and Japan seems to be the growing belief of quite a number of non-pacifists for I find that some are now advocating peace with Germany in order that we may defeat Japan; while others want peace with Japan, in order that we may defeat Germany. Our warmongers still prattle cheerfully of the day when we shall drive Japan out of all the territory she has conquered. A little personal experience of what white men have to endure when engaged in warfare in tropical countries against an enemy armed with modern weapons would, I think, do them good. Serious as is the material loss of our Eastern possessions, the remote chance of their recovery would not be worth the appalling cost in human life and suffering, especially as the people who have a natural right to the territory do not really want us back in their country.

It is a sorry business, but when nations or individuals choose to indulge in folly, selfishness, or mental laziness on a grand scale, the price that has to be paid at the finish is apt to be a heavy one. One small crumb of consolation is to be found in the fact that it is not always necessary to own a country in order to obtain its products. If in peace time we can make any goods which are desired by the people of those Eastern lands we formerly owned we may be able to secure at least a share of their exports by way of trade. If we succeed in doing this, it will be, in the long run, a fairer arrangement than that which has operated under the overseas investment plan which has too often been accompanied by unjust exploitation of native labour.

CHANNEL ISLANDERS

LORD PORTSEA'S APPEAL

Lord Portsea's powerful House of Lords plea on behalf of "the loyal islanders of Jersey and Guernsey" will appear in the next issue of "The Word," unless, in the interval, some steps have been taken to save the families remaining there, especially the children, from starvation.

In the Lords debate, Lord Snell stated that it was impossible to send help, and implied that Lord Portsea's statement was exaggerated, probably through over-anxiety. If this is the official attitude it is only right that the public should judge. The Government statements and Lord Portsea's statement must be put before them. We incline strongly to support Lord Portsea's view. The matter is urgent.

Readers interested, and unable to wait until July, should obtain House of Lords, Official Report, vol. 122, No. 44, for Wednesday, April 22, 1942, direct from H.M. Stationery Office, York House, Kingsway, London, W.2. The cost is 7d. post free. There was a previous discussion on January 22, when the Duke of Devonshire replied to Lord Portsea. It might be as well to order the report for that date as well.

ROBERT CAMPBELL EXEMPTED

In our February issue we dealt with the case of our 24-year-old Rutherglen comrade, Robert Campbell, then serving a sentence of military detention at Northallerton. At that time Campbell had served two prison sentences and two sentences of military detention. Shortly after the article was published, Campbell's sentence was remitted, he was returned to his regiment, re-courtmartialled, and senteneed to two years' imprisonment in a civil prison. On April 29, the North of England Appellate Tribunal for conscientious objectors, sitting in Manchester, ordered his discharge from the Army. Campbell was represented by Stuart Morris, chairman of the Peace Pledge Union.

Mr. Morris said that Campbell registered as a conscientious objector in 1939. When his firm began doing war work he left his job. The Glasgow Tribunal removed him from the register of conscientious objectors, and the Scottish Appellate Tribunal dismissed his appeal. For refusing medical examination, he was sentenced to a £5 fine or ten days imprisonment, and served the imprisonment in Barlinnie Prison. Afterwards he accepted medical examination, and was posted to a Training Regiment of the Royal Artillery.

Stuart Morris detailed Campbell's Courtsmartial and sentences. He concluded:

"That is this man's rather grim but in some ways rather fine record. It is only what would be expected from a man of his views."

The Tribunal ordered that Campbell should be registered in the register of conscientious objectors on condition that he does land work or hospital or ambulance work, or relief work under the Friends' War Relief Service.

F. W. Jowett: A Small Tribute

To The Editor.

Adherence to a set of principles is the most admirable quality of man; and Jowett is one of the best examples of our times in that connection. Whilst others with whom he has worked have thought fit to allow events to control their actions Jowett insists instead on trying to harness events. Without that quality which persists in a few men in every generation the lot of the workers in every part of the world would be grave. In short, Ghandi is much more important to the modern world than Wavell, the British General. The one will leave his mark on the future of mankind; the other will be plastered with medals maybe but his deeds will die with him. Jowett belongs to that school of philosophers who do not mind being unpopular when principles are at stake, and we thank him for standing like Daniel of old against the foul things that are done in our day and generation.

LABOUR & WAR

A Reply to Sir P. J. DOLLAN

By

The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT

(FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS, 1924 LABOUR GOVERNMENT).

[The following essay was published by our comrade Jowett in the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for Friday, May 8, 1942.]

In the Glasgow Forward (April 25th) P. J. Dollan attacked the I.L.P. for opposing the Government at the Cathcart bye-election.

Dollan, like many another prominent Labour Party supporters of the Government and its war policy, was anti-war and anti-government in the first world war. In Dollan's case as in others the swing-over from anti-war to pro-war is thorough-going and unconditional. They are bitter-enders in this war, whatever it may cost the common people of all lands, in years of devestation and starvation, blood, toil, tears and sweat, to carry the war to its bitter end.

There is, of course, nothing to be ashamed of in changing one's opinion. But if the change of opinion is on some vital issue of public importance (change for example from anti-war to pro-war) it does seem to me to lie as a DUTY, on party leaders and the like, to EXPLAIN QUITE CLEARLY AND FRANKLY THE FULL EXTENT OF THE CHANGE AND THEIR REASONS FOR CHANGING.

Unfortunately, last war's pacifists and anti-war Socialists who are bitter-enders in this war almost invariably ignore this obligation to the public they desire to lead. I am sorry to say, judging by his article in Forward "MY VOTE IN CATHCART," Sir Patrick Dollan is not one of the exceptions. I think if I take the main points in Dollan's article and give my reply to them separately the result will show why I say so.

Point (1)

"The National Government was formed with the approval of the Labour Party who refused to accept Cabinet responsibility for the war when Mr. Chamberlain was Prime Minister. As soon as he was replaced by Mr. Winston Churchill, the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress agreed to participate in the Government, and, since then, have been responsible with the other parties for the formulation of its policy."

"The Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress are both pledged to support the prosecution of the war until the Nazi and Fascist Dictatorships are defeated. THOSE WHO ARE OPPOSED TO NAZISM AND FASCISM MUST LOGICALLY ADOPT A SIMILAR ATTITUDE."
(My Capitals)

Reply to Point (1)

This statement, which is made as if it were a statement of fact is merely an arrogant assumption. It is no nearer the truth to say that whoever is opposed to Nazism and Fascism must logically support the Government in this war than it was to say whoever was opposed to the Kaiser's militarism in the last war had the duty, logically, to support the Government in the last war.

In the last war there were people who, although they were bitterly opposed to the Kaiser's militarism — as they were also to British militarism—held the belief that WAR WOULD NOT DEFEAT THE KAISER'S GERMAN MILITARISM. They held that belief quite logically. DOLLAN WAS ONE OF THEM.

AND THEY WERE RIGHT. War to the bitter end to defeat the Kaiser's Germany, intensified militarism not only in Germany, but here, in France, in Poland. It created more acute causes and excuses for dissension, and more preparations for war in Europe than there were before the war.

Now Dollan is quite entitled to change his attitude concerning war and to conclude that this war is essentially different from the one which he unconditionally opposed, but to say that because the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress are pledged to support the war all who are opposed to Nazism and Fascism must, logically, also support the war is just simply nonsense.

The Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress SUPPORTED THE LAST WAR, and Dollan himself would have said it was nonsense if anybody had been foolish enough to tell him it was his duty logically to follow their example.

Point (2)

"Bailie James Carmichael, the I.L.P. candidate, like some other pacifist socialists, has abandoned internationalism for the period of the war. He has, apparently, been converted to the pre-war isolation policy of Lord Beaverbrook, and wants socialism for Britain as the prelude to socialism for other countries."

Reply to Point (2)

There is not the slightest resemblance between Beaverbrook's pre-war isolation policy, and the policy of the I.L.P., and of course Dollan knows there isn't. Beaverbrook's policy was to isolate Britain with her Dominions and semi-slave dependencies within a tariff wall, in which enclosed space British industrialists and British financiers could operate without rivals. The I.L.P. policy is VOLUNTARY LIQUIDATION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE, and beginning to apply socialism in this country, as an example and a guarantee to the people of Germany and elsewhere.

Now Dollan is quite entitled to believe that such a proof of the sincerity of British peace aims would have no effect on the peoples of, say, Germany and Italy; and to give reasons for his belief, but HE IS NOT ENTITLED TO MISREPRESENT THE PROPOSAL by associating it with the pre-war isolation policy of Lord Beaverbrook.

Point (3)

"Russia, defending a workers' state against Capitalist dictatorship, would be deserted if the British electors accepted I.L.P. guidance." . . .

"The I.L.P. in Cathcart ask the British workers to desert their comrades in all democratic countries attacked by the Nazis and Fascists."

Reply to Point (3)

Ex-Lord Provost Dollan makes this assertion on the assumption that the German and Italian peoples (without whose support the whole world war would collapse) would be unaffected by proposals for peace put forward by a British Government which itself was beginning to voluntarily liquidate its empire and establish socialism. He says in reply to Maxton on this point that the method had failed before. This is not true. The mediation and conciliation offered to protect Czecho-Slovakia and Poland, which is mentioned in this connection, have no relation whatever to the I.L.P. proposal for a peace offer by a British Government actually proving by its example the sincerity of its anti-imperialist and truly socialist object in its proposal for an agreed peace.

Dollan may hold the view that notwithstanding the bitter experience of the German people in over two and a half years of war (the awful terror of the first winter campaign in Russia to be followed possibly by at least another)—the working people of Germany would be unaffected by such a peace offer; but HE IS NOT ENTITLED FALSELY TO SAY IT HAS BEEN TRIED AND FAILED. He might think it would fail if it were tried, and say so. That would stand as his opinion. We of the I.L.P., on the contrary, believe it is, to say the least, highly probable that the German peoples' response to a British call for peace that will challenge the world to a new social order by example would DEPRIVE HITLER AND HIS NAZI GOVERNMENT OF THE SUPPORT NECESSARY TO CARRY ON THE WAR.

Where does Hitler get the support necessary to carry on the war? The support necessary to GAIN POWER he got from the big industrialists, and from numbers of middle-class young men without prospects—two classes which saw in Fascism an opening, for themselves at any rate, out of the economic prison in which they were penned. We cannot hope to influence people of this type. But for carrying on the war, Hitler must have, and now has, the support of the great majority of the German people. How does he get that support?

HE GETS IT FROM THE SAME SOURCE AS CHURCHILL GETS HIS SUPPORT IN THIS COUNTRY. Here, as there, the common people are afraid that a victory for the other side would mean markets and currencies rigged against them, raw materials and even food denied to them and their industries and abject poverty for the people. The German people believe this would be their fate if thy overthrew Hitler. It was their fate 24 years ago when they overthrew the Kaiser.

The I.L.P. proposals would cut the ground from under Hitler's feet in every factory in Germany. It is nonsense for Dollan to talk of deserting our Russian comrades; for in fact Russia has already done what the I.L.P. proposes to do: she has established socialism in her own country; renounced her empire; and by Stalin's magnificent Order of the Day, she has assured the German people that her only aim is to expel the Fascist invaders from her soil and that SHE DOES NOT WISH TO DESTROY THE GERMAN STATE (although, if in the process of expelling the Germans from Russia the Nazi clique should be overthrown, Stalin would welcome it). This is not in any way inconsistent with James Maxton's attitude, which Dollan condemns.

Ex-Lord Provost Dollan finishes his Forward article attacking the I. L. P. with an appeal to the British wirking-class "not to abandon the struggle NOW WHEN IT IS BEGINNING TO SHOW SIGNS OF SUCCESS."

This, forsooth, is what he has the temerity to say when the British Imperialist Empire is in what appears to be the last stages of COMPULSORY LIQUIDATION!

AGENT PROVOCATEUR

By

The Rev. HUMPHREY CHALMERS, M.A.

(Minister, Hill Cliffe Baptist Church, Warrington.)

It could not happen to-day. At least need not: so it may be a matter of purely academic and historical interest to place on record something which occurred in 1917, when there also was a war to make the world safe for democracy.

In response to a knock I opened my door to discover a tall, large-boned man on the step. Under his arm he carried a bulky parcel tied up in brown paper. He was dressed in a greyish fawn suit of tweed and his general appearance—including feet—was such that I at once classed him as "plain clothes detective."

"Does the Reverend Chalmers live here?"

"You're addressing him."

"Can I speak to you in private?"

"Come inside."

As soon as he had entered my visitor enquired in a stage whisper whether I was "the clergyman who helped conscientious objectors."

"Not clergyman." I corrected. "Baptist minister. Still, you're near enough."

"That's what I've come for—help. I am a conscientious objector."

"Are you indeed? And what's your special difficulty?"

At that the professed C.O. made a great show of listening and looking round my small room which could scarcely have concealed a cat. "Are you sure we shall not be overheard?" I am putting my life in your hands."

With my suspicion undiminished I replied, "Nobody can hear us. Fire away."

"I'm a conscientious objector. I joined up in 1914 in the 2nd Grenadier Guards, believing this to be a just war, but my eyes have been opened."

"What opened them?"

"In France, in a Y.M.C.A. hut, I read Tolstoy's 'War and Peace' from the library and that converted me.

"Some story," I thought. "That is one book you would be safe not to find in such a place." However, keeping my doubts to myself, I enquired, "Then, why are you not in khaki?" In those days men on leave were not permitted to wear "civvies."

"That's it, Sir. I'm a deserter and I want your help."

"But what about yourself? You know you are liable to the death penalty. Have you counted the cost?"

"Yes, I have" — boldness and determination duly registered—"I am prepared to die, but there's my poor old mother. I would break her heart." The heroic pose was discarded and the hero appeared to weep profusely.

"That's a bad business," I sympathised. "But I don't yet see what I am to do about it. You did not come here just for sympathy or to invite me to visit your mother."

"No, Sir. No, Sir. You see, I can get away with it but for one thing. I have a friend. Food manufacturer in a big way. All his men are exempt from military service. One of them has died and the authorities have failed to collect his Registration Card. My friend will let me have it and I'll take the name and the job."

"Well," said I, "that is your affair. I doubt whether you really can get away with it, and if you are caught you will be shot for certain, whereas, if you go back and give yourself up, you may escape with a sentence of several years. Besides, is it really conscientious to sail under false colours? However, that is for yourself to decide. Anyhow, where do I come in?"

"It's all right. I can do it, but there's my uniform. If I were taken with it I should be done for. It's here in this parcel. Now if you are to help conchies, take it and burn it in your kitchen range."

"No." I objected. "I am not prepared to do that. But I'll give you a letter now to the honorary solicitor to the No-Conscription Fellowship, John's Buildings, Adelphi. Get on the number 77 bus at the end of this street. Alight at Charing Cross and go straight to the N.C.F. office and you will be given free the best legal advice."

"You don't seem inclined to do much yourself."

"I am prepared to consider any advice the solicitor gives me as to helping you.

"Is that all? Here I am risking my life. Won't you take any risks?"

"My dear man, I have taken and expect to take more risks than you can guess, but I have to be sure first that the risks are necessary.

"Won't you break the law? Is that all you can say to a man who may be shot next week?"

"Of course I will break man's law every time that is necessary for observing God's law. All Christian martyrs have done so. I hope I can face martyrdom if I have to, but I am not going out to look for it."

"Well then," he whined. "At least let me leave my khaki here while I go to the office. It is too dangerous to be carrying it about with me."

"It is no greater danger than bringing it here. Take it away."

He wept, or appeared to. He pleaded. Then he swore and called me coward and hypocrite whom he would expose to every Pacifist in the country. At last I ordered him to leave. He moved slowly to the door, still abusing me in pungent Billingsgate. He slyly dropped his parcel on a chair. I restored it to him. Then he slipped it behind the front door and hastily made for the gate.

"Hoi!" I shouted, "You've left something."

He turned, and, to save his head, fielded the unwieldy bundle. Before closing the door I glanced up and down the street. There were two uniformed policemen fifty yards to the right, two the same distance to the left and two directly opposite. As my visitor passed the first two he shook his head.

What would have happened if I had kept the parcel for five minutes? Well, I ask you.

However, as I remarked to begin with, it need not happen now. In twenty-five years we have made progress. There is no necessity in these days for agents provocateurs to entrap people into breeches of the law. Regulation 18B. avoids all that fuss. Ask Mr Herbert Morrison. He was a conchie at the time of which I write.

IN THE BAHAMAS.

The Legislative Council of the Bahamas has rejected a proposal made by the Governor, the Duke of Windsor, that a minimum wage of 6/- a day should be introduced for native labourers.

The Legislature also rejected proposals made by the Duke for public work schemes for the unemployed, and tax reductions to reduce the cost of living.

Our sympathies are with the Duke of Windsor. Recent events have no lessons for the persons who rejected his proposals. Even these do not err on the side of excessive remuneration.

WAR: A STUDY IN FACT

By RUDOLF ROCKER

Rudolf Rocker

[In our March issue we published Rudolf Rocker's mildly pro-war "Thoughts on British Imperialism," and also a reply made to him in the New York L'Adunata dei Refrattan (The call of the Refractaires). Our American comrade, Marcus Graham, has taken up the case against Rocker and his article, entitled "The Issues of the Present War," appears in War Commentary for Mid-May, 1942, Vol. 3, No. 12. Before the outbreak of the first world war we incurred great hatred among our fellow-Anarchists for announcing that Kropotkin intended to go pro-war. Our organ, The Herald of Revolt, was boycotted and denounced. We were right and in time the Kropotkinists, without surrendering their hatred, had to recognise the fact. Later we were marched in handcuffs across Exeter whilst a pro-war meeting in London was cheering a letter from Kropotkin urging that the Russian Revolution meant an intensified war. At a later date we read Kropotkin's terrible speech of Imperialism delivered in Russia on his return. These performances did not prevent the Anarchists acclaiming what was indeed a worthless philosophy and propaganda, since the chief apostle of the cause could not last the distance or even make an effort to stand firm in the hour of crisis. The essence of Anarchism, whether Communist or Individualist, is Anti-Militarism.

Before his internment as an enemy alien in 1915, Rudolf Rocker answered Kropotkin's militarism very effectively in the columns of the London Jewish Anarchist organ, The Workers Friend, in two essays, entitled "A Study In Fact." These articles were translated from the Yiddish, by our Glasgow comrade, Freda Cohen, and published, abridged slightly, in The Spur, for March and June, 1915 (Vol. I, Nos. 9 and 12). They answered Kropotkin in 1914, and despite the Fascism and Nazism form of the Great War, they answer Rocker to-day. In his much quoted letter to Steffen, Kropotkin dwelt upon the reactionary advice William I. offered to Alexander III. in 1881. Against that Rocker quotes from Kropotkin's Memoirs where the character of William's advice is stated to be directly opposite of reactionary. Rocker cites from Kropotkin's pamphlet Modern Wars and Captialism the passage about the English bourgeoisie desiring to set back development in Germany and to break her fleet as they had acted twice before with Russia. These extracts were quoted, and the same points made by us in an editorial essay previously published in The Spur. For this reason, and because Kropotkin's pamphlet was circulated so widely, we deleted them from Rocker's article as being unnecessary.—Ed.]

FIRST ESSAY.

The present attitude of our old comrade, Kropotkin, towards the present catastrophe has caused great chaos in the Anarchist movement. The Anarchist press, in those countries where our papers can yet appear, are engaged with Kropotkin's views on the war; and in several countries, particularly in Italy, the polemic has taken on rather a bitter character. As it happens, the majority of known comrades in France, with the exception of Sebastian Faure, Victor Dave and a few others, are of Kropotkin's opinion, as also are a great number of Russian comrades, particularly those in France.

In Spain and Italy, the majority of our comrades, with the exception of a few individualists, disciples of Stirner and Nietzsche—also an irony of history—are decidedly against Kropotkin. The same is the case with our comrades in Switzerland, Holland, and the majority in England. The opinions of our comrades in Germany, Austro-Hungary, and Bohemia we do not as yet know, as the war has destroyed all our communications with these countries; also our press has been suppressed since before the actual outbreak of war.

Kropotkin developed his present attitude in three articles that appeared in the Russian press and also in a voluminous private correspondence, particularly in his letter to the Swedish professor, Steffen, part of which was published in the civil as well as the Anarchist press. From what we have seen, it seems to us that the letter to Steffen, represents Kropotkin's views on the European situation most completely.

There can be no doubt whatever, that the views Kropotkin develops in that letter, are the most complete negation to all he has written before on the character and cause of modern war. We will not talk here of his article on war that appeared in the Parisian Revolte about thirty years ago. Kropotkin maintained the same views but a short time back. The French edition of his last work Modern Science and Anarchism, contains four excellent chapters on the cause of war. Kropotkin, himself, had translated into English the last portion of this work only six months before the war broke out, and the already named four chapters were issued in a separate brochure entitled, Wars and Capitalism.

In a most brilliant way, Kropotkin expounds therein, the real cause of modern war. He unmasks all the hidden intrigues of high finance, the secret diplomacy of the great armament manufacturers, and of the mercenary bourgeois press, and shows us, that state and capitalism, are the everlasting cause of all wars, and the so-called "armed peace."

But Kropotkin does not deal only with war in general. In the chapter, "War and Industry," he exposes the underground forces that have been at work in the present war. The fact is, Kropotkin was one of the few Socialists who has maintained always that a European war is unavoidable. Only, six months before, our old comrade was certainly not of the opinion that the sole responsibility for the present catastrophe, fell on Germany, exclusively on Germany. How he can reconcile his present attitude with what he himself wrote then, we cannot say, and we are convinced that Kropotkin could not either. A whole abyss lies behind the opinions which he advanced then, and those he urges to-day.

We have no intention of defending Germany. We are acquainted too well with the junkerist regime, and the internal spirit of German militarism. We know the character of the reaction in Germany; we felt it personally. But when to the whole of Europe to fight against the German Huns in the name of the Higher Culture, then it is not only the worst negation of his former efforts, but a point of view which can be explained only through a most extreme one-sidedness. If there is any difference between Germany and the other states, then it is only a difference of degree, but surely not a difference in the real spirit, which is the same in all states. The present war has been prepared for the last twelve or fifteen years, and it has been prepared by all big states in Europe without exception. Kropotkin's own explanation about the secret negotiations between Lord Lansdowne and Delcassé is the best evidence for the truth of our contention. The present war differs from all former wars only in the awfulness of its consequences, but in no way in its internal character. It is the outcome of the same material interests of the possessing classes in the various countries, like all the other wars, and all the contentions about the "cultural meaning" of the present war are no more than idealistic masks, with which they always have sought to justify organised wholesale manslaughter. Tragic only is the fact that a man like Kropotkin, one of the best and noblest men of our age, supports to-day the same idealistic mask of the real cause of the war, which he himself formerly tried at every opportunity to tear off.

When reading Kropotkin's letter to Steffen, one would imagine that Germany is the only danger in Europe, the embodiment of the whole reaction, the everlasting spirit of war. But during the forty-three years that the present Germany has existed, she has never yet been involved in war. During this period Russia had two wars; France three; England had the South African war, not to mention her minor wars; Italy attacked Tripoli; Spain went to war with America, etc.

By this, we do not mean to infer that Germany, that is the German Government, is more peace loving, or better than others. By no means! We know quite well that the German Government all the time has made preparations for a war, exactly like her rivals in East and West. But this shows us that the other States know their business just as well as the German State, and that wars have been, and will continue to be, with and without Germany. This again shows us that all Kropotkin formerly wrote about the character of modern war was right, and is right in every instance.

Kropotkin declares that the annexation of Alsace Lorraine was the cause of the terrible development of militarism in Europe; that France was forced to develop a strong army to defend her national independence; and that the other States were forced to follow Germany in the strengthening of militarism. Yes, that is our opinion as well, and that was the opinion of Bebel and Liebknecht, and the majority of Socialists and revolutionaries after the Franco-German war.

But why does Kropotkin forget to mention, that the French Republic has not only used her army to defend her national independence against Germany? She has also used her army to attack Tonkin, Tunis, and Morocco, just like the armies of the Kaiser have attacked Belgium. Since the Franco-German war, France has subjected thirty-million people, with the help of her army, for the exploitation of her capitalists. All the other States have done likewise without any exception.

This very negation, this sudden change of Kropotkin's ideas concerning the war, has astonished most of our comrades, and some of his intimate friends. The majority are even yet of the opinion, that his feelings, the impression the terrible news of the inhuman deeds in Belgium made on him, were the cause of his changed attitude. Those who are in any way acquainted with our old comrade, know, that such an opinion is justified to a certain degree. Besides, most of us who know him intimately, know from personal experience, of the last few months, how deep that impression is. But we believe that this is not the only explanation. Those who are familiar with his ideas, know that he worked out a complete theory about the "Historical Mission of the French." Though he is not really the founder of that theory—we find it in the writings of Bakunin and other Internationalists—Kropotkin is undoubtedly the one who finally developed it.

Kropotkin—and here we are in absolute agreement with him—holds that the history of the reaction begins with the fall of the old communistic and federal period, and with the rise of the modern State in the fifteenth and sixteenth century. The epoch of the sixteenth, seventeenth and nearly the whole of the eighteenth century, was that of the triumph of the monarchial absolutism and feudalistic slavery in Europe, and the victory of barbarism over the highly developed social culture of the communes of the middle ages.

The only sunbeams in those dark ages were the great uprisings of the peasantry in various countries, and the revolution in Holland and England. But the French Revolution had the greatest influence on the cultural development of the whole of Europe. It was the expression of the renaissance in Europe, the beginning of a new historical era. Its consequences were not felt in France only, as was the case with the revolutions in Holland and England, which had only an influence on those countries. No! it has left its impression on all other countries, and in that sense, it was a real European Revolution.

The study of the great French Revolution had a very powerful, if not the most powerful influence on Kropotkin. As far back as the eighties, he published his two large brochures on this momentous event. His numerous books, pamphlets, and articles, are replete with analogies drawn from the revolutionary period. His complete work, "The French Revolution," is one of the best and most interesting books that have been written, as yet, on that great historical epoch.

There are people who are so engaged in the minute detail of a certain historical epoch, that they lose all perspective, and are unable to recognise the main lines, and the general picture of the conserving period. "They cannot see the forest for many trees." Kropotkin does not belong to that category of historians; but he often falls into the other extreme. He sees the main lines of an epoch and forgets the details. Kropotkin very often thinks in epochs, and has no eye for the detailed scenery of the historical drama. In some instances it is a great advantage, but it carries one very easily to false conclusions. We were always of the opinion that the theoretical fatalism of the German Socialists is a great obstacle to revolutionary initiative; but we believe that the fatalism of those who expect the millenium from the "historical mission of the French," is no less dangerous than that of the Germans.

We feel the greatest admiration and sympathy for the French and all the grand deeds of its noblest elements. We marvel at the revolutionary spirit and creative power of the French workers. But we also know that the spirit of a nation—if we can speak, at all, of the general spirit in a nation—is not always the same, especially in a society that is divided into so many different classes, and so many antagonistic forces, aims, and ideals. The French nation make no exception to that rule. The same nation that renewed Europe with its revolution, has thrown itself, more than once, body and soul into the abyss of reaction. The same French nation that created the revolutions of 1789, 1830, 1848, and 1871, immediately after the revolution of 1848 elected Louis Bonaparte as President of the Republic, and everyone understood what the results of Bonaparte's victory might be. And when Boneparte made his famous plebiscite, to see whether France preferred living under a monarchy or a republic, eight million voted for a king, and only 230,000 were against. Under the reigh of Napoleon the third, the whole of the Socialist and democratic movement ceased. All Socialist papers were suppressed, a whole literature—the richest that Socialism has produced in Europe—simply disappeared, and is only now being re-discovered. The whole of France was diffused with the pestilence of the meanest police systems that one can imagine, and for over twenty years Napoleon was the most influential representative of the reaction in Europe.

And all this happened before the existence of a German military state, as to-day, that could force the French to bend under such a reaction.

No! There are no "chosen nations," and the French have as little monopoly of the revolution as the Germans of the reaction. We do not believe that France has the historical mission to free the world, just as we do not believe that Germany has the mission to enslave her.

Has it not always been one of the special functions of every state, to interfere in the internal struggles of other countries, to help the reactionary parties to suppress the revolutionary movements, so long as there was a possibility of doing so, and so long as it was also favourable to its own interests? Since the raid of the united reactionary armies on the French Republic at the time of the great Revolution, the same phenomenon has manifested itself in the majority of revolutionary and insurrectionary movements in Europe; and more than once have those very free Countries of Western Europe, France and England, betrayed the hopes of the revolutionaries in other countries. Those who are at all familiar with the histories of Portugal, Spain, and Italy, know that our assertion is only too well founded.

If the clerical and monarchical reaction is still triumphant in Spain, it is not the fault of the Spanish people who have attempted through a whole series of uprisings, conspiracies, and revolutions, to free itself from its executioners. But the majority of those uprisings were suppressed in a bloody fashion through French and English interests. In 1820, when Riego raised the flag of the revolution and proclaimed the Constitution of Cadiz, Spain was the freest country in Europe. The prisons were opened, and all the political prisoners set free; the Inquisition was abolished, and the Jesuits driven out of the country. The Liberal Party worked out the famous school-law to break the influence of the monarchy and the clergy. The press was freed, and the right of free speech and organisation became one of the fundamental principles of the Spanish Constitution. Ferdinand the VII himself became constitutional, and swore to observe the famous constitution of 1812. It is hardly credible the change there was in a few short months.

But in 1825, a French army of 80,000 men marched over the Spanish border, under the protection of free England to help Ferdinand to suppress the Spanish Constitution. Riego and his friends were murdered in a most terrible way. 44,000 people filled the prisons. The inquisition was re-established, and thus began the epoch that has not had its equal even in the most barbaric and brutal episodes of the Russian reaction.

If England had only the will she could have prevented, easily, the attack of Austria on Italy at this same period, in order to crush the revolution. But the English Government supported the "Holy Alliance," rather than the struggle of the Italians for a constitution.

And was it not English and German battleships that helped the Spanish Government in 1873, to suppress the revolutionary commune of Catachena, the last fortress of the Communistic Revolution in Spain?

Portugal had to live through the worst reactionary period through "English interests," and the leaders of the last revolution had first of all to give England all necessary guarantees for the safety of her interests, before they could begin their fight against the monarchy.

The disgraceful role England played recently against the Persian constitutionalists, is too well known to require repetition. The fact is, that every state, especially every big state, has been and always will be a danger to every revolution. Germany makes absolutely no exception to this rule.

ANARCHISM AND WAR

In our March issue we drew attention to the fact that Rudolf Rocker was supporting Imperialism and war. In its issue for Mid-May 1942, War Commentary reluctantly admits the fact. In an editorial it says :—

"On the opposite page we publish the first of a series of articles by Marcus Graham on 'The Issues of the Present War.' These articles were written to rebut the charges made by Rudolf Rocker that the Anarchist theory regarding war has no application to the present struggle. It is with great regret that we have to record that so old and respected a militant in the Anarchist movement should have taken up a position of support for capitalist war. It is not, unfortunately, the first time that war has split the Anarchist movement. . . . And we can state that the attitude taken by Rocker is shared only by a minority in the Anarchist movement both here and elsewhere.

"In the last war the anti-war marxists who followed Lenin made a bitter denunciation of those few anarchists who supported the Allies. But we do not admit the right of Socialists, least of all Marxists, to criticise the Anarchists in this regard. Anarchism has always taught that wars are fought between capitalist ruling groups for states in which the workers have no interest. We have always urged the workers to refuse to slaughter their class-brothers to serve the ends of the ruling class. It is for us to attack our fellow anarchists when they depart from teaching."

What nonsense! Why should not Socialists, who oppose war in war-time, or even Christians who do so, attack Anarchists, who cry Anti-Militarism in peace-time and war in war-time? Why should such Anarchists be allowed to continue to masquerade as Anarchists when, obviously, they are nothing of the kind? We wonder if the five-minutes Anarchists, who from time to time speak so pompously as Anarchists, would regret to record the fact that we were supporting a Capitalist Imperialist War if we were in that position. Would they not rather rejoice at an opportunity of attacking us, and give no heed to our years of Anti-Militarist struggles, imprisonments, and untiring propaganda? The commentary of these people is one of nauseating cant. Kropotkin spent the last active years of his life a war-monger. He left Britain a war-monger. He arrived in Russia a war-monger. The Anarchist Movement ought to have dropped him from its calendar of saints long since, just as even the parliamentary socialists ought to have dropped Ramsay MacDonald and Philip Snowden long before they formed and pioneered the reactionary National Government of 1931. If Anarchism is not proof against militarist crisis then, as a philosophy of life and action, it is in the same category as Socialism, Atheism and Christianity: just as good and just as worthless. Why a renegade must not be attacked by a parliamentary Socialist but only by an Anarchist we cannot understand. Humanity is greater than any ism and the proletariat is more important than any faction of the Socialist Movement. Lenin was quite right to attack pro-war Anarchists and we are quite right to attack the Stalinist war-mongers and even the Trotskyist compromisers with militarism. Lenin was right, and Kropotkin was wrong. To-day Rocker is wrong.

Marcus Graham quotes this passage from Rocker :

"That the present war . . . cannot be measured with the standards of past military conflicts, is beginning to be realised even by those who believe, that historical facts can be denied through aged theories."

Graham comments :

"So Rocker begins his dictum article 'The Order of the Hour.' First, he declares the attitude of the anarchist 'theories' as 'aged,' that is, no longer valid. Secondly, he charges some in our movement with using 'aged theories' in order to 'deny historical facts,' and winds up this accusation with the assertion that even all such have also 'realised' this.

"In so far as Rocker attempts to include everyone in the anarchist movement as holding now the same position as he does, he does not back this up by a single proof."

Graham proceeds to state that, in the main, Anarchists throughout the world, have remained true to their ideas. He continues :

"There are few, very few, exceptions. There is the organ of the Jewish speaking anarchists in the United States on whose pages Rocker's article originally appeared. It takes the same position as Rocker. And there is also G. Maximov, the editor of the Russian anarchist language organ in the U.S., who has taken a similar position on the pages of the same publication in which Rocker wrote.

"Rocker's sweeping statement, quoted above, is then, to say the least, a misstatement of the factual situation."

Graham makes some splendid extracts tending to show that the war is not a war of democracy against fascism but an Imperialist-Capitalist struggle, camouflaged as a war of principle.

He quotes from an article contributed to the United States paper, Fortune, for January, 1942, by an attorney named John Foster Dulles:

"The outbreak of the second world war was preceded by trade strangulation without precedent in the time of peace. No one can doubt that this was a contributing cause of the war. It is demonstrable that trade controls relate directly to peace. . . . There is in Japan a population of 75 millions occupying an area smaller than California. Japan is almost barren of natural resources. . . . It must have large exports. Otherwise they cannot pay for their needed imports. Without such means of payment Japan is in effect blockaded."

He shows how the idea of Balance of Power move democratic and fascist ruling classes equally. He quotes "Argus," from The Christian Science Monitor for December 11, 1941:

"This policy, though it has had different names at different times, has always been some form of balance of power. . . . Britain has not always tried for the same balance. When Russia, by the treaty of San Stefano in 1878, threatened to increase its hold on the Balkans, bringing it close to Constantinople, Britain joined Germany in blocking the move. When Germany began warring over the Berlin to Bagdad Railway in 1914, Britain joined with Russia to block the move. Despite reshufflings, however, the principle of the balance remained. . . . Ever since Lord Salisbury in 1902 dignified the oriental island kingdom with a treaty virtually guaranteeing it a free hand in the Far East, British imperialists have looked upon the Japanese not only to safeguard their Far Eastern possessions, but more especially to prevent the general balance by serving as a check on Russia who, whether friendly or otherwise, whether Czarist or Stalinist, was so huge and so eager for a warm port around the East Mediterranean. . . . To-day Russia is the ally: Japan is the enemy, with Tokio's policy expanding far beyond its early role of obliging a zealous collaborator. . . . If Japan were to develop ambitions, however, they were not likely to be held in check either by the British or by the French, who also needed Japan's co-operation for maintaining the security of their empire in Indo-China. . . . The British treaty . . . virtually guaranteed Japan freedom from British interference in any adventure against China or Russia . . . so Japan, with Britain's blessing walked into China and out of the League (of Nations) . . . But Japan intimated that it considered Britain's star in the Pacific to be on the decline, and in 1936 signed the anti-Comintern Pact with Hitler, soon setting out upon the full invasion of China. . . . As recently as July, 1940, the present Churchill Government made a further attempt at appeasement by closing the Burma Road to Chinese supplies. . . . It was this process that first opened the way for an aggressive policy, not only in Japan, but also Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany. In each case the needs of balancing up have caused imperialist to overlook initial lawless moves that have led to the appaling conditions that now face the world."

This quotation is unanswerable. It silences every Imperialist, whether Christian, Atheist, Socialist, or Anarchist. It shows the question that has to be solved, in equity, between the peoples of the earth. It leaves no room for reluctance to repudiate renegades, over-age Anarchist Imperialists, who are as busily recruiting the youths of the world to death as any jingo of the old-time Capitalist-Militarist political parties.

Native Labour Conscription

CREECH JONES and KENYA

Our comrade, A. Creech Jones, M.P., has made himself not only an authority on the native conditions in Africa, but is the outstanding champion of their rights and enemy of their wrongs in the public life of Britain. It is impossible to keep up with his questions in the House of Commons and his contributions to the press.

In the "Manchester Guardian" for March 23 last our comrade contributed the following letter on the subject of Native or African Labour Conscription in Kenya:—

Sir,—The new measure of conscription of African labour to work on European farms in Kenya has aroused misgivings and protests. I was informed in the House of Commons that the step is necessary because Kenya must help to supply one of the theatres of war. However strongly one may agree that the issues of this war are of vital significance to the colonial peoples and that their identity with the common cause should be fostered, the "co-operation" now imposed in Kenya reveals again how false are some of the assumptions of our colonial administration. The European settlers have secured under the cloak of war urgency, another concession at the expense of the Africans.

Our information is still meagre, but the report of the Committee which recommended conscription does not reveal that any thorough consideration was given to the better use of the existing labour on the farms, to securing more efficient production either in the Highlands or in the reserves, or to the question of what respective contributions might be made by Europeans and Africans to war needs. The nature of the labour shortage, where it arises and why; in what respects the Government-assisted recruitment scheme at the end of 1941 was inadequate; the best means of mobilising the total man-power of Kenya and agricultural resources for the maximum effort, having regard to the existing social and race problems of the colony—these are matters which are cursorily set on one side because "the African must be made to work" and compulsion be applied so as to secure African labour on the private European farms.

Throughout the report "European farms" might be read for the words "essential work." It is true that a warning is given that African manhood working outside the reserves should not exceed 55 per cent., but there is no suggestion that African agriculture can give anything to the war effort or that any drive should be made to develop the native economy. The economic and social effects of conscription are barely discussed. The effect of long absences on tribal life and on production of food crops in the reserves, and the reactions on the healthy development of native agriculture are all ignored. African boys of sixteen are to be taken, even from the schools, to mark the culmination of our native policy in Kenya, a policy which gave the Highlands to the Europeans (who are unable to cultivate a great deal of the land) and which depended for success on semi-serfdom and African labour subsidised by the reserves and made available by the pressure of native taxation.

There is no analogy between Britain and Kenya in this matter of labour conscription. The scheme is based on racial discrimination. The Committee was aware that inspection was fundamental to it if grave infringements were to be prevented. Its members knew that more labour inspectors could not be secured and that the district officers could give only limited assistance. They admit that much farm work is unattractive on account of the pay and conditions, that more labour would offer itself if conditions were fair and that there is discontent and short output where conditions are poor. But though they vaguely state that in fixing wages the Wages Committee should give attention to the maintenance of a proper standard of living for the natives and to the increased cost of living, the proposed machinery is weak and no recommendation for an increase in wages is made.

The European farms are subsidised by the African dependents in the reserves, who make it possible for the labourers to work at 3d. per day, or 7d. including food, lodging, etc. And the local authorities are aware that they are likely to do next to nothing about improving rations or housing, particularly on the middling and poorer farms. Even the suggestion that conscription should be fairly applied will not prevent the main burden falling upon the already industrious Africans who have fertile reserves demanding further development at their hands in the Central and Nyanza Provinces.

There are other unhappy features of the measure—the inadequacy of African representation in the machinery set up; the possibility of using handpicked Africans on some of the committees; the operation of penal sanctions; the absence of any provision for men in the spells between "contracts," for repatriation and facilities for travel home, or for responsibility for dependents; the relatively heavy fines on Africans for infringements; and the inequality of penalties as between employees and employed. The maximum labour permitted under the Forced Labour Convention is sixty days; here the minimum is eighty-four days, rising to one year. The sisal growers wanted "contracts" of labour lasting a year rather than the customary shorter periods of the men from the reserves and got their way.

Finally, if this price has to be paid by the African, why is it not accompanied by the guarantee of a new African land and agricultural policy, including the enjoyment by him of the uncultivated areas of the White Highlands? Why are there not definite assurances in respect to social and political development? Why not begin now with representation in the higher councils of the country? Undoubtedly European farming is again being bolstered up by the Government. But the effects of that policy are likely to disturb native life and the economy of the whole territory, to prejudice African development, and to set back production in the reserves.

The Colonial Office gave its hurried consent to this policy which regards Africans as helots for the profit of white settlers. It must be told that definite new safeguards must be introduced and the policy reversed as soon as possible.—Yours, etc.,

A. CREECH JONES.

House of Commons,

In a leading article, the "Manchester Guardian" commented:—

KENYA AGAIN.

The more the plan for conscription in Kenya, so hastily sanctioned by the Colonial Office, is examined the more reason is found for disliking and suspecting it. Mr. Creech Jones sets out the main facts in the letter we publish to-day. Roughly the position is that some twenty thousand more workers are wanted on the farms, and in order to secure this extra supply conscription is to be introduced into a colony with an unhappy record for the exploitation of the natives. The Colonial Office has apparently satisfied itself that the plan will be worked equitably, if such a term can be applied to any system of conscription imposed by white rulers on a black population that has suffered severely at their hands. (The white population has not yet been conscripted.) We wonder whether it would hope to convince the I.L.O. that this is the case. The conscripts are to work for a minimum of eighty-four days in the year and for a maximum of twelve months. The convention adopted by the International Labour Conference lays down that forced labour service is never to exceed sixty days in the year. Africans are to be conscripted at sixteen, Europeans at eighteen. The Africans are to work on the farms of the Europeans—on land, that is to say, from which the Africans were evicted—for the profit of the farmers. For employers and employed who break the provisions of the law the penalty is identical—a fine of £5 or two months' imprisonment. The African pays a fine that represents a year's income, an employer a fine that is nominal.

There are several other ugly features in the plan. But the whole plan is bad. Judged as a war measure it is unintelligent. Presumably the administrative staff of the colony has its hands full with essential work, all the more because some of its members have gone into the Army. Can the colony afford to divert so much of the energy of its depleted staff to the working of the elaborate machinery set up for conscription? The Africans, and not in Kenya only, will suspect that this is a plan not for winning the war but for giving to white men whose power is already excessive still more power over African labour. And that suspicion will be strengthened by the fact that in October the Government suspended the recruitment of Africans in Kenya for labour units in the Army.

The facts stated by Creech Jones in his letter, and commented on in the Guardian leader, give point to the Fabian Colonal Bureau Conference at Oxford, July 10-13, announced in another column. It also gives point to the pamphlet, "Freedom for Colonial Peoples," issued by the National Peace Council, 39 Victoria Street, London, S. W.1.

DOWN IN FLAMES

Sadly, in their prime, they'd taken
Leave of their loved ones and forsaken
Their old pursuits for new employ:
With greater might, might to destroy.

They'd chased the foe twixt clouds and stars
Beneath the gloating eye of Mars;
Had swooped and dived and mounted higher
Midst fusillades of raking fire;

Till deathwards blazing through the clouds
They'd plunged—nor had they need of shrouds
And Mars, the fiery god, joy-crazed,
The victors and the vanquished praised.

THE LORD HELPS THOSE

By

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The story of the self-help experiment inaugurated in Nova Scotia by Dr. Tompkins and Dr. Coady of St. Francis Xavier University, and described by Mr. Bertram B. Fowler in his book "The Lord Helps Those . . ." is of the utmost importance to monetary reformers and, indeed, to social reformers generally. Its interest to monetary reformers is, however, of a somewhat peculiar character, since the experiment records the employment of no unorthodox financial technique and Mr. Fowler's brief reference to monetary reform is, indeed, of a somewhat contemptuous character. His book is of supreme interest mainly because it is a record of how a handful of determined and enlightened men induced communities of people of British stock, living under conditions of dire poverty and ignorance (he says: "In many of these fishing villages the children of the fishermen were not being educated because they had not sufficient clothes to cover them while they went to school") to think for themselves, co-operate and act intelligently in their own interests.

Any worker in the cause of monetary reform will know from bitter experience the almost heart-breaking difficulty of inducing people, no matter how great their need and how simple and obvious the remedies which are brought to their notice, to give any intelligent thought to matters which would make the whole difference to their happiness, or to engage in any form of constructive action. Dr. Tompkins, Dr. Coady and their friends, however, by sheer perseverance in the use of every ordinary method of approach, rather than by employing any strikingly new methods (with the possible exception of the Socratic tactic of constantly asking questions—"What do you want to do? Which problem do you think is the worst ?"—in order to provoke thought in those whom they addressed), actually did succeed in performing what many of us in our more despondent moments have been tempted to consider an impossible task. What they succeeded in accomplishing, others also can do.

In some respects their handicaps were greater than those which reformers in this country would encounter. The climate of Little Dover, one of the pioneer fishing villages where the experiment was first started, was harsher than it is in our own land; the soil was more infertile and the people were more illiterate, many of them being quite unable to read or write. "Teachers and preachers saw themselves faced with an apathy born of poverty, a decadence that was destroying their people culturally and spiritually." On the other hand, the pioneers of the experiment may perhaps be considered to have been favoured by certain slight advantages. The very fact that the people of Little Dover and other villages were often unable to read and write, at least delivered them from the thought-paralysing influences of our own dope-propaganda Press and when they were encouraged to think for themselves, at least they could approach the new venture with minds not already cluttered up with mental rubbish.

For early building undertakings timber which in this country would have had to be purchased was apparently available for the cutting. The villages were also small communities and provided more manageable units for co-operative effort based on joint meetings for friendly study, than large cities could easily provide; although in fairness to the St. Xavier experiment, it should be added that study circles inspired by a similar spirit are said now to be starting even in some of the great American towns.

The poverty problem existing in Nova Scotia was not, in the main, quite the same kind of poverty problem that we encounter in Britain, although conditions in the depressed areas may be sometimes not very far removed from it. In Nova Scotia, the fishermen and others were being exploited by middlemen who bought their produce and sold it at a great profit in far-distant American cities, the middlemen paying in return only miserably small wages in cash or kind. *The profits these middlemen made never came back to Nova Scotia—they were spent in the big American cities and such members of the weekly wage-earning class as derived some benefit from their spending were resident in, or near, those cities and never in Nova Scotia itself.

As already indicated, the whole of the effective action of the small communities which were engaged, in raising themselves above the condition of crippling poverty in which they had previously existed, was based on active constructive thinking and on study circles where the people regularly met together and still meet to discuss, plan and take counsel. Dr. Tompkins saw that if he could awaken the people they would develop their own leaders. He said:

"No man really achieves true greatness any other way than by getting it from the people. Get close to the people with the desire to work for them and with them and they'll make you great. The people make giants." This conviction became the spirit and substance of his teaching. He went about among his people, questioning, prodding, challenging, seeking to waken their dormant faith in themselves and their own ability. He showed them what was wrong with the system under which they lived, and asked them if they were not ready to do something about it. He had the patience to give years to the task, to challenge any question again and again until the people began to stir and look about at the conditions that beset them. He had the patience to go on for years because he believed that when the people awakened they would find a plan of action and do something to change their world. Out of the mass meetings grew the study clubs. In each community Dr. Coady found the natural leaders who were awakened to action in the mass meetings. To help the leaders of the study groups a short extension course was arranged at the university, and the local leaders were brought in for education and stimulation. They proved that the people hunger and thirst for real education that is linked positively with the life they live and the problems they face in its daily round. Because of this fearless and vital practicality a new type of young men and women are making their appearance, speaking with new voices, questioning, challenging, arguing."

Nor was it only the young people who did this, for it is recorded that even quite elderly persons taught themselves to read and write and take an intelligent and constructive interest in the affairs of their community, disproving in their case the supposed truth of the popular saying that you can't teach old dogs new tricks. At a conference it was said that visitors:

"saw there what they afterward admitted was the most dramatic parade of speakers they had ever heard: men and women who had come out of ignorance and poverty to speak with intelligent power and clarity."

After thought came co-operation. The people worked together for the common good and showed themselves ready to help one another. It must be confessed that we in this country are often bad co-operators and I am afraid this applies even more to the members of the agricultural community than to others. People are far too suspicious of one another; too prone to petty resentment and jealousies; too much afraid that the other fellow will do them down; too unwilling to trust and , it must be added, often too undeserving of trust. Obviously, however, in a self-help community, this kind of spirit, which is neither commonsense nor Christianity, has got to go before any really good results can be obtained.

"Dr. Tompkins has declared over and over again that the whole tide of change must be spiritual and cultural in its basic conception and foundation . . . and that the whole aim of the adult educational program is . . . 'to make the Universe praise God.'"

"Although this educational movement has come out of a Catholic college, the pioneers in the work saw that . . . people of different denominations . . . could and should work together socially, ethically and economically. The whole program was launched on this basis and as a result has already lifted the work above denominational differences and sectarian boundaries . . . Protestant clergymen work shoulder to shoulder with Catholic priests and laymen of all denominations in pushing the work forward. Naturally, such a breadth of tolerance and understanding that transcends religious differences is pulling communities together on a broad platform of real ethics, culture and understanding."

Mr. Fowler's description of the early stages in the Little Dover experiment, contains humour as well as interest. The first decision that the community made with regard to their needs was that the village required a proper road to connect it with the neighbouring districts. As the work was of a nature which, unlike some of their subsequent building ventures, they could not undertake themselves, they decided to put in a request for Government help. The time was propitious, as an election was approaching and the local representative desired to stand well with his constituents. After the election, however, Government interest in the road at once began to languish and soon ceased and, as Mr. Fowler puts it, "it took three elections to get the road completed!"

The first action taken by the people of a little parish, Canso, of their own volition, was in 1927 when, a few days before the celebrations of the Confederation of the Canadian Provinces, they asked Dr. Tompkins "Why should we celebrate Confederation? What has the Dominion of Canada done for us?" Dr. Tompkins answered, "Maybe it's your own fault. Stop this grumbling about Confederation. Maybe you need to practise a little of it among yourselves. Maybe you need to try a little self-help." They thought it over and decided to send this telegram to Ottawa—"What are you going to do about the poverty among the fishermen of Nova Scotia?" The telegram caught public attention in the midst of the celebrations, was publicized and resulted in a Royal Commission being sent to Nova Scotia, whose report "was the first great pronouncement to vindicate and approve the thing for which Dr. Tompkins had so long struggled almost single-handed."

Incidentally, "The Lord Helps Those . . ." contains a very interesting reflection on the political results which follow when the members of a community start thinking for themselves and acting in an enlightened manner. They require intelligence and honesty in their Parliamentary representative also. At a time when our country is experiencing to the full the appalling consequences of an unthinking people governed by an unthinking Parliament, the importance of this desire for a higher standard of character and ability in political circles, cannot possibly be exaggerated.

I have already hinted that the Nova Scotia experiment did not involve any attempted modification in the orthodox financial system. It is true that mention is made of the Credit Union movement, but the credit unions, though serving a very useful purpose in the different small communities, appear to have been little more than savings banks where the money of the depositors was put to good use in the general interest of the community.

Mr. Fowler records the very interesting development of various home crafts and industries as a result of the self-help experiment, together with the enormous increase in the general standard of education and culture. Like many "craft" enthusiasts, he is perhaps a little over-inclined to condemn and desire to sweep away the mass-production of the machine age. Many monetary reformers, on the other hand, see in this mass-production a blessing to be developed to the full and distributed among all the people. The happy mean probably lies somewhere between their outlook and Mr. Fowler's. By all means let everything that is good in mass-production be made available to mankind with the aid of a money system which is a servant and not a master; but in cases where, as sometimes happens, mass production is placing on the market a shoddy and ugly article of inferior quality, then undoubtedly there is scope for its replacement by the more durable and beautiful product of the craftsman.

*"The dealers paid the fishermen fifty cents a hundredweight for deep-sea fish that cost the consumers twenty or more cents a pound." After they had learned to put their self-help into action, they were able to get twenty cents a pound for lobsters which formerly had only brought them in six or seven cents. They also used to get $1.87 a barrel for salted mackerel, some years later they were receiving $6.46 a barrel. "Year by year the marketing authorities of the groups expanded. In 1934, the newly formed pools marketed 9,000 pounds of graded poultry. By 1937 this figure had risen to 85,000."

Mr. Fowler's book contains one interesting item which may not be entirely welcome to those who regard political agitation as the mainspring of all useful reform. He records the fact that in the days before Dr. Tompkins began his work, protest demonstrations of a Communist or Left-wing nature claimed the support of the bulk of the male population of the villages.

"Utterly dependent upon the seasonal fluctuations of the mines, the miners lived in a state of sullen rebellion. Periodically the rebellion flared out in open strife. Strikes and demonstrations did win for them some small gains in wages and working conditions." In the old May Day parades, seven thousand miners could be seen, with their sickle and hammer banners, and playing the Red Flag, parading in one town. Ten years later (and it is good to realise that all these great changes took place in only ten years, 1928-38), not more than a dozen men turned out for the May Day meeting. The significance lay in the changed thinking of the miners. They have been given a philosophy that worked—and that, after all, was what they were looking for in the days of their rebellion.

EVERYMAN'S AFFAIR

"Everyman's Affair" or "A Plea For A Sane Peace" Publisher, Andrew Dakers Limited. Price 2/6. Written by Miss A. Ruth Fry.

One sentence in "Everyman's Affair" by A. Ruth Fry (Andrew Daker Limited, 2s. 6d.) embraces the whole purpose of the book itself: "The only real victory will be the melting of hearts in the warmth of friendship; all other ways will only lead to more and more terrible wars." Such views are typical of the Society of Friends, to which Miss Fry belongs, and I cannot help thinking occasionally that the world would be a better place if we would all subscribe to the broad humanity of the principles advanced by this great movement. In fact I subscribe the idea, for what it is worth, that the World Unity which Miss Fry advocates would be quite unnecessary for ending wars if the entities of Nations were controlled by Quakers. I claim that one Quaker State would shame every other country into Peace, it would claim more victories than the most militant Power, or assembly of Powers, in the World.

Many who want World Unity on ideal terms, might find themselves unwilling but helpless Devil's Disciples. Where, then, might the Saints of this World escape to? While the World is made up of so many countries, and continents, it is ridiculous to suppose that all of them can be bad at the same time. One World Power would never remain good for all time.

GLASGOW ANARCHIST C.O.

WILLIAM DICK GRANTED UNCONDITIONAL EXEMPTION

SIR A. C. BLACK, K.C.

Sheriff Principal of Lanarkshire; Chairman of Glasgow and S.W. of Scotland, No. 1, Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal; M.A., LL.B. Glasgow University; Assistant Editor, Encyclopaedia of the Laws of Scotland, 1926-34.

[Reproduced from Glasgow Newspaper sketch, probably "Evening Times."]

William Dick, Motor Lorry Driver, 211 Rigby Street, Glasgow, E.1., appeared before the Glasgow No. 1. Tribunal on Friday, June 12, and stated his case for exemption as a conscientious objector, on the ground of his Anarchist opinions. Sheriff Principal Sir A. C. Black, K.C., presided and four other Members of the Tribunal were present. Dick was granted unconditional exemption. The decision was unanimous.

Dick sent in a written statement in support of his application on May 11. This statement was short and simple and read as follows:—

I am appealing as a conscientious objector. I am an Anarchist and I do not want the Tribunal to grant me exemption without a clear understanding of my vision. As an Anarchist I am opposed absolutely to violence and I do not believe that resort to violence can serve mankind at all in its progressive evolution. I am seeking exemption therefore on moral grounds. My opposition to war, although it is connected with my opposition to the State and to the State organisation of Socley, proceeds definitely from clear moral opposition to violence. How I came to hold this view will be stated to the Tribunal when I appear before it.

The official report states:—

Further evidence obtained at hearing. Heavy Lorry Driver for 20 years, with haulage contractors at present. Considers there should be no need for law in an ideal state. Is an Anarchist. Views held for 15 years.

The decision is recorded as follows:—

ORDER OF THE TRIBUNAL

(a) That the Applicant shall, without condition, be registered in the Register of Conscientious Objectors.

Was the decision of the Tribunal unanimous? YES.

Signature of Chairman, A. C. BLACK.
12th June, 1942.

Dick was treated with courtesy and understanding. Sir A. C. Black questioned him on his philosophy and enquired how society could protect itself without force. One member asked Dick if he believed in God, and Dick replied that he was an Atheist.

Comrade Dick discussed his case with us some months ago. He could have produced overwhelming evidence as to the period over which he has held definite Anti-Militarist and Anti-War convictions. We stated that, although we dislike appearing before Courts and Tribunals, we would have been willing to be one of his witnesses. We had newspaper reports of his meetings containing pertinent summaries of his comments on war. He had letters himself, extending through many years, in which his Socialist activity and approach were discussed. Dick informed us that he had no intention of making use of this wealth of evidence and that he proposed to stand before the Tribunal without witnesses. Too many people went before Tribunals, armed with letters, and assisted by witnesses. This meant they were over-anxious as to the result. He disdained such conduct. He has held his views seriously and soberly for many years. He knew this within himself and needed no external evidence. That fact ought to exhibit itself in his expression and his bearing before the Tribunal. Conviction meant something. The fact that he had held these views so consistently and so long also ought to have some influence on his character and personality. Therefore his sincerity ought to be obvious. If not, he would accept the consequences of failure.

Dick also explained that he intended to make his statement short and to the point. His aim was not to convert the Tribunal to his views but make it clear that he held his views sincerely and would not depart from them.

In this spirit he approached the Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal. The decision has justified his view. The decision is also a credit to the Tribunal. The business of this journal is to record events faithfully and to comment truthfully and usefully. We often criticise Tribunals. In this case we commend the Tribunal. From the standpoint of Sir A. Campbell Black and his associates, this country is actually at war. They do not see class distinctions any more than the Communist Party does when it supports Tory candidates against I.L.P. candidates, who, at least, make some profession of Socialism and economic understanding. They see the British Empire menaced with Hitlerism and forget that its statesmen destroyed the Spanish struggle and entrenched Hitlerism. So seeing, they feel a nervous impatience with and active antagonism towards the man who despises militarism and says that war is not the way to overthrow Fascism. Despite their mental opposition to pacifism, they listened to Dick's statement courteously. They questioned little although pertinently. Finally, they evinced their belief in his sincerity by granting him unconditional exemption. The result is to the credit of the Anarchist, who stood boldly before the Tribunal without wearying it with a mass of evidence; and also to the credit of the Tribunal, who measured his sincerity so well, without other evidence. It judged the man.

WILLIAM DICK

In this picture, Comrade William Dick is standing in front of banner, with his hands behind his back. On the opposite side also in the front of the banner, is James Dick. The latter has been released recently from Barlinnie Prison after serving 12 months imprisonment for refusing to take his medical examination. The two Dicks are non-related. William Dick is well-known for his Anti-Parliamentary and United Socialist and Anarchist activity. He was one of the founders of the United Socialist Movement and at one time its most active member. The banner is the famous A.P.C.F. banner, seized by the Glasgow Police at the time of the 1921 trial and detained by them for nearly two years. Its picture was the cartoon discussed during the trial.

Before joining the United Socialist Movement, William Dick was a member of the I.L.P., and was one of its most active members. For many years he has been one of the ablest open-air speakers in Glasgow. He played a great part in the Glasgow Free Speech campaigns.

EDITOR TO READER

There are many important things to be explained.

In November, 1940, we appealed for the sum of £1,971 11s. 3d. This was to meet the deficit to that date and to meet the expenses of our Hyde Park Free Speech case, which we carried to the Court of King's Bench, and fought in person. On that appeal we are, to-day, about £75 short. We would like that £75 cleared.

Since November 1940, we have issued the paper every month and published a number of pamphlets at a loss. A very complete pamphlet list appeared in our April number. It will appear again soon. We cannot carry lists every month, as we aim to give our readers new matter and each month a completely new paper. Something different. We can send comrades a catalogue.

Our intention was to close the appeal and to announce the name of every comrade who sent a donation. We believe in conducting honest and open propaganda and object to concealing the sources of our support. A difficulty has arisen here. Many comrades, working men, did not wish their names to be published because they were afraid of being victimised. In one case, a Liverpool comrade was visited by the police and questioned closely. She was asked to state her opinion of the Duke of Bedford. Some comrades complained of their letters being opened. We do not say that the letters were tampered with. But they had that feeling. Consequently, it is impossible to list acknowledgments, unless we slump a large number of small sums under the general heading, "Anonymous." This would be unsatisfactory and not explanatory.

One comrade gave up writing because we reproduced a letter and the London press commented. Some months ago a London paper stated that "The Word" was put in letter-boxes throughout the London area. This same paragraph appeared in two provincial papers. Comments about this alleged propaganda caused two comrades to withdraw their support. As a matter of fact the statement was false. We know our circulation. And we know that no such distribution as these papers suggest occurred.

Sectarian difficulties afflict us. Several readers object to ministers of religion writing in our columns. One minister objects to our personal atheist attitude and the record of our trials. Let us explain that we are proud of our trials. Also we have no objection to the Christian minister who makes a pulpit a rostrum against war. We are atheist and democrat. Yet another minister objected to us calling Unitarians "Christians." He sent us an article, which we published, and has not had the courtesy to write acknowledging either the paper containing the article, or some letters we sent to him. Another reader wrote objecting to the Duke of Bedford being reported in our columns, on the ground that Anarchists and Socialists ought not to mix with Dukes. Fortunately or unfortunately we hold correspondence with the Duke of Bedford. This is a consequence of the war situation. We believe in his sincerity and his right to be heard. We believe he is making a great stand for truth and humanity and so are pledged to second his efforts. The daily orthodox press is closed to him. His commonsense heresy is taboo. Our columns are open to him. They are open also to the Socialist dustman and the Anarchist cobbler. "The Word" is a forum of democracy and its columns are closed to none. It is open to all heretical opinion, and since we believe violence and exploitation to be wrong, to all Pacifist and all Socialist opinion. We see no reason why opinions should not conflict. "The Word" is an organ of thought and encourages thinkers. The editor is dogmatic. His opinions are exact and stated narrowly. No one need endorse them. He submits them for consideration. Every other reader may express his view equally.

In this issue we intended to print the House of Lords speeches of Lord Portsea and Lord Wedgwood. Both are held. Also the Duke of Bedford's speech on June 2, with Viscount Elibank's and the Earl of Mansfield's disgraceful attacks on the Duke. How he is hated for single-mindedness and robust commonsense over this subject of war. All this must be done later.

Our aim is to build a United Movement of peace, equity and freedom; to erect a forum of democracy. Knowing that life means an ebb and flow of faiths and convictions, and believing with the first Christians that the word is greater than the sword, we aim to establish within the British Empire and across all frontiers, THE LEAGUE OF THE WORD!

Will you become a member of this league, a stalwart in its cause, regardless of oppression, contempt or censure? If you will, please write.

Our correspondence is very heavy but slowly we will catch up with even that correspondence and reply to you. We believe that a living organ should maintain an intimate association between editor and readers. Your letter is awaited.

We ask you to make up that deficit on the November 1940 appeal. If readers object to their names being published, we must end this appeal in general terms.

Since November 1940 there has been a heavy monthly loss on "The Word." Think of the cost of paper, etc., to-day, and other difficulties. Reflect on that steady monthly loss. Do your best to help to bridge it. WE NEED THE IMMEDIATE HELP OF EVERY COMRADE TO KEEP OUR WORK GOING.

If someone tells you that this journal represents only a minority, and that we are opposed to a compact majority consisting of Vansittart, Donegall, Londonderry, Harry Pollitt, and Willie Gallagher, remember that a mob is not the people. Remember also the bold words of Wendell Phillips, America's immortal champion of liberty and anti-slavery, when he stood almost alone against the mob of conservatism and slavery: "ONE ON THE SIDE OF GOD IS A MAJORITY."

Those who stand for war and violence are never on the side of God. They are the transient majority that becomes history's repudiated and scorned eternal minority, the hopeless host of Satan, the legion of the damned.

An appeal against military service on the grounds of conscience was made by Major Lane Harvey, a Jehovah's Witness, who appeared before the No. 1 Armed Forces Appeal Board at Whangarei, on February 14.

"One cannot be a soldier of God and also a soldier of a nation under the power of the devil," said Harvey.

Mr. Cox: Would you take the oath of allegiance to the King?

Harvey: No, I would not take the oath of allegiance, so I must be disloyal. I am loyal to God, our King.

Appellant said he was not prepared to fight for his country.

Mr. Cox: Do you hope Britain will win the war?

Harvey: I am entirely neutral.

In reply to further questions, appellant said he would not care if there was a Nazi victory.

The appeal was dismissed.

On February 18 the Board dismissed a number of cases.

Saying that he was prepared "to fight to the death" in defence of New Zealand but was definitely opposed to serving overseas, M. H. Bowden, a clerk, appeared dressed in military uniform, and explained that he was pay sergeant in the 1st Auckland Battalion, in camp at Avondale.

Bowden's statement said:—

"I am a New Zealander and I do not feel any sense of patriotism to any other country. My ancestors left England early last century. I am therefore of English origin, but, as I am of the fourth generation, perhaps my lack of attachment toward England lies in that fact. . . . I feel that my duty as a soldier begins and ends in New Zealand."

The chairman said that appellant's appeal therefore was not correctly based on conscientious objection.

At Palmerston North, on Tuesday, February 18, Frank Marriott, slaughterman, appealed against overseas military service on conscientious grounds.

Marriott declared: "I don't believe in fighting for Capitalism—I am a Socialist."

Mr. Coleman, S.M.: What is your conscientious objection?

Appellant: It is based on Socialism.

Mr. Coleman: Would you fight for your home?—Yes, I am not a pacifist.

The appeal was dismissed.

Stating that he was a pacifist and a member of the Peace Pledge Union, and that he refused to become part of the war machine, John Archibald Baxter, a carpenter, residing at Brighton, appealed at a sitting of the Armed Forces Appeal Board, on February 15, against being called for military service.

In a letter to the board, the appellant stated that he was a pacifist, and had become a member of the Peace Pledge Union as soon as a branch was formed in his district.

The letter concluded:—

"I believe war and the preparation for war to be futile and contrary to the teachings of Christ and my conscience. I therefore refuse to support or sanction one. The last war was a war to end war. This in itself should be proof enough of the futility of war. War will never end war. I therefore refuse to become part of the war machine. I also refuse to compromise and perform work of national importance other than continuing my present occupation as a carpenter. I have held these convictions since the last war. My uncles, the Baxters, were conscientious objectors during the last war. They stood to their humane principles and suffered for them. To-day, their ideals are unchanged."

Baxter was questioned by Mr. A. N. Haggitt, the Crown representative.

Mr. Haggitt: Would you defend this country if it were invaded?

Appellant: I would do nothing in the defence of New Zealand and would do nothing to assist in any organised form. I definitely refuse to do anything at all in the war effort.

Mr. Haggitt: Supposing this country were invaded and your home attacked, what would you do?

Appellant: I would not kill, and I would not protect my home with arms. I think there is a power stronger than an invading army.

The Last Years of a Great Educationist: A Record of the Work and Thought of F. J. Gould, from 1923 to 1938 by F. H. Hayward, M.A., D.SC., D.Litt. and E. M. Whyte, F.R.HIST.S.

This work deals mainly with the three objectives which occupied F. J. Gould's thoughts and labours during the last fifteen years of his life—Education, Economics, World Unity. Much of the book takes the form of extracts from his letters;' and there are accounts of his dealings with Rationalism, Positivism, the Ethical Movement, the League of Nations Union, and the Social Credit Movement.

Those who knew F. J. Gould will find here a faithful record of him, and those who did not will discover a wise and penetrating personality whose influence will increase as the significance of his educational and social contribution is more realised.

CONSCIENCE IN COURT

By

ANNESLEY GUY ALDRED

Having recently had the melancholy experience of attending at some of the London courts, whilst some of my less fortunate Comrades have been sentenced for failing to submit to their Medical examination, I have since found myself making "odious" comparisons.

When the Conscientious Objectors Tribunals first started their "vivisecting" some two-and-a-half years ago, one could not help but realise the hatred and intolerance which actuated many of the decisions. The tremendous effect of personal bias showed clearly in the percentage columns of the various Local Tribunals. Nor could one fail, at times, to notice the marked effect of a good, or bad, lunch on the afternoon decisions.

Even so, the proceedings at that stage were, comparatively, academic. An appearance before the tribunal meant that one had committed the sin of being in the minority, but one had still not committed any legal offence. And one was expected to believe the Tribunal if they said you had no conscience, and accordingly to go forth and do what you were told.

Appearance, now, before the Magistrates, is a very different matter. It means that you have transgressed in fact as well as in spirit; that you have struck at the roots of the system upon which they depend and which they are there to defend. And the importance of the fact that you have struck at the roots, and not merely nibbled at the edge like a housebreaker or bank robber, is shown by the amount of venom which is frequently displayed. It matters not to the Magistrates whether your objection is religious or political; the fact is that you are a menace. One religious objector at Brentford, who endeavoured in vain to make a statement, was told bluntly that the Magistrates might recognise a higher law outside the Court but they certainly did not inside it. One degree worse than the Grocer who puts sand in the sugar all the week and goes to church on Sunday.

Actually, however much personal bias affected the results at each individual Tribunal over a period, superficially, at least, each individual case was given some consideration and the result could be affected by certain outside factors. Even this does not apply at the Police Courts, for each court has its own standard sentence. So that the mere matter of a borough or county border may make the difference between a sentence of four, six or twelve months; or, at one court which seems to have a liking for cat-and-mouse tactics, a sentence of one month followed, within a week or two of completion, by one of six months.

In some cases even the facade of justice has vanished and the whole proceedings are a travesty. One of my I.L.P. Comrades, Victor Rose, appeared at Brentford on 8th April. When his name was called he walked from the public part of the Court, past the Warrant Officer who, presumably, confirmed his name, and was marched straight out by a Police officer. During this walk which took from 5-10 seconds the Magistrate airily waved his arms about and said "Usual order, twenty-four hours in custody, to be taken before the Medical Board under Police supervision." The following day it took an average of about one minute each to charge, convict and sentence three other C.O.'s to twelve months each. Yet when Victor Rose elected to go for Trial at the Quarter Sessions it took about twenty minutes to place on record what was supposed to have occurred during the few seconds the previous day. As a matter of fact even the twenty-four hours on remand are unnecessary and spiteful. I have since learned from him that the conditions during that twenty-four hour remand were far worse than actual prison conditions. That this is quite unnecessary is shown by the fact that at Willesden the order is made, the C.O.'s are taken before the Medical Board and, if they refuse the examination, are back at the Court within an hour for sentence (incidentally only a six months sentence), as I had occasion to note when Patterson Rose, Victor's brother, appeared there on 13th April.

It is worthy of note in this article that when Victor Rose appeared before Mr. Thorpe, K.C. (Chairman) at the Middlesex Quarter Sessions on May 7th, the prosecution were so sure of the bias on the bench that their Counsel barely recited the facts of the case and made no effort to press the charge further. The Chairman made every effort to prevent Mr. Platt Mills, K.C. (defending) from developing any line of defence at all. It is to that Counsel's credit that he persisted valiantly with his case and refused to be browbeaten. He claimed that it was relevant to bring forward evidence as to the character, integrity and sincerity of the accused, on the ground that since only a maximum sentence was laid down in the Act it was obviously considered, when the Act was framed, that there were cases when a lesser sentence would suffice. Mr. Thorpe rejected this claim, but nevertheless it may very well have restrained him from giving the maximum sentence of two years, and giving instead the comparatively "moderate" sentence of twelve months.

In any case the Chairman would in all probability be the first to protest if, in a criminal case which he was defending he was refused the right, after conviction, to bring forward evidence of previous good character in mitigation. Even if one accepts the legal fiction that because a person has been turned down by a Tribunal he ceases to be a Conscientious Objector, surely it is not unreasonable to bring forward evidence that here is not a person who wantonly breaks the rules of decent society, but one who has previously behaved with normal understanding of his responsibilities. A person who may, therefore, be regarded as taking his present stand from motives of conscience and principle, whatever the Tribunal may have decided.

To deny such right, to refuse to hear such evidence, is to bridge the last small gap between the "freedom" for which this country is supposed to be fighting and the Fascism of Nazi Germany. ,

It is essential that that right should be demanded by those of us who believe in the right of conscience not because, in this or that individual case it may mean a slightly smaller sentence, but because it represents just that small spark of freedom which will, in the days to come, be fanned into a flame of international freedom and justice in a world which will not permit war. Because it represents just that small spark which, if it is extinguished will mean that the only outcome of this war, whatever the military result, will be the indefinite continuation of the degradation and enslavement of the workers of the world.

I do not know Platt Mills attitude towards this war but it is clear from his conversation during consultation, from his conduct of the case and from his indignation at the attitude of the Chairman, that he is both an able Counsel and a genuine champion of Civil Liberty.

The whole proceedings were thoroughly disgusting. Over half an hour had been spent by this Court solemnly deciding whether a motorist previously convicted of being drunk in charge of a car, should have his license reinstated. Yet the case of a person standing out for a principle would not have merited five minutes had the Judge had his way. He did in fact actually infer that he considered the case a waste of the Court's time and a deliberate hindrance of the war effort, although, when rebuked by Counsel, he denied having made such a statement.

"Freedom is in peril." The system which permits "justice" to be meted out according to the state of health, the personal prejudice, or the bank balance, of each individual magistrate, is the same system which so recklessly throws away millions of lives three or four times in every century. Yes, Freedom is in peril! and every C.O. who stands firm is defending it with all his might, and is helping to build a world in which there will be no war but which will dispense real justice. A world of decency and understanding, tolerance and happiness.

"THE PEACE OF CHRIST"

["Pax Christi" by Rev. Albert W. Belden, B.D., D.D.. Allen & Unwin, 3s. 6d.; Postage, 7d. extra. Obtainable through the Strickland Press.

The war has produced many able articles and short books dealing with the Christian Pacifist position and among these Dr Belden's book deserves a high place.

Even those old campaigners who may be tempted to feel that they are already familiar with every argument and appeal that can be put forward in support of pacifism will find much in it to interest and to inspire.

The central constructive idea of the book — the League of ultimate pacifism—though it might perhaps appear to some as a trifle suggestive of a concession to the frailty of those who would ask for a time of respite in which to "go first and bury their fathers" before accepting the full implications and duties of Christian discipleship, is fresh and original.

Dr Belden feels that individual pacifism is not enough and he seeks to build up a great international and interdenominational fellowship of Christians who pledge themselves to renounce war and everything to do with war as soon as they are directed to do so by their churches. This fellowship is open both to those who are already active pacifists and also to the much larger number of people who, while in general sympathy with pacifist ideals, find that pacifism is as yet, for them, impracticable. Dr. Belden is confident that the existence and work of a rapidly growing Fellowship of this kind would, in the end, compel Church leaders to accept the true Christian position with regard to war and issue a world-call to renounce war.

JOHN WESLEY ON WAR

Whatever be the cause of War, let us calmly consider the thing itself. There are forty thousand men gathered together on this plain. What are they going to do? See there are thirty or forty thousand more a little way off. And these are going to shoot them through the head or body, to stab them, or split their skulls as fast as possibly they can. Why so? What harm have they done to them? O, none at all! They do not so much as know them. But a man who is King of France, has a quarrel with another man who is King of England. So these Frenchmen are to kill as many of these Englishmen as they can, to prove the King of France is right. Now what an argument is this! What a method of proof! What an amazing way of deciding controversies!

What must mankind be before such a thing as war could ever be thought of on earth? How shocking, how inconceivable a want must there have been of common understanding, as well as common humanity, before any two governors or any two nations in the universe could once think of such a method of decision!

If then all the nations Pagan, Mahometan, and Christian do, in fact, make this their last resort, what farther proof do we need of the utter degeneracy of all nations from the plainest principles of reason and virtue? Is it not astonishing, that this is the naked truth? that within a short term of years this has been the real case in almost every part of the Christian world and meanwhile we gravely talk of the "dignity of our nature" in its present state. This is really surprising, and might easily drive a well-tempered man to say: "One might bear with men, if they would be content with those vices and follies to which nature has entitled them. This is all according to the natural course of things, and surely all our declamations on the strength of human reason, and the eminence of our virtues are no more than the cant and jargon of pride and ignorance so long as there is such a thing as war in the world. Men in general can never be allowed to be reasonable creatures till they know not war any more. So long as this monster stalks uncontrolled; where is reason, virtue, humanity? They are utterly excluded; they have no place; they are a name and nothing more."

Wild as the untaught Indians' brood
The Christians savages remain;
Strangers, yea, enemies to God
They make thee spill thy blood in vain.

TAXES, WAGES AND PRICES IN WAR

By C. H. NORMAN

[This article appeared in "The Railway Review" for March 6, 1942.—Ed.]

A recent inspired statement told the public that since the war began the cost of living had risen 28 per cent. and wages had gone up 26 per cent. It is not clear what the purpose of making this statement was; but, as the cost of living does not include direct taxation like the income tax, the comparison between the rise in wages and the rise in cost of living is merely ridiculous with direct taxation at its present level.

The objection to income tax on wages is that it is a drastic reduction in wages outside the usual machinery of negotiation by which wages are fixed, the wage being based on the maintenance standard of the particular class of workman. But there are profounder causes for the great discontent there is in the country at the operation of war finance and the glaring inequalities caused by the administration of conscription by a totally incompetent and stupid bureaucracy. One of the most dreadful evils of war is the placing in responsible positions of completely incompetent persons who are acting as dictators over the lives of their fellow citizens, such persons being quite unfitted, for the main part, to have control over a cat or dog or anything else. Their insolence is the only thing which exceeds their incapacity.

Railwaymen who are overworked and underpaid to a scandalous degree should be particularly interested in the unnecessary journeys involving waste of tran-power involved in methods of the War Office and the Ministry of Labour.

One of the many cases which have come under the writer's notice was that of a reserve officer called up, reported at place X, sent on journeys amounting to a thousand miles, signing up a few recruits, the travelling being largely by night, arriving back at a place ten miles from where he reported, having done absolutely nothing of any value to the country or anyone else! There were some hundreds of private soldiers who were moved about in the same way, arriving back at a post several miles from the place they had reported at originally.

The only underlying principle seems to be to send recruits or conscripts as far away as possible from their home connections, and, in the case of civilian labour, as far as possible from any job where their qualifications can be best employed.

The cost of this procedure in labour-power, fuel and money to the country is enormous.

An intelligent use of the transport system would reduce the cost of the war by a very large sum per day, while relieving the intolerable toil which is imposed on railway workers. All this kind of thing adds greatly to the cost of moved commodities of every kind.

Some people have expressed astonishment at the great rise in the prices of uncontrolled goods of all types in this war compared with the war of 1914-1918. But there is really no reason for such surprise when one recollects the whole basis of Capitalism is for the owning class to live on the profits of commodities handled whether they be goods or labour power.

No employer willingly employs anyone except with the intention of making some profit out of their labour. In many industries, the normal profit put on labour cost is from 80 to 100 per cent.; mining being an exception. The average net profit on persons employed in the dock industry, the building industry and the engineering industry is between 80 and 100 per cent.

The position of the trading class in commodities is rather stronger, and their outlook is somewhat different.

The class which deals in commodities has always striven (and with great success in the capitalist system) to pass on any taxation to the consumers of their commodities.

That is so well recognised and is so powerful a motive that even the Board of Trade permitted a substantial percentage to be charged by traders on the purchase tax in certain cases, the figure varying from 20 to 40 per cent.

The true reason for the enormous advances which took place in many uncontrolled commodities (such as chocolate before control was recently instituted) was the carrying out by the trading class of this policy of passing their taxation on to the consumer or the general public. Income tax standing at the high rate of 6s. 6d. to 10s. even on small incomes could not be recovered by the trader except through a steep increase in the price of the goods he was handling.

There was no warrant for the enormous prices charged for fruit and vegetables of the rarer kind in this war in any great advance in cost of labour or production. The basis of the traders' outlook being that they should not pay any taxes in reality, if they can be avoided lawfully, the prices of uncontrolled commodities and luxuries of all kinds were forced up, so that the general community should bear the burden not only of its own taxation but the taxation of traders in commodities.

Therefore, when one considers the present figure of taxation, one can see how hollow is the pretence of equality in its burden.

The working class and the professional class (indeed, the body of the community which does not deal in articles of commerce and trade) have no means of repelling this policy of the trading class except by a general municipal or governmental taking over of the sale of the necessities of daily life. The working class and the professional class cannot easily pass on their taxation burden, as the price of their services is fixed in such a way that fluctuations and changes take a long time to be brought about, as the railwaymen well know with their experience of the negotiating machinery.

The controllers of and dealers in commodities, on the other hand, can raise prices from week to week and even from day to day. A certain article purchased by the writer in the same shop varied substantially in price three times recently in a fortnight.

Another element, no doubt, in the increase in price is the fall in the internal value of the pound due to inflflation, concealed and actual, by the subsidising of commodities by the Government.

A curious illustration of how this internal decline operates can be taken from the business of selling foreign stamps, foreign stamps having also in peace time, when their movements are not controlled as now, a kind of standard or international currency. The Jubilee stamps of King George V. for the whole empire were fetching just before the war about £16 the whole set. The price to-day is ranging from £32 to £35. The curious thing is that, in the United States, where there has not yet been any marked decline in the internal value of the dollar, the dealers are offering the whole set for £15, which was about the pre-war price in England. As the dealers in the United States cannot export stamps to Great Britain, but dealers in Great Britain are encouraged to export stamps to the United States to create dollar exchange, the lower price in the United States has no competitive effect on the price of these stamps in Great Britain as would ordinarily be the case. The profiteering by stamp dealers in this respect is a remarkable example of what is bound to happen under a system by which people maintain themselves by the marketing of commodities whatever they may be, a method of livelihood which certainly should require more stringent regulation than has been the case in the past.

It is difficult to suggest any drastic remedy within the confines of the capitalist system in war-time. It is one of the elements in a society founded upon disguised robbery. But it is strong reason for criticising the conduct of Labour in entering into a government which is administering a system whose very existence is an affront to the working-class whose fortunes the Movement is intended to safeguard,

THE THREE NIGHTINGALES

By LADY DUNN

For years the English nightingale had built his nest "somewhere in Surrey" having built it he poured out his very heart in song all through the night, sitting beside it on a low bush, whilst his mate drowsed sleepily over the eggs.

Those were nights to remember.

Nights, sometimes flooded with moonlight —sometimes lit by great stars—but always scented by the growth of the English June countryside — buttercups, tall grasses, may trees, cows' breath and rain—simple things not gorgeous ones such as come to the nightingale family in Persia or Cashmir—where they almost swoon from the heavy perfume of roses, lilies, and jasmin.

The "English" nightingales were content —more than content.

The "Austrian" nightingales built too in the same spot in the Weinerwald where they had built before (long before) Beethoven one day walking there and sitting to rest, heard their song "Beside the Brook" and without so much as "by your leave" had put it into his Pastoral Symphony" — something still proudly talked about by the "Austrian" family of nightingales.

The "Italian" nightingale sang on and on in perhaps the lovliest setting of all—sang in a voice so pure so ethereal — that not only Keats felt that it would be no misfortune to

"Cease upon the midnight without pain
Whilst thou art pouring forth thy soul
In such an ecstasy!"

Three families of the same "immortal little bird" they knew and know nothing of such divisions as German—Italian—or British

Three airmen flew high
The first over the English countryside
The second over the slumbering Black Forest
The third over Rome.

Three great planes crashed and fell burning to the ground the young Italian airman fell near Beethoven's family of nightingales on his way to the Russian

The German crashed in Surrey somewhere near Glyndebourne and the Englishman over Rome.

Had they but known it—each had a requiem sung by a little brown bird — who pausing silent with fear for a few minutes—later burst into song again

As the flames died down.

"ONE SANE POLICY"

Under this caption, our contemporary, The Catholic Herald, in its issue for June 12, reviewed the House of Lords' debate on plans for the post-war world. It added:—

BUT SUCH PLANS DEPEND UPON A GENUINE CHANGE OF HEART IN REGARD TO THE FATE OF DEFEATED PEOPLES.

We do not agree with the Duke of Bedford's views about the practicability of making a sound peace with Hitler, but if the Duke continues to talk — and to talk almost alone — such sound sense about the conditions of a sound peace when the enemy is defeated, people may come to wonder whether he may not be more sound than he seems in other matters.

We absolutely endorse the following words of the Duke:

The caps are in the original. Our contemporary then quoted the Duke's powerful words defining "one sane policy after a great world war."

BEDFORD'S MAIDEN SPEECH
AN APPRECIATION
By
F. W. JOWETT

My dear Aldred, Since my return home I have read Bedford's House of Lords speech again. Second reading has increased my good opinion of it and my admiration for the man's courage. To go steadily on, apparently unperturbed by glaring hostility in that Chamber of refrigerated arrogance, delivering a well reasoned speech supported by citation of irrefutable facts, was a great achievement the effect of which will not have been lost in spite of general press boycott and all efforts to be-little it. The speech is now on the official records where it will bear witness for truth for all time. And the press boycott, although general, does not appear to have been quite effective for I understand that "The Times" and "The Manchester Guardian" carried reports. I have not seen them but if, as I expect, they were fair, they will have done some good service.

Yours Fraternally,
F. W. JOWETT.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—Many thanks for parcel of "The Word." It is a grand paper! I am glad you have printed my letter about "Gowrie." I know your space is severely limited but I am sure your "letter-box" page will be a popular one. These letters show the interest taken in the paper and readers may often find the name of someone they have known at one time. I know the people to whom I distribute "The Word" look forward to it each month with eagerness.

I was glad to read in the "Forward" of the collapse of the case against Comrade Aldred.

With all best wishes.

Yours fraternally,
HAROLD DEIGHTON.

York, June 2.

Dear Mr Aldred, — I am very interested in the pamphlets you have sent, and the one entitled "Historical and Traditional Christianity" I have already started to read.

It will be 12 years on Monday since I resigned my Orders and I have been living on the poverty-level practically ever since.

At present I am a laundryman at one of the local hospitals, but am leaving with a view to finding more suitable work.

I remember, some years ago, hearing you speak in Hyde Park and was much impressed by what you had to say. On that occasion I also had the pleasure of talking to you.

Yours sincerely,
A. E. S. RIDDLE.

Hillingdon, Middx, May 15.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Keep on 'keeping-on.' I try to be a Christian, so do not agree with all your inked thoughts, but I do like your Anti-War consistency.

But aren't there so few of us around? What a pity.

I do like the Duke of Bedford's stand for Christ. If Bedford is wrong and Vansittart right, then I am anti-God.

As regards the Socialist leaders in Parliament. How unscientific Socialism can be foisted on the rank and file of Trades' Unions by these chaps, beat me to a frazzle, and I am a Trade Unionist since 1911. But more facile pens than mine must re-fertilise the mind of the rising youth. It will have to be done. Where are the men to do it now? Frankly I cannot see or sense any. Can you? Hope you are 'tres bon.'

Fraternally,
W. E. BROOKES.

Southampton, June 5.

Dear Comrade Editor,—Even an old hand like you must have blushed at the tributes to you in the June "Word." I was pleased to read Sorabji among the correspondents. He was the enfant terrible a little while back—in Orage's "New Age", and I remember often enjoying his vitriolic writing.

Herewith another epigram for your enjoyment.

Bellow your cause the wide world o'er,
From studio and from steeple;
But leave out: "It's a People's War."
We Know . . . Its on the people.

In Haste,
W. A. RATHKEY.

Aldbury, June 9.

Dear Sir,—A friend of mine has sent a copy of "The Word" of June, 1942. Everyone must sympathise with your ideals, but I fear no progress will be made towards permanent peace unless War be treated as a disease of the body politic and preventive hygenic methods applied accordingly. Potential disturbers of the peace will always find some pretext for their mischievous activities in the form of a grievance, real or imaginary, with which to rouse to arms the people who little know the consequences. The true and only hygenic method is to establish a trusted tribunal for the adjudication of such grievances, just as the establishment of Law Courts in every civilised Country prevented the resort to violence of those who wished to assert their rights.

That was the theme of a small publication of mine when the War was approaching upon us, and I enclose a copy if you would like to make any use of its themes in your columns.

Yours faithfully,
C. L. NORDON.

London, E.C.4., June 8.

[We propose to place Mr Nordon's work before our readers. Also to reprint his essay from "The New Commonwealth" for July, 1939.—Ed.]

My Dear Friend,—I believe there is a big future for "The Word." I hope to see you concentrating more and more on exposing our rotten economic and financial system which creates wars for every new generation to fight. I came across an old comrade of yours yesterday. He occupied the next cell to you at Wormwood Scrubs as a C.O. in the last war. I told him a lot of your early history in Hyde Park when I first met you about 1903. His name is Chapman and he lives in Bristol.

I am rather anxious to read your "Devil's Chaplain." My memory goes back to a fine summer's evening in Hyde Park on a Saturday, when a young boy about 17 years of age gave a lecture on Robert Taylor. Dr K. Macdonald was your chairman. Ernest Park and Fred Howard were among your audience, who were amazed at your eloquence. Do you remember?

What a lot has happened since those free and easy days, and how slow the people are to learn. You have had an iron will to carry on.

I should like some more of your writings, also the Duke's. What a noble character he is. I met him some years ago at Newbury when he lectured for us on his favourite subject, money reform. What a curse money is!

Yours fraternally,
S. T. WILLCOCK.

Newbury, June 11.

My dear Aldred, — Thanks for copies of "The Word" for June and for the copy of "Why Blunder On?" I have not yet been able to start on the latter, but "The Word" is an exceptionally good number.

A friend of ours, who has not yet thought out his position, was staying with us on Friday and Saturday. He picked up a copy of the April number, which was lying about and was so taken with it that he insisted on reading much of it aloud to his wife and ourselves. Then he had to get hold of the June number and it was impossible to dig him out of it, until he had read it all.

Every good wish.

Yours faithfully,
(Rev.) H. CHALMERS.

Warrington, Junes 2.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—The June issue of "The Word" is excellent. Thanks for printing my poor appreciations of your effort.

As an Anglican Padre I do what I can to promulgate the Gospel I believe in, which is very different from the Gospel the Churches appear to believe in, yet there are thousands who are I believe hungering to hear the truth. They are sickened and "fed up" with warmongering parsons and bragging politicians. The churches should be ashamed that the present bombing competition goes on while they stand and mumble pious platitudes over the bodies of the victors.

May the circulation of "The Word" increase and its message reach an ever wider public.

Yours fraternally,
CAMERON NEWELL.

Ipswich, June 6.

P.S. It looks as if SITWELL was an alias of mine!

[Our comrade is correct. Through an error, we printed one letter above his right name, and a second letter above the name "Sitwell." The printed error explains itself. The editor's bad correcting is unforgiveable.—Ed.]

Dear Guy,—Lohr has booked the Conway Hall, Red Lion Square, Holborn, for Tuesday, July 7th, speakers to be Middleton Murray, F. A. Ridley, M. Kavanagh, with F. Lohr in the Chair. As you will see from the speakers this is not an anarchist meeting. Lohr thinks that there should be a movement out-side of all parties, to discuss the present world-crisis, and the out-come of the war.

Lohr works entirely on his own. He has not started a group, though that may come later for he has quite a following in Hyde Park.

Gapes walked away with the S.P.G.B. debate. Cash cut a sorry figure. He dragged your name in, in a sneering way, and warned their young members against the anarchists, for it was impossible to tell the difference between a policeman and an anarchist, and so on ad nauseum.

Yours for Solidarity,
M. KAVANAGH.

London, N.W.3., June 9.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—About a year ago I sent for my first copy of "The Word." Since then I must say that I look forward to its monthly advent more than any other of the papers I take. Not only has its quality been maintained, it has improved. You have gathered around you writers representative of every school of thought, and the growing numbers who take the definitely Christian standpoint in their attitude towards war must go a long way to prove that, though the "leaders" of the Church may be timorous and even time-serving, more and more of the "rank and file" are becoming inspired by the faith that ultimately will prevail against the gates of hell. I was particularly pleased to see the article by Le Messurier. He belongs to the Anglo-Catholic wing, and was the first Secretary of the Anglican Pacifist Fellowship. In "New Vision" for the Spring Quarter he wrote a beautiful little story called "Kyrie Eleison." I believe he had quite a distinguished career in the 1914–18 war. Of course the Duke of Bedford's articles are always inspiring, and I rejoice that he is coming more into the public eye. Undoubtedly he has all the qualities of leadership.

Have you noticed the deplorable attitude of the "Church Times" towards this war? I don't think any paper has said "Yes" so obediently to the Government and especially to the Prime Minister. I don't know who the Editor is at present, but I should think he would get an O.B.E. at least for his services in dispensing dope to Church people. After the P.M.'s "Gas" speech I noticed the following gem:

"Hitler may intend to use poison gas against the Red Army. If he does . . . . the copious stocks of poison gas prepared for such an event will be employed by British bombers against the Germans. . . . It is a filthy war. Hitler has made it filthy. It is for him alone to say whether he will make it filthier yet."

The late Archbishop Davidson in 1915 wanted to know how far that line of reprisals would carry us. He visualised a situation in which there would be nothing to choose between the nations which were at war, and in which it would become a matter of small importance, and probably of disputed fact, who began the general course of adopting these vile usages. His protest was unavailing—his prophecy was correct. And history is repeating itself with the exception that no Archbishop of Canterbury has protested against the Prime Minister's speech.

Again last week commenting on the Cologne bombing: "There is no good pretending that raids on such a scale are anything but horrible. The casualties among operatives and their families . . . . cannot but be enormous. Such is the method of warfare enforced by the Nazis on the civilized world. . . . The one good thing that can be said is that the heavier the bombing the quicker it may be all over."

Again and again during the period 1914–18 Archbishop Davidson deprecated this spirit, and even the present Primate, who goes out of his way to justify this war (methinks he doth protest too much!) has thought it necessary to utter a mild warning against gloating over atrocities such as we have been committing. But, in company with his predecessor, he has been ignored. And the Church will be ignored until, throwing aside vested interests and pride of place, she flings the whole of her undoubted strength into the fight against Mars and Mammon.

All good wishes,

Yours in the struggle,
(Rev.) A. K. SHREWSBURY.

Chevington, June 9.

Dear Friend,—Your June issue, received to-day, suggests a heavy deficit and though I find appeals growing in number—P.P.U., Peace News, War Resisters, Friends' Peace Board, Civil Liberties, etc., etc.!! I feel your good work cannot be hampered by financial embarrassment.

The world needs a return to sanity and courageous leadership to secure it for us—this appears to be your "raison d'etre."

Thanks and good wishes,
JOHN BULLOUGH.

DANIEL MULLIN WITH
AND
CHILD

Anarchist and Socialist comrades throughout Lanarkshire were shocked recently to learn of the death of our active and vigorous comrade, Daniel Mullin. The Anti-Parliamentary movement throughout Lanarkshire owes a great deal to the loyal and disinterested activity of comrade Mullin. "The Gazette." Blantyre, recorded his death in its issue for May 9 last. Referring to our comrade as "a colourful personality," our contemporary writes:—

We regret to record the death, which occurred in London last week-end, of a former well-known Blantyre man, Mr. Dan Mullin who, before going South about nine years ago, resided at 80 Victoria Street.

Mr. Mullin, who was 48 years of age, suffered from an internal complaint and died in a London hospital on Thursday last. He is survived by his wife and a family of ten children.

"Big Dan," who stood over six feet, was well-known and highly respected in this district. He was a colourful personality and had led a really adventurous life in many respects. He served throughout the first World War; was decorated with the Military Medal for bravery in action on the Somme and latterly sustained a serious head wound which necessitated a trepanning operation. In this connection Dan often humorously remarked that no matter how hard the times were he would never be "broke"—that he always kept a silver plate in his head!

Dan's politics changed with the times and he was an enthusiast for whatever cause he sponsored. Like many people with progressive ideas, he was very frequently in the minority, but no matter who it was with whom he may have differed ,they all agreed that Dan was sincere, good, and whole-hearted. He was not always strictly orthodox in his methods and a rather good story is told regarding an incident which occurred during a period when he was keenly interested in mining affairs. There was an unofficial stoppage at one of the local pits and, as might be expected, Dan was on the side of the strikers. The Union officials for the area met one night to consider the matter and it was generally recognised that their decision (for or against the stoppage) would have an important bearing upon the strike. It was also known that their decision was almost a foregone conclusion—they were against the unofficial stoppage.

Dan was strong in his support of the strikers and to prevent any Union edict which might tell against them he adopted a novel method of ensuring "delayed action." The Union officials at that time met in a wooden hut on vacant ground between the Vics' Park and the two-storey building adjoining. While the meeting was in progress Dan got a few other lads together and between them they turned the hut over on its side while the Union officials were still in solemn conclave!

It would, perhaps, be discreet to pass over the scene which followed as the officials scrambled out of the overturned hut, but Dan had gained his point —there was no decision given against the strikers that night!

Dan was a soldier of fortune (some might say misfortune) in some respects. He fought well and truly in France against the Germans; he was in Ireland during the "troubles" over there and assisted in training some of the Sinn Fein army; later he fought with the Republicans against the new Irish Government and, in more recent times, he fought and was wounded in Spain when he supported the Republican forces against Franco.

Dan was big—in heart as well as in physique—and his passing is a loss to all who knew him.

Every word of tribute paid to Dan Mullin by our orthodox contemporary is merited. Dan Mullin was an Anarchist and his struggles represented a consistent unfolding of his purpose and character. He believed in equity and liberty. He was one of the most sincere, fearless, and utterly disinterested men who ever lived. Under conditions of extreme struggle and poverty, he retained a flair for ideals and the romance of living. His death is a great loss to the workers' struggle. To know him was to live in a world of freedom, humour, courage far removed from the sordid reality against which he battled. The workers have laid to rest a brave and loyal member of their class, a true fighter in the battle towards classless society.
